Those who did the killing encountered a hitch, too. The family "were wearing what amounted to jeweled bulletproof vests," Mr. Steinberg said. When the bullets ricocheted off corsets and gems, the firing squad resorted to bayonets and rifle butts.

Is there an optimal way to execute a deposed ruler, then? If speed is paramount, "by far the best is the guillotine for dispatching anyone," said Geoffrey Abbott, author of "Execution: The Guillotine, the Pendulum, the Thousand Cuts, the Spanish Donkey and 66 Other Ways of Putting Someone to Death" and a former yeoman warder at the Tower of London. Points there, then, for the executions of Louis XVI and Marie-Antoinette ("Pardonez-moi," she said to her executioner as she trod on his foot, assuring that at least some niceties were observed).

Mr. Abbott would not say which of the 70 ways might have suited Mr. Hussein, but if the idea is to "pay the penalty untinged by revenge," then "I would say firing squad," he said. "The thought of a military execution is more honorable than a crude hanging."

Emperor Maximilian of Mexico got the former in 1867; Zulfikar Ali Bhutto of Pakistan the latter in 1979. In recalling Bhutto's execution, a jailer later wrote: "On the other side of the jailhouse's wall, in the prime minister's house, Bhutto Sahib used to get anything he wished for, from anywhere in the world. And today he could not even fulfill his simple wish of having a cup of tea."

Likely Blair Successor Blasts Hanging (AP)

AP, January 7, 2007

The likely successor to British Prime Minister Tony Blair condemned Saddam Hussein's execution as "deplorable" on Saturday.

Treasury chief Gordon Brown said he opposed the death penalty and hoped lessons would be learned from the mistakes made in Saddam's hanging, as well as from other difficulties encountered in Iraq.

"Now that we know the full picture of what happened, we can sum this up as a deplorable set of events," Brown said in an interview taped Saturday to be aired by the British Broadcasting Corp. on Sunday.

Brown's denunciation contrasted with Blair's silence on the issue. Blair, the chief U.S. ally in the war in Iraq, faces increasing pressure to share his views on the execution and has said he would speak about it in the coming week.

The former Iraqi dictator was taunted by onlookers as he was hanged Saturday, and an illicitly recorded video of his death was later leaked and distributed on the Internet.

Brown, who is expected to succeed Blair when the prime minister steps down this year, said the execution "has done nothing to lessen tensions between the Shiite and Sunni communities."

On Tuesday, Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott also described the circumstances surrounding Saddam's execution as "deplorable."

Blair's office said the prime minister did not necessarily support Prescott's view. However, Blair has endorsed an investigation into the manner of the execution.

UN Chief Urges Iraq To Suspend Executions (AFP)

AFP, January 7, 2007

UN chief Ban Ki-moon has "strongly" urged the Iraqi government to suspend imminent executions amid an international outcry over the bungled hanging of Saddam Hussein a week ago.

Iraq's embattled prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, meanwhile, threatened to "review" relations with countries that criticized Saddam's execution and announced a new security crackdown in the chaos-wracked country.

In a statement released by the United Nations, Ban "strongly urged the Government of Iraq to grant a stay of execution to those whose death sentences may be carried out in the near future."

Ban's cabinet chief, Vijay Nambiar, sent a letter Saturday to Iraq's UN representative reiterating Ban's backing of a call by the top UN human rights official "for restraint by the Government of Iraq in the execution of death sentences imposed by the Iraqi High Tribunal," the statement said.

"The letter also refers to the Secretary General's view that all members of the international community should pay due regard to all aspects of international humanitarian and human rights laws."

Two former Saddam henchmen -- Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and Awad Ahmed al-Bandar -- are expected to be hanged soon. They were found guilty along with Saddam of executing 148 Shiite civilians from Dujail, north of Baghdad, in the 1980s.

DOJ_NMG_0113417

Their executions, due Thursday, were postponed to Sunday, Shiite lawmaker Baha al-Araji from the group of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr told AFP earlier this week.

A senior official with Maliki's office said the executions were postponed "due to international pressure."

The December 30 hanging of Saddam sparked an outcry after the leak of an unofficial, grisly cellphone video of his execution that showed a guard taunting the former dictator moments before his death.

The UN secretary general's appeal to the Iraqi government Saturday for restraint followed a similar UN appeal in the case of the execution of Saddam, who was hanged within days after a court upheld his death sentence.

Ban, who took office on Monday, has declined to condemn or defend Saddam's hanging.

Iraqi's premier Maliki lashed out a critics Saturday, threatening to "review" relations with countries that criticized the bungled execution and arguing the hanging was an internal matter.

"The Iraqi government could be obliged to review its relations with any state that fails to respect the wish of the Iraqi people," warned Maliki, who has ordered an investigation into the illegal filming of the execution.

"We consider the execution of the dictator an internal affair that concerns only the Iraqi people," he said.

Maliki said the criticism would not deter his government from punishing other officials of the ousted regime.

"We will go ahead in applying the law against those who abused the Iraqi people and whose hands are stained with the blood of innocents," he said.

A number of international leaders have criticized Saddam's hanging, saying it appeared more like a sectarian lynching than a court-directed punishment after a guard, believed to be a Shiite, taunted the Sunni former president in his final moments.

The strongest criticism came from Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who said the execution had made Saddam a "martyr".

The man tipped to succeed Tony Blair as British prime minister, finance minister Gordon Brown, condemned the manner of Saddam's execution in an interview to be broadcast on BBC television Sunday.

"Now that we know the full picture of what happened, we can sum this up as a deplorable set of events," Brown said.

US President George W. Bush on Thursday acknowledged that the execution should have been "more dignified."

UN Urges Stay Of Iraq Executions (BBC)

BBC.com, January 7, 2007

New UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon has urged Iraq to suspend the execution of two of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's co-defendants.

His appeal comes amid growing international criticism of the handling of Saddam Hussein's hanging, at which he was taunted and filmed.

Mr Ban was criticised this week for failing to state the UN's policy of opposing the death penalty.

Saddam Hussein's intelligence chief and chief judge are also due to be hanged.

Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and Awad al-Bandar were convicted along with Saddam Hussein for their part in the killing of 148 Shia Muslims in the Iraqi village of Dujail in the 1980s.

Saddam Hussein was hanged on 30 December.

Campaign

In a letter to the Iraqi representative at the UN, Mr Ban urged restraint in carrying out death sentences imposed by the Iraqi High Tribunal

The BBC's Keith Adams says Mr Ban's comments on Saddam Hussein's hanging caused a stir this week - his first in the job.

He said capital punishment "was for each and every member state to decide" - words that seemed at odds with the UN's policy of opposing the death penalty.

Our correspondent says Mr Ban now seems to be asserting the established UN stance.

The UN said Mr Ban's letter "also refers to the secretary general's view that all members of the international community should pay due regard to all aspects of international humanitarian and human rights laws".

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has reacted angrily to the international outcry over the execution.

He said his government could review relations with any country that criticised the action.

Mr Maliki said the hanging was a "domestic affair" for the benefit of Iraq's unity, adding that the former president had received a fair trial.

International protest has continued, however. On Saturday Rome's mayor lit up the Colosseum to highlight Italy's support for a global ban on the death penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0113418

Italy this week began a diplomatic push to have the issue taken up by the UN General Assembly.

Former Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi called the execution a "political and historic error".

The UK's finance minister, Gordon Brown, described the way Saddam Hussein was executed as "deplorable" and "completely unacceptable".

He said the manner of Saddam Hussein's death would do nothing to ease the tension between Sunnis and Shias.

Several Sunni Arab countries have criticised the hanging as sectarian.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said it had turned the former leader into a martyr.

Not The Case (NYT)

By Noah Feldman

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

Even among those who opposed the Iraq war from the start, there was always hope that bringing Saddam Hussein to justice would be a saving grace of the entire misbegotten enterprise. Now it seems that even this comfort will be denied. Far from healing old wounds, as some suggested it would, his conviction by the Iraqi special tribunal has exerted little effect on the deepening civil conflict between Shiites and Sunnis. The often circuslike atmosphere of the trial, as well as the murder of three defense lawyers, led groups like Human Rights Watch to condemn the tribunal as flawed and illegitimate. And the charge for which Saddam Hussein received the death penalty did not include his most heinous acts. His execution must still remind the world of the horror of the atrocities he committed while in power. But unfortunately, the disarray of the legal process calls greater attention to the failings of the United States, the Iraqis and the international community in dealing with all that has come after.

Since its inception, the tribunal has been haunted by a fundamental problem that bedevils the new Iraqi government more generally: the nature and origin of its authority. That the Iraqi dictator deserved to be punished was never in question. But from what source did the tribunal, which was established under U.S. occupation and then affirmed by the sovereign Iraqi government, derive the right to do so? This was not an academic question. Saddam Hussein was found guilty and sentenced to hang for sending 148 men and boys to their deaths in the aftermath of an attempted assassination against him in the Shiite town of Dujail in 1982. Under Iraqi law at the time, the president was immune from prosecution. In order to satisfy the rule of law - and to avoid the appearance of victor's justice - the tribunal needed to be able to explain its basis for applying the law that was used to find him guilty.

In part, the tribunal sought to draw legitimacy from international law. The court found Saddam Hussein guilty not of ordinary murder but of "crimes against humanity," a grand-sounding, internationally recognized charge with intuitive moral force. When the phrase "crimes against humanity" was used at the Nuremberg trials in 1945, the convening nations did not bother to explain what gave them the right to define and punish such crimes. It was presumed self-evident that certain actions were so terrible that they must be treated as illegal, even if they might have been permissible under Nazi German law when they took place. The so-called Rome Statute, which created the International Criminal Court in The Hague in 2002, specifically defined crimes against humanity in terms drawn from the Nuremberg charter, and the definition used by the Iraqi special tribunal was copied from there.

Yet it is hard to believe that the Iraqi tribunal could convincingly claim its authority from the international community. Like the United States, Iraq has not ratified the Rome Statute. Indeed, the Iraqi tribunal explicitly avoided submitting itself to international standards so that it would be able to apply the death penalty, which most of the international community rejects. This resulted in near complete withdrawal of international cooperation in the investigation of Saddam Hussein's crimes and the trial itself, and the tribunal lost some of the perception of fairness that would have come from broader international participation.

So where, if anywhere, did the Iraqi tribunal get the right to punish Saddam Hussein for crimes against humanity? Sovereign nations like Iraq can, of course, punish whatever crimes they choose, and can change or abrogate their own earlier laws to do it. But there is something unsatisfying about offering this as an account, for it diminishes the tribunal's credible claim that the Iraqi dictator's actions reverberated worldwide, implicating not just Iraq but all of humanity. There must be some deeper source of law, apart from treaties or the dictates of the United Nations Security Council, that bans the systematic killing of innocents.

The most persuasive answer is that a law prohibiting crimes against humanity derives its authority from the inherent moral responsibility that lies with whoever has the capacity to punish truly heinous deeds. To be sure, in some cases the international community will bear that responsibility. In the case of Iraq, though, the international community was not in a position to act, not only because of the question of the death penalty but also because many of its members denied the legality of the invasion. Responsibility rested with the powers that actually held Saddam Hussein within their grasp. Their right - and their duty - was to bring him to justice.

DOJ_NMG_0113419

By these lights, the decision to charge Saddam Hussein with crimes against humanity was morally and legally justified. Nevertheless, the process fell short of what is needed to invoke the transcendent norms of universal justice. This was a profound failure. As with the other shortcomings of Iraq's government, many players were at fault here: the Americans for failing to provide security for the Iraqis, including the defense team; the Iraqis for failing to get the trial - or the country - to run smoothly; the international community for sanctimoniously disengaging.

But the fact that blame is to be shared does not mitigate the tragedy of this missed opportunity.

Arab Nationalism's Last Gasp (LAT)

By Robert D. Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

Saddam Hussein's execution likely means the end of the foolish secular Arab nationalism movement.

JUST AS THE demise of Slobodan Milosevic in Yugoslavia closed the lid on national communist parties in Eastern Europe, the demise of Saddam Hussein in Iraq appears likely to do the same for secular Arab nationalism across the Middle East.

And just as communism exited the European stage exposed for what it always truly was — fascism without fascism's ability to make the trains run on time — secular Arab nationalism will exit the stage revealed for what it always was: a despotic perversion of the western nation-state that lasted as long as it did mainly because of secret-police techniques imported from the former Soviet Union.

Arab nationalism's roots go back to the revolt against European colonialism in the early decades of the 20th century. But as it developed, it faced a serious problem: Because it was organized around the artificial national borders that these same colonialists had drawn — which generally ignored ethnic and sectarian lines — the result, in too many cases, was multiethnic rivalry and the subjugation of one part of the population by another.

In Iraq, for instance, the national borders created a state in which the majority Shiites were subjugated by the minority Sunnis (as we all now know). In Syria, the majority Sunnis came to be subjugated by the minority Alawites, who constitute a branch of Shiism (and who had been favored in the armed forces by the French). In Lebanon, it was the Shiites who ended up subjugated by both Christians and Sunnis.

No sooner were these independent new states created than the ties of faith and tribe were undermining them. A fragile unity of sorts could only be achieved by recourse to secular nationalism, which, on paper at least, aimed to transcend those bitter rivalries.

Indeed, the more artificial the state, the more extreme the secular ideology had to be to hold it together. To secure unwieldy tribal assemblages, for instance, an austere state socialism was required in Algeria, and a form of "Dear Leader Absolutism" in Libya. Because Syria and Iraq were also artificial constructs, these two states resorted to Baathism — another bastardized form of state socialism.

Contrast all this with places such as Morocco, Tunisia and Egypt, which were age-old civilization clusters whose identities, rather than artificial, harked back to antiquity. It should be no surprise that these places produced more benign forms of secular government.

The two extremes in the Arab world became Tunisia and Iraq. Tunisia, a small country of Sunni Arabs with no internal divisions, which traced its borders back to ancient Carthage, produced Habib Bourguiba, the Arab version of the enlightened Turkish modernizer Kemal Ataturk. Iraq, a Frankenstein monster of a country assembled from warring ethnic and sectarian groups by the British, produced Saddam Hussein, the Arab Stalin.

The defining fact of the Cold War years in the Middle East was competition among these insecure new states for the right to inherit the mantle of the deceased Ottoman Turkish empire, which had held sway over most of their territories for centuries. Because Israel served as a symbolic replacement for European colonialism, each new state tried to outdo the other to prove its anti-Zionist bona fides.

Egypt, the Arab world's demographic hub, had the advantage, especially as its leader, Gamal Abdel Nassar, psychologically mobilized the Arab masses by standing up to an invasion by Britain, France and Israel in October 1956, leading to a withdrawal of these "colonial" powers from the Suez Canal. Thus began the high-water mark of secular Arabism, which lasted until Nasser's humiliation by the Israelis in the 1967 war.

The Palestine Liberation Organization emerged in the waning years of Nasserism. It was modeled after the other secular nationalist movements — so much so that its foundational text, the 1938 book "The Arab Awakening," was written not by a Muslim but by a Greek Orthodox Christian, George Antonius. Another Christian, George Habash, became one of the PLO's most radical guiding lights.

DOJ_NMG_0113420

The defining organizational attribute of secular Arab nationalism was the military emergency regime — witness Egypt, Syria and Iraq — that justified its existence by the continued state of war with Israel. Also working against liberal change in the Middle East was the influence of the Soviet Union. With Soviet military and economic aid for the secular nationalists came the techniques of East Bloc security services.

Nowhere was this more apparent than in the two Baathist countries, Syria and Iraq. The result of made-in-Moscow surveillance techniques was the emergence in the early 1970s of a new class of dictator — Hafez Assad in Syria and Saddam Hussein in Iraq — who, unlike their predecessors, were not overthrown by yet another general or colonel after a short time in office.

These new men stayed in power for decades because anyone who opposed them, no matter how furtively, was soon identified and destroyed.

Thus it was that the Nasserites, the Baathists from Syria and Iraq and the austere pseudo-Marxists from Algeria vied with each other for influence. The PLO, as the supreme symbol of the anti-Zionist struggle, was the beneficiary of the competition. But when the Berlin Wall collapsed and aid from the East Bloc began to dry up, Palestine had still not been liberated, even as creaky, authoritarian bureaucracies across the Arab world were decaying.

Beneath the carapace of secularism, a disturbing brew of religious and sectarian tensions had always simmered. Islamism emerged from an upwardly mobile peasantry that had drifted into Arab cities from the countryside. In the countryside, Islam was an integral part of a traditional existence and generally nonpolitical, but in these pseudo-Westernized cities, filled with the worst sorts of temptations, religion required a severity and ideological component in order to keep families together and teenage boys from slipping into crime.

Alas, what really killed secular Arab nationalism — much more so than the dark influence of the Soviet police state or the mobilizing distraction of the Zionist threat — was the combination of a bad form of urbanization and what Middle East expert Michael Hudson in the 1970s labeled the "primordial identifications" of tribe and sect and religion.

As the secularized Arab state withered, these sub-state loyalties reemerged full bore, making even further mockery of the borders of the Arab world — because tribe- and faith-based communities have little use for national borders.

Those who proclaim today that the only real solution to the Arab dilemma is political freedom are correct. The problem is that they are describing a process that could encompass several bloody decades. After all, it took centuries for stable democracy as we know it to evolve in Europe. In this Darwinian shaking-out process, the new forms of political legitimacy may more closely resemble militarized social welfare organizations such as Hezbollah and the Al Mahdi army than the ramshackle contrivances of the European model that we saw in the post-colonial era.

Right before the trap door was opened, Hussein's executioners chanted "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada," referring to Shiite militia leader Muqtada Sadr — because what was supposed to have been retribution for crimes against humanity had, despite all of our efforts, turned into another sectarian killing. Such is the abyss that follows secular Arab nationalism.

ROBERT D. KAPLAN is a correspondent for the Atlantic Monthly and a visiting professor at the U.S. Naval Academy. He is the author of "The Arabists," among other books.

Antitank Mines Hamper Progress Of U.S.-Iraqi Assault (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

SAMOUDI, IRAQ — All they wanted was a hot meal.

Three days into a wet, cold offensive through a lawless region east of Baghdad, Iraqi soldiers persuaded their American counterparts to let them pull back to their command post for a dinner that wasn't out of a Meals Ready to Eat packet.

As dusk fell Saturday, an urgent message came in over a crackling radio: A blast, apparently an antitank mine, had ripped through one of the vehicles in the Iraqi convoy. Flames shot out of the stricken Humvee and ignited ammunition, sending rounds streaking into the sky. One Iraqi was killed in the blast and three were injured.

Along another stretch of road, two mines exploded Saturday less than 15 yards apart, injuring five American soldiers.

This morning as U.S. and Iraqi troops started to pull out, two more antitank mines tore through two Iraqi troop carriers one after another, injuring at least 21 soldiers, five seriously.

Antitank mines have become one of the top threats as U.S. and Iraqi forces press their assault in a Sunni insurgent redoubt said to be riddled with weapons caches, secret tunnels and training ranges. Their convoys have hit at least 10 explosive devices since the operation was launched early Thursday, most of them antitank mines.

"We used to be pretty good about finding IED [improvised explosive device] tripwires and such," 1st Sgt. Michael S. Clemens said. "But since they started using antitank mines, that hasn't worked so well."

DOJ_NMG_0113421

The devices first were used in the area in November, when U.S. forces faced off against fighters maneuvering through the irrigation canals that lace the region.

U.S. vehicles have been upgraded to withstand many attacks, including in some cases adding armor around their fuel tanks that Iraqi vehicles lack. U.S. forces also have developed strategies to mitigate the impact of the blasts, including driving very slowly so the effects are concentrated on the engine box, not the passenger compartment.

Iraqi forces are often less cautious. And they sometimes attach extra fuel containers to the sides of their vehicles, U.S. soldiers noted. It was not immediately clear whether that played a part in Saturday's fiery explosion.

After three days of slow, methodical searches through remote hamlets in the region about 40 miles east of Baghdad, some Iraqi soldiers had started complaining Saturday that they were tired from spending a rain-soaked night in uncovered troop carriers. Adding to the frustration, the day coincided with a scheduled troop rotation, when most had expected to go home. U.S. officers decided it would boost morale to allow them to drive back for a hot meal.

"We do not like the MREs," said one Iraqi 1st lieutenant, wrinkling his nose in distaste. He gave his name only as Ali.

Capt. Stephen Dobbins, a troop commander in the U.S. Army's 5th Squadron, 73rd Cavalry, was driving on the opposite side of a canal road Saturday when one of the American vehicles was hit.

The charred carcass of a Humvee damaged in the first blast had already been loaded onto a truck and driven over the same stretch of road when another Humvee rounded a bend and touched off the deafening blast. Dobbins jumped out of his vehicle and strode down the road to help oversee the response.

Soldiers rushed forward to pull dazed and bloodied comrades from the stricken vehicle. Medics applied bandages and intravenous drips. Black Hawk helicopters swooped in to collect the four most seriously wounded, including one soldier with two possibly broken legs and another sitting upright on a stretcher with a blackened face and bloodshot eyes.

The explosion had blown out the front of the vehicle, sending bits of twisted metal and a backpack flying at soldiers standing nearby. A panel that protects the gun turret dangled from its hinges, and the passenger compartment was filled with bits of equipment.

Once the wounded were seen to, soldiers turned to salvaging the wrecks.

As he turned back toward his Humvee, Dobbins paused to kick dirt over blood spots.

"I don't want them to be able to come back and see that we were bleeding," he said. "It's a trophy for them."

About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces are involved in the assault aimed at reclaiming an area military commanders say has become a haven for Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups.

The troops have been moving from village to village, hunting for weapons, fighters and intelligence. All military-age men are questioned and tested for explosives residue. But in most homes, soldiers are finding only women and children.

In Samoudi, many homes stood eerily empty Saturday as U.S. and Iraqi forces moved through the large farming community. At one house, rows of brightly colored plastic shoes were neatly lined up outside the door, and the remnants of the previous night's meal had not yet been washed from the pots in the kitchen. There was black leather furniture in the living room, a television set and a motorcycle, which U.S. forces call "the insurgents' Humvee."

"That's an awful lot of nice stuff to leave behind," Dobbins said.

Those who remained contended that there was nothing suspicious about their neighbors' disappearance.

"People are jittery when the forces come, so they gather together," said Madeha Alwan, a tall, weathered woman sitting cross-legged on the floor with her husband's second wife, his sister and a throng of children. "These children couldn't sleep last night, so we brought them here together." Her husband, she said, was tending to his sheep.

Searching through fields and grain stacks, troops found sniper rifles, hand grenades and ammunition boxes. Six men were detained for questioning.

In one building along a notoriously mined road, soldiers found equipment to amplify a radio or wireless phone signal and a map they believed might indicate weapons caches.

U.S. forces think the building served as an observation point, part of an elaborate early warning system that includes fires, flares and gunshots to alert fighters that vehicles are approaching. Thirteen men were detained there, the military said.

Calming Voice Sought In A Restive Region (LAT)

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

The Marines hope to persuade Iraqi women in Al Anbar province to talk their men into fighting the insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0113422

BAGHDADI, IRAQ — The living room of the local sheik is filled to the bursting point with women. Some are covered in traditional garb and say little. Others take pictures and talk excitedly. They have come together for an unlikely gathering in this patriarchal society: a women's discussion group.

The U.S. military is reaching out to women in several communities in the rebel stronghold of Al Anbar province, in hopes of persuading them to tell their husbands and sons to help in the fight against the insurgency.

"We want to empower the women to the point where they can have a positive influence on the men, when they're alone, in the home, in the bedroom," said Marine Master Sgt. James Allen, who helps coordinate the effort but, as a man, cannot attend the gatherings.

Angela Khadijah Williams, a public diplomacy officer with the State Department, goes a step further. She believes outreach to Iraqi women is essential.

"If you don't bring them in, you're not going to win," said Williams, who is based at Camp Fallouja to help with what the military calls the Women's Engagement Program.

In this community along the Euphrates River, 120 miles from Baghdad, Sheik Mal Allah has given approval to a women's group and allowed it to meet in his home. The turnout was so good for the recent session, he joked that if any more came, "they'd break my house."

Allah also is a member of the City Council and, along with his brother, has rallied residents to resist intimidation and hijacking of food by insurgents in surrounding cities. His brother is a colonel with the local police.

"You are my brothers," the sheik told a group of visiting Marine brass.

The women's outreach effort is in its first stages with no tangible results so far, another reason the Marines say the fight against the insurgency in Al Anbar is a long process where patience is key.

"Right now, we're relationship-building, listening to these women … building trust," said Marine Cpl. Jennifer McNamara, who is involved with a group in another community.

In Baghdadi, female Marines and Navy corpsmen have given lectures to the group on prenatal and child care and other health issues.

The U.S. has donated sewing machines. The Marine Corps plans to provide a building inside the troops' guarded compound here where the women can meet safely.

Brig. Gen. Robert Neller, deputy commanding general of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, said he hoped the women would realize that "the insurgency has nothing to offer these people."

The sheik has taken a strong stand against the insurgents. "They want to take us back in history," he said through an interpreter.

After initially being resistant to helping the Americans, the sheik has come to believe the United States presents the best opportunity to combat the insurgents and compensate for a government in Baghdad that he does not believe cares about this Sunni Arab community.

"Nobody helps us from the Iraqi government," he said. "They do nothing to remove our sadness."

So far, few sheiks are as willing as Allah to embrace the idea of women's participation. In Qaim, near the Syrian border, for example, the men initially gave their approval to a meeting of women but then withdrew it.

Finding a sheik to step forward in the fight against the insurgency is not easy, Marines said. In the nearby community of Hit, no sheik has been as bold as Allah.

"Identifying trustworthy, reliable people willing to step up and take a position of responsibility has been difficult," said Army Capt. Will Bardenwerper, whose unit has responsibility for Hit.

"There's just been so much murder and intimidation," he said.

Even when a sheik offers help, the Americans have learned to be cautious. Some sheiks claim authority they don't have. Some make promises they don't keep, Marines said.

A sheik functions as a kind of village elder, often receiving payments from members of his tribe.

The insurgency threatens to disrupt long-standing economic arrangements. The Americans try to convince sheiks that the Marines can help them retain their economic position and status.

Allah decided to help the Americans because food supplies for his community were routinely stolen by insurgents.

The U.S. sent his brother to a police academy in Jordan so the man would become part of the police department rather than form a militia.

At the recent meeting at Allah's house, the women of Baghdadi were attentive and apparently eager for more sessions.

McNamara said that in the gatherings she had attended, the women seemed to appreciate having someone listen to them.

The Marines are trying to be culturally sensitive, McNamara said.

DOJ_NMG_0113423

"We're not going to tell them, 'Throw off your veils and be free,' " she said. "We're not trying to change their culture."

Official: Evidence Doesn't Back Marines (AP)

By Robert Burns,

AP, January 7, 2007

U.S. criminal investigators found no evidence to support the claim of Marines charged in the deaths of unarmed Iraqi civilians that five were shot after trying to flee the scene of a roadside bombing that killed one Marine, a senior defense official said Saturday.

Investigators determined that all five Iraqis were shot within arm's length of each other and no more than 18 feet from the white taxi they were ordered to exit by members of a Marine squad in the western Iraqi town of Haditha, said the official, who is familiar with reports produced by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to publicly discuss details of the killings on Nov. 19, 2005.

Two Marines are charged with murder in the five deaths. They are Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich and Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz.

Two other Marines — Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt and Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum — face murder charges in connection with the deaths of other Iraqi civilians shot shortly after the killings by the taxi.

Through his lawyers, Wuterich has claimed he acted appropriately and within military rules governing the use of deadly force in combat.

Mark Zaid, an attorney for Wuterich, said in an interview Saturday he was highly disappointed that information from the government's investigative report on Haditha had been leaked to the media. He called it an effort by unidentified Pentagon officials to "portray a negative slant of these Marines."

Tatum's attorney, Jack Zimmerman, said he got the report the day after Christmas and has not "even begun to crack it." He called disclosure of details from the report a "serious, serious violation" and said he may ask the military to investigate the source of the leak.

Attempts on Saturday to reach lawyers for DelaCruz and Sharratt were unsuccessful.

Dela Cruz told investigators he fired bullets into the five bodies as they lay on the ground and that he later urinated on one, the defense official said.

These details about the deaths were first reported in Saturday's Washington Post, which said it obtained a copy of a lengthy government investigative report. The Post published photos from the investigative file that had not previously been made public; one shows the five Iraqis sprawled near the taxi.

One of the five may have been kneeling at the time he was shot, the defense official told The Associated Press.

In addition to the four Marines facing murder charges, four other Marines who were not at the scene were charged with dereliction of duty for failing to report or properly investigate the killings. In all, the case involves the deaths of 24 Iraqi civilians.

The Haditha investigation is the biggest U.S. criminal case involving civilian deaths so far in the Iraq war.

Members of an explosive ordnance disposal team that was summoned to the scene scoured the taxi and found no weapons or evidence of bomb-making materials, the defense official said. At least two, and possibly four, of the five Iraqis were students; the other was the taxi driver, who was taking the students to school.

The Marines claimed later that the five were attempting to flee and that they fit the profile of military-age men who, in the past, had acted as spotters for insurgents setting off roadside bombs. Zaid said Wuterich's position is that the five had disobeyed the Marines' orders, issued in Arabic, and were starting to flee. He said the report that they were up to 18 feet from the taxi supports Wuterich's position.

The NCIS investigators determined that the five had no apparent link to the bombing that morning in Haditha that shattered a Marine Humvee utility vehicle and killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas; two other Marines were injured.

The shooting of the men near the taxi was the first in a series of violence responses by the Marines, according to the NCIS investigation. The Marines subsequently raided four nearby houses, killing 18 unarmed civilians inside three of the residences. One other was shot dead outside. Among the dead were women and children.

The Marines were with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, based at Camp Pendleton, Calif.

After the deaths, the Marines announced that 15 civilians had been killed in Haditha from a roadside bombing and a Marine firefight with insurgents. The Marines said eight insurgents also were killed. The Marines have since acknowledged that that report was false.

DOJ_NMG_0113424

The matter, involving an unusually large number of civilian casualties, was not investigated by the military until a Time magazine reporter inquired about the deaths in January 2006.

The military launched the first phase of its investigation in February, and in March it began a separate administrative probe focusing on how the matter was reported in official Marine Corps channels and whether there was an attempted cover-up. On the basis of that investigation, four Marines were charged with dereliction of duty.

The NCIS began its probe in March and it grew into the agency's largest criminal investigation in years.

One worry of military prosecutors is that American investigators failed to persuade the families of the any of the 24 dead to permit their bodies to be exhumed and examined to obtain forensic evidence.

The NCIS had hoped to gain access to the bodies so they could, for example, compare wounds on the bodies to the blood stain patterns at the scene and to other evidence and witness statements.

U.S. government officials went so far as to propose through the Iraqi government in Baghdad last year that a nongovernment humanitarian organization with medical credentials be permitted to exhume and examine the 24 bodies, but the families rejected that approach.

___

Associated Press Writer Elliot Spagat in San Diego contributed to this report.

U.S. Inquiry Backs Charges Of Killing By Marines In Iraq (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

An American government report on the killing of 24 Iraqis, including several women and children, by marines in the village of Haditha in 2005 provides new details of how the shootings unfolded and supports allegations by prosecutors that a few marines illegally killed civilians, government officials said yesterday.

The report, by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, contains thousands of pages of interviews with marines, Iraqi Army soldiers who had accompanied them and Iraqi villagers who had seen the attack. The shootings followed a roadside bombing that killed a young lance corporal and wounded two other marines, said a senior Defense Department official and another official who had read the report.

The evidence contained in the report, the most exhaustive of several inquiries begun by the military last year to determine what happened in Haditha that day, led prosecutors to charge four enlisted marines with murder. Four marine officers, who were not present during the attack, were also charged with dereliction of duty and other crimes for failing to properly report details of the episode.

The details of the investigation, first reported by The Washington Post yesterday, corroborate accounts of how the killings took place over a period of hours, as described by senior military and Defense Department officials last year in The New York Times.

But the report broadly expands those descriptions, and provides additional evidence, sworn testimony and accounts of witnesses that both prosecutors and lawyers for the accused marines are likely to use in upcoming courts martial, officials said.

The four enlisted men charged with unpremeditated murder, all members of a squad of Company K, Third Battalion, First Marines, are: Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich of Meriden, Conn.; Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz, 24, of Chicago; Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt, 22, of Carbondale, Pa.; and Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum, 25, of Edmond, Okla.

The attack on the Iraqis began after the roadside bomb blew up one of four Humvees the marines were traveling in on Nov. 19, 2005. Minutes after that, the report portrays Sergeant Wuterich, the squad leader, and Sergeant Dela Cruz as killing five men who had nervously piled out of a taxi that had stopped near the marine convoy, the officials said.

The men “were shot by Wuterich as they stood, unarmed, next to the vehicle approximately 10 feet in front of him,” the report said, according to a person who has read it.

Sergeant Dela Cruz said that as he approached the taxi, he saw some men standing near it with their hands in the air, officials said. After Sergeant Wuterich shot them, he continued shooting as they lay on the ground, and later urinated on one of them, an official said.

The marines, taking small arms fire from several locations near homes on either side of the convoy, attacked a home nearby, killing six people, including a young boy, a woman and two elderly people, none of them armed, the report said, according to officials and people who have read it.

The report said that marines told investigators who interviewed them months later that they believed they had permission from their superiors to fire at will inside that home and a second home they raided minutes later, officials said. They said an officer, First Lt. William Kallop, who arrived with other marines after the roadside bomb to support the squad under fire, told them to commandeer one of the homes.

DOJ_NMG_0113425

In one of the houses the marines raided, the report said, a 13-year-old girl, Safah Yunis Salem, said she survived by pretending to be dead after marines killed several family members, including her 3-year-old sister and 5-year-old brother, government officials said.

One person who has read the N.C.I.S. report and who is sympathetic to the marines' account of events said that its thousands of pages provides evidence for both prosecution and defense teams, and that drawing conclusions from it about the guilt of any of the accused marines is difficult.

"For every statement that said X happened, there's another statement that said Y happened," this person said, speaking only after being granted anonymity, because he was not authorized to discuss the report.

An N.C.I.S. spokesman declined to comment on the report, which it has not officially released, and said the agency was troubled by the leak of it to The Post. "N.C.I.S. strives to ensure the integrity of every investigation and finds the idea that someone might leak any of its investigative products to be deeply troubling," the spokesman said.

Several lawyers representing the accused marines expressed anger at the Defense Department, which they blamed for allowing the report to be given surreptitiously to a newspaper and, they said, potentially damaging their clients' cases.

"The defense lawyers are extremely upset," said Mark Zaid, a lawyer for Sergeant Wuterich, the squad leader who is charged with killing at least a dozen Iraqis. "The release of the entire evidentiary set is unethical and appears to have been done by certain Pentagon officials with the intent to harm the defendant's defense."

The report offer some contradictory evidence, and omits other issues about how the marine chain of command handled the aftermath of the attack that have rankled certain people within the military and defense department. One issue is the cash payments that commanders approved giving to families of people killed in the attacks.

Maj. Gen. Richard A. Huck, the commander of the Second Marine Division at the time, and Col. Stephen W. Davis, then the regimental commander, should have suspected the killings were improper, one Defense Department official said yesterday. Though the Marine Corps' official view of the Haditha matter remained that 15 Iraqis were killed by the roadside bomb, the Marine Corps nonetheless approved $2,500 payments to each of at least 15 families of people killed in the episode.

"The numbers simply never added up, and the Marines never acknowledged it," the Defense Department official said.

Marines' Photos Provide Graphic Evidence In Haditha Probe (WP)

By Josh White, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Capturing images of war on their digital cameras, as many troops in Iraq have done, Marines took dozens of gruesome photographs of the 24 civilians who were killed in Haditha, Iraq, in November 2005.

The images -- which investigators tracked down on several laptop computers and digital media drives, some in the United States -- provide visual evidence of a series of shootings outside a taxi and inside three homes that military criminal investigators have alleged were murders.

Much like the photographs that emerged in the Abu Ghraib prison abuse cases, the Haditha images have provided investigators powerful and visceral evidence of what happened. But unlike the detainee photographs, which were turned over to officials who then investigated the case, the Haditha images were discovered months after the shootings as more than 60 Naval Criminal Investigative Service agents scoured the globe for them.

Investigators found photographs on laptop computers that were shipped back to the United States and recovered images that had supposedly been deleted from a Sony PlayStation Portable memory drive, according to investigative documents.

Marines were found to have downloaded the images from each other's devices, traded them and loaded them onto personal Web sites; one Marine told investigators he saw some of the photographs set to music on another Marine's computer. Some were e-mailed from Iraq to a civilian in the United States, but none surfaced publicly until now.

Among the images, there is a young boy with a picture of a helicopter on his pajamas, slumped over, his face and head covered in blood. There is a mother lying on a bed, arms splayed, the bodies of three young children huddled against her right side. There are men with gaping head wounds, and a woman and a child hunkered down on their knees, their hands frozen around their faces as if permanently bracing for an attack.

Several Marines took photographs on Nov. 19, 2005, some of them as part of an intelligence-gathering operation and some in order to record what had happened to a Humvee that was destroyed by a massive roadside bomb, killing Lance Cpl. Miguel "T.J." Terrazas. The photographs of the bomb crater and the shredded vehicle show the power of the explosion that set the Haditha incident in motion.

DOJ_NMG_0113426

The images are contained in thousands of pages of NCIS investigative documents obtained by The Washington Post. Post editors decided that most of the images are too graphic to publish.

Ed Buice, an NCIS spokesman, said he could not comment on an open investigation: "NCIS strives to ensure the integrity of every investigation and finds the idea that someone might leak any of its investigative products to be deeply troubling."

One Marine who decided to hold onto the photographs made it certain that officials would have a clearer view of what happened that day. Lance Cpl. Andrew A. Wright, who arrived on the scene after the violence to care for the bodies, took photographs of the dead and kept a full set.

"I decided that it was in my best interest to obtain the photos I had taken that night," Wright told investigators. "Even though there was no investigation at the time, I felt that the photographs would be evidence if anything came up in the future. In my opinion, the people that I photographed had been murdered."

Because the killings in Haditha were not investigated until four months afterward -- initially, Marine officers decided the shootings did not appear out of the norm -- the photographs are in some cases the only hard evidence. Officials are hoping to use them to reconstruct the events because they have not been able to exhume the Iraqi victims' bodies.

NCIS officials are comparing the images with the Marines' statements about what happened.

Investigators have found 44 photographs that a civil affairs officer took in the days after the incident as part of an effort to make condolence payments to the families of the dead. The pictures show pockmarked walls and bloodstained floors.

Investigators also found video from an unmanned aircraft that was aloft in the region that day, but it began recording after the first reports of a roadside bomb and the initial shootings, according to the documents. The video shows Marines conducting door-to-door searches, according to an intelligence officer's statement.

Defense lawyers for four Marines who have been charged with murder in the killings said they believe it will be hard to prove anything based on the photographs alone, other than that the Marines killed the people while hunting for insurgents. The Marines have told investigators that they were following their rules of engagement.

Marine Corps officials believe that many of the photographs -- which show the results of grenade explosions inside civilian homes and close-range rifle shots -- are inflammatory by their nature, no matter whether a crime was committed. Investigators have gone to great lengths to keep them private. It is possible that even the most grim images will surface publicly in military court proceedings.

Witness Accounts Of Attack On Civilians Revealed (LAT)

From Times Wire Services

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — A Marine squad just hit by a roadside bomb in Iraq ordered five unarmed Iraqi civilians out of a taxi, and the squad leader shot them, witnesses say in a report obtained by the Washington Post.

The report by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which reveals previously undisclosed details about the Haditha incident, says a taxi happened upon the scene shortly after the explosion. Witnesses told investigators that the Marines' squad leader, Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, ordered the passengers out of the car.

Naval investigators said that Wuterich shot the Iraqis one by one as they stood next to the vehicle, about 10 feet from him, the Post reported Saturday.

Another Marine allegedly fired shots into the victims' bodies as they lay on the ground.

"They didn't even try to run away," said one witness, a young Iraqi soldier working with the Marine squad. "We were afraid from Marines and we saw them behaving like crazy. They were yelling and screaming."

Four Marines have been charged in the Nov. 19, 2005, deaths of 24 civilians, including women and children, that occurred immediately after a roadside bomb killed one Marine and injured two. In addition, four officers, who were not there during the killings but were accused of failures in investigating and reporting the deaths, have been charged.

Marines took dozens of gruesome photographs of the civilians who were killed, the newspaper reported today in a subsequent article.

Much like the photographs that emerged in the Abu Ghraib prison abuse cases, the images — which investigators tracked down on several laptop computers and digital media drives, some in the United States — provide visual evidence of what happened. But unlike the detainee photographs, which were turned over to officials, who then investigated the case, the Haditha images were discovered months after the shootings as more than 60 Naval Criminal Investigative Service agents scoured the globe for them.

The killings have led to the biggest U.S. criminal case involving civilian deaths in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0113427

After the taxi passengers were shot, the report says, the Marines raided nearby houses, firing indiscriminately in a bloody, door-to-door sweep, killing 14 unarmed inhabitants in 10 minutes.

The four Marines charged with murder in the killings are: Wuterich; Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz; Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt; and Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum. They face a maximum penalty of life in prison if convicted.

N.E. Toll In Iraq Nearly Doubles (BOS)

By Raja Mishra, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 7, 2007

Most of 40 killed in '06 were men under age 25

The number of New Englanders killed in combat in Iraq nearly doubled last year to 40, mostly men under age 25 cut down by increasingly lethal hidden roadside bombs, according to a Globe analysis.

Military analysts said the numbers underscore a troubling aspect of the war: Insurgents have been able to outwit American forces by improving roadside bombs and other improvised explosive devices, resulting in a steady stream of deaths among the young soldiers and Marines typically assigned to daily patrols.

In New Hampshire, 2006 was particularly difficult for military families. The number of Iraq deaths jumped from two in 2005 to eight, and five of last year's dead were younger than 25, leaving a trail of unfulfilled aspirations.

Behind the grim statistics are such young men as Ryan T. McCaughn , whose dreams of opening a bar and grill vanished in an instant in November when an improvised explosive device ripped through the 19-year-old Marine lance corporal as he hunted insurgents in Anbar Province.

"He was my heart and soul," said his mother, Nicole Cote , 44, of Manchester, N.H. "He was always talking about his future, about having kids and being a father."

Of the 40 New Englanders killed in Iraq last year, 26 -- 65 percent -- were under age 25, according to the Globe analysis. Overall, among the most recent 1,000 Americans killed, between late October 2005 and the end of December, about 56 percent were younger than 25, according to a recent Pentagon study.

"The people out on patrol are the most likely to be in that age group," said David J. Danelo , a Marine who fought in Iraq and the author of "Blood Stripes: The Grunt's View of the War in Iraq," a combat memoir.

"Young people assume the greatest risk in this war," he said.

Overall, New England fatalities in Iraq have fluctuated over the course of the war, dipping in 2005, then increasing last year to nearly the level of 2004, the first full year of combat.

The victims are often such young people as 19-year-old Michael L. Ford of New Bedford, one of the youngest Massachusetts men to die last year in Iraq, killed by an improvised explosive device in April. He sent his father a letter from Iraq that said only "Hi," typical of his sense of humor, his family said. Ford planned to convert his Marine Corps experience into a career in law enforcement.

Scott Procopio , 20, of Saugus, became engaged to his longtime sweetheart, Kristal Cerbone , just six months before he was killed by an IED in April.

McCaughn had his own plans.

"The one thing he always talked about was opening his own restaurant," Cote said. "It would have a full-service bar and serve all kinds of food."

McCaughn graduated in spring 2005 from Central High School in Manchester, where he took culinary courses. He saw the military as a way to pay for further culinary training and left for boot camp on Parris Island, S.C., one week after graduation.

"He was the kind of person that thought about everyone else," said his mother, her voice trembling. "He was special, very special."

The deaths of older servicemen were no less tragic. David J. Babineau , 25, of Springfield, killed last June, left behind two sons, ages 2 and 4, and ambitions of becoming a five-star general.

Increasingly, the agent of these deaths is the improvised explosive device.

The devices caused about 22 percent of the deaths among the first 1,000 troops killed, according to the Pentagon analysis. But among the most recent 1,000 deaths, they accounted for 47 percent of fatalities.

The numbers were even starker among New England military personnel killed last year: 57 percent of Massachusetts deaths and 75 percent of New Hampshire deaths were caused by IEDs.

Military specialists said the increasing frequency of IED deaths showed the insurgents' tenacity. IEDs are hidden along roadsides and sidewalks, and often triggered by cellphone signals or hidden timers.

DOJ_NMG_0113428

"It's a really cheap, easy, and anonymous way to attack. I could show you how to make one in about 20 minutes," said Paul Rieckhoff , an Iraq veteran and executive director of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America. "By the time I left in the winter of 2004, they were in full bloom."

The US military now teaches IED detection and handling during basic training. Humvees and other personnel carriers have been upgraded with armor.

In response, insurgents have come up with more sophisticated devices. They have also made bigger IEDs by using the tons of explosives that were stolen from unguarded Iraqi military buildings in the weeks after the US invasion in March 2003.

"There's been a competition between ourselves and the insurgents. Over time, the IEDs have gotten bigger, more powerful and the triggering devices have gotten more sophisticated," said Boston University international relations professor Andrew J. Bacevich , whose son is fighting in Iraq. "We've never been able to get the lead on that competition."

And with President Bush expected to announce this week that he will send tens of thousands of more troops to Iraq, military specialists predicted that roadside bombs will kill many more young Americans.

"A lot of these young people don't speak the language and don't have a good grasp of what's going on around them," said military analyst Loren B. Thompson of the Lexington Institute, a nonpartisan think tank in Arlington, Va. "It's easy for insurgents to use IEDs against them. And it will continue."

Case Tests Officers' Right To Dissent (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

1st Lt. Ehren Watada's lawyer likens his client's comments against the war and the administration to those of retired military officials.

Do military officers have the right to publicly voice dissent about their commander in chief and U.S. war policy?

That question highlighted last week's pretrial hearing at Ft. Lewis Army base near Seattle for 1st Lt. Ehren Watada, the nation's first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq. Watada faces a court-martial and six years in prison for failing to deploy with his Stryker Brigade last year and for making four public statements criticizing President Bush and the Iraq war.

"This is an important case that will test the limits of dissent within the Army officer corps," said Eugene R. Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice in Washington, D.C.

Watada, a 28-year-old Honolulu native who enlisted after the Sept. 11 attacks, said he gradually came to the conclusion that the Bush administration had lied about the basis for war and had betrayed the trust of the American people, making Watada ashamed to wear the uniform. In media interviews and in a speech at a peace convention, Watada also said that the Iraq war was "not only morally wrong but a horrible breach of American law," and that soldiers could stop it by refusing to fight.

Civilians would unquestionably be free to make such remarks under the 1st Amendment, but Army officials argue that soldiers voluntarily surrender some of that freedom when they choose to join the military. Watada's statements constitute the criminal offense of "conduct unbecoming an officer," Army officials argue.

"While service members do have freedom to speak, what you say must be in keeping with good order and discipline in the military and with national security," said Ft. Lewis spokesman Joseph Piek.

Watada's attorney, Eric Seitz, argued last week that even military personnel could voice dissent, particularly on issues of such public importance as war. In motions to dismiss the charges of unbecoming conduct, Seitz argued that Watada's dissent was respectfully delivered and did not rise to the moral failings the military code was meant to punish, which include "dishonesty, unfair dealings, indecency, indecorum, lawlessness, injustice and cruelty."

"Whether or not one agrees with Lt. Watada's conclusions, it was no sign of personal degradation or moral unfitness for him to speak his conscience on gravely important issues of war and peace," Seitz argued.

Seitz also argued that Watada was being selectively prosecuted; he noted that several high-ranking retired military officials had criticized the war effort and not been charged with any offenses.

Retired officers who draw a military pension are still subject to military law.

But two of those cited in Seitz's motion, Army Maj. Gens. John Batiste and Paul D. Eaton, said in interviews that they drew sharp distinctions between Watada's conduct as a still-active-duty officer and their own remarks after they left the service.

"It is totally inappropriate if not unauthorized for an active-duty officer to publicly criticize the chain of command," said Eaton, a 33-year military veteran who led the Iraqi security forces training program before stepping down last January. He subsequently called then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld "incompetent" and urged Rumsfeld to resign in an op-ed article.

Americans should not let sentiment against the unpopular Iraq war lead them to endorse behavior that undermines the military system and threatens national interests, Eaton said.

DOJ_NMG_0113429

"The American people have to have absolute faith that when the call to duty goes out, soldiers do precisely what their commander in chief asks them to do," Eaton said.

"What the American people can't have is an Army of people who on any given day can wake up and say, 'That's not what I want to do.' "

Batiste, who commanded the 1st Infantry Division in Iraq until March 2005, also said he had been careful not to criticize the war effort until he made what he called a "gut-wrenching decision" to resign from the military after 31 years. Batiste subsequently called for Rumsfeld's resignation and blasted U.S. policy for failing to commit enough resources to win the war, for watering down Geneva Convention prisoner protections and for promoting democracy over security.

"You don't [criticize] in public — not while you're wearing the uniform," Batiste said. "It's contrary to the culture and norms of the military."

Others have hailed Watada as a courageous soldier of conscience, including retired U.S. Army Col. Ann Wright and international law expert Francis Boyle.

Fidell of the military justice institute said officials chose not to prosecute soldiers who put "Impeach Nixon" bumper stickers on their cars in the 1970s. In contrast, he said, officials successfully pursued unbecoming-conduct charges against a military doctor who urged soldiers not to fight during the Vietnam War; the conviction was upheld by the Supreme Court.

Lt. Col. John Head, the military judge in Watada's case, is expected to issue a written decision this week on whether to dismiss the unbecoming-conduct charges before Watada's February court-martial trial. Those charges carry a maximum four-year sentence.

Head will also rule on whether to grant Watada's request for a hearing on the legality of the Iraq war. The lieutenant is arguing that the Bush administration failed to obtain proper authorization for the war and that the Nuremberg principles adopted after World War II require soldiers to refuse illegal orders. But Seitz said the judge indicated last week that he would probably not permit the hearing.

Contractors In War Zones Lose Immunity (BOS)

By Farah Stockman, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 7, 2007

Bill provision allows military prosecutions

WASHINGTON -- An estimated 100,000 employees of US defense contractors working in Iraq are no longer immune from military prosecutions, because of a little-noticed provision in a 2007 defense spending bill aimed at holding private contractors accountable for crimes committed in war zones.

For the past three years, an unprecedented number of private contractors in Iraq have performed jobs previously reserved for the military, with immunity from military rules that govern troops and from criminal prosecution in Iraqi courts.

The legal loophole caused outrage during the Abu Ghraib scandal in 2004. Soldiers involved in abusing prisoners were sentenced in military courts, but the civilian interrogators working alongside them for Titan Corp. and CACI International, two private firms, faced no punishment.

The 2007 Defense Bill, enacted in October, placed contractors and others who accompany the military in the field under the same set of military laws that govern the armed forces.

"Basically 100,000 contractors woke up to find themselves under the Uniform Code of Military Justice," said Peter W. Singer , a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution who specializes on civilian military contractors and whose article on a defense blog Thursday called attention to the change.

Previously, the code applied to "persons serving with or accompanying an armed force in the field" only during a war, which US courts interpreted to mean a war declared by Congress. No such declaration was made in the Iraq conflict. Now, Congress has amended the code to apply to persons accompanying an armed force during a "declared war or contingency operation."

The amendment, spearheaded by Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, was the latest in a series of moves by lawmakers to plug legal loopholes that had allowed contractors who had committed crimes overseas to escape justice. A Senate aide said the amendment passed with little discussion. "There was a concern about whether we have an adequate allocation of legal responsibility for contractors," said the aide, who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to speak to the media. "If they are not subject to Iraqi law, what law are they subject to?"

But the provision might also have unintended consequences, if the military chooses to use its new power to court-martial civilians. For instance, the language in the law is so broad that it can be interpreted as saying that embedded journalists and contract employees from foreign countries would also be liable under the military code. Other punishable offenses under the code include disobeying an order, disrespecting an officer, and possession of pornography -- far less serious than the crimes that Congress envisioned when drafting the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0113430

Contractors have yet to react publicly to the changes. A spokeswoman for L-3 Communications, which has sent hundreds of translators to work with the US military in Iraq, said the company could not comment on government policy. Calls to Halliburton, another major US contractor in Iraq, were not returned.

Some military law specialists said the move to allow civilians to be tried in military courts would raise alarm bells with human rights groups and the United Nations, and in US civilian courts.

"I think there should have been some kind of hearing before Congress passed this measure," said Eugene R. Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice, a nonprofit organization in Virginia. "Ultimately, if this power is used, it will create a substantial issue that would likely reach the Supreme Court, and it will put us at odds with contemporary international standards."

Fidell said that US courts have a history of throwing out convictions of civilians who were tried in military courts, including the 1957 case of a wife who killed her husband on a military base.

"There was a period of decades that you could have crimes by US persons overseas that could never be punished," he said.

In 1970, during the Vietnam War, a civilian contractor convicted of larceny in a military court had his conviction overturned because Congress had never formally declared war in Vietnam, and therefore the court-martial had no jurisdiction.

In 2000, in Bosnia, a group of employees from DynCorp International , a Virginia-based security contractor, were accused of stockpiling illegal weapons and participating in a prostitution ring. Military investigators found a home video of an alleged rape and extracted a confession from one of the men, but they were never prosecuted because they were deemed immune from court-martial and from Bosnian laws.

That same year, Congress passed the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act, which asserts that US federal courts can prosecute civilians working for the Defense Department overseas. But that law was largely geared toward crimes committed by relatives of troops and has never been widely used to prosecute contractors, Singer said.

Congress eventually broadened that law to include all US government contractors, but US civilian prosecutors have been reluctant to take on such cases because witnesses and victims are thousands of miles away in a war zone. The Justice Department team responsible for initiating such charges has not gone forward with any of the nearly two-dozen cases referred by the Pentagon and the CIA, partly because of lack of evidence, according to The New York Times.

Fidell said the Defense Department could decline to prosecute the cases, just as the Justice Department has, even though Congress has given the department the power to do so. Only a handful of contractors have been prosecuted in US courts, mostly for financial crimes under a whistle-blower statute that protects the US government from fraud.

British Deals Seen Hurting Fight Against Taliban (WT)

By Ahmed Rashid, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan -- British policy in Afghanistan is seriously damaging Western efforts against the Taliban, diplomats from allied countries have warned.

Officials from the United States and European members of NATO say Britain is increasingly at odds with its coalition partners over its policy of making arbitrary peace deals with the Taliban, while at the same time declining to put pressure on Pakistan to stop providing sanctuary to the Taliban leadership.

Diplomats in Kabul and Islamabad, the capitals of Afghanistan and Pakistan, say Britain's "go-it-alone policies" are threatening military preparations for a major Taliban offensive expected next month.

Western officials have strongly criticized a deal in Musa Qala in Afghanistan's Helmand province, where thousands of British troops are fighting a resurgent Taliban faction.

British commanders say the deal was struck with tribal elders, but it has been claimed that the agreement was actually made with the Taliban, who controlled the town. British officers deny the accusation.

The truce is now reported to be breaking down, with large numbers of heavily armed Taliban returning to Musa Qala.

Britain wants more such deals, but the United States and some NATO allies have rejected the idea.

Lt. Gen. David Richards, the British commander of the 32,000-strong NATO force, will be replaced this year by Lt. Gen. Dan MacNeil, an American who is expected to cancel all such agreements, officials said.

"We're going to have to fight those [Taliban]. I don't see any opportunity or need to negotiate," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher said recently.

DOJ_NMG_0113431

Europe's other contention is over the relationship with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

NATO is trying to forge a common front to put pressure on Gen. Musharraf to end the sanctuary that elements within Pakistan's intelligence services provide the Taliban.

The issue is of critical importance in the next few weeks as the Taliban is expected to recruit thousands of men and collect arms and other supplies for its spring offensive.

But Britain has resisted such pressure. Instead, Prime Minister Tony Blair lavished praise on Gen. Musharraf when Mr. Blair visited Islamabad in November.

The reason, diplomats say, is the cooperation between Britain's MI6 intelligence agency and Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) agency on Britain's domestic terrorist threat from British-born extremists of Pakistani origin.

"Even though British troops in Helmand are facing attacks from Pakistan-based Taliban, London is willing to sacrifice that issue in exchange for getting ISI help on its home-based terrorist problems," a senior European official said.

Bombs Target NATO Convoys In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

A roadside bomb struck a NATO vehicle in southern Afghanistan on Saturday, wounding one soldier, while a suicide bomber in a car wounded four soldiers in the country's east, officials said.

The roadside bomb hit the NATO vehicle in Zhari district in Kandahar province, wounding one soldier, said Capt. Andre Salloum, a spokesman for the NATO-led force. He did not disclose the nationality of the wounded soldier.

A suicide bomber, meanwhile, plowed his car into a NATO convoy in eastern Afghanistan's Paktika province on Friday, wounding four soldiers, said Mohammad Akram Akhpelwak, the province's governor.

The bomber struck the convoy, which also included Afghan security forces, in Bermel district, he said.

A NATO spokesman confirmed the blast and said some soldiers were wounded but he did not disclose the number. Most of the troops in that region are American.

The Bermel region borders Pakistan, and a U.S. base there sees frequent rocket attacks. Afghan and Western officials say that militants cross the border to launch attacks against Afghan and foreign troops in the country.

Afghan-Pakistani Bond Steadily Deteriorating (WP)

By Pamela Constable, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Plan for Border Fence, Mines Seen Deepening Distrust

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Jan. 6 -- A proposal by Pakistan to plant land mines along the border with Afghanistan, aimed at preventing Islamic insurgents from using Pakistan as a sanctuary, has aroused angry protests by Afghan leaders who say the mines would endanger innocent travelers and divide tribal lands whose inhabitants do not recognize the border.

The contretemps is the latest sour note in a deteriorating relationship between the neighboring Muslim governments, both staunch U.S. allies that are linked by the common threat of terrorism but divided by bitter cross-charges of failing to curb a growing Islamic insurgency that operates on both sides of the border.

On Thursday, after a lengthy meeting in Kabul with Pakistani Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz, Afghan President Hamid Karzai said there was still an increasing "lack of trust" between the countries. The plan to mine and fence the border, Karzai said bluntly, "will not prevent terrorism, but it will divide the two nations."

The tension has persisted despite a series of high-level meetings between Karzai and senior Pakistani officials, including the two-day visit by Aziz to the Afghan capital this week and a private session with President Bush at the White House in September that brought Karzai together with the Pakistani president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf.

Taliban insurgents have spread across southern Afghanistan in the past year, battling NATO troops and launching hundreds of attacks, including suicide bombings against government facilities, military convoys and schools. Afghan and Pakistani officials have repeatedly blamed each other for failing to control the violent groups.

Karzai and his aides accuse Pakistan of allowing Taliban leaders and their sympathizers to seek refuge across the border, especially in the semiautonomous tribal districts. Recently, U.S. officials have made the same claim after months of defending Musharraf as an important partner in the war against terrorism.

"The Taliban have been able to use those areas for sanctuary and for command and control and for regrouping and supply," Richard A. Boucher, a senior State Department official, said during a visit to Canada two weeks ago, although he noted that Pakistani authorities had historically not "held sway" in the tribal regions.

DOJ_NMG_0113432

Pakistani officials, in turn, maintain that they have tried every possible means of reining in the Islamic fighters, first sending about 80,000 army troops to the restive border areas and then negotiating agreements with tribal leaders who pledged to control or eject armed Islamic groups. Both efforts have met with major problems.

"We have been the target of a whisper campaign that we are not doing enough, but no one has yet defined what enough is," Tariq Azim Khan, Pakistan's minister of state for information, said in an interview Saturday. "We have gone the extra mile, and we have lost many troops. This is a joint fight and a joint struggle, but we can only look after our side of the border. The Afghans have to look after their side, too."

Pakistan's latest proposal, to lay mines and string barbed wire along parts of the 1,500-mile border, has struck some observers as either cynical or far-fetched, but officials here insist that they are serious about it and that the work will begin sometime this month. They said they have made careful plans to avoid areas of heavy legal cross-border traffic and focus on others where clandestine crossings occur.

"If people take the legal routes, there will be no problem. They will be clearly marked," the information minister said. "Our intention is to go after those who want to move illegally," he said, comparing Pakistan's plan to the strenuous efforts made by U.S. authorities to stop illegal immigrants crossing from Mexico.

The minister noted that in addition to insurgent fighters, drug traffickers use hidden routes to bring opium out of Afghanistan, which produces 90 percent of the world's heroin supply. He suggested that drug-related groups, who are powerful in southern Afghanistan, could be using their influence against the border-sealing plan.

But Afghan reaction to the proposal has been negative for other reasons. Many Afghans have echoed Karzai's assertion that it would arbitrarily divide the Pashtun tribes that live on both sides of the border, while insurgents would continue to slip across.

Moreover, Afghanistan has endured terrible human suffering from hundreds of thousands of land mines laid during 25 years of military conflict, first by the occupying Soviet army in the 1980s and then by warring Afghan Islamic militia factions in the 1990s. The United Nations and other aid groups have spent millions of dollars on mine clearance, but many areas are still infested with the deadly devices.

"We are against planting mines on the border because we have many bad memories of mines in Afghanistan," Mir Wali Khan, a member of Afghan's parliament from Helmand province, said in a telephone interview Saturday. "This cannot possibly stop the terrorists, and it's not even clear where the border is. Pakistan always lies about trying to help us. They don't want a stable Afghanistan, they are just interfering in our affairs."

The information minister and other Pakistani officials insist that it is very much in Pakistan's interest to have Afghanistan become stable and peaceful, in part because Pakistan is tired of hosting several million refugees from years of Afghan conflict and is worried that renewed turmoil could send a new flood of people fleeing across the border. During his visit to Kabul this week, Prime Minister Aziz stressed Pakistan's determination to begin registering and returning all remaining refugees.

Taliban officials, for their part, have sent contradictory signals about their relations with Pakistan. Some have boasted that they can move freely in the tribal areas and also in the southern border city of Quetta, Pakistan, where the Taliban leadership council is widely reported to be based. But a statement this week attributed to Mohammad Omar, the fugitive Taliban leader, insisted that the entire movement was based in Afghanistan and was not receiving any foreign assistance.

Omar and other Taliban officials have vowed to step up their attacks against the Afghan government, its civilian collaborators and the 40,000 NATO troops stationed in Afghanistan, whom they condemn as infidel occupiers. They have rejected recent proposals by Karzai for tribal meetings or peace negotiations.

Solemn Duty In Section 60 (WP)

By Brigid Schulte, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Rising Death Toll of Young Service Members Complicates an Arlington Tradition

On a winter day when the rows and rows of white headstones were shrouded in a band of low-lying mist at Arlington National Cemetery, Jane Newman took her place in the white-gloved military honor guard. As the ashes of the latest fallen soldier arrived, she placed her hand over her heart in the civilian salute.

She didn't know this soldier or the family that shuffled behind his urn, shoulders stooped in grief. As usual, she knew only his name, Keith E. Fiscus. His age, 26. His years of service in the Army, four, and the names of his next of kin. Yet when she went through the paperwork that morning, she felt a pang. He was one more soldier killed in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0113433

When she was invited five years ago to become an Army Arlington Lady, Newman, the wife of a 30-year Army artillery officer and herself a retired Army nurse, was drawn to the group's mission: that no soldier is ever buried alone. Every fourth Tuesday of the month, she spends the day at Arlington, standing graveside, hand over heart, at up to six funerals a day.

When she started, most of the soldiers she was burying were World War II veterans or soldiers who had lived long lives. Handing a condolence card on behalf of the Army chief of staff and saying a few kind words from the "Army family" to a grieving widow was never easy. But these days, as the death toll from the Iraq war has topped 3,000 and many of the buried are young soldiers, Newman and other Arlington Ladies are finding it difficult to do their solemn duty. Some have asked to be excused.

"I find myself saying, 'Stiff upper lip, Jane,' " she said after a funeral. " 'Stiff upper lip.' "

An Arlington Lady does not cry. An Arlington Lady is not a professional mourner. She is not a grief counselor, according to their strict Standard Operating Procedure. She is there simply so that somebody is. Since 1973, when the Army chief of staff's wife saw a veteran's funeral with no one attending, an Army Arlington Lady, in muted civilian dress and often muddy pumps, has stood graveside at every funeral at Arlington as the personal representative of the chief of staff. Occasionally, she is the only one there.

She is part of a society open only to military wives or widows and then only to those invited to join. The Navy ladies formed in 1985. The much smaller Air Force had Arlington Ladies as far back as 1948. Now, the Navy, Air Force and Army have about 50 Arlington Ladies each. The Marines do not want to participate. The Marines take care of their own, the groups have been told.

Arlington Ladies adhere to a strict dress code -- no slacks, no bright colors. Sunglasses are permitted at all times. They stand at attention with the honor guard. Their role in the ceremony is brief: When the flag has been presented to the grieving family, they approach, offer a few words of comfort and a handwritten note and back away, never once turning their backs on the flag.

"We add a little more personal touch to the military funeral," explained Margaret Mensch, chair of the Army Arlington Ladies. "Yet not too personal."

Getting too personal got one Arlington Lady in trouble last year. After a particularly emotional funeral in section 60, where the dead from Iraq and Afghanistan are buried, she kissed the foreheads of the widow and mother. "She was reprimanded for that," Mensch said.

But it was just that gesture that Cindy Upchurch, the mother of Spec. Clinton Upchurch, who was killed by a makeshift bomb in Iraq, needed that day. "It was a blessing," she said recently. "I don't remember who the Arlington Lady was, but she was elderly and she was so kind. You could tell she was heartbroken. And at that point in a mother's life, when you've lost a child in a violent death, in a war, you need some human touch."

Lt. Col. William Barefield, Arlington's senior Army chaplain, says he sees Arlington Ladies as healers. "I watch the families. After we present the flag, you sense a little bit of sadness, like 'Oh, it's over,' " he said. And that's when the Arlington Ladies walk into what he calls the "eye of the storm -- the unbelievable sorrow for a death in war. They represent someone at the highest level of government. It's an acknowledgment that this life was one of a kind."

Their duty days are still filled with the funerals of old veterans. Of all the troops killed in Iraq and Afghanistan, fewer than 300 are buried at Arlington National Cemetery. "Some are so young," Mensch said, "the families want them closer to home."

Mensch has been attending funerals, stoic and tearless, for nearly 30 years. But the young ones killed in combat are difficult. When one of the dead on her schedule one day turned out to be her former honor guard escort, killed in Iraq, she had to steel herself. "You are still. You just don't cry. When I got there, I thought, 'Just concentrate on that leaf on that tree over there,' " she said. "A military funeral is very dignified. Very precise. It may sound cold, but that's the beauty of it."

Alba Thompson, an Army Arlington Lady, gets down on her knee and touches the hand of the widow or mother. It's hard, regardless of age, to approach what she calls this "sacred space." But it's especially hard when it's a young widow. Once, a widow wore a strapless dress. She caught herself wondering: Had she never been to a funeral before? Or was this his favorite dress?

"I tell them, 'I don't know what I can say right now to make you feel better. Just remember that thousands of people come through here, and when they see the name of your husband or your son, they'll know he was a good and honorable man. They'll know he served his country,' " she said. "Some of them nod, and some of them are bitter."

Only the Navy Arlington Ladies will meet the families before the service and send follow-up notes several months later to see how families are faring. The Army is just so much bigger -- and soldiers make up the majority of those killed in Iraq and Afghanistan -- so the Army Ladies can't, Mensch said. Nor does she want to intrude on families. "We're strangers to them."

On that December morning, Jane Newman found herself tearing up as six soldiers in dress uniform carefully smoothed and folded the American flag that had been draped over Fiscus's ashes. And taps always makes her catch her breath. When the flag was presented to Fiscus's mother, who collapsed over it, and the acrid air burned from the three volleys of rifle fire, Newman approached the mother. Perhaps it was better, she said later, that she didn't know Sgt. Fiscus once called his mother "as tough as woodpecker lips" and his hero. Better not to know, as she later read in the newspaper, that Pamela Fiscus had asked her son not to go to this war.

DOJ_NMG_0113434

She draped her hand over the woman's shoulder and told her, with a quiver in her voice, that the nation was grateful for her son's sacrifice. The mother continued clutching the flag, head bowed and weeping.

And because this is a controversial war, because recent polls show that the majority of Americans, including Pamela Fiscus, oppose it, Newman finds it difficult to say that sometimes. "It's particularly hard when the family is wondering, 'Are they dying in vain for this?' "

Those fears, said Paula McKinley, chair of the Navy Arlington ladies, are not new. "They have permeated every war since World War II." And all the more reason that an Arlington Lady be present. "We have to understand that every person buried at Arlington was a hero to someone."

As they sit at their desks between funerals, the Arlington Ladies keep their politics to themselves. They are military wives. They do their duty. And sometimes, not everyone comes out alive. Having been wives or mothers of soldiers, pilots and sailors, the Arlington Ladies know what it means when a commitment is made to serve.

As Keith Fiscus's family remained at the columbarium to mourn in private, Newman and her escort returned to the administrative building to warm up. "She was so upset," Newman said of Fiscus's mother. "It's a son. And you're not supposed to bury your children."

Later that day, the Defense Department announced that another soldier had died in Iraq.

DOJ:

Hopis Pleased Member Recommended (AR)

By Az In D.c., Billy House

The Arizona Republic, January 7, 2007

News last week that Hopi Tribe member Diane Humetewa was being recommended by Arizona's senators to President Bush as a potential nominee to be the next U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona was met with excitement in the village of Kykotsmovi.

Justice Department officials said Friday that they've determined she would not be the first Native American U.S. attorney in the entire nation, because past and former U.S. attorneys from states including Utah, South Dakota, New Hampshire and West Virginia have claimed Native American heritage. But she would be the first Native American U.S. attorney for the Arizona district if nominated and confirmed.

Hopi Tribal Vice Chairman Todd Honyaoma Sr. said Humetewa is a member of the Tobacco/Rabbit Clan from the Village of Kykotsmovi.

"We could not be more proud of and exhilarated for our sister and daughter," he said.

"The Hopi way is that we place a high value on education and serve as stewards to our communities and to the world. Ms. Humetewa has exemplified this value many times in her life," Honyaoma said.

"She will make history."

First days

After being sworn into office, Arizona's Rep. Harry Mitchell joined House Democratic leaders at a news conference Thursday urging colleagues to vote for a package of laws to improve ethics in Congress.

The House later acted on several measures, including those to bar members from accepting meals and gifts from lobbyists and requiring lawmakers to publicly disclose the pet projects, referred to as earmarks in legislative form, they want.

Mitchell, a former state senator, said there wasn't much of a difference between a Washington news conference and one in Arizona, "other than there was just more reporters and more cameras."

But he said he was genuinely surprised by one thing last week - the 15 minutes given to House member to cast their votes on the floor.

"I was comparing it to my state senator experience," he said, when everyone simply sat at their desks and voted.

"Here you get 15 minutes and people are walking around and talking," Mitchell said. "It's quite a bit different . . . there's no order . . . well, you have to get used to the order."

Reach the reporter at billy.house@arizonarepublic.com or 1-(202)-906-8136. Read his blog on Washington politics at dcblog.azcentral.com.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

More $200 Million Parachutes? Don't Be Shocked (NYT)

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

IT has been a bit bewildering to watch two failed chief executives in the last two weeks or so waltz away from their companies toting severance packages worth more than $200 million each. But pay experts say shareholders had better get ready for more of the same.

Last week, Robert L. Nardelli hightailed it out of Home Depot with $210 million, fast on the heels of Hank McKinnell, whose farewell package of a similar amount from Pfizer was disclosed Dec. 21. Both were paid profusely for failure, thanks to contracts struck years ago by the companies' directors.

Keep in mind that both packages supplemented pay that these executives received during their tenures. Mr. Nardelli's $210 million, for example, came on top of the $63.5 million he made running Home Depot for six years.

That exit numbers like these have shocked many shareholders proves how much inadequate disclosure has kept executive pay hidden from view. But with new rules from the Securities and Exchange Commission on improved pay disclosures, more of these "holy cow" moments will be coming soon to a proxy near you.

Under the new rules, companies will have to disclose potential payments to executives in the case of a termination or a change in control at the company, wrought perhaps by a merger. Unfortunately, the S.E.C. did not require that these payments be made in tabular form and totaled, which would have made it simple for time-pressed investors.

For the most part, however, the figures will be there in black and white.

Are we likely to see any $200 million numbers? Yes, said Mike Sorensen, a principal at Exequity, a law firm in Libertyville, Ill., that does compensation work. He expects such largess to show up at roughly 10 of the nation's 100 largest companies.

"There are a lot of big numbers out there for many companies," Mr. Sorensen said. "Directors right now are looking at these things and saying, 'Wow, these are really embarrassing; we have to revisit this.' But that won't happen overnight."

A CHIEF executive with 10 years of service at a top-100 company might typically be in line to receive $50 million to $60 million in pension obligations, deferred compensation and cash severance, Mr. Sorensen estimated.

That doesn't include the value of executives' share grants, however, which is a wild card. Executives who have received oodles of options over the years and never sold a share will have a much larger total value, for example, than executives who have exercised options regularly and sold shares.

But for all the work that went into the new disclosure requirements, they still leave shareholders in the dark in several crucial areas, said Brian Foley, an independent compensation consultant in White Plains. As a result, the total pay picture will still elude us.

"Things are not going to quite make it to the surface the way they should have," Mr. Foley said. "The summary compensation is not even close to one-stop shopping, which is what one S.E.C. commissioner said was the goal."

For example, Mr. Foley said the new rules should have required a cumulative tally of exercised stock options, restricted stock awards that could be cashed in and long-term incentive payouts. That way, shareholders could see how much wealth executives had already banked.

Another missing figure: dividends paid on restricted stock and unvested stock awards.

Neither do the rules require disclosure of how much the company has contributed to an executive's defined-contribution plan, such as a 401(k). For executives who have been at a company for a long time, this can be a big number, Mr. Foley said.

Also on his wish list is full disclosure of the impact of financial restatements on executive pay dispensed in previous years, especially for executives who were directly involved in activities that led to restatements. It is not as if restatements are rare: during the first nine months of 2006, according to the research firm Glass Lewis & Company, 967 companies restated their financial results, 6.5 percent more than did so in the same period the previous year. These restatements almost certainly mean that some executives were paid for results they did not actually achieve.

But the biggest hole in the new rules, Mr. Foley said, is that they do not require the disclosure of compensation or benefits that have been paid between the end of the year covered by the proxy statement and the date of its filing, which could span several months. Often, he said, companies make large grants in the early months of their fiscal years, but shareholders don't find out about them until more than a year later, unless they pore over insider-trading forms.

"What is the excuse for not having an update section that picks up the big-ticket items like employment agreements and equity awards that went to the big guys?" Mr. Foley asked. "The proxy at the time of mailing ought to be more current."

DOJ_NMG_0113436

Last week's outcry over Mr. Nardelli's exit pay certainly means that boards will be looking at their companies' tallies, even if they are preliminary. When they do, directors should quickly correct past compensation mistakes, said Jesse M. Brill, publisher of CompensationStandards.com, a Web site specializing in pay issues.

Two practices are eroding public trust in the system, he said. The first is the granting of stock to executives who already own so many shares that additional awards cannot possibly motivate them further. The second is to continue giving retirement, severance and change-in-control pay to people who have already accumulated "several lifetimes of wealth."

"Many boards will need to implement a coordinated offset," Mr. Brill wrote, "so that when accumulated gains from equity and long-term incentives reach an agreed-upon amount, post-employment provisions become unnecessary and are canceled out."

This is surely going to be a neck-wrenching change for executives and directors who seem unable to comprehend the concept that enough is enough. Breaking executives of their more-more-more habits won't be easy, of course. Thank Mr. Nardelli for getting directors' attention, at least.

Shareholders can do their part by withholding their support for any director who doesn't try to cut back on excess pay. That could make the coming proxy season more entertaining than ever.

He's Not Out Of Cash, But Is Out Of The Club (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

On the very same day that he left Home Depot last week with an exit package worth at least $210 million, Robert L. Nardelli walked away from another prominent position — without a cent.

While he was still Home Depot's chairman and chief executive, Mr. Nardelli volunteered as the chairman of a disaster-response task force at the Business Roundtable, a kind of club for corporate chieftains that lobbies for their interests.

Last month, he met at the White House with Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, and other top government and military officials to discuss improved collaboration on disaster preparedness.

On Tuesday, though, Mr. Nardelli had to quit the group. The Business Roundtable is only for sitting chief executives.

At least he is in good company. The roundtable's former chairman, Hank McKinnell, had to quit last year after he was pushed out of Pfizer, coincidentally with his own $200 million severance package.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Racist Murder Or Suicide? New Mayor's Death Roils Town (AP)

AP, January 7, 2007

WESTLAKE, Louisiana (AP) -- In the hours before his death on the evening of December 30, the first black mayor of this overwhelmingly white town started learning his new job.

About noon, he set City Hall's alarm system for the first time. He got instructions on how to raise and lower the U.S. flag. He had already ordered a new mayoral letterhead with his name on it and a button-down shirt embroidered "Gerald Washington, Mayor."

A few hours later he indulged in a hobby, placing a $4 bet at a nearby horse-racing track.

But by 10 p.m. Gerald "Wash" Washington was dead in the deserted parking lot of a former high school, a bullet wound in his chest. His gun was found by the body.

The coroner and the sheriff have pronounced Washington's death a suicide -- a finding that has embroiled this oil-refinery town in conspiracy theories, with Washington's kin and friends insisting he had no reason to end his life. (Watch what relatives have to say and why a second autopsy was ordered)

Some have accused police of covering up a murder -- perhaps a racially motivated one.

"This is the South, so of course everybody's going to say it was some white guy shooting a black guy," said Dr. Terry Welke, the Calcasieu Parish coroner who ruled that Washington killed himself.

Welke said soot from the pistol was deep in the wound, indicating the gun was touching Washington's chest when the trigger was pulled. That, he said, suggested suicide. He also said that while most gunfire suicides involve a bullet to the head, it is not unusual for people to kill themselves with a shot to the chest.

DOJ_NMG_0113437

But the coroner and the sheriff have offered no reason for why Washington would have killed himself. No suicide note was found. And there is no evidence he bade farewell to anyone, put his financial affairs in order, or gave any other indication he was about to kill himself, authorities said.

Washington's son, Geroski, accused the sheriff's office of doing a sloppy job, and asked the state police to take over the investigation.

"We were dissatisfied with the time frame of the investigation and the way it was opened and closed. We're thinking it's a cover-up because of the quick and fast work they did and didn't do," he told the American Press, the local newspaper.

State police entered the case earlier this week and took the body to Baton Rouge for another autopsy. The state police said it is interviewing friends of Washington's family, but it would not otherwise comment on the investigation.Popular, with 'a smile that would light up this room'

Gerald Washington, 57, was a Vietnam veteran, a retired refinery supervisor who spent 12 years as a city councilman. He stood about 6-feet-5 and enjoyed rumbling around town on his Harley Davidson, dressed in leather pants and chaps. Colleagues described him as magnetic, outgoing and always friendly.

"He had a smile that would just light up this room," said the outgoing mayor, Dudley Dixon. "He had a just dominating personality."

Washington's popularity was obvious: He defeated a white opponent in last fall's election with 69 percent of the vote in this town, which is 80 percent white. Westlake, population 4,500, is near Lake Charles, about 200 miles west of New Orleans.

On the day of his death, Washington met Dixon about noon at City Hall, where he learned about the alarm system. The men lowered the flag to half-staff, to commemorate the death of former President Ford.

A passing motorist called 911 just before 10 p.m., after spotting Washington's body in the parking lot of the school administration building that used to be Mossville High, where Washington went to school and played basketball. Washington lay on his back, in a T-shirt and baseball cap, the coroner's office said.Pearl-handled revolver and betting slip near body

Near the body was a pearl-handled revolver. On Washington's body investigators found a betting slip from Delta Downs from 4:44 p.m.

The coroner said the reaction of Washington's family to the suicide finding -- disbelief -- is not unusual.

"Almost every case of suicide is like that," he said. "Suicides give us more grief than anything else."

That explanation hasn't dampened rumors in town, particularly among blacks, that it should be a murder case.

"Someone lured him to Mossville," said Pat Hartman, 61, a lifelong resident of Mossville, the neighboring town where she and Washington went to school. "Why would he want to go to Mossville, to kill himself at his alma mater?"

"That boy didn't kill himself. Somebody killed him."

FBI: Man Tried To Extort $1.5M From Oprah (AP)

AP, January 7, 2007

Atlanta man allegedly threatened to release taped conversations

CHICAGO - A man has been charged with trying to extort $1.5 million from Oprah Winfrey by threatening to release recorded telephone conversations he claimed would hurt her reputation, according to the FBI and published reports.

Keifer Bonvillain, 36, targeted a person identified only as “a public figure and the owner of a Chicago-based company,” according to a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court. The Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Sun-Times, citing unnamed sources, reported Saturday that Bonvillain’s target was Winfrey.

Bonvillain, of Atlanta, was arrested Dec. 15 in the parking lot of an Atlanta hotel and released on $20,000 bail. He was scheduled for a preliminary hearing in Chicago on Monday.

Story continues below ? advertisement

According to the complaint, Bonvillain met a California-based employee of the Chicago company at a party more than two years ago, then recorded conversations with the employee about the owner and her business.

In mid-October he sent the owner an e-mail, telling her an employee said awful things about her, the complaint states.

‘It was a big mix-up,’ suspect says

A month later, Bonvillain sent a letter saying he had tapes of the conversations, an FBI agent alleges in the complaint. In response, another associate of the company called Bonvillain and learned he had taped 12 hours of those discussions.

Over the next few weeks, Bonvillain told the associate he wanted to publish a book based on the tapes and claimed he had received offers of $500,000 to $3 million from tabloids and book publishers, the complaint said.

“There are a lot of people who would want these,” Bonvillain said, according to the complaint.

DOJ_NMG_0113438

The associate, who was working with the FBI, agreed to a $1.5 million price, wired Bonvillain $3,000 in earnest money and arranged to meet him in the parking lot, the complaint said. Bonvillain was arrested the next day.

U. Student Sentenced For Hacking Into Professor's Accounts (DESERET)

By Geoffrey Fattah, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, January 7, 2007

A 22-year-old University of Utah computer science student has been sentenced to four months incarceration and 120 days home confinement after admitting to hacking into his professor's university and personal accounts, changing grades and reading personal e-mails.

During a sentencing hearing in U.S. District Court on Thursday, You Li promised U.S. District Judge Tena Campbell to lead a more honest life. "Those things were so wrong and were against my conscience and my beliefs," Li said.

Li, a Chinese national, was arrested by FBI agents at a campus dormitory last February. According to a grand jury indictment, Li was accused of using a software program to break into the university's math department computer system in December of 2004.

Li has admitted to using a professor's user name and password to attempt to change his grades in classes, read e-mails and obtain other passwords and bank account information.

According to federal prosecutors, Li also accessed the professor's personal e-mail account and installed a key-logging software that recorded the professor's other user names and passwords as well as other actions.

Li's attorney, Robert Steele, said his client has been "humbled" by his mistakes and assured the court his client would not get into any more trouble.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Scott Garland said Li's actions went beyond just changing a grade and that the student ventured into his professor's bank account and personal life.

Campbell called Li's actions "abhorrent" but noted Li's personality and potential did not warrant heavy prison time.

Li was sentenced to serve four months at a local county jail contracted with the federal system and then 120 days home confinement. Li cannot access an online-enabled computer without prior written permission by the court and is not to possess any data encryption programs.

Garland said punishment for Li's crime was necessary to send a message to other computer science students. In particular, Garland said the U.S. Justice Department is concerned about such students being recruited by organized crime groups.

Li faced a maximum of up to 15 months. Steele said had Li been sentenced to more than 12 months he would have been considered an aggravated felon and would have been immediately deported to China. As it is now, Li will still face an immigration review.

Attack Of The Zombie Computers Is Growing Threat (NYT)

By John Markoff

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

In their persistent quest to breach the Internet's defenses, the bad guys are honing their weapons and increasing their firepower.

With growing sophistication, they are taking advantage of programs that secretly install themselves on thousands or even millions of personal computers, band these computers together into an unwitting army of zombies, and use the collective power of the dragooned network to commit Internet crimes.

These systems, called botnets, are being blamed for the huge spike in spam that bedeviled the Internet in recent months, as well as fraud and data theft.

Security researchers have been concerned about botnets for some time because they automate and amplify the effects of viruses and other malicious programs.

What is new is the vastly escalating scale of the problem — and the precision with which some of the programs can scan computers for specific information, like corporate and personal data, to drain money from online bank accounts and stock brokerages.

"It's the perfect crime, both low-risk and high-profit," said Gadi Evron, a computer security researcher for an Israeli-based firm, Beyond Security, who coordinates an international volunteer effort to fight botnets. "The war to make the Internet safe was lost long ago, and we need to figure out what to do now."

DOJ_NMG_0113439

Last spring, a program was discovered at a foreign coast guard agency that systematically searched for documents that had shipping schedules, then forwarded them to an e-mail address in China, according to David Rand, chief technology officer of Trend Micro, a Tokyo-based computer security firm. He declined to identify the agency because it is a customer.

Although there is a wide range of estimates of the overall infection rate, the scale and the power of the botnet programs have clearly become immense. David Dagon, a Georgia Institute of Technology researcher who is a co-founder of Damballa, a start-up company focusing on controlling botnets, said the consensus among scientists is that botnet programs are present on about 11 percent of the more than 650 million computers attached to the Internet.

Plagues of viruses and other malicious programs have periodically swept through the Internet since 1988, when there were only 60,000 computers online. Each time, computer security managers and users have cleaned up the damage and patched holes in systems.

In recent years, however, such attacks have increasingly become endemic, forcing increasingly stringent security responses. And the emergence of botnets has alarmed not just computer security experts, but also specialists who created the early Internet infrastructure.

"It represents a threat but it's one that is hard to explain," said David J. Farber, a Carnegie Mellon computer scientist who was an Internet pioneer. "It's an insidious threat, and what worries me is that the scope of the problem is still not clear to most people." Referring to Windows computers, he added, "The popular machines are so easy to penetrate, and that's scary."

So far botnets have predominantly infected Windows-based computers, although there have been scattered reports of botnet-related attacks on computers running the Linux and Macintosh operating systems. The programs are often created by small groups of code writers in Eastern Europe and elsewhere and distributed in a variety of ways, including e-mail attachments and downloads by users who do not know they are getting something malicious. They can even be present in pirated software sold on online auction sites. Once installed on Internet-connected PCs, they can be controlled using a widely available communications system called Internet Relay Chat, or I.R.C.

ShadowServer, a voluntary organization of computer security experts that monitors botnet activity, is now tracking more than 400,000 infected machines and about 1,450 separate I.R.C. control systems, which are called Command & Control servers.

The financial danger can be seen in a technical report presented last summer by a security researcher who analyzed the information contained in a 200-megabyte file that he had intercepted. The file had been generated by a botnet that was systematically harvesting stolen information and then hiding it in a secret location where the data could be retrieved by the botnet master.

The data in the file had been collected during a 30-day period, according to Rick Wesson, chief executive of Support Intelligence, a San Francisco-based company that sells information on computer security threats to corporations and federal agencies. The data came from 793 infected computers and it generated 54,926 log-in credentials and 281 credit-card numbers. The stolen information affected 1,239 companies, he said, including 35 stock brokerages, 86 bank accounts, 174 e-commerce accounts and 245 e-mail accounts.

Sensor information collected by his company is now able to identify more than 250,000 new botnet infections daily, Mr. Wesson said.

"We are losing this war badly," he said. "Even the vendors understand that we are losing the war."

According to the annual intelligence report of MessageLabs, a New York-based computer security firm, more than 80 percent of all spam now originates from botnets. Last month, for the first time ever, a single Internet service provider generated more than one billion spam e-mail messages in a 24-hour period, according to a ranking system maintained by Trend Micro, the computer security firm. That indicated that machines of the service providers' customers had been woven into a giant network, with a single control point using them to pump out spam.

The extent of the botnet threat was underscored in recent months by the emergence of a version of the stealthy program that adds computers to the botnet. The recent version of the program, which security researchers are calling "rustock," infected several hundred thousand Internet-connected computers and then began generating vast quantities of spam e-mail messages as part of a "pump and dump" stock scheme.

The author of the program, who is active on Internet technical discussion groups and claims to live in Zimbabwe, has found a way to hide the infecting agent in such a way that it leaves none of the traditional digital fingerprints that have been used to detect such programs.

Moreover, although rustock is currently being used for distributing spam, it is a more general tool that can be used with many other forms of illegal Internet activity.

"It could be used for other types of malware as well," said Joe Stewart, a researcher at SecureWorks, an Atlanta-based computer security firm. "It's just a payload delivery system with extra stealth."

DOJ_NMG_0113440

Last month Mr. Stewart tracked trading around a penny stock being touted in a spam campaign. The Diamant Art Corporation was trading for 8 cents on Dec. 15 when a series of small transactions involving 11,532,726 shares raised the price of the stock to 11 cents. After the close of business that day, a Friday, a botnet began spewing out millions of spam messages, he said.

On the following Monday, the stock went first to 19 cents per share and then ultimately to 25 cents a share. He estimated that if the spammer then sold the shares purchased at the peak on Monday he would realize a $20,000 profit. (By Dec. 20, it was down to 12 cents.)

Computer security experts warn that botnet programs are evolving faster than security firms can respond and have now come to represent a fundamental threat to the viability of the commercial Internet. The problem is being compounded, they say, because many Internet service providers are either ignoring or minimizing the problem.

"It's a huge scientific, policy, and ultimately social crisis, and no one is taking any responsibility for addressing it," said K. C. Claffy , a veteran Internet researcher at the San Diego Supercomputer Center.

The $6 billion computer security industry offers a growing array of products and services that are targeted at network operators, corporations and individual computer users. Yet the industry has a poor track record so far in combating the plague, according to computer security researchers.

"This is a little bit like airlines advertising how infrequently they crash into mountains," said Mr. Dagon, the Georgia Tech researcher.

The malicious software is continually being refined by "black hat" programmers to defeat software that detects the malicious programs by tracking digital fingerprints.

Some botnet-installed programs have been identified that exploit features of the Windows operating system, like the ability to recognize recently viewed documents. Botnet authors assume that any personal document that a computer owner has used recently will also be of interest to a data thief, Mr. Dagon said.

Serry Winkler, a sales representative in Denver, said that she had turned off the network-security software provided by her Internet service provider because it slowed performance to a crawl on her PC, which was running Windows 98. A few months ago four sheriff's deputies pounded on her apartment door to confiscate the PC, which they said was being used to order goods from Sears with a stolen credit card. The computer, it turned out, had been commandeered by an intruder who was using it remotely.

"I'm a middle-aged single woman living here for six years," she said. "Do I sound like a terrorist?"

She is now planning to buy a more up-to-date PC, she said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gay "Marriage" Ballot Measures Running Their Course (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

The legislative approval of a marriage constitutional amendment in Massachusetts last week means that at least three states have a good chance of having such measures on their 2008 ballots.

But this is a considerably smaller crop of amendments than in previous elections, and there are signs that the state amendment strategy may have run its course.

The push to get voters to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman in state constitutions started in 1998, when traditional-values activists in Hawaii and Alaska used the tactic to overrule state Supreme Court decisions legalizing same-sex "marriage."

The amendment strategy took off after the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court legalized same-sex "marriage" in November 2003, and now 27 states have voter-approved marriage amendments.

But no other state court has followed the Massachusetts court -- in fact, nine recent court decisions have upheld state marriage laws -- "so, yes," the issue has "died down," said Glen Lavy of the Alliance Defense Fund, an Arizona-based legal organization active on same-sex "marriage" cases.

"But that doesn't mean that people are less interested ... and don't forget California," he said. The California Supreme Court will hear arguments on its same-sex "marriage" case this spring. If it reverses the state appellate court and finds a constitutional right to same-sex "marriage," "there will be a marriage amendment on the [California] ballot next year," Mr. Lavy said.

Meanwhile, of the 23 states without marriage amendments:

DOJ_NMG_0113441

•Florida, Indiana and Massachusetts are on track to put an amendment before voters in 2008. Florida has an amendment petition drive under way; lawmakers in the other states must pass the amendments a second time before they can be put before voters.

•Lawmakers in Iowa, Maryland, Minnesota, North Carolina and Pennsylvania debated but failed to pass amendments in their last sessions. Amendment bills could resurface, but would face strong opposition.

•New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer and California Assemblyman Mark Leno have taken stands in favor of legalizing same-sex "marriage." In 2005, California lawmakers made history when they passed a bill creating "gender-neutral" marriage. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger vetoed it, saying the people or the courts should decide the issue. Last year, Rhode Island lawmakers introduced pro-homosexual "marriage" bills for the ninth time, homosexual rights advocates said.

•In Illinois, a petition drive to put a nonbinding marriage amendment on the 2006 ballot failed, and the Arizona marriage amendment was defeated at the polls. It's not known if Illinois activists will try for another amendment, but Mr. Lavy said that "there's a good chance" a new Arizona amendment will appear.

•Connecticut, New Jersey and Vermont appear to have settled the same-sex "marriage" issue by enacting civil union laws, and there are signs New Hampshire lawmakers may follow suit.

•Delaware, Maine, New Mexico, Washington, West Virginia and Wyoming do not appear to have much, if any, activity on the amendment issue.

ANTITRUST:

.S. Steel Continues To Explore Options (PTR)

By C.M. Mortimer, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, January 7, 2007

U.S. Steel Corp. still is eyeing Middletown, Ohio-based AK Steel Corp., or it could go shopping for a raw materials supplier in Central or Eastern Europe as steel industry consolidation continues, analysts said.

Merger mania was resurrected when Nucor Corp., the second-largest U.S. steel producer behind U.S. Steel, last week agreed to acquire Toronto-based Harris Steel Group Inc. for about $1.07 billion.

Conjecture over a possible U.S. Steel takeover of AK Steel surfaced in March. "Last year, their board was looking at AK Steel, and I heard they're still watching it," said independent analyst Charles Bradford, of Soleil Securities in New York.

Bradford said he understood U.S. Steel may be looking in Central and Eastern Europe, where assets are cheaper.

"Domestically, they have the iron ore and coke they need. In Central Europe, they don't have any of that. They may also be looking at smaller, government-owned steel companies," said Bradford, who did not identify potential foreign targets.

U.S. Steel operates a plant in Kosice in the Slovak Republic, the largest flat-rolled steel producer in Central Europe. The company operates U.S. Steel Serbia, too.

U.S. Steel CEO John Surma told analysts during a third-quarter conference in November that the company is not ruling out acquisitions. "We think there still could be opportunities to expand our footprint," he said.

"We believe in consolidation, and we continuously evaluate strategic opportunities focusing mostly in North America and Europe. Any acquisition we would make, however, would have to create value for our company and our shareholders. It has to generate a good return on capital, has to be accretive and generate cash," said Charles L. Rice, spokesman for U.S. Steel.

AK Steel declined comment on speculation involving U.S. Steel, said spokesman Alan H. McCoy.

Bradford said another potential target could be Illinois-based IPSCO Inc., a producer of tubular products and steel plate, with annual steelmaking capacity of 4 million tons. "It could be a good fit for U.S. Steel because IPSCO has assets in Canada," he said.

U.S. Steel may be interested in a steel processing company, said Ivan Feinseth, director of research for Matrix USA, LLC, New York.

Feinseth named Columbus, Ohio-based Worthington Industries, which processes steel and makes steel products for the automotive and aerospace industries, and Los Angeles-based Reliance Steel & Aluminum Co., a large metals service company, which also produces hot-rolled and cold-finished steel.

Feinseth said a potential acquisition target could be Grupo IMSA, a Mexican steel processor whose products include galvanized metal plate, cold and hot-rolled metal plate.

U.S. Steel may also look overseas.

DOJ_NMG_0113442

"They may do something in Europe to bolster their raw material position there," said Leo Larkin, equity analyst for Standard & Poor's in New York.

Larkin said U.S. Steel's interest in AK Steel may be lukewarm, and obstacles could include labor difficulties, health care and pension liabilities and potential anti-trust reviews. "It could happen, maybe my anti-trust concern is overblown," Larkin said.

AK Steel generated revenue of about $6 billion in 2005. The company remains mired in an 11-month labor dispute at its Middletown plant, with the International Association of Machinists Local Lodge 1943, which represents about 1,800 members.

U.S. Steel's stock has surged in the past year on speculation it could be an acquisition target. It closed Friday at $69.72, down 92 cents. It gained 46 percent in 2006.

"All of the big steel companies could be interested," said Matrix USA's Feinseth, who estimated the value of U.S. Steel anywhere from $85 to $90 per share.

S&P's Larkin mentioned POSCO, a South Korean steelmaker, as a possible suitor. "POSCO has a strong balance sheet, and they're in an expansion mode. It would strike me as logical, and they have the financial strength to pull it off," Larkin said.

POSCO shipped about 30 million tons of steel, generating about $26 billion in revenue in 2005. During the same period, U.S. Steel shipped about 25 million tons of steel and generated revenue of about $14 billion.

C.M. Mortimer can be reached at cmortimer@tribweb.com or (724) 836-5252.

US Airways Chief Digs In For Delta Fight (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 7, 2007

Don't mistake the relative quiet of the past two weeks for a sign that US Airways' resolve to buy Delta Air Lines is weakening, says Doug Parker, CEO of US Airways.

"We believe our offer is more than fair, and as a result, don't intend on ... backing off," Parker said in a telephone interview last week. "We certainly don't intend on pulling the offer."

Parker made his carrier's $8 billion-plus offer public on Nov. 15, and Delta — which had already rebuffed his private approaches — fired back with a volley of objections, employee anti-merger rallies and a formal plan to emerge from Chapter 11 on its own. The dust settled during the holidays.

Parker says he expects things to soon heat up again, pointing out that Delta's creditors recently hired retired Continental Airlines Chief Executive Gordon Bethune to evaluate the rivals' proposals or other potential alternatives for Delta.

"Gordon is a decisive, extremely knowledgeable individual who ... they clearly didn't bring in just to look at the stand-alone plan. They brought him in to look at strategic alternatives," said Parker.

Another potential flash point: Delta has asked for a bankruptcy court hearing Feb. 7 to begin pitching its stand-alone plan to creditors. They will ultimately vote on whatever reorganization plan Delta uses. Delta's plan values the company at $12 billion when it comes out of bankruptcy and would pay creditors with stock. US Airways argues its cash-stock offer is better for creditors and that a merger will create a stronger airline.

"I think you'll start seeing more urgency this month," said Parker during the interview from US Airways' headquarters in Tempe, Ariz. The conversation has been edited for clarity and length.

Q: Have you gotten any indication as to how the unsecured creditors committee views the US Airways offer?

A: We've met with the committee a couple of times. Their advisers have come back and asked us a number of questions. My own personal view is I think they appreciate the value of the synergies, and I believe they're doing their work now. They've just hired Gordon Bethune, which we think is a positive development — not because we have any idea what Gordon's views are, but just because I know Gordon is a decisive, independent person who knows the airline business very, very well.

Q: What has the committee asked the most questions about?

A: It doesn't seem to be one area of focus. They've spent a lot of time going through the synergy analysis, the $1.65 billion a year [in estimated annual savings from a merger], with our team. I know they've hired their own antitrust counsel to come up with their own views of the antitrust issues, which you know we feel very sanguine about and Delta feels very differently about. They obviously need to get their own views on that. ... So most of the time with us has been on our proposal and synergies.

Q: How soon do you expect the unsecured creditors committee to take some sort of position?

A: I don't know. It's really up to them. ... The process only becomes urgent to the extent that the Delta stand-alone plan is moving in a way that is inconsistent with our merger proposal. ... So long as Delta remains in bankruptcy and there aren't things being approved or disapproved by the bankruptcy court that are inconsistent with our plan, there's no urgency.

DOJ_NMG_0113443

Q: There's the Feb. 7 hearing about the disclosure statement on Delta's reorganization plan. [If the statement is approved by the bankruptcy judge, Delta would be allowed to start seeking creditors' votes backing its proposal.] What does that hearing mean to the US Airways deal?

A: Right now there's a request for a hearing. If indeed that hearing took place on that date, yeah, that would drive some urgency around this process, and I think it will. ... My guess is if the creditor committee wants to support that date, they have a lot of work to get done before that date.

Q: Does that mean it might force you guys to bump up your offer? Does it mean you might have to somehow figure out how to intervene in that hearing?

A: ... It doesn't drive any additional action at this point from US Airways, but I think what it does drive is action from the committee to get themselves ready. The ball's in their court. ... The dialog will continue with the committee, and we're following their lead. ... But as we stand here today, our offer, we think, is well in excess of [Delta's] stand-alone plan in terms of value, and we don't feel any need to amend the offer.

Q: If the committee does finally come out and say we're not interested in your offer, does that kill it?

A: We'd have to reassess at that point. I don't know the answer to that and don't want to speculate.

Q: Does the hostility of Delta employees toward this deal give you or the creditors any pause?

A: It certainly doesn't give us any. I understand it. As we went through the US Airways-America West merger [in which Parker's America West bought the larger carrier and took its name, as it now proposes to do with Delta], there clearly was reluctance on the US Airways side. ... Indeed, even on the America West side, there was some concern about why we were hitching ourselves to that boat. So we had to spend a lot of time communicating with our employees about where the company is going. ... But the fact is, change creates anxiety, and anxiety can turn into fear.

In a situation where we don't have the ability to communicate [with Delta employees] ... it's not surprising at all. I expect over time as this develops for us to have those opportunities. What the employees at Delta will see is that all we're trying to do is build a better Delta Air Lines, and that's only better for the employees. ... I think the culture of Delta is one of its strongest assets and one of the things we want to build on.

Q: There seems to be a widepread belief around here that the merged carrier would be based in Tempe (America West's headquarters before it merged with US Airways, which had been based near Washington) ...Would you consider putting the headquarters in Atlanta to save the deal?

A: I won't speculate on negotiating tactics and really don't want to speculate on where the headquarters might be. The answer is we just don't know right now. ... We don't even know what the management team's going to look like, so to decide where it's headquartered is just premature at this point. What we do know is that both Phoenix and Atlanta are going to be extremely important to this new airline, and there are going to be a lot on management people in both cities.

Q: Why is it so hard to figure out where the headquarters will be?

A: Well, you need to know what the management structure looks like when you're done. ... I think there's a view that ... it will be a US Airways management team that prevailed, and that's certainly not my view. What I know is that we put together US Airways and America West, and most people see me and [a few other high-ranking executives] are all America West, [but] the fact is a third of our officers came from US Airways, and that percentage gets higher as you move on down the ranks.

But you don't know what that management team looks like until you start figuring out who wants to be part of the team and who doesn't, and how it all fits best. In the case of US Airways-America West, it was a good bit easier because their headquarters in Crystal City, Va., consisted of like two or three floors of people. ... That's not the case in Atlanta. It's a much harder decision to make.

Q: What odds do you give yourself of getting this deal through?

A: I feel very good about our chances. The market has clearly spoken in favor of our transaction. The bonds of Delta are at 70 percent [of face value]. The day we announced this transaction they got all that [gain] in the first day, and they stayed there. So I feel extremely good about the market reaction, and I feel very good as a result about where it's going to end up. [The value of Delta's bonds jumped more than 50 percent when US Airways announced its proposal on Nov. 15 and about 10 percent more shortly before Delta disclosed its stand-alone plan.]

If I go back to Nov. 15, is there any disappointment? The only thing I would say is six weeks later, we still haven't begun due diligence [on the proposed merger with Delta] despite that market reaction.

Q: We noticed that Julius Maldutis [a longtime airline securities analyst and consultant] this week was quoted as saying he doesn't think US Airways will go forward with the deal ... because of Delta employees' hostility. When you talk to creditors, is that a concern?

A: They haven't mentioned it to us. ... That has not come up as an issue.

DOJ_NMG_0113444

Q: As time goes on, does that help or hurt your proposal?

A: There's nothing that gets worse with time with our proposal. The only thing that gets worse is if Delta emerges stand-alone.

Q: At least from the outside, it looks like Delta has done pretty well at lining up potential support on the unsecured creditors committee. (Delta has settled with its pilots union, Boeing and the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., all committee members.) Isn't that making your job harder?

A: If you accept the premise, yeah — which I don't. The committee has a fiduciary obligation to the creditors. They recognize as much as we do what's happened to the bond prices since our proposal came out, and they need to do what's best for the creditors of Delta, which is who they represent. I don't know what it means to be making progress with individual members of the committee, because the committee in itself represents all creditors.

Q: Does the possibility that the creditors committee is using US Airways to get a richer reorganization plan from Delta or a higher bid from another buyer keep you awake at night?

A: Look, we've assumed from the start that the bankruptcy process is essentially an auction process. ... We welcome any competition and any other offers, and we believe we will prevail against any of them.

Staff writer Dave Hirschman contributed to this article.

ENVIRONMENT:

NRA Pressured To Resist Bush Energy Policies (WP)

By Blaine Harden, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Hunters Wary of Limited Land Access

SEATTLE -- After years of close association with the Republican Party and hard-nosed opposition to federal land-use regulation, the National Rifle Association is being pressured by its membership to distance itself from President Bush's energy policies that have opened more public land for oil and gas drilling and limited access to hunters and anglers.

"The Bush administration has placed more emphasis on oil and gas than access rights for hunters," said Ronald L. Schmeits, second vice president of the NRA, a member of its board of directors and a bank president in Raton, N.M.

The new emphasis on the issue of access to public lands, which Schmeits said is at the "discussion" level among the NRA's directors, would represent a strategic shift for the NRA, whose leadership in Washington has long maintained that its 4 million members were not complaining or even asking questions about access to public lands.

But, during the past six years, an increasing number of the country's 46 million hunters and anglers, including Republican-leaning shooting organizations such as the Boone and Crockett Club, have been grumbling about the Bush's administration fast-tracking of oil and gas drilling leases on public lands.

"We find that our members are having a harder time finding access to public land," said Schmeits, who recently pushed the NRA to lobby for congressional protection of the game-rich Valle Vidal forest on federal land in New Mexico. "Gun rights are still number one, but there will be more time and effort spent on this issue [by NRA leaders] as we move forward."

Such a change in policy could undercut a key argument that the NRA uses to raise money, sway voters and help elect candidates. It has long warned its members that many environmentalists are advancing a subversive gun-grabbing agenda masterminded by liberal Democrats.

Andrew Arulanandam, the group's spokesman in Washington, said he agrees with Schmeits that members are voicing increasing concern about access to hunting land and that the NRA is focusing on the problem.

This comes at a politically challenging time for what has long been one of the most feared lobbying groups in Washington. The NRA is increasingly being criticized as out of touch by some members of the Outdoor Writers Association of America. A new gun ownership group is trying to win the support of disaffected hunters. Also, there is some complaining within the gun industry that NRA policies might be bad for business.

"The core, the dream, the passion that drives gun ownership is hunting and getting out on the wide open spaces," said a senior gun company executive who did not want to be quoted by name for fear of retribution from the NRA. "In the same way the Bush administration has overreached on Iraq, the NRA has overreached on gun rights. We are losing our grip on this green environmental thing."

The NRA found new strength and increased membership with its battles against gun control during the Clinton era, while cementing ties with the Republican Party. An NRA official was videotaped boasting in 2000 that the association would open an office in the Bush White House. No such office opened, but close identification now with an unpopular president and a party that has lost control of Congress may be hurting the NRA.

DOJ_NMG_0113445

"If Republicans have a bad year, the NRA is going to have a bad year," said Charlie Cook, the political analyst who runs the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "The Democrats have learned in recent years to shut the hell up about guns. Once they did, they started to win some elections."

In November's midterm elections, a number of prominent NRA-backed Republican incumbents were defeated, including Sen. George Allen of Virginia, Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana, Sen. James M. Talent of Missouri and Rep. Richard W. Pombo of California.

Top Democratic leaders appear to have taken the shut-your-mouth-about-guns lesson to heart. Aides to the new speaker and majority leader in the House said that Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California and Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland have no intention of bringing up gun control in the coming year.

For six years, the NRA joined the Bush administration in opposing the Clinton-era roadless rule, a broad land-protection measure that put nearly a third of the national forests off limits to most development -- while keeping them open for hunters and anglers willing to walk or ride horseback into the backcountry.

The 2001 rule, which was overturned by the Bush administration but reinstated by a federal judge in September, had little initial support from state fish and game agencies, Western governors or many major hunting groups. The NRA opposed the rule, arguing that it was too broad and prevented older, less mobile and disabled hunters from using prime hunting lands.

But years of aggressive oil and gas leasing on prime hunting areas in the federal lands of the Rocky Mountain West seem to have made those protections more attractive. Fish and game agencies in Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Idaho, Washington, Oregon and Montana now support the roadless rule, as do most of the region's governors and more and more hunters.

"It is a no-brainer," said Hal Herring, a contributing editor for Field and Stream magazine and an avid hunter who lives near Montana's Rocky Mountain Front, the only area in the lower 48 states where grizzlies, elk and bighorn sheep still come out of the mountains to feed on the plains.

"The NRA stance on the roadless rule is a mistake," Herring said, echoing the view of many prominent outdoor writers. "There are no more roadless areas being produced."

A reader poll in 2003 by Field and Stream found that 41 percent of hunters saw shrinking wildlife habitat as the biggest threat to hunting in America, while 25 percent saw anti-gun legislation as a major threat to hunting.

Trying to seize on these sentiments, a rival gun group, the American Hunters and Shooters Association (AHSA), was founded two years ago by former Washington Redskin Ray Schoenke and John Rosenthal, a real estate developer in Boston. "I believe that we have reached a tipping point where the majority of hunters and shooters realize the NRA isn't representing their interests," said Rosenthal, who is a longtime activist for handgun control.

The group concedes that, so far, the NRA has more executives than the new group has members. That has not stopped the NRA from attacking the AHSA in its magazine, America's 1st Freedom, as a "cold, calculated attempt by the gun-ban lobby to thieve the hard-earned political credibility of gun owners and hunters."

Threatened By Warming (WP)

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Polar bear as harbinger

THE BUSH administration has done everything in its power to do as little as possible about climate change. Yet the reality of global warming has a way of intruding even on the most willfully heedless of politicians. Not even an administration dead set against mandatory curbs on carbon emissions can deny that the habitat of the polar bear, as Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne put it the other day, "may literally be melting." In response, the administration is proposing to list the polar bear as a threatened species under the Endangered Species Act.

Such a listing would have symbolic and practical importance. Polar bears live most of their lives on sea ice, which is diminishing in an Arctic region warming much faster than more temperate regions of the globe. A formal designation, following a lengthy period of comment and analysis, would acknowledge that the law compels action at least to mitigate the effects of global climate change. What's more, it's hard to see how one could act to preserve polar bear habitat without taking steps to reduce fossil fuel consumption and slow the rate of carbon emissions into the atmosphere.

The administration proposed the polar bear designation only after environmental groups petitioned for it and then sued to force a decision. Still, when confronted with the need to make a decision, it made the right one -- and thereby set the stage for action down the road. Cuddly, loveable animals -- even ferocious ones that can kill a seal with a single blow of a monster-strong paw -- have a way of precipitating steps that non-furry creatures just can't manage. Unfortunately, the threat to these majestic giants of the North is all too real.

DOJ_NMG_0113446

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Learning How To Fight America's Most Wanted (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

NEW HAVEN

I'M holding a gun for the first time and trying to look as if I know what I'm doing, as my partner and I pursue a suspect in a fatal bank robbery.

We take him by surprise in his motel room, and my partner tries to handcuff him. The suspect's brother unexpectedly emerges from the bathroom, and the momentary confusion allows the suspect to reach for a gun. I shoot once and hit the wet bar. The suspect's aim is better, and within 1.6 seconds, I am dead. Left unprotected, my partner takes two bullets to the head, and our assailants gleefully escape.

Witnessing this exercise in humiliation was a roomful of people who, like me, had signed up for an invitation-only "Citizens' Academy" course given in the fall by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Connecticut. As part of our weekly training, we shot guns in computerized simulations, subjected ourselves to lie detector tests and met some of the graduates of a "body farm" in Knoxville, Tenn., where federal agents blow up, bury, submerge and do other unspeakable things to donated corpses to sharpen their crime-solving skills.

Though the two dozen of us taking the class often wondered why the government runs such a course, Citizens' Academy has been around for at least 13 years. One stated objective is to help the bureau improve relationships with the communities it serves. Another is "to demystify the bureau," as Kimberly K. Mertz, the special agent in charge of the F.B.I. in Connecticut, explained.

The cautious side of me fretted whether to participate, given the personal information I had to divulge in the mandatory background check. Did I have to mention religious affiliations? What about my library card? Withholding information, the application noted, was a potential crime. I inquired whether I was also subjecting my husband to a background check.

"Why, is he a Communist?" I was asked.

"Not lately," I sputtered.

On Sept. 14, having learned that my loved ones and I had passed muster, I was waved past a fortified guard booth and seated near a minister, a chiropractor, a lawyer and other working people who had been deemed by the F.B.I. to be "business, religious, civic and community leaders."

Like me, at least a few had prior dealings with the bureau. For instance, one classmate, Rocco Orso, the purchasing agent for the City of Waterbury, volunteered that his phone had been wiretapped for six months during a federal investigation into bid-rigging. Agents discovered instead in 2001 that the city's mayor, Philip A. Giordano, was molesting young girls. Mr. Orso said he was eventually told by the F.B.I. that he "was the most honest man in Waterbury." A city lawyer confirmed the comment and the agent's admonition to "give the man a raise."

Such efforts to rein in municipal corruption, white-collar fraud and organized crime have long been the F.B.I.'s stock in trade. But international terrorism has created new pressures, and the bureau's top brass has been deflecting calls for reorganizations that would separate newer intelligence-gathering functions from its historic crime-fighting mission.

Our eight weeks — three hours every Thursday night — inside the F.B.I. did not provide enough information to resolve these larger questions. But it did give us a feel for some of the 100 or so agents in Connecticut and their boss, Ms. Mertz. An Iowa native, she ran the public corruption unit in Washington from 1999 to 2001 and is now one of eight women running one of the bureau's 56 field offices. When we met, she was wearing pearls and strappy black heels and had her hair in a pony tail, and if she was packing a weapon, it was artfully tucked away inside her fitted suit.

Less than 3 percent of those who apply to be agents make the cut, and her staff was suitably impressive. David Rhieu, her chief division counsel, sometimes thumbs through 4,000 laws to determine if a situation merits federal jurisdiction. In 2002, when a man took hostages at Fairfield University, Mr. Rhieu determined that the standoff's impact on traffic on Interstate 95 justified his agency's intervention.

Dan O'Brien, the agent who runs the bureau's Meriden, Conn., office, quoted Oscar Wilde's "I can resist everything except temptation" in describing public officials and their cheating ways. Stuart Robinson, the head of a public-corruption squad in

DOJ_NMG_0113447

Bridgeport, instructed us that when catching crooks, “you want to get to the beehives, not catch bees.” Erin McNamara, an agent who recovered some of the $200 million that the former financier Martin R. Frankel had amassed by defrauding insurance companies, told us about finding a 15-carat diamond disguised as a Sucrets lozenge. Judy Eide, another agent, shared tales of “tipsters” who call the bureau’s hot line to complain, “I ordered a mail-order bride, and did not get it.”

We each left with a graduation certificate, or a reasonable facsimile, signed by Robert S. Mueller III, the F.B.I. director. And some of the lessons continue to resonate, especially after a Nov. 25 melee with police outside a Queens strip club left an unarmed man dead on his wedding day.

Our introduction to shootouts had taken place weeks before, in September, and I have no idea who was right or who was wrong on that tragic night in New York.

But one reason for letting us wield a 9-millimeter semiautomatic pistol hooked up to a $50,000 training device was to sensitize us to the split-second decisions that law enforcement agents must make in the name of public safety and to the fact that their lives are on the line. None of us wielding that gun were terribly experienced with weapons, and the full range of human frailties, from eyeglasses to middle-aged paunches, was on display that day. So the experiment had its built-in limits.

Surely, I asked, people who are better trained can disarm an assailant without killing him, say, by aiming at the hand holding the gun? Our instructors looked at me as if I watched too many westerns. Few agents are sharpshooters, they said, and their priority must be stopping the threat. One instructor, a former marine, noted that assailants often keep shooting after they’ve been wounded.

To minimize the chance of confrontations with tragic consequences, federal authorities say they collect a great deal of information about the individuals they are following and their habits before kicking in doors. By the time they make an arrest, agents generally know which night of the week a suspect orders pizza, Ms. Mertz said, jokingly. Many agents, we were also told, have never discharged their weapons in the line of duty. That goes for Ms. Mertz. “Most agents never do,” she said.

After failing at the simulator, I can see, perhaps, how I had overestimated others’ proficiency with weapons and their ability to control situations that might be beyond control. Leaving the F.B.I. building, I ran into a longtime agent, Mark Gentil, and told him about my lousy shooting. He asked which scenario had done me in. I told him the motel scene.

“Oh, that’s a hard one,” he said, extending some welcome sympathy as I headed out into the night.

Man Sets Fire To Richmond Church (SFC)

By Carrie Sturrock, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 7, 2007

(01-06) 16:50 PST RICHMOND -- A man set fire to a Richmond church early Friday evening after interrupting a practicing choir.

The man walked into St. Cornelius Parish at 225 28th Street shortly before 8 p.m. and poured a flammable liquid on the altar and a nativity scene and then set it ablaze, according to fire officials and a witness.

A short time later, police arrested Robert Mills, 40, of San Pablo on suspicion of arson.

Seven members of the choir, including a 10-year-old boy, were singing the gospel song "Jardinero" in Spanish when a man entered the church who seemed to be speaking to himself, then announced, "Do you want to leave or do you want to stay? Because I'm burning this f— place down," said choir member Veronica Monroy, 32, of Albany.

Monroy said she asked him, "Who are you? Why are you doing this?"

She said he simply replied, "I'm just telling you. Either you want to burn or you want to leave."

He then opened what appeared to be a red can of gasoline and poured it on the altar and Nativity scene, Monroy said, adding that everyone left the church as he did this, except one choir member who stayed back.

Monroy said that man told her the intruder took out a lighter, lit a piece of paper and then threw the flame on the liquid. The choir member tried unsuccessfully to fight the fire with an extinguisher, Monroy said.

She said she had never seen the man at the church before, which she estimated had thousands of members.

After allegedly setting the blaze, Mills left through the same door as the choir members. As he did so, some people outside the church followed him and told police he had entered nearby Nicholl Park.

Police found Mills hiding in the southeastern corner of the park in some shrubbery at Leona Street, and arrested him at 8:10 p.m. as firefighters extinguished the flames, Johnson said.

Mills will likely be charged with arson. The district attorney may also consider charges of false imprisonment because the church was occupied at the time of the fire, said Johnson.

"If they establish it's a hate crime, they could go in that direction," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0113448

Firefighters received word of the fire at 7:47 p.m. When they arrived, the church was suffused with smoke, but they quickly got the fire under control by 8:19 p.m, said Richmond Fire Department Battalion Chief Byron Berhel. No one was injured.

The fire destroyed the altar, nativity scene, a lectern and carpeting. Berhel said there was also extensive smoke damage throughout the relatively large building.

"You can't get that smoke scent out 100 percent," he said. "A lot of the stuff is probably going to have to be replaced."

He said the arson was unusual.

"You don't find people going into a church and deliberately setting a fire," he said. "That's a first for me."

Monroy said the damage is sad to look at. Still, church officials have planned masses for tomorrow in the church gym and parishioners will later come together to repair the building.

"That is just going to keep us more united," said Monroy. "Our faith is very strong. That's one thing we can say. We're going to get up and we're going to continue."

Metairie Store Gun Theft Suspect Being Sought (NOTP)

By From Staff Reports

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 7, 2007

Police trying to ID second man in heist

The Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office on Saturday released the identity of a suspect being sought in Monday's theft of more than 120 guns from a Metairie sporting goods store and announced a $10,000 reward for information leading to his arrest.

Jermaine Surtain, 28, who once lived in the 5700 block of Tullis Drive, Algiers, is wanted on a warrant accusing him of burglarizing Puglia's Sporting Goods, 1925 Veterans Memorial Blvd., said Col. John Fortunato, a Sheriff's Office spokesman.

The office is also seeking the public's help in identifying a "person of interest" who rented a vehicle thought to be used in the break-in, Fortunato said.

Authorities think the burglary was committed by four men possibly using a black Dodge Durango. The men made a hole in a wall to get in around 2:30 a.m., then broke display cases and took 115 handguns, several shotguns and two assault rifles.

Authorities identified Surtain as a suspect through the cooperation of the Sheriff's Office, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the West Bank Major Crimes Task Force. The task force is made up of officers from the Sheriff's Office and the Gretna, New Orleans and Westwego police forces.

After the burglary, authorities recovered four handguns that apparently had been dropped during the break-in. Another handgun taken in the burglary was recovered Saturday at a house in New Orleans, Fortunato said.

He said Surtain has a criminal record and also will be booked with possession of a firearm by a felon when he is arrested.

Sheriff Harry Lee said he was greatly concerned about the theft of the guns, and he asked Crimestoppers to double its usual $2,500 reward for information leading to an arrest and indictment, Fortunato said. He said the ATF is offering $5,000 more.

Anyone with information can call the Sheriff's Office at (504) 364-5300.

. . . . . .

A reward is available for information leading to an indictment. Call Crimestoppers at (504) 822-1111 or toll-free at (877) 903-7867.

Gun Violence Across Puerto Rico Leaves 7 Dead On Kings Day (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico (AP) — Seven people were killed in shootings across Puerto Rico on Saturday, prompting the U.S. territory's top police official to plead for lawmakers to pass tougher gun laws.

The violence, which marred the Caribbean island's Three Kings Day celebrations, included a drive-by shooting of a minivan outside a fast-food restaurant in which two people died and two others were injured in a San Juan suburb, police said.

At a news conference, police chief Pedro Toledo urged the approval of pending legislation that would make it more difficult for islanders to import weapons from the U.S. mainland. Gunmakers have opposed the restrictions.

"Our biggest concern is the amount of weapons and ammunition on the streets," Toledo said.

The two victims killed in the parking lot in Guaynabo were identified as Leslie Machado Becerril, 18, and Christian Collazo Pacheco, 24. The other slayings were reported in Manati, Toa Alta, Caguas, Humacao and Loiza.

The U.S. territory of 3.9 million people averaged just more than two homicides a day last year. The 739 slayings marked a slight decrease from 2005. In most cases, the murders were linked to the drug trade, according to police.

IMMIGRATION:

Complaints Rise Against Immigration Lawyers (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Complex Statutes, Criminal Schemes Heighten Concerns

Complaints against immigration lawyers working in and around the nation's capital are rising, say officials who investigate allegations of attorney misconduct.

Last year, the D.C. Office of Bar Counsel received 59 complaints about immigration lawyers, up from 49 in 2005 -- when, for the first time, immigration law drew more complaints than any other specialized practice area.

The bar counsel office is finalizing 2006 totals for other categories, but complaints about immigration law appear likely to rank near the top again.

Such a distinction is no small feat in a city flush with lawyers and no small worry in a region long established as a destination for immigrants, particularly those from Africa and Latin America.

"There are a lot of unhappy immigrant clients out there, and some of them have very good reason to be unhappy," said D.C. Deputy Bar Counsel Elizabeth A. Herman, who has handled immigration complaints for more than a decade.

From the simply confused to the unquestionably criminal, bad lawyers have become a concern for the immigration bar and for the nation's immigration tribunals.

Federal sanctions have been rising in recent years. Established in 2000, the bar counsel at the Executive Office for Immigration Review, the Justice Department branch that oversees U.S. immigration courts and the Board of Immigration Appeals, disciplined 47 immigration lawyers last year and 54 the previous year -- up from 22 in 2000.

"You have a very vulnerable population," said Jennifer Barnes, who has been the bar counsel for the immigration review office since the position was created. Many immigrants, she said, don't speak English, and few understand the statutes and regulations that are second perhaps only to the tax code in complexity. "And you have attorneys out there looking to take advantage of that vulnerability," she said.

Perhaps the most notorious Washington area immigration hustler in recent history is Arlington lawyer Samuel G. Kooritzky, who was imprisoned in 2003 after he was convicted of engaging in a massive fraud. Kooritzky's firm, Capital Law Centers, specialized in applying for state labor certifications, which businesses use when they cannot find a U.S. citizen for a particular job. An immigrant can then use a certification to apply to the federal government for a green card.

Kooritzky's firm submitted thousands of fake applications for labor certifications without telling the businesses they were being used. He charged immigrants $8,000 to $20,000 for the service and raked in millions before the fraud was discovered. Kooritzky received a 10-year sentence.

The breadth of Kooritzky's criminal enterprise is hard to match, but there are some contenders. In November, a few were in court in the District.

A federal judge sent a Northwest Washington lawyer, Mohamed Alamgir, to prison for more than three years. From 1996 to 2003, Alamgir filed hundreds of false labor and immigration forms as part of a scheme to obtain permanent residency for immigrants by claiming they had jobs awaiting them in the United States, prosecutors said.

But there were no jobs. In some cases, Alamgir paid employers who agreed to participate in the scheme. In others, he put up friends or relatives as employers. And in still others, he mingled fake applications with legitimate ones. In all, the fraud took in more than $2 million.

A D.C. Superior Court judge jailed another lawyer, Richard A. James, who, despite having been disbarred, continued to practice immigration law. Given a suspended sentence in 2002 for flouting his disbarment in 2000, James was ordered not to practice. But he did, working out of an office on I Street NW where one of his specialties was helping foreign physicians immigrate to the United States. He's serving an eight-month sentence for contempt.

But most of the wrongdoing that keeps bar counsels busy does not rise to the criminal level.

It is the missed deadline, the unreturned phone call, the obviously overlooked opportunity that frustrate many eager immigrants and prompt a large share of the complaints. Such lapses might be less grievous in other legal arenas, but immigration law is stringent, and immigration tribunals are exacting in their application of it, say lawyers who practice before them.

That is why bar counsel offices such as the District's have made immigration law a priority. "The consequences for missing a deadline are draconian," Herman said. "In civil court, if you miss a deadline, you just file a motion for more time. In immigration court, you can't do that and expect a good result."

DOJ_NMG_0113450

Some aggrieved immigrants file complaints. Some have no choice but to file in order to ask an immigration judge to reopen a case. But many never do, being unaware of their rights or reluctant to exercise them for fear of further complicating their situation, advocates for immigrants say.

Complaints can take months or years to investigate and resolve. Documents must be gathered, transcripts of proceedings might have to be ordered and lawyers must be given a chance to respond.

When D.C. bar counsel Wallace E. "Gene" Shipp Jr. elects to seek a sanction, his lawyers have to try the case before a Board of Professional Responsibility hearing committee, then argue it before the board, which ultimately makes a recommendation to the District's highest court, the Court of Appeals.

In 2005, for example, the court upheld a reprimand for a lawyer who had failed to file an appeal that his client had requested after the client was denied asylum and then neglected to tell his client that the appeal had not been filed; the lawyer was in a dispute with the client over how much of a $625 fee had to be paid up front.

Bad lawyering carried consequences for Fanny Saavedra and her family, they said. Born in Bolivia, Saavedra has been in the United States illegally for more than a decade, since she overstayed a tourist visa, was arrested in a workplace raid and ordered deported.

After her husband, Rene, also of Bolivia, won permanent residency in 2000, Fanny should have been right behind him in line for a green card, said her current attorney, the Rev. David Brooks. But their attorney at the time said that Fanny could not piggyback on Rene's residency and would need to wait until he became a citizen.

The lawyer was wrong, Brooks said. But not until last year, as Rene was preparing to become a citizen, did they learn that they didn't have to wait.

The couple's three children -- ages 3, 7 and 9 -- were born in the United States and are citizens, and Fanny Saavedra's teenage daughter, born in Bolivia, was able to gain permanent residency in 2002 as Rene Saavedra's stepchild.

In her own Gaithersburg home, only Fanny Saavedra is in the country illegally, haunted by the memory of the raid that led to her deportation order. Even the news that her case has been reopened and will be heard by an immigration judge this month has done little to quell her anxiety.

"It's like trauma for me," the 40-year-old housekeeper said. "I'm afraid, really afraid. I don't want to leave my kids."

But the idea of filing a grievance seemed like asking for more trouble when the family was focused on legalizing Fanny Saavedra's status. "We didn't make a complaint, because we didn't want any more legal problems with our situation," Rene Saavedra said.

In a field dominated by solo practitioners and firms of two to three lawyers, even conscientious ones can find it hard to keep up with changes in the law and the strict demands of immigration courts.

"A lot of people get into this practice and they mean well, and they get overwhelmed -- they get totally overwhelmed," said Michael Maggio, whose Dupont Circle firm, Maggio & Kattar, has one of the area's biggest immigration practices.

Last year, the American Immigration Lawyers Association created a practice and professionalism center to provide guidance for lawyers navigating immigration law, as more are entering the immigration field. The association has grown from fewer than 4,000 members in 1994 to more than 10,000. Only New York and Miami have more members than the Washington region, which has about 800.

When a lawyer's lapse costs an immigrant whatever opportunity he or she had, the aftermath can be heartbreaking.

"No matter what we do to show the lawyer did wrong, [the immigrant] may still be deported," Herman said, drawing on her experience with the D.C. bar counsel office. "It's more than frustrating. It's tragic in some cases. They may be separated from their children. They may be deported to a country they haven't lived in since they were an infant. Their whole lives are turned upside down."

Fanny Saavedra wakes up with such fears every day, despite her attorney's confidence that she'll be allowed to stay. "My husband, he always supports me," she said. "Whatever happens, we'll be together. If we go back, we're going to go back, all of us."

TAX:

House Rules Change Clears Way For Tax Increases (WT)

By Donald Lambro, The Washington Times
The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113451

One of the first key procedural votes in the Democrat-controlled House last week established legislative rules that Republicans say will make it easier to raise taxes by a simple majority vote.

The straight party-line vote received little attention Thursday as Rep. Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, was elected speaker of the House. But Republican leaders and conservative tax-cut advocates said it opened up a huge loophole in a Republican-imposed rule drawn from the Republicans' 1994 Contract with America, which requires a supermajority, or three-fifths vote, to raise taxes.

Democrats unanimously voted down a motion offered by Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio that would have prevented them from waiving the rule, a move that tax-cutters said signaled the Democrats' intention to raise taxes between now and the 2008 elections.

"American taxpayers need to hold on to their wallets because the new House rules concerning taxes are not worth the paper they're written on," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform (ATR).

"After spending an entire year on the campaign trail claiming she will not raise taxes, the first vote Nancy Pelosi brings to the floor for a vote as speaker will open the door to billions and billions of dollars of tax increases over the next two years," Mr. Norquist said.

Many liberal Democrats vowed in the midterm election campaigns to repeal the Bush tax cuts for those in the top income-tax brackets, and party leaders already have scheduled a vote to eliminate tax breaks for oil companies, which would effectively raise taxes on the nation's energy-producing corporations.

"The Democrats have a more established record of wanting to raise taxes than Republicans do. So to have them reject making the rule unwaivable indicates they want to preserve the option to raise taxes," said Jo Maney, spokeswoman for the Rules Committee, through which all legislation must pass.

"The Democrats were smart in crafting the new rules," said Dan Clifton, ATR's chief economist. "They did not change them but made additions to them. Now the three-fifths rule can be waived by a simple majority," or 218 votes.

"President Clinton got a bare majority 218 votes for his tax increases in 1993. So all the Democrats have to do is vote to waive the three-fifths rule, and they've got a tax increase," Mr. Clifton said.

Democratic officials saw Mr. Boehner's motion as a move to tie their hands on future tax policy, and the majority leadership effectively held all of its troops in line to oppose it, even though some of its members ran on pledges not to raise taxes.

"In the coming months, the Democrat-controlled Rules Committee will be pressured to repeal or waive the Contract with America's barriers against unfair tax increases to make it easier for the Democrat majority in Congress to raise taxes," Mr. Boehner predicted.

The Democrats also approved the so-called "pay-as-you-go" rule as part of the House rules package. The rule says that when taxes are cut, lawmakers must offset any revenue loss with either new or higher taxes elsewhere, or reductions in spending.

But the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget said Friday that the pay-as-you-go rules "do not always work perfectly, and it may be useful to consider changes to improve the technical workings of [pay-as-you-go] to make it more effective."

A Balanced Budget (WP)

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

In 2012. Maybe.

SO PRESIDENT Bush is promising a balanced federal budget -- three years after he leaves office. That's a worthy goal, and we look forward to seeing, when the budget is released next month, how, exactly, he hopes to achieve it. But we'd be more impressed by the professed commitment to fiscal discipline if it weren't, in large part, Mr. Bush's own policies that made that far-off target look like an achievement. Or, better yet, if we had any confidence, based on performance, that this theoretical balance is based on realistic projections. Or if there were any acknowledgment from Mr. Bush that his sacrosanct tax cuts would have to be adjusted to meet this goal.

The traditional Democratic Party rap against the Bush administration's fiscal policies goes like this: He inherited a projected 10-year budget surplus of $5.6 trillion and turned that into a projected $3 trillion deficit. The truth is more complicated: The surplus was always, to some extent, illusory, and some of the budgetary deterioration was due to circumstances -- an economic slowdown, the costs of the war against terrorism -- beyond Mr. Bush's control.

Nonetheless, it was Mr. Bush's recklessly unaffordable tax cuts and his insistence on maintaining and extending them even as the costs of the war in Iraq escalated that helped drive the deficit. It was Mr. Bush -- the same Mr. Bush who now calls for an end to the "dead of the night" process of inserting earmarks into spending bills -- who signed every spending bill put before him, even as they were stuffed by a Congress controlled by his party with record numbers and amounts of earmarked projects.

DOJ_NMG_0113452

Even as he asserts that his budget submission next month will show a path to balance by 2012, Mr. Bush insists that the tax cuts cannot be touched. That presages yet another budget that will be hard to take seriously -- one that doesn't account adequately for expected spending in Iraq and Afghanistan and that doesn't factor in the enormous costs of adjusting the alternative minimum tax so that it doesn't sweep in increasing numbers of middle-class taxpayers.

As a political matter, it's impossible to imagine that balance could be achieved through spending cuts alone. Just consider the difficulty that the Republican-controlled Congress had trying to craft a budget based on Mr. Bush's unrealistic discretionary spending or in making even modest inroads on entitlement spending. Nor, politics aside, is it clear that spending discipline alone is the better way. Why, to put it in the starkest terms, should tax cuts for the wealthy take precedence over health care for children?

A real path to balance will not be easy. It will require a recognition from Mr. Bush and his fellow Republicans that all their tax cuts cannot stand and a willingness by Democrats to forgo spending that their constituencies demand. It's not clear that either side has accepted that reality.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Dems Prepare Slew Of Oversight Hearings (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 7, 2007

In this new era of divided government, the congressional hearing room is where the executive and legislative branches will clash.

Over the next few weeks, Senate Democrats plan to hold at least 11 hearings just on Iraq. In the House, one of the Democrats' most dogged investigators is waiting to spring his committee on a different mission — suspected government fraud.

From the war to environmental policy and secret surveillance, the Democrats who now control both the House and Senate are armed with subpoena power and ready to summon panels of witnesses.

These newly empowered Democrats plan to put the Bush administration under scrutiny like never before.

"One of the clearest messages of the last election was that the Republican leadership was just AWOL when it came to holding the Bush administration accountable," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

The congressional hearing room is a Washington set piece: A lonely witness at a table covered in red velvet, klieg lights glaring, a determined inquisitor across the floor. Congressional power in its rawest form.

Iraq is the focal point of Democratic efforts.

Beginning this week, when Bush is expected to disclose his new war strategy, three Senate and at least two House committees plan to call Cabinet members to testify about the president's policy.

"We will use these hearings to ask tough questions, demand real solutions and keep working to bring this war to a close," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Saturday in his party's weekly radio address.

The hearings are one way for Democrats to respond to the party's anti-war wing. Last week, as Democrats prepared to assume power in the new Congress, anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan and a group of protesters interrupted a Democratic press conference, chanting "De-escalate. Investigate. Troops home now!"

The outburst highlighted the limited options Democrats have on redirecting policy in Iraq. Short of cutting off money for the war — a step Democratic leaders say they will not take — Congress has little recourse but to agitate publicly against Bush's strategy.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Reid wrote Bush last week to express their opposition to a potential temporary increase in the number of troops in Iraq — an idea Bush is said to be considering.

Some Democrats, so far a minority, want Congress to take a stand against an emergency spending bill that Bush is expected to send to Congress to pay for military and reconstruction operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

That bill "is a vehicle for continuing the war through the end of Bush's term" in early 2009, said Democratic Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, who is running for president in 2008. "You cannot say you oppose the war and continue to fund it."

DOJ_NMG_0113453

Reid on Friday reiterated that Democrats would not use spending legislation to try to change the course of the war. In fact, Democratic strategists say it is far better for the party to keep the war focus on Bush than it is to devise a detailed exit plan for Iraq.

"We are not at a point at this moment where I can say we have a specific strategy, but we have several options," said Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democratic leader.

One idea under consideration would cap the number of troops Bush could send to Iraq.

"It could be legislation that requires the president to come for congressional approval for troops over a certain level," Durbin said, quickly adding there was no Democratic agreement on such an option. "I'm giving you speculation. This is not strategy."

Besides the focus on Iraq, Democratic committee chairmen are planning their own policy oversight sessions with Bush officials.

"We need to be the watchdog," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif.

From his perch as chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, Waxman said he intends to tackle instances of "waste, fraud and abuse." He did not specify his first target, but previously has expressed interest in investigating federal contracts in Iraq and in the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina struck.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has said he will examine the administration's policies on torture and other human rights issues. His request for data exposed one of the first rifts between the new Congress and the administration when the Justice Department refused to provide the committee with two secret documents that describe CIA detention and interrogation policies for suspected terrorists.

Leahy, D-Vt., stopped short of threatening the use of a subpoena to get the documents. But he told Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that he "would pursue this matter further" when the committee holds its first oversight hearing.

Now that Bush had accepted the resignation of Harriet Miers as his top in-house lawyer, the White House is preparing to revamp its counsel's office in anticipation of a more aggressive and demanding Congress.

Miers was one of Reid's favorite White House officials and the senator applauded Bush for nominating her to the Supreme Court in 2005 — though she eventually withdrew from consideration. Her replacement probably will not elicit the same warm response.

Medicare Drug Program Costing Less Than Estimates, U.S. Says (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6 — The Bush administration lowered its estimate of the cost of Medicare's new prescription drug benefit Saturday, saying the price tag had come down about 10 percent in the last six months.

Administration officials said they hoped the numbers would undercut support in Congress for a Democratic proposal requiring the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical makers to secure lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries.

The 2003 Medicare law prohibits such direct negotiations, relying instead on private insurers and their agents to seek discounts on prescription drugs. Legislation to repeal that ban is a top priority for the new Democratic majority in Congress.

Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, said the new numbers showed that such legislation was unnecessary because competition among private plans had effectively held down costs.

"Our new estimates provide clear evidence that consumer choice is working," Mr. Leavitt said in an interview. "Government interference will result in fewer choices and less consumer satisfaction."

Such arguments are unlikely to sway House Democrats, who say older Americans are still paying far too much for medications. But the numbers provide new ammunition for Republicans.

In July, the Bush administration estimated that payments to private plans offering the Medicare drug benefit would total $1.077 trillion from 2007 to 2016. Officials now estimate they will be $964 billion.

The federal government subsidizes premiums and pays a variety of subsidies to insurers to draw them into the Medicare market.

Leslie V. Norwalk, acting administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said drug costs in general had been increasing more slowly than expected. In addition, Ms. Norwalk said, enrollment in the new Medicare program is lower than expected, because some beneficiaries found they had equivalent drug coverage from other sources.

Critics Warn Of Pitfalls In Democrats' Drug Plan (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113454

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6 — Democrats want the government to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, but insist that the government should not decide which drugs are covered.

Many economists and health policy experts see this as a paradox. The only way to get big savings and discounts, they say, is to steer patients to certain preferred drugs.

The debate on this issue, bubbling for several years, will come to a boil in Congress next week as the House votes on a Democratic proposal to require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate with drug manufacturers on behalf of Medicare beneficiaries.

On the one hand, the bill says the secretary "shall negotiate" lower prices. On the other hand, the drug benefit would still be delivered by private insurers. Each plan would establish its own list of covered drugs, known as a formulary, and the secretary could not "establish or require a particular formulary."

Under the 2003 Medicare law, passed by a Republican Congress, insurers and their agents negotiate prices with drug manufacturers. The law prohibits the secretary from interfering in those negotiations.

Democrats describe their proposal as a way to overcome the power of special interests — specifically, they say, the pharmaceutical and biotechnology industries, which would rather deal with dozens of private insurers than with one big federal agency.

"Direct negotiation for lower prescription drug prices is directly related to our lobbying and ethics reform legislation," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

The purpose of both proposals, Mr. Emanuel said, is "to make sure that special interests do not control what happens in Congress."

Democrats often point to the Department of Veterans Affairs as a model, saying it negotiates much lower prices than Medicare gets. But the programs differ in significant ways.

Under federal law, the V.A. is guaranteed a substantial discount — about 24 percent off the average price paid to the manufacturer of a brand-name drug by commercial customers. Starting with this guarantee, officials negotiate deeper discounts.

The veterans agency, which filled more than 120 million prescriptions last year, has a national formulary. The agency decides which drugs or classes of drugs it needs to treat its patients.

After those decisions are made, drug companies compete for the business, and the V.A. often encourages doctors to switch patients to the drugs that are selected, if it is medically appropriate to do so.

Dr. Alan M. Garber, director of the Center for Health Policy at Stanford University, said he did not see how Medicare officials could obtain big discounts unless they were able to establish a restrictive formulary.

"To obtain drugs at low prices, a purchaser must be able to say no to covering a particular drug," said Dr. Garber, who is an economist and a physician. "If you cannot walk away from a deal, there's no way you can be sure of obtaining a low price. That's true whether you are buying a car, a house or medications."

President Bush and the pharmaceutical industry adamantly oppose a requirement for Medicare to negotiate prices. But Congressional Democrats say it is worth a try.

"Republicans had their shot at making the drug bill work, and seniors are still not getting the prices they deserve," said Representative John D. Dingell of Michigan, the chief sponsor of the Democratic proposal.

"Republicans chose to take care of their friends in the drug industry," Mr. Dingell said. "It's our turn to prove that the bill can work for seniors."

AARP, the lobby for older Americans, supports the proposal. In a new advertising campaign, the group says: "Medicare has 43 million members. And zero bargaining power when it comes to prescription drug prices."

William D. Novelli, the chief executive of AARP, said that Medicare drug plans "currently have little choice but to accept the high prices set by manufacturers" for brand-name drugs if no competing products are available.

Under the Democrats' proposal, the secretary would negotiate the prices that could be charged to sponsors of Medicare drug plans, and those plans could try to obtain still lower prices on their own.

In a report this week, the Congressional Budget Office said that private purchasers had leverage in negotiating prices when they could "systematically favor one brand-name drug over another," thus increasing its share of the market. Nothing in the Democratic proposal allows the secretary to choose one drug over another, or to influence the choices made by Medicare drug plans.

James R. Lang, former president of Anthem Prescription Management, a drug benefit manager, said: "For this proposal to work, the government would have to take over price negotiations. It would have to take over formularies. You cannot do one without the other. There's no leverage. Manufacturers won't give up something for nothing."

DOJ_NMG_0113455

Democrats Face Hurdles In Bid To Close Medicare Gap (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Eliminating Hole in Drug Coverage Would Require Tax Increases or Spending Cuts to Avoid Expanding Budget Deficit

Democrats face a difficult time delivering on their pledge to eliminate the "doughnut hole" in Medicare's drug benefit, despite having used the unpopular coverage gap as a rhetorical club against Republicans in regaining control of Congress in the fall elections.

Requiring Medicare to negotiate lower drug prices from pharmaceutical companies -- a popular idea that nevertheless faces significant political hurdles -- will not produce enough savings to fill the doughnut hole, experts say. And making up the difference would require big tax increases or spending cuts elsewhere if Democrats are to keep another campaign promise, to be fiscally responsible and avoid increasing the federal budget deficit.

"I think the Democrats are going to shy away from it because it's very costly," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), who was chairman of the Senate Finance Committee when it crafted the Medicare drug benefit in 2003. "I think you'll find out that closing the doughnut hole would have just about doubled what we were going to put into the whole program. So you're talking about hundreds of billions of dollars."

Democrats are still determined to eliminate the gap, said Brendan Daly, spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). The House is expected to vote this week on a bill Democrats introduced Friday that would require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate the prices of drugs covered by what is formally known as Medicare Part D.

"We're hoping to get some savings, obviously, from the price negotiation, and then we can try to use some of that to start to close the doughnut hole," Daly said. "I don't think we're going to have enough to close it entirely. It's a difficult task. . . . We are committed to doing it, though."

The doughnut hole refers to a coverage gap in which Medicare beneficiaries must pay for 100 percent of their drug purchases, even as they continue to pay monthly premiums. An estimated 3 million to 4 million people fell into the gap last year. In 2007, under the standard plan, the gap opens when a senior's total drug costs reach $2,400 and closes when out-of-pocket expenses total $3,850. Medicare then picks up most additional costs.

The Congressional Budget Office has informally estimated that filling the hole would cost $450 billion over 10 years, but the agency has no estimate of how much government price negotiations might save. A study released in October by Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the new chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, estimated that the savings would range from $61 billion to $96 billion.

Even before the elections, Democrats began to acknowledge that they would not be able to eliminate the coverage gap right away. But in months of campaigning, party leaders and candidates fanned public anger over the doughnut hole and accused Republicans of selling out to the pharmaceutical industry.

At a senior center in Sunrise, Fla., on Oct. 3, Pelosi touted government drug-price negotiations as a solution and pledged to make them happen as part of the Democrats' agenda for the first 100 hours of the new Congress.

"We will use that money to fill the doughnut hole so that seniors will have affordability, they will have reliability, and will not be caught in this trap of the doughnut hole," Pelosi said. " . . . You pay [premiums] in, they get the money, you get no benefits back. How could that be a good idea unless you're writing the bill for the HMOs and the pharmaceutical companies, and not for America's seniors?"

In July, Rep. Steven R. Rothman (D-N.J.) issued a statement calling the program "broken" and the doughnut hole one of its "most glaring failures."

"The Republican majority created a terrible mess with Medicare Part D," Rothman said. "We can fix Medicare Part D by providing a prescription-drug benefit through Medicare, ending the subsidies for insurance companies, and allowing the government to negotiate lower drug prices. Doing so will eliminate the doughnut hole and provide a benefit worthy of our seniors."

Back in 2003, proponents, mainly Republicans, saw the unusual setup as a way to provide some help to all beneficiaries, and substantial help to those with catastrophic drug costs, and yet not break the bank with the new benefit. Lately, GOP lawmakers have contended that the doughnut hole is not a problem because it does not apply to low-income beneficiaries, and because other seniors can choose more expensive drug plans that offer coverage without the gap.

Filling the hole soon is unlikely, many analysts say. The White House's opposition means that drug-price negotiations are not likely to be enacted even if the idea manages to win approval in the Senate, where the going is likely to be tougher than in the House, they say.

DOJ_NMG_0113456

Even if it were to pass and escape a presidential veto, the House bill would not authorize the health and human services secretary to limit Medicare coverage to a list of approved drugs -- called a formulary -- a tool that some experts say would be necessary to win major price concessions. The legislation would also not explicitly require that any savings be applied to filling the doughnut hole.

"There is virtually no chance that we are going to see any change to the doughnut hole in the foreseeable future," said Robert Laszewski, a nonpartisan health policy consultant in Washington. "The doughnut hole is sort of institutionalized now. . . . It's there for a reason. It's there because that's the kind of plan design the Congress could afford. And just because you change the Congress doesn't mean the affordability changes."

John Rother, policy director for AARP, the powerful seniors' lobby, agreed that substantial changes to the doughnut hole are unlikely this year. But he does not think that Democrats would pay a political price for that.

"It's not an overriding, intense concern for most seniors," Rother said. "What we get a lot from our members is concern about overall drug costs, not just the doughnut hole."

House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) said requiring government negotiations is just the "first step."

"I plan to hold hearings early in the new Congress to identify additional changes needed to improve the Medicare drug program, and reviewing the donut hole will be part of that process," he said in a statement.

Leadership Tries To Restrain Fiefs In New Congress (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6 — Less than 24 hours after taking over as speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi summoned the new chairmen of five committees with responsibility for various aspects of Iraq policy to her office to review and coordinate plans for hearings and inquiries.

The gathering on Friday would have been unthinkable when Democrats last controlled the House. In the days before the 1994 Republican takeover, all-powerful Democratic chairmen ruled their committees with impunity, doing what they wanted, when they wanted, with little regard to the views of the speaker or others in the upper ranks.

Now the new Democratic leaders of the House and Senate want to avoid a return to that era by forging a working relationship with the men and women who will actually write the bills and lead the Congressional investigations. Top lawmakers acknowledge that finding a way to keep the overarching goals of the party from clashing with the objectives of the independent chairmen will be crucial to keeping Democratic control from spiraling out of control.

“The challenge of maintaining a coherent message even though the power in the Senate is so diffuse is probably our major challenge,” said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the Senate’s third-ranking Democrat.

Already there are signs of discord. Senator Max Baucus of Montana, the Finance Committee chairman who has been a headache for past Democratic leaders, says he will plunge ahead with hearings next week on giving the government power to negotiate Medicare drug prices with pharmaceutical companies — a top Democratic priority he has opposed and one the House plans to speed through with no new scrutiny.

“If we want to do legislation, I want to get the facts first,” said Mr. Baucus, who broke with colleagues in the past on the Bush administration’s tax cuts.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, who won re-election as an independent but kept his seniority within the Democratic Party and will lead the Homeland Security panel, is making his colleagues nervous as they consider his differences with many of them over the war and antiterror issues.

In the House, Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, who as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee will be the gatekeeper for critical tax and social policy, suggested Friday that he might revisit new Democratic rules forcing lawmakers to disclose their sponsorship of tax breaks for small enterprises. And Representative John D. Dingell of Michigan, the chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, has broken with fellow Democrats over the years on an issue likely to return in this session, imposing tougher mileage standards on automakers.

“I am a member of the team and I am going to be a team player, but it is too early to see how it is going to develop,” Mr. Dingell said of the new relationship between leadership and the chairmen.

During four decades of Democratic rule ending in 1994, committee chairmen amassed almost unchallenged authority, often becoming more feared and influential than the elected leadership. They were nearly impossible to budge from their perches, and the concept of term limits was unimaginable. In a move that caught some new Democratic chairmen by surprise, House rules pushed through by the Democrats this week retained the six-year limit on chairmen imposed by Republicans, but the leadership reassured lawmakers they would revisit the restrictions when there was less attention focused on the dawn of the Democratic era.

DOJ_NMG_0113457

Mr. Dingell is a holdover from those days of dominant Democratic chairmen, men like Dan Rostenkowski on Ways and Means, Jack Brooks on Judiciary and Jamie Whitten on Appropriations. Those and other lawmakers saw themselves as legislative forces and the leadership as a nuisance to be negotiated on the way to the floor. Mr. Dingell said his contemporaries in the days before Republican rule were descendants of earlier strong-willed chairman like Wilber Mills.

"We simply carried on a tradition which was there, which was accepted, which was proper and which, very frankly, worked," Mr. Dingell said.

But the delegation of such power to the chairmen came with a price. Republicans derided Democrats as arrogant and pushed the image of out-of-touch Democrats as a campaign slogan, riding it and Democratic gaffes to majority status in 1994.

Once installed, the new Republican leadership moved quickly to centralize power in the offices of speaker, majority leader and whip. They stripped chairmen of the power to control their own legislation, enacted term limits and forced prospective chairmen to plead their case with the leadership and bolster it with a record of campaign contributions.

Incoming Democrats said Republicans went too far in diminishing the authority of chairmen and fostered arrogance at the leadership level.

Now Democrats say they hope to strike a more productive balance, giving chairmen some leeway as long as they operate in concert with their fellow committee leaders and with the leadership's approval.

"It is the right mix," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts and chairman of the Financial Services Committee. "We have to work together and we don't want to do things that are discordant, but the leadership should not micromanage."

As an example, Mr. Frank said he informed Mrs. Pelosi that he intended to schedule oversight hearings quickly on administration problems in replacing housing along the Gulf of Mexico after Hurricane Katrina. Mr. Frank said he also planned initiatives to help lower-income Americans buy housing and to give corporate shareholders more say in executive compensation.

Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, the chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee — renamed to put the emphasis on oversight — said he had no qualms about clearing his agenda with the leadership and believed such cooperation should not impinge on his own goals.

"I don't think it is inconsistent," said Mr. Waxman, who said his panel would most likely begin hearings this month. "We are going to pursue the most important theme we can deal with: whether taxpayers' money is wasted through fraud and abuse."

Through the meeting she convened on Friday and conversations with other lawmakers, Mrs. Pelosi has shown she considers herself firmly in charge of the House and is not going to let the chairmen set the pace.

The initial Democratic legislative program is not being routed through committee — perhaps not even the Rules Committee. But Mr. Frank and others said the new chairmen were comfortable with that approach if it helped to make a quick impression. In general, House leadership aides said they believed they could keep the chairmen and the rank-and-file moving in tandem, though they expected some feuds. Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the majority leader, has scheduled the first weekly meeting with House chairmen for Tuesday.

Tom Daschle, the former Senate majority leader who occasionally found himself at odds with committee leaders during his tenure, said communication was essential in a legislative body where lawmakers could be such independent operators.

"The key is to just try to realize you are going to have low-maintenance and high-maintenance chairs and you have to work with both," Mr. Daschle said. "You have to personalize your relationship with each or you are going to have trouble."

Mr. Daschle, a close ally of Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the new majority leader, said he was confident Mr. Reid had the skills to manage the sometimes delicate relationship. Some incoming chairmen agree.

Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, the chairman of the Banking Committee, said Mr. Reid had already diplomatically sounded him out on his plans. "We are very much in sync on this," said Mr. Dodd, who is considering legislation to protect consumers from credit card marketing fraud and high-risk mortgages. "I am not going to do anything without letting Harry Reid know what we are going to do."

Mr. Baucus said he sees himself in broad agreement with Mr. Reid.

"Nine times out of 10, Harry Reid and I will agree," he said. "But when we disagree, I have to do what is right. I am elected by the people of Montana, and they are my employers."

Bipartisanship As The First Resort? (NYT)

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113458

The House's new Democratic majority is mounting a legislative blitzkrieg meant to leave the displaced Republicans gasping in the dust. In successive working days, the Democrats plan to enact legislation to bolster homeland security, raise the minimum wage, encourage embryonic stem cell research, require the government to bargain for lower Medicare drug prices, recoup lost royalties on offshore oil and gas leases, and lower interest rates on student loans.

These are all commendable goals. Equally commendable is the pledge by the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, to restore some pay-as-you-go fiscal discipline to a budget process bloated out of control by President Bush's deficit spending. But what is sorely lacking is the oft-invoked, more often abused ideal of bipartisanship — despite the Democrats' campaign pledge to end the practice of relegating minority lawmakers to the legislative wilderness.

The Democrats have the votes to impose their way. But quickly turning any of these measures into law is dicier given the more complicated rules in the Senate and the Democrats' blade-thin majority there. In scoring early political notches, House Democrats had better keep in mind the promise of bipartisanship for securing larger victories.

For years, bipartisanship has been the missing ingredient in the sour stew of Washington. It was lacking during the Democrats' long House reign that ended in 1994. But during the last 12 years, the Republicans virtually eliminated Democratic participation. Chronically invoked by President Bush, this political ideal has been reduced to rhetorical ashes.

Of necessity, perhaps, the new Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, is making a considerable show of promising to reach across the aisle. In the House, Ms. Pelosi promises bipartisanship will be in evidence after the Democrats get past their opening agenda. That is like saying the checks and balances are in the mail. If Democratic candidates were smart enough during the campaign to realize that the voters demand bipartisanship, they should be quick enough to try it from the start.

It's Really About '08, Nancy (WP)

By Victor H. Fazio

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Nancy Pelosi is on the clock. During the 2006 congressional contest that culminated with the California Democrat becoming the first female House speaker, Pelosi initially said she would take the campaign "one day at a time." But her timeframe quickly expanded into an ambitious vision of what the new Democratic Congress would accomplish in its first 100 hours. After the ceremony and celebration on Thursday, Pelosi must not only try to make good on her promises, but she must do so amid the general confusion, power struggles and even the smell of fresh paint that prevail whenever Congress changes hands.

Pelosi has pledged that the first 100 working hours of the 110th Congress will pass measures such as lobbying and ethics reform; a minimum-wage increase; pay-as-you-go budgeting; expanded federal funding for embryonic stem cell research; lower interest rates on student loans; adoption of the 9/11 commission's recommendations; changes to allow Medicare to directly negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies; and reduced dependence on foreign oil.

But the speaker, the Democratic leadership and new lawmakers will face practical challenges in navigating this list. For a new Congress, January normally is a time for members to be sworn in, work the district or perhaps travel overseas until the president's State of the Union address later in the month.

For freshman members, these first few weeks can be especially chaotic, as they focus on establishing offices and hiring staff in Washington and their home districts. Fresh from their victories, members frequently face the dizzying challenge of finding a home in Washington and possibly relocating their families. This time is a whirlwind of exposure to new committee assignments, delegations and caucuses. Oh, and new members have to learn the administrative and practical skills they'll need as the business of making laws gets underway.

These 100 hours will also include the first time that some members will address the House, a moment every lawmaker recollects. That first address is rarely one's finest performance -- even the most experienced member can be unnerved by the realization that not only the public but also House colleagues will listen to what they have to say. (My first address was on the rice industry -- a key concern of my constituents -- and a subject I knew much more about when I left the House in 1999 than when I first took the floor in 1979.)

Not everyone will be learning anew this week. Pelosi has sought to engender some bipartisan goodwill by authorizing severance pay for newly unemployed Republican staff members. Likewise, she has sought to preserve continuity by retaining existing staff in the parliamentarian's office and other administrative positions, including the sergeant-at-arms, the clerk of the House and the House historian. In 1994, when Newt Gingrich became speaker, the leadership fired everyone except the parliamentarian. In contrast to that off-with-their-heads attitude, Pelosi has more respect for the administrative framework of the House. Perhaps most important, she reached out to John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who was House majority leader, on transition issues, such as the schedule, oversight on intelligence and fixing the Congressional page program.

DOJ_NMG_0113459

Pelosi's strategy reflects an understanding that progress depends on bipartisan agreement, though it may also reveal an effort to take advantage of President Bush's declining popularity -- and the potential willingness of some House Republicans to distance themselves from the White House.

Pelosi's First 100 Hours initiative has drawn some comparisons with the Republicans' 1994 "Contract With America," a package that sought to bring about major policy change over 100 days. But for Pelosi, the effort is less about radical policy shifts than about bringing policy in line with what Democrats believe is common wisdom to Americans. Stem cell funding, which has passed once and enjoys bipartisan support, is the quintessential example. However, even pay-as-you-go budgeting garners support on both sides of the aisle, including from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan. Perhaps most significant, there has been bipartisan cosponsorship of proposals for lobbying reform, the minimum-wage increase, the 9/11 commission recommendations and Medicare drug pricing.

Of course, no matter how carefully Pelosi has selected the issues for her first 100 hours, the legislation will not necessarily steamroll through Congress unquestioned. Though lobbying reform and minimum-wage proposals could pass easily, there may be differences between the House and Senate that could lead to conflict in conference committees.

There are early indications that issues such as adopting the 9/11 commission report and the Medicare drug proposal may face some opposition, both within and beyond the Democratic ranks. The Democrats' proposal to require offsetting revenue or savings whenever any tax cuts or spending increases occur will present challenges to the Congress as it attempts even the least expensive initiatives. This pay-as-you-go proposal may be especially problematic for Democrats in dealing with funding the Iraq war, for which less than half of the total anticipated cost has been incurred so far.

Just as elements of the Contract With America failed to pass in the Senate or get signed into law, the long-term prospects of the 100-hours legislation outside the House remain uncertain. However, if the speaker can shepherd her initiatives through Congress, she will have established herself and her Democratic caucus as advocates for the middle class as well as the poor -- and her party as one that keeps its word. This message will be especially important as the 2008 presidential contest unfolds and Democrats seek to campaign in opposition to the political quagmire, foreign and domestic, that has plagued the Bush administration.

Indeed, if Congress passes the bulk of the First 100 Hours proposals, Pelosi will have succeeded in laying these touchstone issues squarely at Bush's feet. After all, it is Bush who may ultimately determine the record of the 110th Congress. It is likely that the president will dust off his once-used veto power, at least again on stem cell funding and on interest rate breaks for college tuition, attempting to repair his fragmented base. On other issues, however, there are hints that the president, perhaps harking back to his days in Austin, may meet Congress in the middle. On immigration and Social Security reform, which will require bipartisan agreement, Democrats should at least be optimistic about the prospect of presidential compromise.

Once these issues have been placed before Bush, the First 100 Hours package in many ways will have already succeeded. If faced with a small stack of bills, the president will be in the unenviable position of either signing them and making the package an unqualified success, or refusing to sign them and making himself the villain in rejecting fairly popular proposals. Even the latter option would make the First 100 Hours package a success, at least for Democrats, by contrasting the parties and portraying Bush as a slave to inflexible partisan positions. With 2008 in mind, Pelosi's first 100 hours may prove less a personal crusade than a harbinger of greater gains to come.

Victor H. Fazio (D-Calif.), a senior adviser at Akin Gump, served in the House from 1979 to 1999.

A Good Start For Congress (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

Democrats launch solid ethics reform in their first few hours in charge.

AFTER 12 YEARS in the political wilderness, Democrats in the House of Representatives can be excused the hoopla and hokeyness that marked their first day of control. But, to the new leadership's credit, the showmanship was accompanied by something significant: the approval of tough ethics rules that will do a lot to curb the appearance and reality of the "culture of corruption" the Democrats campaigned against.

The new ethics rules approved expeditiously Thursday — "railroaded," if you like — set a high bar for similar self-policing by the Senate. That chamber also came under Democratic control, albeit in a more subdued fashion reflecting the Democrats' one-vote majority and the charisma gap between Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the first woman to hold that position.

The House essentially enacted the wish list of advocates of reform (including us), burnishing Pelosi's promise to preside over "the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history." Some burnishing was necessary after Pelosi unsuccessfully attempted to install Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a Beltway insider who was investigated but not charged in the Abscam scandal, as majority leader.

DOJ_NMG_0113460

Under the rules adopted Thursday, representatives may not accept gifts or travel from lobbyists or agents of foreign governments, and — to prevent a repetition of the Republicans' notorious "K Street Project" — members are prohibited from retaliating against firms that dare to employ lobbyists from the opposite party. On Friday, the House advanced the ethics agenda further by making it easier to monitor special-interest "earmarks" inserted in legislation.

More remains to be done. Reformers inside and outside Congress must continue to press for the creation of a new ethics watchdog in each chamber. House Democrats say they will take up that initiative in the coming weeks, and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who now chairs the Rules Committee, has indicated that she would hold hearings on the idea.

Important as they are, the new ethics rules deal with process, not substance. The public receives regular reminders, most recently from Jack Abramoff, of how the legislative process can be corrupted by narrow special interests. But even in a transparent process unsullied by bribery or self-dealing, policy choices must be made. They include relatively easy ones, such as raising the minimum wage, and harder ones, such as whether to allow Republican tax cuts to expire and how to respond to President Bush's Iraq policy.

On some of those issues, as Pelosi knows, Democrats are not united. All the more reason for them to focus first on something on which they (and their sadder-but-wiser Republican colleagues) agree: the need for an improvement in their own behavior.

Showdown In Washington (SFC)

By Leah Garchik

San Francisco Chronicle, January 7, 2007

Pat Schroeder, the former Democratic congresswoman from Colorado, vowed to wear her silvery "Madame Speaker 2007" pin "until it rusts and falls off." But by the end of last week, new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's oft-repeated teatime remarks to the young ladies of the Convent of the Sacred Heart -- "We're not prisoners of the past; we're shaping the future" -- seemed slogan-like.

On the other hand, the educational wallop that began with what student Tanaya Macheel of the San Francisco school called "being in a political environment and being able to see Nancy in person" went beyond words.

Friday morning on national TV, Pelosi had been seen shaking her head "no" to a reporter who asked whether she would support sending additional troops to Iraq. Madam Speaker's locomotive had chugged away from the station and was heading down the track. As Americans watched, a question arose: Is the power of office any different when it is wielded by a woman, and -- even today -- do women have a harder time in office?

"The fact that you are a novelty means that you are watched doubly carefully," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., during a phone conversation several weeks ago. "And I've always felt the most important thing is to show you could be effective early on."

Pelosi's 100-hour blitz of legislation began immediately Thursday with the reforming of the House rules. "Once you're effective," said Feinstein, "the whole perception of you changes."

Feinstein, now beginning her 15th year in the Senate, remembered that she passed two early tests: bills to ban assault weapons and a desert protection act, going "toe to toe" with Republican Sen. Malcolm Wallop of Wyoming, "and from that point on, I had a very productive relationship with men."

There were some social problems. "It's very difficult," she said, "to go up to a man and say, 'How about having dinner with me tonight?' It is for me ... and there is still that thing."

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., said by phone in December that when she arrived in the House in 1983, she demanded that a male colleague's comment -- "I want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentlelady from California. As a matter of fact, I'd like to associate with the gentlelady" -- be stricken from the record.

Boxer said she treats men and women the same. But Feinstein allowed that in some cases it might be possible to "use warm femininity to reach a goal ... I think it is a finely honed art form. You have to be very careful."

Now, most male lawmakers are savvier. "There are no different rules for women or men," said Boxer, who served in the House for a decade before her election to the Senate in 1992. "We get the same pay, we get the same rules, we have the right to hold up legislation, we have the right to introduce legislation."

Although Boxer said Pelosi -- her "closest of friends" -- told her years ago "she wanted to be speaker," the feat is "amazing. ... I believed we would have a woman president long before we would have a woman speaker, because it's such a man's world in the House."

DOJ_NMG_0113461

Schroeder, who served in the House from 1973 to 1996 and is now executive director of the Association of American Publishers, said she never thought there would be a woman speaker, because in the caucus, "they can vote by secret ballot."

In the '80s, when Schroeder and her House colleagues Shirley Chisholm and Geraldine Ferraro of New York and Ohio's Mary Rose Oakar tried to push through women- and family-friendly legislation, they'd line up male allies, ducks in a row. "We thought we had the votes. And then the votes would come out the other way."

That's still not entirely in the past. Although there are a record 71 female members serving in the 110th Congress, it's "only" 16 percent of the chamber, she said, "and we still don't have an Equal Rights Amendment."

Schroeder and Boxer said there are a variety of reasons it has taken women longer to reach powerful positions in Congress.

"A lot of it in the House had to do with the fact that women came a lot later," Boxer said, "and didn't stay as long. Many had gotten there because their husbands had died. If appointed, they would have less respect ... that was a lot different than fighting for it" in an election.

Schroeder said that while nontraditional families are common in America today, in Congress "only 1 family in 10 doesn't look like the Norman Rockwell family."

The congressional men in those families, Schroeder said she believes, are personally threatened by women in power. Their wives have supported them by hosting receptions, sending holiday cards and smiling at political rallies, and that's the role they see for women.

"We all want wives," Schroeder said, laughing.

Feinstein and Rep. Mary Bono, R-Palm Springs, said that female camaraderie is essentially different from the male variety.

Despite political differences, "Women are more quick to share their personal side, to support each other," said Bono, who has known Pelosi since the early 1990s. Bono said that when they first met, she told Pelosi she was impressed with her "charisma, charm and intelligence" and Pelosi "looked at me, surprised" at the compliment.

She still has warm feelings and says Pelosi's swearing-in speech Thursday was "truly historic," but she is left with a conundrum: "I want her to be successful as a woman in power, but politically, as a Republican, I am on the other side. But I hope when she needs a friend on this side of the aisle, I'll be one of the first she will call."

Bono said expressing anger is a special problem for women in positions of authority.

"There are different ways to be, different sensitivities. ... Guys like to say we're shrill and use the b-word to describe us."

But Schroeder said in the Republican-controlled House of the past 12 years, all differences of opinion became "very personal." The attitude of GOP leaders such as Newt Gingrich and Tom DeLay was "if you don't agree with me, you must be a Commie simp from San Francisco, and your mother wore combat boots. Instead of getting angry, they tried to trash somebody. And Nancy Pelosi is not going to do that."

The Ebb Of Prejudice (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

It was, superficially, pure coincidence that Nancy Pelosi and Deval Patrick took their precedent-setting oaths of office at almost the same hour on Thursday.

Pelosi became the first female speaker of the House of Representatives, second in line to the presidency. And Patrick became the first African American governor of Massachusetts, only the second black state chief executive elected in the history of the United States.

Impressive as their individual r?sum?s are, what's more significant is what their elevation signals: a growing sense of inclusiveness and opportunity in this society.

The United States has many challenges and shortcomings, but occasionally it is appropriate to take note of the ways in which this country is overcoming prejudices. Thursday was such a day.

It was not really an accident that these breakthroughs occurred simultaneously. The generation that is now producing major leaders is a generation substantially freed of the sexism and racism of its predecessors.

Decades of men and women of different races going to school together, working in the same offices and factories, and serving in the same military have changed attitudes. Gender and racial differences have shrunk to a manageable size.

What is striking is that Pelosi and Patrick were elevated by their opposites. Pelosi leads a House of Representatives in which men outnumber women, 364 to 71. Patrick was elected by a constituency that is nearly 90 percent white.

In neither case was the gender or race of the person competing for power the determinant of the outcome. Those who were deciding were able to look past these obvious characteristics to weigh their skills and leadership potential.

DOJ_NMG_0113462

Skeptics will argue that in 21st-century America women and blacks still face barriers that make their climb to the top harder. And that is true. Pelosi worked anonymously for years in Democratic politics before another woman, the dying Rep. Sala Burton, endorsed her as her successor -- an endorsement that helped Pelosi win her first and toughest primary. Once in the House, she showed the canniness and drive that built the alliances that eventually made her the Democratic leader and the majority party's choice for speaker.

Patrick got his break when he was one of the poverty-stricken black youths in Chicago chosen to receive scholarships to the elite Milton Academy in Massachusetts. There he starred academically and went on to Harvard and a law career both in the Justice Department and in two major corporations.

But their success is not unique, and it is part of a pattern that shows the progress this society -- and not just a few exceptional individuals -- has made.

While both Pelosi and Patrick are Democrats, and proudly part of a party that abandoned its racist past to become a champion of civil rights, Republicans have also moved with the times. The two secretaries of state named by President Bush, Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice, are both African American. Powell is a product of the U.S. Army, one of the great egalitarian institutions of the past generation, and Rice rose in an academia that increasingly treated women as equals to men.

Their predecessor in the Clinton administration's State Department was Madeleine Albright, a woman and an immigrant -- a combination that was unimaginable in such a position in any previous time.

The United States has not reached perfection. Discrimination still exists in many forms and in many places. But the progress is real -- and well worth celebrating.

?

Here is a final postscript to the wonderful tributes last week to Gerald R. Ford -- a story told me by Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin.

Two years ago, on a visit to Washington, Ford spent an hour chatting with members on the floor of the House, where he had served for so many years.

Obey, one of the few current members who served with Ford, told the former president that he was finishing a memoir, in which he discussed all the presidents he'd known in Washington, from Richard Nixon to the current President Bush.

"You'll be surprised," said the liberal Democrat, "but I've written that you were the best president of the bunch."

Ford paused for a moment and then replied with a smile, "Pretty slim pickings, wasn't it?"

That was so typical of the man -- modest, honest, realistic and good-natured, all at once.

Congressional Budget Delay Stymies Scientific Research (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

The failure of Congress to pass new budgets for the current fiscal year has produced a crisis in science financing that threatens to close major facilities, delay new projects and leave thousands of government scientists out of work, federal and private officials say.

“The consequences for American science will be disastrous,” said Michael S. Lubell, a senior official of the American Physical Society, the world’s largest group of physicists. “The message to young scientists and industry leaders, alike, will be, ‘Look outside the U.S. if you want to succeed.’ ”

Last year, Congress passed just 2 of 11 spending bills — for the military and domestic security — and froze all other federal spending at 2006 levels. Factoring in inflation, the budgets translate into reductions of about 3 percent to 4 percent for most fields of science and engineering.

Representative Rush D. Holt, a New Jersey Democrat and a physicist, said that scientists, in most cases, were likely to see little or no relief. “It’s that bad,” Mr. Holt said. “For this year, it’s going to be belt tightening all around.”

Congressional Democrats said last month that they would not try to finish multiple spending bills left hanging by the departed Republican majority and would instead keep most government agencies operating under their current budgets until next fall. Except for the Pentagon and the Department of Homeland Security, the government is being financed under a stopgap resolution. It expires Feb. 15, and Democrats said they planned to extend a similar resolution through Sept. 30.

Some Republicans favored not finishing the bills because of automatic savings achieved by forgoing expected spending increases. Democrats and Republicans alike say that operating under current budgets, in some cases with less money, can strap federal agencies and lead to major disruptions in service.

Scientists say that is especially true for the physical sciences, which include physics, chemistry and astronomy. When it comes to federal financing, such fields in recent years have fared poorly compared with biology. The National Institutes of Health, for instance, spend more than $28 billion annually on biomedical programs, five times more than all federal spending for physical sciences.

DOJ_NMG_0113463

For 2007, Congress and the Bush administration agreed that the federal budget for the physical sciences should get a major increase. A year ago, in his American Competitiveness Initiative, President Bush called for doubling the money for science over a decade. That prompted schools and federal laboratories to prepare for long-deferred repairs and expansions, plans that appear now to be in jeopardy.

Among the projects at risk is the Relativistic Heavy Ion Collider at the Brookhaven National Laboratory in New York, on Long Island. The $600 million machine — 2.4 miles in circumference — slams together subatomic particles to recreate conditions at the beginning of time, some 14 billion years ago, so scientists can study the Big Bang theory. It was already operating partly on charitable contributions, officials say, and now could shut down entirely, throwing its 1,069 specialists into limbo.

"For us, it's quite serious," said Sam Aronson, the Brookhaven director. For the nation, Dr. Aronson added, the timing is especially bad because the collider has given the United States a head start on European rivals, who hope to build a more powerful machine.

"Things are pretty miserable for a year in which people talked a lot about regaining our competitive edge," Dr. Aronson said. "I think all that's stalled."

Another potential victim is the Fermi National Accelerator Laboratory in Illinois, where a four-mile-long collider investigates the building blocks of matter. Its director, Piermaria Oddone, said the laboratory would close for a month as most of the staff of 4,200 are sent home.

Congress and the Bush administration could restore much of the science financing in the 2008 budget. Scientists say it would help enormously, but add that senior staff members by that point may have already abandoned major projects for other jobs that were more stable.

Other projects affected by the budget freeze include:

¶A $1.4 billion particle accelerator at the Oak Ridge National Laboratory in Tennessee meant to probe the fine structure of materials and aid in cutting-edge technologies. Its opening might be delayed a year.

¶A $30 million contribution to a global team designing an experimental reactor to fuse atoms rather than break them apart. Controlled fusion, if successful, would offer a nearly inexhaustible source of energy.

¶A $440 million X-ray machine some two miles long at the Stanford Linear Accelerator Center in California that would act like a microscope to peer inside materials, aiding science and industry. Construction, begun last year, would slow.

"It's pretty bad," said Burton Richter, a Nobel laureate in physics. "There's going to be another year of stagnation. That hurts a lot."

The National Science Foundation, which supports basic research at universities, had expected a $400 million increase over the $5.7 billion budget it received in 2006. Now, the freeze is prompting program cuts, delays and slowdowns.

"It's rather devastating," said Jeff Nesbit, the foundation's head of legislative and public affairs. "While $400 million in the grand scheme of things might seem like decimal dust, it's hugely important for universities that rely on N.S.F. funding."

The threatened programs include a $50 million plan to build a supercomputer that universities would use to push back frontiers in science and engineering; a $310 million observatory meant to study the ocean environment from the seabed to the surface; a $62 million contribution to a global program of polar research involving 10 other nations; and a $98 million ship to explore the Arctic, including the thinning of its sheath of floating sea ice.

Missions at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration are also threatened, with $100 million in cuts. Paul Hertz, the chief scientist at NASA's science mission directorate, said potential victims included programs to explore Mars, astrophysics and space weather.

Physicists said a partial solution to the crisis would let the Energy Department do what it wanted to do all along for 2007: move $500 million left over from environmental cleanup accounts into the physical sciences. That would require Congressional approval but no budget increase.

Raymond L. Orbach, the department's under secretary for science, in a recent statement seemed to call for such legislative relief.

"A yearlong continuing resolution takes away many of the opportunities for advancing science," Dr. Orbach said. "We urge Congress to continue critical investments in America's scientific leadership."

U.S. Selecting Hybrid Design For Warheads (NYT)

By William J. Broad, David E. Sanger, Thom Shanker
The New York Times, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113464

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6 — The Bush administration is expected to announce next week a major step forward in the building of the country's first new nuclear warhead in nearly two decades. It will propose combining elements of competing designs from two weapons laboratories in an approach that some experts argue is untested and risky.

The new weapon would not add to but replace the nation's existing arsenal of aging warheads, with a new generation meant to be sturdier, more reliable, safer from accidental detonation and more secure from theft by terrorists.

The announcement, to be made by the interagency Nuclear Weapons Council, avoids making a choice between the two designs for a new weapon, called the Reliable Replacement Warhead, which at first would be mounted on submarine-launched missiles.

The effort, if approved by President Bush and financed by Congress, would require a huge refurbishment of the nation's complex for nuclear design and manufacturing, with the overall bill estimated at more than $100 billion.

But the council's decision to seek a hybrid design, combining well-tested elements from an older design with new safety and security elements from a more novel approach, could delay the weapon's production. It also raises the question of whether the United States will ultimately be forced to end its moratorium on underground nuclear testing to make sure the new design works.

On Friday, Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the National Nuclear Security Administration of the Energy Department, said the government would not proceed with the Reliable Replacement Warhead "if it is determined that testing is needed." But other officials in the administration, including Robert Joseph, the under secretary of state for arms control and international security, have said that the White House should make no commitment on testing.

Congress authorized exploratory research for the weapon three years ago, and has financed it at relatively low levels since. But now the costs will begin to increase.

If Mr. Bush decides to deploy the new design, he could touch off a debate in a Democrat-controlled Congress and among allies and adversaries abroad, who have opposed efforts to modernize the arsenal in the past. While proponents of the new weapon said that it would replace older weapons that could deteriorate over time, and reduce the chances of a detonation if weapons fell into the wrong hands, critics have long argued that this is the wrong moment for Washington to produce a new nuclear warhead of any kind.

At a time when the administration is trying to convince the world to put sanctions on North Korea and Iran to halt their nuclear programs, those critics argue, any move to improve the American arsenal will be seen as hypocritical, an effort by the United States to extend its nuclear lead over other countries. Should the United States decide to conduct a test, officials said, China and Russia — which have their own nuclear modernization programs under way — would feel free to do the same. North Korea was sanctioned by the United Nations Security Council for conducting its first test on Oct. 9, and it may be preparing for more, experts said.

Both administration officials and military officers like Gen. James E. Cartwright, head of the Strategic Command, which controls the nation's nuclear arsenal, argue that because the United States provides a nuclear umbrella for so many allies, it is critical that its stockpile be as reliable as possible.

"We will not 'un-invent' nuclear weapons, and we will not walk away from the world," General Cartwright said in a recent interview. "Right now, it is not the nation's position that zero is the answer to the size of our inventory."

"So, if you are going to have these weapons, they should be safe, they should be able to be secured, and they should be reliable if used," General Cartwright said in the interview, conducted before the Department of Energy's decision was announced.

The current schedule, which is subject to change, would call for the president to make a decision in a year or two and, if approved, to begin engineering development by fiscal year 2010 and production by 2012.

The two teams competing to design the weapon, one at Los Alamos in New Mexico, the other at the Livermore National Laboratory in California, approached the problem with very different philosophies, nuclear officials and experts said. Livermore drew on a single, robust design that, before the testing moratorium, was detonated in the 1980s under a desolate patch of Nevada desert. The weapon, however, never entered the nation's nuclear stockpile.

The Los Alamos team drew on aspects of many weapons from the stockpile and pulled them together in a novel design that has never undergone testing.

A winner of the competition was to have been announced in November. But federal officials said they had a hard time choosing between the two designs, calling both excellent.

The question now, arms experts said, is whether a mix-and-match approach combining the two will produce a clever hybrid or an unworkable dud. They said the nuclear laboratories, bitter rivals for decades, have never before shared responsibility for designing a weapon.

DOJ_NMG_0113465

"There has not been what I would consider a real partnership," said Philip E. Coyle III, a former director of weapons testing at the Pentagon and former director of nuclear testing for Livermore. "In some respects, it's unprecedented."

Ray E. Kidder, a senior Livermore scientist who pioneered early arms designs, said the hybrid approach appeared to be based more on the politics of survival for the laboratories than on technical merit.

"It's spreading the wealth," he said. Federal officials, Dr. Kidder added, "tend to do that fairly rigorously so as to keep the labs alive. To foreclose the possibility of closure, they try to divide the work load."

General Cartwright cast that problem differently, saying that it is critical to keep America's "intellectual capital" in producing weapons alive. "We are starting to get to the point where the people who actually have experience designing a weapon are reaching that point at which they will start to leave the industry," he said. "And are we able to attract the minds that we will need to sustain this activity?"

Nonetheless, several nuclear experts expressed doubts about the wisdom of using a design that has never undergone testing, saying future presidents might lose confidence in the arsenal's potency and be tempted to conduct test explosions.

"It's one thing to have all the components working and another to have them all working together," said Raymond Jeanloz, a geophysicist at the University of California, Berkeley, who advises the government on nuclear arms. "To me, that's the key technical issue that has yet to be resolved."

In the few years since its debut, the reliability program has grown from a fringe effort at the nation's nuclear arms laboratories into a centerpiece of the Bush administration's nuclear policy.

Advocates say a generation of more reliable arms would give military commanders the confidence to abandon the current philosophy of holding onto huge inventories of old weapons, and could speed a shrinkage of the American arsenal from some 6,000 warheads to perhaps 2,000 or less.

Critics say a main justification for the program vanished in November when a secretive federal panel known as Jason found that the plutonium "pits" at the heart of many nuclear warheads aged far better than expected, with most able to work reliability for a century or more.

"This research eliminates a major rationale," Lisbeth Gronlund, a nuclear arms specialist at the Union of Concerned Scientists, a private group based in Cambridge, Mass., said in a November statement.

Since that study was revealed, the administration has emphasized other reasons to build a new warhead, especially new, highly classified technologies to make the weapons virtually impossible to use if they fall into unfriendly hands. Other objectives are to simplify manufacturing, reduce toxic byproducts and improve safety of triggering devices.

As a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, the United States and other nuclear weapons states have committed, at least on paper, to the ultimate goal of "the liquidation of all their existing stockpiles" of weapons. But General Cartwright cautioned that much of the criticism of the program was cast in terms of achieving that disarmament, and he said the government's policy, and that of the new warhead program, was to maintain a nuclear stockpile "that would be the smallest practical to maintain its credibility."

He described the nation's nuclear weapons stockpile as "an artifact of the cold war — cold war both in its delivery systems and its characteristics and certainly in its technology."

"We stopped testing a while back. So, from the testing standpoint, we have not been fielding new weapons," General Cartwright said. "From the standpoint of engineering and design, there has been only marginal activity, mostly reacting to the age of components."

Justices Continue Trend Of Hearing Fewer Cases (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Only a handful of decisions each year define the Supreme Court for the American public, and that might be especially appropriate this year.

After decades of decline in its caseload, the court is once again on track to take its fewest number of cases in modern history. The justices went on a relative shopping spree when they returned from their holiday break, on Friday, agreeing to hear seven additional cases before this year's term ends. Before that they had accepted only 60 petitions, as opposed to 80 at this point last year.

Even a caseload in the 80s would have been considered extraordinarily skimpy 20 years ago. In William H. Rehnquist's first term as chief justice in 1986, the court disposed of 175 cases. That had dwindled to 82 cases last year after Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. took over.

Roberts himself said during his 2005 confirmation hearings that the court should be doing more.

DOJ_NMG_0113466

"They hear about half the number of cases they did 25 years ago," Roberts testified. "There may be good reasons for that that I'll learn if I am confirmed. But just looking at it from the outside, I think they could contribute more to the clarity and uniformity of the law by taking more cases."

What Roberts has discovered is unclear. The process by which the nine justices decide which of the thousands of appeals they receive each year will be given the justices' full consideration -- granted certiorari, in the court's terminology -- is among the court's most closely guarded procedures. But the chief justice's role is limited.

"When it comes to certiorari, the chief justice only has one vote like everyone else," said University of Minnesota law professor David Stras, who has conducted extensive research into the process. It takes four votes of the nine to accept a case.

There is one reason for the decline from the heavy workloads of the 1980s that everyone agrees on: A 1988 congressional decision made at the court's behest eliminated a number of mandatory appeals, leaving the justices to pretty much set their own agenda.

Beyond that, theories abound. Stras said he thinks it is as simple as a change in personnel. His research shows former Justices Byron R. White and Harry A. Blackmun, who left the court in 1993 and 1994, respectively, were much more likely to grant certiorari -- or "cert" -- than their contemporaries.

He said his studies of Blackmun's papers, which detail cert grants, suggest that the downward trend could continue if Justice John Paul Stevens, 86, is the next to leave. Stevens also was above average in voting to take cases, he said.

Others say that an increasingly homogenous appellate judiciary appointed by Republican administrations is producing fewer conflicting opinions among circuits, a chief characteristic of the kinds of cases the justices like to take. Or that the federal government, usually the most persuasive in convincing the court that an issue is ripe for review, is losing less often at the lower levels and not appealing as many cases.

Some blame the so-called "cert pool," the practice by which eight justices -- Stevens is the exception -- combine their clerks to review the thousands of petitions. One clerk then makes an initial recommendation on a case, with the justices having the final say. No one really knows what the recommendations are, but the theory is that it might be safer for a relatively inexperienced clerk to recommend denial rather than a grant.

Others wonder whether the new -- with the addition of Roberts and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. -- and philosophically divided court is overly cautious. That theory is that justices would withhold their vote to take a case unless they could be sure their "side" would prevail.

All those theories for the falling number of cases have detractors, especially the last one. While the court's 5 to 4 decisions in controversial cases get all the attention, the vast majority of the court's work is more mundane -- tomorrow's oral arguments consist of a tax case from Guam and a trash-hauling dispute -- and more likely to be decided in unanimous or near-unanimous decisions.

Those most familiar with the court say the docket is always part happenstance, based on the cases made available. For the most part, "they're not working as a unit" deciding what areas of the law need attention, said Margaret M. Cordray, who teaches a seminar on the court at Capital University Law School in Ohio. "They operate very independently on the question of cert."

Cordray and her husband, Richard Cordray, who clerked for White and Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, wrote an op-ed piece last summer in The Washington Post criticizing the court for being so stingy in granting petitions. "The justices need to engage in a more self-conscious reflection and discussion about whether the shape of their docket is what it should be to govern the complex legal affairs of this large and diverse nation," they wrote.

Cordray said she believes the court could take on 100 to 130 cases, although she agrees there is no magic number on what the court should accept.

Thomas C. Goldstein, a Supreme Court practitioner at Akin Gump Hauer & Feld who instigated a lively debate in legal circles when he wrote about the issue on Scotusblog.com, acknowledged that the shrinking docket has been evolving for years.

"But this is different," he said. "They were sliding down a hill, and this year they fell off the cliff."

Five days of oral arguments are customarily set aside in February, and justices this year filled them only by scheduling just one case on three of those days. The court usually hears two per day and in the past has heard as many as four. Justices canceled one day set aside for hearings in December and are expediting some cases to fill their March calendar.

Margaret Cordray, Goldstein and others do not buy the argument that there are not enough conflicts out there for the court to resolve. Goldstein said there are still plenty of splits among the lower courts that the high court could accept, and Cordray wants the court to take on more cases that would give guidance to the lower courts on matters that are not necessarily high in profile.

DOJ_NMG_0113467

While the declining caseload at the nation's most visible court could create a small public-relations problem -- Roberts and other justices are actively advocating a major pay increase for the judiciary -- the court in the end will still be judged by the controversial cases it decides, rather than the number.

The court will make major decisions this term on abortion, the use of race in school admissions, and employment discrimination. Also, it has an emerging number of environmental cases, including the justices' first consideration of the issue of global warming.

Don't Pay Supes Like Members Of Congress (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

Chief Justice John Roberts rightly argues that judges need higher pay, but he exaggerates.

WHEN JOHN G. Roberts Jr. was seeking confirmation as chief justice of the United States, he told the Senate that judges should be guided by "institutional and personal modesty and humility." Alas, Roberts has ignored his own advice. In his annual report on the judicial branch, he calls inadequate pay for federal judges a "constitutional crisis that threatens to undermine the strength and independence of the federal judiciary."

Watergate was a constitutional crisis. "Massive resistance" by Southern states to the Supreme Court's desegregation rulings was a constitutional crisis. Al Gore's refusal to accept the Supreme Court's decision in Bush vs. Gore would have been a constitutional crisis. Less-than-ideal pay for federal judges is a political problem.

In asking for higher pay for judges, Roberts is echoing not just his mentor, the late William H. Rehnquist, but blue-ribbon commissions and the organized bar. Like them, he argues that pay for federal judges has not kept up with inflation, that financial anxieties have caused some judges to resign from the bench early and that the quality of the federal bench has suffered as a result.

Maybe so. But Roberts, known for his caution in crafting judicial opinions, overreaches, especially when he suggests that once "judicial appointment ceases to be the capstone of a distinguished career and instead becomes a stepping stone to a lucrative position in private practice, the framers' goal of a truly independent judiciary will be placed in serious jeopardy."

But it is life tenure, not annual salary, that ensures judicial independence. Federal judges — first-rate or mediocre — can't be forced off the bench because of unpopular decisions. A judge's decision to quit early to improve his or her standard of living is a different issue.

Roberts' frustration is understandable. Pay raises for judges — and other public officials, for that matter — will always seem exorbitant to citizens who earn less. Yet as Roberts points out, since 1969 the average U.S. worker's wages have risen 17.8%, and judicial pay has declined 23.9%. But he shouldn't expect those numbers to inspire pity parties once it's pointed out that federal district judges were paid $165,200 in 2006.

That said, federal judges have been ill-treated by a 1989 law that links their cost-of-living raises to those of members of Congress. Fearful of being criticized for raising their own salaries, members of Congress voted not to accept several pay raises in the 1990s — meaning that the judges also went without raises. That connection would be broken under legislation that would also include a "catch-up" raise for judges.

Roberts is free to describe the problem and press for its solution. But please, Mr. Chief Justice, no more talk of a constitutional crisis.

OTHER NEWS:

Upward Bound, Just Not As Fast (WP)

By Nell Henderson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Modest Growth Predicted for 2007

The coming year will be a tough one for anybody looking for jobs or profits in home building, but it holds out modest promise for most other American workers, consumers and investors.

The housing market stays in the dumps. Unemployment edges up a bit, but stays relatively low. Inflation ebbs, interest rates remain moderate and stock prices climb, though not as exuberantly as in recent years.

Or at least that's the general consensus of the experts on Wall Street and in Corporate America, who churned out their annual blizzard of forecasts last month.

DOJ_NMG_0113468

Sure, they may be wrong: Oil prices remain a wild card. The housing slump might hammer the economy harder than widely expected. And it's becoming tougher to predict the course of a U.S economy that is increasingly affected by financial decisions made overseas.

Even with such caveats, the forecasts are useful for everyone making financial plans for the new year. Families want to know what is likely to happen to prices and interest rates as they make spending decisions. Stock pickers and bond buyers want guidance on how to adjust their portfolios. Executives want a sense of the economy's health so they make decisions about hiring and expanding.

What follows is the outlook on several key economic issues. It is based on interviews with several analysts and a survey of dozens of economists conducted by Blue Chip Economic Indicators, a monthly publication.

No one has a crystal ball, and there is plenty of debate about the details. But overall, the economy is likely to grow a moderate 2.4 percent this year, according to the average forecast of the 54 top business and university economists surveyed last month by Blue Chip Economic Indicators.

That's a slowdown after three years of rapid growth of more than 3 percent, but many economists, including those at the Federal Reserve, think that's just fine. The economy needs to cool a bit to prevent inflation from worsening. And they expect the weakness in housing and auto production to be offset by growth in the services sector, which includes health care, education, law, finance, entertainment, retailing and tourism, accounting for 85 percent of the nation's economic output and more than four of every five jobs.

"I think it's going to be a very good year," said Richard Yamarone, director of research at Argus Research, among the most upbeat of the economists surveyed. The economy "is growing at a pace that is very desirable."

The key to his sunny outlook, Yamarone said, is strong job and wage growth, which fuels consumer spending. "The consumer is riding on a full tank of gas."

Some economists surveyed had a slightly gloomier view, though none predicted a recession. David A. Rosenberg, the chief North American economist for Merrill Lynch produced the most pessimistic forecast for Blue Chip Economic Indicators, predicting sluggish economic activity this year and a significant increase in unemployment.

Rosenberg argues that much of the economic growth of recent years flowed from rising home values, which made consumers feel wealthier, spurring them to borrow and spend more than their incomes. He expects that process to reverse as the housing downturn deepens this year.

"I know I sound like the boy who cried wolf, but remember the wolf did show up at the end of the story," Rosenberg said.

The Dollar Could Slip Some More (WP)

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

The dollar fell more than 11 percent last year compared with the euro and rose slightly against the yen. A lower dollar helps boost U.S. exports, by making them relatively cheaper in overseas markets, and attracts more foreign tourists to the United States.

Many economists think the dollar will slip a bit lower this year for the same reasons it slid last year: the huge U.S. trade deficit, slower U.S. economic growth and robust growth abroad. Many analysts think the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates by midyear, while other governments are raising borrowing costs, which tends to diminish the demand for dollars.

Other analysts, however, forecast that the dollar will stabilize this year. They generally bet that the Fed will hold interest rates steady because of moderate U.S. economic growth as economies overseas lose momentum. The Blue Chip consensus also predicts that the U.S. trade deficit will shrink slightly, as Americans import less and export more.

Also, one major prop under the dollar has not shifted significantly. The Chinese government, and many others, are running big trade surpluses with the United States and plowing their profits into U.S. investments, such as Treasury securities, stocks and other assets. That keeps demand for the dollar solid.

Setting The Bar On Earnings (NYT)

By Conrad De Aenlle

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

THE flow of earnings reports will pick up this week, but the earnings themselves are expected to show a dip in growth from past quarters. Any impact on share prices may depend on investors' expectations about those expectations.

Standard & Poor's estimates that earnings for companies in its 500-stock index rose by 9 percent, year over year, in the fourth quarter. That would be a healthy gain, but also the worst one in nearly five years, said Sam Stovall, S.& P.'s chief investment strategist.

DOJ_NMG_0113469

"This would be the first quarter in 19 where we've had a single-digit advance," he said.

But it has not been 19 quarters, or even two, since analysts last forecast single-digit growth.

Earnings estimates started off low for just about every quarter during the four-year bull market and then nudged up continually as fresh numbers came in. S.& P.'s forecast is close to those of other research firms, Mr. Stovall noted, but investors may still be disappointed if results meet expectations and nothing more.

"Earnings are not going to grow at double digits forever," he said. "The real question is: Is Wall Street prepared for the first single-digit advance in 19 quarters?"

One of the first big-name companies to report is Alcoa, which Mr. Stovall likened to a corporate Iowa for its status as a periodic bellwether.

S.& P. projects 150 percent earnings growth for aluminum producers, of which Alcoa is the biggest, and a result in that neighborhood on Tuesday would augur well for fourth-quarter earnings generally, and for 2007 economic activity, he said.

No triple-digit, or even double-digit, gain is foreseen for smaller companies. After increasing earnings at an annual rate of 17 percent or more in each quarter of last year, the S.& P. 600 index of smaller companies is expected to show growth of just 5 percent for the last quarter.

The gap in earnings growth is just one reason that Mr. Stovall expects investors to find larger companies more appealing than smaller ones this year. Smaller companies' run of outperformance is looking long in the tooth after seven years, he said, and indications of softening economic conditions could steer investors toward the comparative safety that blue chips are thought to offer.

"It's getting later in the stock market and economic cycle," he said. "When sailing into an impending storm, sailors prefer a larger ship."

DATA WATCH The highlight of a thin post-holiday economic calendar may be the report on Wednesday of the nation's trade balance for November.

A Bloomberg News poll of economists forecasts a widening deficit, to $60 billion from $58.9 billion in October.

Retail sales for December, to be reported on Friday, are expected to rise by 0.6 percent after a 1.0 percent increase in November.

A Phantom Rebound In The Housing Market (NYT)

By Daniel Gross

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

HOUSING bulls took heart on Dec. 27, when the Commerce Department reported that sales of new one-family homes rose 3.4 percent in November from October. While the figure was still well below the rate of November 2005, it represented a recovery from the sharp declines of the summer.

"Sales of new and existing homes showed tentative signs of stabilizing, although at levels well below their mid-2005 peaks," the Federal Reserve's Open Market Committee said at its December meeting.

But those who think that the worst may be over for the housing market should take another look at the data, economists say. For the figures on new-home sales have a strange wrinkle that, in the current environment, may lead the government to overstate sales (and to understate inventory) by up to 20 percent. "The market is weaker than the data say," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's/Economy.com.

New-home sales are tallied by the Census Bureau, based on a sampling of contracts signed by home buyers. Running at a pace of more than one million a year for the last four years, new-home sales have been a significant contributor to the housing boom — and to the economy. (Existing-home sales, reported monthly by the National Association of Realtors, count actual closings.)

But here's the rub: If a contract to buy a home, signed in November, is canceled in December, the Census Bureau does not subtract the failed transaction from the number of sales, or add the house back to its inventory total. In the last year, as the housing market has cooled, the volume of cancellations has risen to epidemic proportions.

Speculators who signed contracts to buy homes in new communities in hot markets like Florida simply walked away from their deposits when they realized they couldn't flip the houses for a quick profit. And as prices and interest rates rose, noted Joseph Carson, chief economist at AllianceBernstein, "people who committed to making new home purchases found they were having difficulty selling their own houses."

And so, in the quarter ended on Oct. 31, Toll Brothers, the high-end home builder, noted that cancellations totaled 37 percent of contracts signed in the quarter, up from 18 percent in the same quarter the previous year. Pulte Homes, the builder based in Bloomfield Hills, Mich., reported a 36 percent cancellation rate in its third quarter, up from 17 percent in the 2005 third quarter.

DOJ_NMG_0113470

"Cancellations have really affected big, publicly held builders the most, because they are relatively heavily concentrated in what had been the hottest markets," said Dave Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders. Basing his findings on a survey of 30 large builders, Mr. Seiders concluded that in November 2006, cancellations constituted 38 percent of gross sales, compared with 26 percent in November 2005 and about 18 percent in the first half of 2005.

Of course, the large publicly held builders comprise a minority of the home-building industry. Lawrence Yun, senior economist at the National Association of Realtors, noted that "smaller home builders aren't affected as much by cancellations because they generally try to sign up clients before they start construction."

On its Web site, the Census Bureau acknowledges: "As a result of our methodology, if conditions are worsening in the marketplace and cancellations are high, sales would be temporarily overestimated." By how much? Mr. Carson of AllianceBernstein estimates that the government is overestimating the pace of annual sales by 100,000 to 150,000. Mr. Zandi of Economy.com estimates that the differential is even greater. "Given the rise in cancellation rates, it suggests that between 150,000 and 200,000 home sales are being counted that actually did not occur."

Just as the rising tide of cancellations leads the Census Bureau to overreport sales in the short term, it leads the government to underreport inventories. New homes on which contracts are not consummated are not added back into the inventory figure. The most recent report found that the seasonally adjusted estimate of new houses for sale at the end of November was 545,000, or 6.3 months of supply. Given the high rate of cancellations, it's likely that inventory is substantially higher.

This much is clear: Given the failure of the reports to account for cancellations, demand isn't as strong as it appears, and supply is greater than it seems.

The large builders are clearly taking action to remedy the situation. In recent months, they have thrown in extras and cut prices as part of an effort to reduce inventory. These moves may have stemmed the tide of cancellations. "In our survey of big builders, the absolute volume of sales cancellations did seem to top out in the third quarter," Mr. Seiders said.

That's good news. But it may also mean that the housing market's recovery and stabilization may turn out to be like ski trips planned in the Northeast for the week between Christmas and New Year's. Given the climate, both have been postponed until 2007.

Investors Start The New Year Indecisively (NYT)

By Jeff Sommer

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

The year got off to an uneven start on Wall Street last week, with the Dow Jones industrial average and the broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index both dropping modestly. But the Nasdaq composite index, in which technology stocks dominate, eked out a small gain.

Many analysts expect technology earnings to be strong this year. On Thursday, after Banc of America Securities issued a bullish earnings projection for Intel, the chip maker, tech shares rose sharply. But on Friday, the sector's shares dropped on a disappointing earnings report by Motorola, the cellphone maker, whose stock had a one-day loss of 7.8 percent.

For the week, Intel had the best performance in the Dow, with a gain of 4.2 percent. Goodyear Tire's gain of 10.9 percent led the S.& P. 500. The company said it had reached an agreement with striking workers that would enable it to cut costs.

For the week, the Dow lost 65.14 points, or 0.5 percent, to close at 12,398.01. The S.& P. 500 lost 8.59 points, or 0.6 percent, to close at 1,409.71. The Nasdaq composite index rose 18.96 points, or 0.8 percent, to close at 2,434.25.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note slipped to 4.64 percent from 4.70 percent the previous week.

Gore Leaves Door Ajar For 2008 (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Will he or won't he?

As the Democratic field for 2008 takes shape, one big remaining question is whether former vice president Al Gore -- winner of the popular vote in 2000, an almost-candidate in 2004 and now the public face of the movement to address global warming -- will be in it.

Over the past six years, Gore has become a heroic figure for the party's liberal left, thanks in large part to his early and steady opposition to the war in Iraq. And it's not just liberals who have taken to Gore. "An Inconvenient Truth," the film detailing

DOJ_NMG_0113471

Gore's lonely quest to raise awareness of climate change, is one of the most successful documentaries of all time and, as important, has transformed Gore's public image from cold to cool.

That renewed popularity has stoked speculation that Gore just may have another national race up his sleeve. "He's the Rocky Balboa of 2008," said Chris Lehane, a former Gore adviser.

But is Gore ready to enter the ring one more time? Don't count on it, say his closest advisers. "There are no secret meetings going on to plan the Gore campaign," said Carter Eskew, a longtime confidant of the former vice president.

But neither Eskew nor any of the small cadre of Gore's closest advisers would entirely rule out such a bid, leaving the same small but substantial amount of wiggle room that Gore himself has left in his public pronouncements.

And there are small signs here and there that could be read as the stirrings of his renewed interest in a campaign. Early last month, Gore addressed more than three dozen labor leaders in Washington, a wide-ranging talk about the Democratic congressional gains and the media, said one attendee, who demanded anonymity. Asked about 2008, Gore said that he has taken a number of calls from people encouraging him to consider running but he "didn't know whether he was going to or not," the source said. "Everybody felt he left a small door open."

For the moment, however, Gore seems more interested in his role as global-warming warrior. He couldn't make time for an interview for the Sunday Fix because he was training 600 people on the slide-show presentation featured in "An Inconvenient Truth," according to his spokeswoman.Rove's Progeny

As we suspected, Karl Rove really is the progenitor of all modern political operatives.

Need evidence? Look no further than John Weaver and Beth Myers, the lead political strategists for 2008 Republican aspirants John McCain and Mitt Romney, respectively.

The two met more than two decades ago in Texas while working on the gubernatorial campaign of Bill Clements. Both Weaver and Myers were deputy campaign managers in Clements's victory over Democratic Gov. Mark Wells White. Their boss? Karl Rove.

Back in 1986, Myers and Weaver started off as rivals. Myers was working for Clements, Weaver for Rep. Tom Loeffler. Clements, who had served a term as governor from 1978 to 1982, drubbed Loeffler in the primary, but Rove must have liked what he saw of Weaver as he offered the young operative a spot on Clements's general election campaign.

Myers recalled her time alongside Weaver -- and under the tutelage of Rove -- fondly.

"John and I were in our 20s working 18-hour days fueled by pizza and chocolate, and Karl provided the adult supervision," said Myers. Ah, those halcyon days!

Although the two principals are sure to be at daggers drawn many times between now and 2008, each said their experiences in Texas would preserve their bond. "She and I developed a fast and lasting friendship then, and I'm sure it will last through this next chapter," Weaver said.

Rangel Says Encouraging Obama On '08 Is No Big Deal (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

Are Charles B. Rangel's loyalties mixed?

Mr. Rangel, the longtime Harlem congressman, has let it be known he encouraged Barack Obama to run for president, which could complicate the presidential ambitions of Mr. Rangel's fellow New York Democrat, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"I told him if he didn't run, he'd regret it, and that he's a young man and he ought to test the waters," Mr. Rangel said in an interview yesterday, echoing comments he made on MSNBC and that will appear in the coming issue of New York magazine.

He said he also told Mr. Obama that he was following Mrs. Clinton's moves "and that as dean of the New York delegation, I had obligations, and he would have to understand that," Mr. Rangel said.

Asked if that meant he would support Mrs. Clinton, he said it was too early to say. And he added, "I got a call recently from my good friend Wes Clark who said he's still contemplating entering the race."

Though neither has announced a candidacy, Mr. Obama is seen as Mrs. Clinton's biggest obstacle as she prepares for a 2008 run. Her advance work has included an effort to build a united front among New York Democrats, including Mr. Rangel. The two met in late November to discuss her plans, about the same time he spoke with Mr. Obama, he said.

Mr. Rangel called the importance of having a united state delegation "relative."

"It's not the end of the world if we split," he said, though it is better to be united.

On MSNBC last week, Mr. Rangel said of Mr. Obama: "He's brilliant, he's talented. He's not tested, but who could be with the limited political experience?" He said that Democrats "should have as many exciting candidates up front as we can get, so we can find out who's electable and who can best lead our country."

DOJ_NMG_0113472

Herman D. Farrell Jr., chairman of the state Democratic Party, was unfazed by Mr. Rangel's advice to Mr. Obama. "With two years to go before the next presidential election, it's an acceptable position," he said. "A year from now, we'll talk."

Players (WP)

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's reelection was one of the few bright spots for the GOP in November, so it's not surprising that Republican presidential aspirants are raiding his team.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona has turned his presidential exploratory committee into Arnold East, hiring not only campaign manager Steve Schmidt as a senior adviser but also Schmidt's deputy, Reed Galen, to serve as a deputy campaign manager and even Schmidt's assistant, Jake Suski, to be assistant to campaign manager-in-waiting Terry Nelson.

Robert Terra, who ran the Schwarzenegger war room, will do the same for McCain. Matt David, who served as director of response on the Schwarzenegger reelection drive will be the -- you guessed it! -- director of response for McCain.

McCain didn't get them all. Katie Levinson, Schwarzenegger's communications director, will oversee construction of Rudy Giuliani's communications operation. Schwarzenegger deputy political director Josh Ginsberg has inked a deal with Mitt Romney.

'08 Candidacy Could Shake Up Giuliani's Firm (NYT)

By Patrick Healy, Russ Buettner

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

In the time since Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani left office in 2001, he has told friends and political allies that he would consider running for the presidency in 2008, and that he wanted to use the interim to create a consulting business that would both burnish and broaden his image as a leader and security expert.

And in the first months of that new firm, Giuliani Partners, there seemed no end to its ambitions: Mr. Giuliani saw safety and security, law, crime-fighting, and real estate as lucrative areas of expertise, his aides say. They quickly announced ventures with Ernst & Young, Nextel and Mexico; discussed trading services for equity; and envisioned finding such success that the business could, without doubt, survive his departure one day.

Now, as Mr. Giuliani contemplates that bid for the presidency, the firm — about which little has been publicly known — says it is dependably profitable and attractively positioned. But, at the same time, its aspirations have been modestly realized: a collection of boutiques more than an empire, and one whose long-term survival if Mr. Giuliani departs is very much a matter of debate both in-house and out.

The partnership comprises three distinct businesses that have had varying degrees of success in maintaining the steep trajectory of the early days.

The largest unit, in terms of employees and possibly revenue, is Giuliani Capital Advisors, an investment bank with 100 employees that Mr. Giuliani did not create, but rather was bought by Giuliani Partners from Ernst & Young for $9.8 million in 2004.

The investment firm's revenues were down in 2005, the first year Mr. Giuliani owned it, though its chief executive said the downturn began in the months prior to the sale and has since been reversed. Last year, eight of its original 22 managing directors left for other jobs. Despite its name, Mr. Giuliani is minimally involved.

Giuliani Partners, the 60-person consulting arm, is Mr. Giuliani's main focus, and it has had to scale back its reach somewhat in recent years to accommodate his political travel and lucrative speaking offers. It had a base of 20 major clients in early 2004, while now it has 12 to 15: a deliberate limit, firm partners say, because all of the clients seek and receive personal time with Mr. Giuliani.

The third and smallest unit is Giuliani Security and Safety, another consultancy that former Police Commissioner Bernard B. Kerik once ran (as Giuliani-Kerik L.L.C.) until he resigned at the end of 2004 amid personal problems that caused him to withdraw his name from consideration to be President Bush's secretary of homeland security. The Kerik debacle forced an overhaul of the unit, which Giuliani aides now hail as a small but fast-growing practice, with 10 employees led by a respected former F.B.I. official.

Change is a constant in all sorts of businesses, and Giuliani Partners acknowledges its own set of evolutions. Though it once announced new clients with celebratory press releases, the last such announcement was in November 2004.

Partners say their newer clients — they will not give a number — have not sought the same level of public exposure for their relationship with Mr. Giuliani.

But the largest potential change, a Giuliani candidacy, looms larger than all the rest, and the company says it is now deeply engaged with questions about its future. If he does run, executives say, at least some shakeout at the firm is certain.

DOJ_NMG_0113473

"Obviously as things accelerate, there are going to have to be changes, and we're looking at that," said Michael D. Hess, senior managing director of Giuliani Partners.

Mr. Hess acknowledged that his view had shifted since 2004, when an interviewer asked if the business could survive without Mr. Giuliani. "Absolutely," he said at the time.

Would he answer the same today? "I think so," he said last week. While Mr. Giuliani is an irreplaceable figure, he said, other executives are also attracting business. "He is, of course, a draw, people do want to work with him," Mr. Hess said of the ex-mayor, "but on the other side of the coin, we have a very deep bench."

Yet Mr. Hess acknowledged in an interview that other top executives at the firm, like him and Dennison Young Jr., a partner who was a top mayoral aide to Mr. Giuliani, would most likely join a Giuliani campaign.

"I think the answer is yes," Mr. Hess said in evaluating that possibility. At that point Mr. Giuliani's spokeswoman, Sunny Mindel, interjected, "We don't know all these things," and Mr. Hess picked up her line of thought.

"But no one knows — that's the study and continuing exploration we have to do," Mr. Hess said. "The substantive people are less likely to be involved in the campaign. We're not terribly political."

By "substantive people," he was referring to firm executives who work with clients in areas of expertise; during the interview he included in that group Pasquale J. D'Amuro, the head of Giuliani Security and Safety; Richard J. Sheirer, a senior vice president and the commissioner of emergency management under the former mayor; and Thomas Von Essen, another senior vice president and former city fire commissioner. (At the same time, Mr. Hess did not rule out any of these three or others as possible campaign members.)

Giuliani Partners is a private company, which makes it difficult to assess its financial health and assets. By one measure of accomplishment, client satisfaction, Giuliani advisers say the company has been an unqualified success, and there is no record of lawsuits or notable public complaints from those who have received services.

Jim Steets, a spokesman for Entergy, long a client of Giuliani Partners, said the firm helped revamp its security and emergency response plans and strengthened its relationships with emergency agencies around its five nuclear plants in the Northeast.

How much Mr. Giuliani and other principals of the firm are earning from the businesses is not public record. But much of Mr. Giuliani's income comes from his outside business interests and includes millions of dollars he earns from speaking appearances around the world and as a partner in a Houston-based law firm, Bracewell & Giuliani.

Mr. Hess said Mr. Giuliani's speaking fees are individual earnings and do not represent income for the firm.

But several Giuliani Partner ventures have not borne all the anticipated fruit.

In 2003, Bear Stearns Merchant Banking set up a $300 million private equity fund to invest in security-related companies, with advice and profit sharing by Giuliani Partners. But only one investment was made: the $210 million purchase of CamelBak, a Petaluma, Calif., company that makes canteens worn like backpacks. The equity fund put up $100 million of the price, according to The Deal and Forbes.

Two other relationships were ended after questions emerged in news accounts about the backgrounds and operations of the client.

Mr. Giuliani's experience as a businessman could be a factor in a presidential race, political analysts say. "Voters like supporting a businessman who has to meet a payroll, who built a business from scratch and can demonstrate an understanding of the economy," said Frank Luntz, a Republican pollster who has worked for Mr. Giuliani in the past.

Mr. Giuliani has said he will decide about a presidential bid early this year, but advisers now say the decision may be up in the air for months.

Were he to leave, could Rudy Inc. survive without Rudy?

Eric Abrahamson, a professor at Columbia Business School, said survival for a business that loses a key leader can depend on many factors, including the nature of its business and its maturity. He said the departure of a rainmaker could be hardest to survive.

"When you bring in those people, you are bringing them in for their social network," said Mr. Abrahamson, who studies the creation and growth of management techniques.

Giuliani Partners is five years old and operates from the Times Square offices of Ernst & Young, the accounting firm. As a private business, Giuliani Partners is not required to release its clients' names, but some have been announced, and others, Mr. Hess said, wish to remain private. Active clients, Mr. Hess said, include Entergy, Purdue Pharma, and TransCanada Corp. and Shell.

DOJ_NMG_0113474

Neither Mr. Giuliani nor other executives have registered to represent foreign governments in the United States, nor are they lobbyists. Mr. Giuliani also does not hold the type of licenses that are held by the directors of Giuliani Capital Advisors, of which Giuliani Partners is the majority owner.

The capital firm specializes in bankruptcy consulting, and mergers and acquisitions.

The partnership's security division, which Mr. D'Amuro took over in 2005, may be the unit most poised for growth. Mr. D'Amuro has traveled to meet with executives in Japan, Qatar, and other nations, often focusing on clients who seek the firm out for advice on how to protect against a terrorist attack.

Giuliani Partners recently launched two international offshoots: Giuliani Security and Safety Asia, and Giuliani Compliance Japan, where Mr. Giuliani and other executives speak to businesses there about complying with new conflict-of-interest rules.

Mr. Hess said he was not concerned that foreign work would somehow tarnish Mr. Giuliani politically.

"We bend over backwards and are very careful about who we do business with, for the most obvious reasons — from the beginning, Rudy's brand of integrity and ethics always had to be preserved," Mr. Hess said.

Revenues for Giuliani Partners' main consulting or security wings are not available because it is a private company.

But the third wing of the business, Giuliani Capital Advisors, is required to file annual financial statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

For calendar 2005, Capital Advisors reported revenues of $48 million, a drop from what the firm had brought in under Ernst & Young. For example, in the 2004 fiscal year, the last full year Ernst & Young owned it, the firm reported revenues of $85 million.

Steven D. Oesterle, a partner in Giuliani Partners and chairman of the investment bank, said a fairer comparison is to measure the Capital Advisors' performance in the final five months before the sale in December 2004, where it averaged about $3.3 million a month in revenue, versus the $4 million a month it took in the following year.

He said the firm was more modest in scale than during its Ernst & Young years, in part because there are fewer bankruptcies today and there had been very little backlog of business when the company changed hands. The firm still ranks high on lists comparing financial advisers based on the number of cases handled.

Mr. Oesterle said most of the eight managing directors who departed last year had been replaced.

The chief compliance officer and other top executives also left, but Mr. Oesterle said the departures did not reflect poorly on the business or signal unhappiness with Mr. Giuliani.

"It's a competitive marketplace," he said, "but that creates opportunity for us to hire people. I'm very comfortable with where we are in terms of the talent level within the organization."

Of Mr. Giuliani, he said, "He plays a very limited role with this business — you can think of this as more of an investment of Giuliani Partners in many ways."

One executive who left Capital Advisors last year, and spoke on the condition of anonymity because those who left had signed confidentiality agreements, said Mr. Giuliani's limited role had not helped. He said the firm needed a rainmaker to bring in business and to raise capital for the merger and acquisition portion of the business.

"When you put all that together, it's just not a winning formula," the former executive said.

Mr. Hess, however, described Mr. Giuliani as a hands-on manager in the main consulting part of the business, an executive whose busy schedule very much sets the agenda for the company, at least for now.

"We work with his schedule: When he's off speaking or when he was writing his book, we would find what days worked and what days don't work," Mr. Hess said. "He's remarkable. He doesn't sleep very much."

Bloggers Unleash A Virtual Campaign (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

Former Gen. Wesley K. Clark boasts 35,000 more friends than ex-Sen. John Edwards, and there are more flattering photos of Sen. Barack Obama than Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

In an attempt to reach the MySpace generation, politicians are turning to the virtual campaign trail. Dedicated political junkies are setting up their own sites devoted to encouraging presidential runs from their favorite candidates -- former Vice President Al Gore, Sen. John McCain and the two Democratic superstars currently topping polls, Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton.

"Happy New Year to the future president of the United States of America," Leapin Larry told Mr. Obama Sunday on one of the fan sites, which has more than 21,000 friends.

Michele, a 28-year-old from Orange Beach, Ala., tells the former first lady: "Hillary, you fixed ny. I'd love to see you as president. Go for it, you would fix this country."

Some of the candidate MySpace pages are official, such as the sites run by 2004 vice presidential candidate Mr. Edwards and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack -- both Democrats seeking the 2008 nomination. Others, such as the nearly 100 sites created in Mrs. Clinton's name, are run by anonymous Web surfers.

If popularity were gauged by MySpace, Mr. Clark, a Democrat with an official "Securing America" page, is winning with more than 45,000 friends, and Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, is the best-known.

At least 40 MySpace accounts have been set up as belonging to Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat, but none seem to be official. A close look at MySpace fan sites reveal passionate Web surfers.

"Hi Hillary with your brains and beauty you should have no problem!!!!!!!!" yells a man with the screen name HuckFinny, doing so entirely in capital letters.

"I have never been into politics actively, but if big Al would run again, oh, I would do anything," writes Josh Paskowitz on a Gore site. "I would march. I would rally. I would DIE to make him win." Patrick agrees, telling the former vice president: "Can't wait to see you out there again in 2008. ... Keep up the fight."

Mr. Gore does not have an official site, but he does have a page promoting his film on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth."

There's also a site called "President Gore," which calls the 2000 Democratic nominee, who won the popular vote but lost the Electoral College to George Bush, the "Rightful president."

Mr. Edwards, a former U.S. senator from North Carolina, has one of the most active official pages as he works to build a grass-roots campaign. It includes all the details of his presidential-announcement tour and Web video links and his snazzy 2008 logo.

"Our country needs a president who sees the serious problems and honestly wants to fix them," Kristin of California tells Mr. Edwards.

Jen, a 23-year-old Pennsylvania resident, tells the candidate, "I am so happy that you decided to run again! You have my vote!!!" emphasizing her happiness and voting intentions with the screaming all-capitals style common on such sites.

The comments would be an ego boost for any politician.

"Iowa is Hillary country," Howie, a 27-year-old from Des Moines, Iowa, says. "Time to announce, so I can get to work helping you win here in the caucuses in January 2008!"

MySpace user Beth tells Mr. Obama on one site: "You're the solution in 2008."

"Please run for president," one person begs Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican. "We need a real patriot in the office!"

Several efforts to draft candidates enjoy popularity on MySpace. One site has even worked up a merchandising plan, selling "Barack the Vote" T-shirts superimposed on an altered "Rock the Vote" logo.

There are several sites devoted to Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who made a failed bid to unseat Mr. Bush in 2004. Many of the sites seem to have been designed to promote his candidacy then, but a few are more current.

One is a good try at an official site, complete with the song "America the Beautiful" and a waving U.S. flag indicating Mr. Kerry is "online now."

Among his top friends are his wife, Teresa Heinz Kerry, and former Democratic Presidents Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton. Mr. McCain is his only Republican friend.

Beth, a 44-year-old resident of Skokie, Ill., wishes Mr. Kerry "best of luck in the new year," and tells him "I voted for you!! I love you!! I'll vote for you again!!"

Plenty of the lesser-known politicians have sites as well.

Democratic Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich's official site promotes an end to the war in Iraq, complete with a Democratic presidential primary poll showing him in the lead.

"You are an inspiration," Colleen, a 31-year-old Denver resident tells the Ohio representative.

"Glad to hear that you have decided to run in 2008!" Chris Ho tells Democratic Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr.

Another fan of the Delaware politician says, "Go for it senator. Get the troops out."

On what seems to be New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson's official site, Jess tells the Democrat he should pursue a presidential bid. Of the most likely Democratic candidates, only Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut has no MySpace presence, official or fan-based.

The Invasion Of The Alpha Male Democrat (NYT)

By Ryan Lizza

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113476

NANCY PELOSI'S carefully crafted introduction to the American people last week seemed to reinforce some stereotypes of the so-called mommy party. On the day she made history as the first woman to be elected speaker, she appeared on the House floor, surrounded by children and bedecked in pearls.

But even as this nurturing image dominated the news, the swearing-in ceremony on Thursday was notable for another milestone in gender politics: the return of the Alpha Male Democrat.

The members of this new faction, which helped the Democrats expand into majority status, stand out not for their ideology or racial background but for their carefully cultivated masculinity.

"As much as the policy positions is the background and character of these Democrats," says John Lapp, the former executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee who helped recruit this new breed of candidate. "So we went to C.I.A. agents, F.B.I. agents, N.F.L. quarterbacks, sheriffs, Iraq war vets. These are red-blooded Americans who are tough."

Mr. Lapp even coined a term to describe these manly — and they are all men — pols: "the Macho Dems."

The return of Democratic manliness was no accident; it was a carefully planned strategy. But now that the Macho Dems are walking the halls of Congress, it remains to be seen whether they will create as many problems for Democrats as they solved. After all, these new Democrats have heterodox political views that could complicate Democratic caucus politics, and their success may raise uncomfortable questions for those Democrats who don't pass the new macho test.

The architects of this strategy, Representative Rahm Emanuel, Mr. Lapp's boss, as well as Senator Charles Schumer, are well-known political pit bulls. Mr. Emanuel won his Congressional seat by navigating the ward politics of Chicago's old-fashioned political machine.

He is missing half of one finger — his aides refer to him as "nine point five" — and swears enough to make a Soprano blush. Senator Schumer is so aggressive and demanding that he has a reputation as one of the most difficult people in the Senate to work for. Both men, who have been elevated to leadership positions in the new Congress, are throwbacks to the era when tough-guy Democrats were urban ethnic politicians, like Dan Rostenkowski and Tip O'Neill.

When Mr. Emanuel and Mr. Schumer set out to find candidates to run in the red states and districts of the 2006 electoral battleground they sought their own rural and exurban doppelgängers.

The fruits of those efforts arrived in Washington last week. Take, for example, three House freshman from Pennsylvania. Patrick Murphy, the son of a Philadelphia police officer, was a West Point professor, a prosecutor and an Iraq war veteran before he ran for Congress. Chris Carney was a lieutenant commander in the Navy Reserves. Joe Sestak is a former Navy vice admiral whose last job was commanding 15,000 sailors and dozens of ships and aircraft for operations in Afghanistan.

"Joe Sestak — that guy's muscular!" says Mr. Lapp. "He's a vice admiral. I've told him to spend a lot of time going on the national talk shows. He can really do a service changing the mold and the way the Democratic Party is viewed."

Other House members include Minnesota's Tim Walz, an Army national guardsman; Brad Ellsworth, an Indiana sheriff; and Heath Shuler, a former N.F.L. quarterback from North Carolina.

Biography, it can be argued, counts more than substance. For example, Mr. Shuler's Web site includes more information about his high-school football career (106 touchdowns) than his post-football career (selling real estate).

In the Senate, Mr. Schumer's tough-guy caucus includes Jon Tester, a husky Montana farmer with a buzz-cut, and Jim Webb, the former marine from Virginia who turned his son's combat boots into an effective electoral prop. Upon arriving in Washington, he promptly picked a fight with President Bush at a White House reception.

The roots of the Macho Dem strategy can be found in the party's 2004 losses when Democrats decided that their post-9/11 candidates needed to exude strength above all else.

"Presidential politics, but also the rest of national political leadership, has a lot to do with the understandable desire of voters for leadership, strength, clarity and sureness," says Jim Jordan, John Kerry's first presidential campaign manager. "Frankly, in the post-Vietnam era, Democrats have come up short by those measures too frequently."

Adds the Democratic strategist James Carville, "The fact that the party has come across as less — I don't want to say less masculine — but certainly less aggressive than Republicans, is true."

But there may be serious risks for the Democrats' embrace of an electoral philosophy based less on bold ideas than on bold biography. For one, the Macho Dem strategy is inherently pro-male. And Democrats have historically relied on a gender gap advantage — with women. If they tilt in the other direction, does that gap disappear?

As Tom Edsall recently pointed out in a guest column on The New York Times Op-Ed page, despite Ms. Pelosi's historic ascension, 2006 was a bad year for Democratic women. Nine of the party's top 11 male House candidates won, while only 1 of the organization's top 11 female candidates prevailed.

DOJ_NMG_0113477

It's a paradoxical conclusion to an election that was followed by Ms. Pelosi's ascension to speaker and Hillary Clinton's dominance of presidential political predictions. Just as these female faces are solidifying the perception of the Democrats as the party of women — the gender gap still exists — the Macho Dems are adding a dash of testosterone, which could add some cultural frisson to the party.

Sure, some Macho Dems express support for, say, abortion rights but one gets the sense that ensuring Roe's preservation may not be one of their highest priorities in coming to the Senate. It's hard to imagine them at the next Emily's List fund-raiser.

Ideologically, many Macho Dems are culturally conservative and economically liberal — making them odd ducks in a party that since the Clinton years has been defined by cultural liberalism and Rubinomics.

"You can argue it will cause more problems because there will be more cross currents," says Mr. Carville. "A lot of these guys are economically pretty populist — Webb and Tester — more so than the Clintonites like myself."

Then again, President Bush and the Iraq war serve as unifying force for Democrats that may militate against these cross currents.

More interesting may be the implications of the Macho Dem theory for the 2008 presidential campaign. If a party measures its candidates by whether they wear a uniform, carry a gun or simply look tough — does it invite the public and press to apply that standard to all the party's leaders?

The leading presidential candidates — Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton — may not score that high on the Alpha meter. And in the past, when Democrats believed their candidate was a true hero — well, just remember how the Republican Party was able to portray John Kerry. It could be a warning sign for Democrats: live by the Macho Dem creed, die by it.

The Jeb Bush Era Ends In Florida (WP)

By Linda Kleindienst

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Outgoing Governor Did Things His Way

TALLAHASSEE -- On a bright January day in 1998 marked by bone-numbing 33-degree cold, Jeb Bush took office as Florida's 43rd governor with a pledge to safeguard the interests of the people, not the bureaucrats.

In the ensuing eight years, Bush sent shivers through Florida's status quo as he gathered more power than any previous governor and reshaped state government to fit his vision.

Nicknamed "King Jeb," the Republican transformed what he saw as a tangle of red tape and squanderer of public money into a smaller, business-friendly administration needing fewer tax dollars to run.

Bush, who passed the mantle to Charlie Crist (R) last Tuesday, leaves a legacy of a leader adamant about doing things his way, who fearlessly championed such controversial causes as school vouchers, faith-based prisons and prolonging the life of Terri Schiavo, a brain-damaged woman who became the centerpiece of a national right-to-die battle.

Yet, while his tenure coincided with a sizzling economy and an overflowing treasury, Bush's back-to-back terms were marred by frequent ethics scandals, official bungling and the inability of the government he downsized to meet growing demands for state services, including education and aid for the infirm and the elderly.

A policy wonk, Bush pursued an agenda so frenetic that even his efficiency czar resigned in protest.

"I've always felt, if you can do something today, why wait? It's just my nature," said Bush, 53, who grew grayer and slightly stouter in Tallahassee but never slackened his pace, even during his final days.

He championed tax cuts that chiefly benefited business and the wealthy, trimmed the state's payroll, stripped job protection from thousands of mid-level civil servants, gained more power over the judiciary, exploited his Washington connections to prevent the closing of military bases and launched the nation's first statewide private-school voucher program.

While older brother George's administration in Washington badly fumbled its initial response to Hurricane Katrina, Jeb Bush was praised for his actions before, during and after the eight hurricanes that raked Florida in 2004 and 2005. Seemingly everywhere, he warned residents in English and Spanish to gird themselves for the storms' fury, then oversaw relief efforts when the winds died down.

But his administration -- the Department of Children and Families, in particular -- was vilified for losing track of 500 youngsters under state care and for failing to prevent the deaths of several others. A smiling Rilya Wilson became the poster child for all that was wrong with the agency and, by extension, the Bush administration's failure to serve Floridians in need. Although her body was never found, it is believed the 5-year-old Miami girl was killed in December 2000, 15 months before the state realized she was missing.

DOJ_NMG_0113478

Despite the controversy that swirled around the botched 2000 presidential election, which saw his brother win Florida and thus the White House by 537 votes, Bush failed to fully restore confidence in an electoral system that is still mired in controversy and lawsuits. He did little to counteract soaring property insurance rates or shorten waiting lists for citizens needing services.

"He led the enactment of tax cuts that will drain the state of needed revenue for health care and children and senior citizens -- and we already rank at the bottom of the nation in those services," said Karen Woodall, a lobbyist for migrant workers and the poor.

Few people have so dominated Florida's political landscape. When Bush moved into the governor's mansion, Florida Republicans reached their zenith of power. Buoyed by a GOP-controlled legislature awed by his personality, clout and family name, Bush enjoyed superstar status and high job performance ratings from voters -- and believed he had the political capital to shake things up.

"Most governors have been committed to the public sector. They grew up knowing and supporting government," said Dominic Calabro, president of Florida TaxWatch, a private watchdog of government spending. "He grew up with a disdain and believed in limited government."

While seeking reelection in 2002, Bush defined "real leadership" as making tough choices. For those who disagreed with him, he said, "You know where I stand."

Bush battled against government intrusion in private lives but commandeered the state's executive and legislative branches to prolong the life of Schiavo, Florida's legislature and Congress. Ignoring the repeated verdicts of judges, Bush, a convert to Roman Catholicism who approached this battle with moral zeal, rammed through a special law to restore Schiavo's feeding tube in what many saw as an attempt to pander to the religious right. But the courts had the final word and on March 31, 2005, the 41-year-old Schiavo died.

"I'm deeply disappointed that a woman was starved to death," said Bush, calling it the most disheartening event during his time in office. "I can respect other people's opinions but, at the end of the day, that's what happened."

Under Bush, Florida earned Wall Street's highest possible bond rating. He led a drive to make Florida a biotechnology center by luring the Scripps Research Institute to Palm Beach County with $369 million in state money as bait. But while Florida led the nation in job creation, much of that was in low-paid service industry jobs that left many Floridians without health insurance and scrambling for affordable housing amid a real estate boom that helped fuel business-friendly tax breaks.

A fiscal conservative, Bush slashed the number of state workers by giving their jobs to private companies. Many public services -- including the state's foster-care system -- were spun off without official oversight, and some ran up cost overruns in the millions. The state budget ballooned by 52 percent, from $48.6 billion in 1999 to $73.9 billion in 2006, though much of the growth was attributable to the hot real estate market and post-hurricane rebuilding.

Though he proclaimed himself the "education governor," Bush's legacy in this field was mixed at best. Test results showed learning gains among fourth-graders, whose scores were easier to improve than those of older children, as well as minorities across all grade levels. But Florida's high school dropout rate and per-pupil spending continued to rank among the nation's worst. While Bush sought spending increases for public schools, they barely offset steadily growing demands on school districts, including the soaring cost of health and property insurance.

During his first year in office, the Legislature approved Bush's A-Plus education reform package, including the nation's first statewide private school voucher program for students in failing schools. But it was struck down as unconstitutional by the Florida Supreme Court early this year.

Perhaps Bush's most grievous blunder came with the enactment of One Florida, a plan to end affirmative-action preferences for minorities in university admissions and state contracting. It sparked a sit-in by two black legislators in the governor's executive suite -- and hundreds of black college students in the hallway outside his office -- and the largest ever protest-march, led by the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson, on the state Capitol in 2000.

One Florida was a prime example of Bush's shoot-first, take-no-advice method of governing. It tarnished his image in the black community and alienated voters he and the Republican Party had been working hard to woo.

Yet, Bush voiced no regrets. He left behind an office he worked hard to overhaul, in a way he thinks better meets the needs of a fast-changing Florida. Summing up his legacy, he said: "This office has more authority to create the agenda and implement it. . . . My gift is that we've shown that governors can be activists, they can be reformers, if they want to."

Katie O'Malley Makes A Case For Keeping Her Job (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113479

Maryland's soon-to-be first lady, Catherine Curran O'Malley, is sticking with her plan to stay on the bench once her husband is sworn in as governor.

O'Malley, a district court judge in Baltimore, spoke publicly about her intentions during the summer as her husband, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D), was campaigning to unseat Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R).

But Katie O'Malley's desire to keep her job has been complicated by a residency requirement and other family considerations regarding an anticipated move to Annapolis. The O'Malleys have four children, including two daughters in high school.

On Friday, a lawyer for the governor-elect wrote to Ben C. Clyburn, the chief judge for the District Court of Maryland, citing case law that suggests a temporary move to Annapolis would not preclude Katie O'Malley from maintaining her "domicile" in Baltimore, provided she intends to return there at the end of her husband's term.

"When this temporary position of Martin's is over, we both intend to reside in Baltimore," Katie O'Malley said yesterday.

The O'Malley family plans to move into the 54-room governor's mansion, known as Government House, sometime after Martin O'Malley's Jan. 17 swearing-in. But the timing remains unclear, aides said. The family has yet to make a decision as to whether to sell their home in Baltimore.

Katie O'Malley's decision to stay on the bench is hardly without precedent.

Marjorie Rendell, the wife of Pennsylvania Gov. Edward G. Rendell (D), sits on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals; Mary Pawlenty, the wife of Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty (R), is a district judge in the state; and Gary Sebelius, the husband of Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius (D), who refers to himself as the state's "first dude," is a federal magistrate judge.

Anne Holton, first lady of Virginia, had been a judge but decided to step down after her husband, Timothy M. Kaine (D), won the governorship.O'Malley Continues to Fill Out His Staff

Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley has added a few more familiar faces to his incoming State House staff, including two former campaign managers.

O'Malley made one of his picks public last week at a gathering of Maryland county officials, announcing that Josh White would serve as his director of intergovernmental affairs.

The seemingly unflappable White served as O'Malley's campaign manager during his recent win over Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and is a former executive director of the Maryland Democratic Party. He has been serving in a key staff role in O'Malley's transition in recent months.

Also on board, according to transition sources, is Sean R. Malone, who ran O'Malley's 1995 campaign for reelection to the Baltimore City Council. Since O'Malley's election as mayor, Malone has most recently served as labor commissioner.

In Annapolis, Malone will serve as a deputy to Joseph C. Bryce, whom O'Malley recently named as his senior policy and legislative adviser.

Malone and O'Malley have been friends for more than 12 years, dating back to Malone's time as a bartender at a Charles Street pub in Baltimore where O'Malley regularly played Irish music.Political Staffs Play Musical Chairs

While Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley works to fill his new administration, people with close ties to the outgoing Baltimore mayor are also popping up in some interesting places in county and state governments.

Peter O'Malley, a brother of the governor-elect and former senior campaign aide, is now chief of staff to Baltimore County Executive Jim Smith (D).

Kevin Enright, brother of the governor-elect's chief of staff, Michael Enright, and a former spokesman for the Baltimore police department, has taken a job as communications director for new Howard County Executive Ken Ulman (D). Enright most recently served as spokesman for Maryland Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. (D), O'Malley's father-in-law.

Aaron Greenfield, a former assistant city solicitor for O'Malley's administration, is also working for Ulman, as his chief of staff.

Raquel Guillory, O'Malley's City Hall press secretary, will become communications director later this month for the newly installed Maryland Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler (D).

And Alexandra M. Hughes, a former economic and neighborhood development aide at City Hall, recently landed in the office of House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) as his communications and policy adviser. Hughes more recently worked for the Baltimore schools as a top aide to then-Chief Executive Bonnie S. Copeland.

Breakfast Of Champions (NYT)

By Charles Baxter

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113480

THE Senate has been seated, and we have a new senator, Amy Klobuchar. But we're still talking about the aftermath of the midterm elections.

Two friends from high school, guys I've known for 40 years, and I are at breakfast at a greasy spoon on Lyndale Avenue, watching the Minneapolis traffic. I ask for their analysis. My friend the estate planner speaks up first.

"I have it all figured out. Bill Clinton defeated Karl Rove," he says. "The centrist Democrats, Bill Clinton types, beat out the Karl Rove types, the base voters. The base strategy isn't going to work for a while. If it had worked, Mark Kennedy would have won the race for the Senate, and we'd have a scowling movement-conservative accountant as Minnesota's senator. Instead, we have a brainy upbeat soccer-mom progressive. She won in a landslide. She was the antidote to despair. That's what's important."

My other friend looks up from cutting his waffle and joins in. "Bill O'Reilly said national voter turnout would be low. He said that the election was a matter of life and death but that everyone — or 'the folks,' as he calls them — would be watching 'Dancing with the Stars.' " He chews thoughtfully. "That's pretty cynical of him. Who are these 'folks' he's always talking about? Anyway, he was wrong. There was a huge turnout in Minnesota."

"George Bush hit the trifecta," I say. "Iraq, corruption and incompetence." I dig into my huevos. "Failure follows failure. The Republic Party will take years to recover from this. Al Franken thinks George Bush won't even be invited to the 2008 convention. It doesn't matter. No one has anything new to say about the current administration. It's all been said."

"Why do you call it 'the Republic Party'?" my friend asks.

"Because they say 'the Democrat Party.' So we should follow their example and say, 'the Republic Party,' and see what happens."

"The Republic Party convention is going to be here," the estate planner says. "Think about that."

There is a long silence.

"Let them come," my other friend, a sculptor and furniture-maker, proclaims with a smile. "This Congressional district is now represented by an African-American Muslim, a follower of Paul Wellstone." He means Keith Ellison.

"Here's a guy who doesn't run a single TV ad and beats his opponent in a landslide. He gets on TV after the election and is asked by a conservative commentator to prove that he's not sympathetic to terrorism. Then a representative from Virginia wonders if he's going to take the oath of office on the Koran. This district is the object of national attention. It's so progressive, it goes beyond blue into deep purple. We're not just a bunch of Lutherans anymore: Somalis and Latinos and everybody lives here. The party of George Bush wants to have its convention in St. Paul? Fine."

We watch the traffic.

"It's safer to drive now," the estate planner says. "After the last elections, people were so angry that they were driving 80 or 90 miles an hour on I-35. They've calmed down a little."

I speak up. "Well, there's no winter here; the roads are clear. You can't ski because there's no snow, and the hockey rinks haven't opened because the ice is unsafe — when there is ice. In Minnesota! It's creepy. You'd think someone would pay attention."

Another pause. "Why did they lie to us, those guys?" the sculptor asks, reaching for his coffee. "Why do they keep lying about Iraq and global warming?" I am always quoting from somewhere, so I quote my Minneapolis neighbor, the poet Robert Bly: "These lies mean that the country wants to die."

"Not anymore," the sculptor says, sipping his coffee. "We're in a new, positive era, starting now. The Democrats will make some difference."

"You think so?" I reply. Minnesotans cherish their political optimism. But when I think of Iraq and of our intentions there, another line of poetry comes to me, by Louis Simpson, so I say it: "Grave by grave we civilize the ground."

They Came From Montana (NYT)

By Deirdre McNamer

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

IT seemed a good idea, during the holidays, to get a dose of Capra corn. So I rented "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington" (one of the screenwriters based it on a novel he'd written called "The Gentleman From Montana") to watch Jimmy Stewart play the consummate rube who can scarcely stop gawking long enough to get sworn in as a newly appointed senator. Nefarious powers think his naïveté makes him the perfectly malleable replacement for his predecessor, who keeled over unexpectedly. But, boy, are they in for a surprise.

During Senator Smith's excited sightseeing ("I don't think I've ever been so thrilled in my whole life, and that Lincoln Memorial! Gee-whiz!"), I thought about Montana's new senator, Jon Tester, gazing up at the Capitol dome for the first time, shortly after the general election. "It hasn't soaked in yet," he told reporters. "Maybe it will never soak in."

DOJ_NMG_0113481

Mr. Tester and his wife, Sharla, had traveled to Washington from their farm in north-central Montana, a patch of ground in a county with 1.5 people per square mile, about 1,800 miles from the nation's capital as the crow flies. They were there because Mr. Tester, campaigning for government honesty and attention to the concerns of "regular folks," had unseated the Republican incumbent, Conrad Burns, in a cliffhanger that helped deliver the Senate to the Democratic Party.

And now what?

Undoubtedly, Mr. Tester's rhetoric and style — he might always look a little wrong in a business suit — will tempt continuing comparisons to the barmy screen version of the gentleman from Montana. But only if one forgets that Mr. Tester is 50 years old, he's seasoned in state politics, he ran a canny, gloves-off campaign, and he's the kind of charismatic, hard-to-peg, Western neopopulist (like his friend, Gov. Brian Schweitzer of Montana) who might be, even now, redefining in certain far-reaching ways what it means to be a Democrat.

Or not.

The 110th Congress is just four days into what it will become. It is still on the brink. On the verge. The verge, says my dictionary, is "the point beyond which an action, state or condition is likely to begin or occur." It's also, interestingly, "a rod, wand or staff carried as an emblem of authority or office."

Montana, like any state, has sent to Congress its share of those who strode forth, verges in hand, to become forgettable in the long run. But I think we can be forgiven for anticipating the exceptional. After all, we sent lean and plain-spoken Mike Mansfield, the Senate's longest-serving majority leader and a pivotal force behind civil rights legislation, the Watergate investigation and opposition to the Vietnam War. Decades earlier, we sent Congress its first female member, Republican Jeannette Rankin, the only person to vote against United States entry into not one, but two, world wars. We sent Thomas J. Walsh, who became a national hero for exposing Interior Department corruption in the Teapot Dome oil scandal of the 1920s. And Senator Burton K. Wheeler, a Democrat, who became the most vocal foe of F.D.R.'s attempt to "pack" the Supreme Court.

"Always try to see life around you as if you just came out of a tunnel," Senator Smith advises his hard-boiled assistant, Miss Saunders, in the Capra parable.

Campaigns are tunnels in a sense, filled as they are with obfuscation, noise and narrowly defined progress. Out of the tunnel, out in the lit-up day, it's different. What the members of the 110th Congress see now, and what they choose to do about what they see, might well decide who among them — among both the Testers and the old hands — will outlast their day.

Paint My Sidewalk Blue (NYT)

By Dan Chaon

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

"Congratulations!" cries Dolly, our Republican neighbor, a few days after the election, and my wife and I pause warily on the sidewalk outside her house. Our street is noted for its calm bipartisanship, and Dolly in particular is well-known for her good nature and graciousness. But still, we hesitate for a moment. "Oh," my wife says. "Um ...thanks!" And we exchange glances. Congratulations?

I guess we're still trying to get used to the concept of "winning." As Democrats in Ohio, victory is a sensation we've been unfamiliar with for quite some time, and I have to admit that it makes me a little suspicious. "Oh, snap out of it," my wife says, and I put my hands in my pockets as we continue on down the street.

Of course, it's not easy to be jubilant given the state of affairs in Ohio, or in the country, or in the world. December comes on drizzly and warmish in a kind of eerie, global-warming way, and that first blush of excitement seems to mute quickly. Mike DeWine, the defeated incumbent senator, spends his final days in Congress delivering eulogies for service members killed in Iraq and Afghanistan. Meanwhile, Bob Taft, the departing governor, rounds out his unpopular, scandal-ridden tenure with one last humiliation — on Dec. 27, the Ohio Supreme Court formally reprimands him for his failure to report nearly $6,000 worth of gifts. Around the same time, newspapers begin to report that a Cleveland-size ice shelf had broken clear of the coast of Ellesmere Island in the Canadian Arctic, though apparently Mr. Taft had nothing to do with this.

Our neighbor Susan is usually reliably cynical this time of year, but she says that she's been feeling pretty happy since the election. "I would actually characterize myself as giddy," Susan says, and she tells me that she's even begun to warm to our new senator, Sherrod Brown, who now seems admirably enthusiastic and energetic, especially since he doesn't have to continue to repeat the phrase "fight for the middle class" in every sentence. He seems more solidly progressive than she thought at first.

Sue is one of several people I know who believes that the 2004 election was stolen, and that voting irregularities in Ohio were primarily at fault. She had been very pessimistic about 2006 as well. "And there were plenty of problems," she says.

In Cleveland, voting machine breakdowns led to delays and long lines at many polling places. There also continued to be questions about the reliability of the electronic voting systems. Major discrepancies were reported in several counties, including

DOJ_NMG_0113482

Cuyahoga, where there was a disparity of almost 17 percent between the unofficial vote tally reported immediately after the election (562,498 votes) and the official tally reported in December (468,056 votes).

It is troubling and worrisome, Susan agrees — but this time, it seemed, the inconsistencies hadn't been enough to counteract the number of Democratic voters who went to the polls. "I felt like there was a real surge of energy," Susan tells me. "Almost like a grass-roots movement."

My friend Peggy disagrees. " 'Movement' is strong word," she says. Peggy is a retired law school dean, a little past 60, more than a bit skeptical, and she looks at me wryly. "What are they going to pull off, really?" she asks. "Where's the leadership? Seriously. Nancy Pelosi? Harry Reid?"

The two of us are shopping at the West Side Market on yet another warm late December day, walking through the busy aisles and selecting produce from various stands, pausing to look at a case full of beautiful breads or interesting sausages.

"I guess I've become apolitical," Peggy says, and shrugs. "I just don't think that a meaningful discussion of what's important in life is going to reside in politics. I don't suppose that's really going to help your article."

"No," I say. "Not really." The two of us sit down in the balcony above the market, sharing a piece of strudel, and we look down onto a throng of people, buying up food for their New Year's Eve parties.

"I don't mean to be discouraging," she says. "I mean, I do keep voting every year — just like I keep on washing the dishes and lighting the candles — I guess partially it's just a ritual that we go through."

"But not all of it," I say.

"No, of course not," Peggy says, looking at me sidelong. "You can always hope that things are going to change."

We sit there for a moment longer, and she cuts off a piece of pastry with her plastic fork, scrutinizes it, then takes a bite. Christmas music is still playing from some loudspeaker somewhere.

"Anyway," Peggy says. "It's a new year, isn't it?"

An Election With No Losers (NYT)

By Robert Hicks

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

FORMER Mayor Bob Corker of Chattanooga is now Senator Bob Corker in Washington and, while I didn't vote for him, I think that if he proves true to his own past he will do well. That is, he'll be a centrist Republican, guided by his own common sense and maybe a bit by the example of Tennessee's moderate senior senator, Lamar Alexander, rather than by the right-wing rhetoric that has become de rigueur in so much of the South.

As for former Representative Harold Ford, the Democrat Mr. Corker defeated, things aren't all that grim. Despite his loss, he was quickly nominated by James Carville to challenge Howard Dean for the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee. He declined, but sooner or later there is going to be a fight for the leadership of the party, and Mr. Ford has likely earned himself a pivotal role in any effort to move Democrats away from reflexive Deaniac liberalism.

Ironic as it may sound, what Mr. Ford did prove in his defeat was that he is electable. As it turned out, race didn't seem to hold the Memphis congressman back — the exit polls made it pretty clear that he probably did as well as any white Democrat could have done, given the growing conservative bent of Tennessee.

In talking with my Republican friends and neighbors, I too have concluded that his color was far less important than his family's long record of graft and political strong-arming. Of course, my fellow Tennesseans had their reservations, but, as it turned out, their concerns were not based on the fact that Mr. Ford is a black man or on his voting record, but on the baggage he bears with his lineage.

As one of my neighbors said to me, "I just kept wanting him to say something more than 'You can't choose your family.' " The neighbor's big disappointment was that Mr. Ford wouldn't actively support Steve Cohen, the Democratic nominee for the Congressional seat he vacated, over Mr. Ford's brother Jake, who ran a write-in campaign after losing the Democratic primary.

And the other night I was having dinner with Welling LaGrone, one of Nashville's civic leaders and a Republican if there ever was one, and even he said he had to admit that Mr. Ford was impressive on all fronts, other than that he was raised in a den of thieves.

I say all this to make the point that despite not being able to choose — or cut loose from — his family, his race or his party, Harold Ford has emerged as a serious politician, a gracious loser, a gentleman worthy of respect and with a solid foundation to build a future on, not only for himself but, I hope, for those remaining yellow dog Democrats like myself.

So what does the future look like? Gov. Phil Bredesen, a Democrat, will begin a well-deserved second term. Senators Alexander and Corker seem set to infuse Washington's newly minority party with the spirit of moderation. And Harold Ford looks likely to find the door that will lead him to best serve his party and the nation.

DOJ_NMG_0113483

In an era when elections leave so many Americans of both parties frustrated and bitter, I think Tennessee voters across the spectrum are feeling they can congratulate themselves on a job well done.

For Veterans, Alaska's An Attraction (WP/AP)

By Jeannette J. Lee, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Ex-Military Personnel Have Flocked to State

ANCHORAGE -- As a boy in Upstate New York, Bill McCue spent many hours poring over articles in Field and Stream magazine about moose and grizzlies and dreaming about adventures in the Alaska wilderness.

Later, as a military man, he was stationed in Alaska, and "it was like a dream come true," said McCue, a Vietnam veteran who served at the Navy base on Kodiak Island in the early 1960s. "It's like no other place I'd ever been to."

McCue is one of nearly 70,000 veterans who have chosen to make their home in Alaska, which, according to the Census Bureau, has the country's highest concentration of former military personnel.

The high number reflects, in part, that veterans tend to cluster near military bases. Alaska's two biggest cities, Anchorage and Fairbanks, have one Army and one Air Force base apiece.

"There are real advantages to staying near a military post once you've retired. You can use the PX, you can go on post for medical care, and you've got a social network," said Catherine Lutz, a professor of anthropology at Brown University in Providence, R.I.

But why cold and snowy Alaska and not, say, a warm military town in the Sunbelt? Many veterans, as with many non-military residents, are drawn by the untrammeled wilderness, the world-class hunting and fishing, and secure jobs with good pay.

Moreover, the libertarian frontier spirit and the extreme solitude in this sparsely settled state of 650,000 have a certain appeal to veterans who led highly regimented professional lives or saw too much of the horrors of war.

"There's a lot of open space," said state Veterans Affairs Administrator Jerry Beale. "You can be an individual. You can move out into the bush as far as you want and not have to see anybody for a year if don't want to."

McCue said that for years he suffered from night sweats after serving on an aircraft carrier in the South China Sea during the Vietnam War.

"You come to get away from everything, especially if you've seen stuff you don't want to remember," he said.

McCue has since realized many of his boyhood imaginings. He has been a commercial fisherman, helped guide bear hunts on Kodiak Island and once filled the bed of a pickup truck with pink salmon after fishing for 11 hours with a rod and reel. Now, at 63, he drives a taxi in Anchorage.

Dave Landacre, who is a chaplain at the Veterans of Foreign Wars in Fairbanks, said the veterans he knows "don't like to be told what to do."

"Fairbanks veterans are the people that had 20 to 30 years in military service. They're very loyal, but now that they're done, they want to do things on their own," Landacre said.

Veterans make up nearly 17 percent of the state's adult population, the Census Bureau reported in 2005. Nationally, the proportion is 11 percent.

Beale said most veterans in Alaska are originally from the lower 48 states and get their first glimpse of the state while on duty.

John Kelley, who served in the Air Force and Army, stopped in Alaska in 1968 on his way to Vietnam. He remembers the plane had to circle to scare a moose off the runway before landing.

"I said, 'All righty, I'm coming back,' " he said. "I made it back in 1986 and haven't lived anywhere else since."

Many of Alaska's veterans work for state or federal agencies, with a high percentage in law enforcement as police officers, state troopers or prison guards.

But it takes a hardy sort to live independently in Alaska, and as many veterans grow old, they leave for retirement communities in Arizona, Florida or California. "The cold, snow and ice gets to a lot of people," Beale said.

But Landacre said he and his fellow veterans made an educated choice, having sampled cities around the world while in the service. Landacre, for example, was stationed in balmy places such as Hawaii, California, Cuba and Guam before settling on Fairbanks, where temperatures can sink to 60 below.

"The Fairbanks crew is not going anywhere. They're up here, and they're staying," Landacre said. "I guarantee not one of us is planning to move to Florida."

Oh, Now The Right Wants To Talk Nice (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0113484

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

After raining fire on Clinton for years, conservatives are becoming obsessed with tone now that Democrats are in power.

IN THE 1990S, prominent conservatives suggested that President Clinton was a murderer, a conservative senator warned that the president might be shot if he visited that senator's state, and a Republican majority leader told Democrats, "Your president is just not that important to us." And there were many other nasty episodes. But ever since a Republican has held the White House, certain conservatives have decided that political anger is now the main problem of American life and that it resides primarily on the left.

The latest such conservative is Peter Woods, who has written an article in National Review holding me up as the apotheosis of this trend. Woods refers to my "anger" and "nastiness" and writes that I represent "a kind of political theater — a special kind of theater in which the performer enacts rage and attempts symbolically to annihilate his opponent."

Because he is obviously very sensitive, I will try to explain myself as delicately as possible, in the civil and respectful tone that he finds appropriate.

Let me begin by saying Woods is obviously a brilliant and discerning man. I'm sure he writes in good faith and is a caring father or son or cousin to somebody. If I were to run into him, I would greet him warmly, offer him a drink and start gently washing his feet.

Yet I must ever so gently point out that his logic falls just a wee bit short. In 2003, I wrote an essay for the New Republic defending hatred of George W. Bush, an essay to which Woods attributes many of the ills of modern life. According to Woods, "its essential message is, 'I am to be believed and reckoned with because I am angry.' "

I would meekly suggest that this was the opposite of the point of the essay. I wrote that I personally find Bush to be a quite distasteful person, but you must separate your view of the man from your view of his policies. That is the reason why I forcefully (and, in retrospect, mistakenly) supported the Iraq war and upbraided my fellow liberals for allowing their disdain for Bush to color their view of the enterprise. The point of the essay was that personal anger can exist, but it ought to be put aside, and there were sound and natural reasons why liberals loathe Bush.

Woods further claims that I have exposed myself again with another article in the New Republic. Let me explain this one. Recently, a libertarian named Brink Lindsey wrote an article for the New Republic arguing that liberals needed to form an alliance with libertarians. I found his argument interesting (and I encouraged its publication) but ultimately unconvincing. So I wrote a reply, arguing that it would be ideologically and politically counterproductive for liberals to follow Lindsey's advice.

This is the article Woods seizes on as verification that I and other liberals are driven by blind rage. "It is the proof that the American Left's anger is ultimately not about Bush," he writes. My article, in his description, exuded "withering disdain." Most horrible of all, it ended by quoting Michael Corleone — from "The Godfather, Part 2" — saying, "My offer is this: Nothing." My use of this quote, Woods writes, was an effort to "adopt the persona of a gravely insulted Michael Corleone."

Well. As for the "withering disdain," I do confess that I found Lindsey's argument unconvincing. But in my reply, I did write that Lindsey's offer was "written in a friendly spirit" and I called it "quite thought-provoking." If my politesse was not up to Woods' standards, I humbly apologize and plead the constraints of space, without which I would have gone on in my praise of Lindsey in greater detail.

Moreover, by quoting a movie, I was not attempting to adopt the persona of a mafia don. Nor, for that matter, was I threatening to have Lindsey killed. I was simply trying to make a little joke. I am deeply sorry that in so doing I tore asunder the fragile threads of our civil society.

Some would suggest that the right's newfound obsession with tone is not only hypocritical but an attempt to stifle criticism through arbitrary criteria, much like campus PC-niks. But I would not suggest that because that would be an angry thing to say, and I do not want to do any more damage to civil discourse than I already have.

Saudis, France Urge Compliance From Iran (AP)

AP, January 7, 2007

Saudi Arabia and France called Saturday on Iran to accept international demands to halt uranium enrichment, saying the Mideast should be free of weapons of mass destruction.

Visiting French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy and his Saudi counterpart Prince Saud al-Faisal stressed diplomacy must be the way to solve Iran's ongoing standoff with the West over its nuclear program.

"We agreed on the necessity that the region should be void of weapons of mass destruction and that achieving this target will be by dialogue and diplomacy," al-Faisal said during a joint news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0113485

"Israel should not be excluded from the international efforts and procedures," he added, reflecting regional demands that the Jewish state also be scrutinized for its nuclear program.

Iran recently stated it would continue to defy international sanctions aimed at rolling back its uranium enrichment program. Enriched uranium can be used both for nuclear power and nuclear weapons.

Tehran says its nuclear program is peaceful, but the United States and Europe fear Iran is trying to develop an atomic bomb.

"Iran has to respond to international demands regarding this issue, and should have a positive stance," Douste-Blazy was quoted as saying by the state-run Saudi Press Agency.

Arab states near Iran are concerned nuclear accidents could endanger their citizens or environment, and fear a possible military confrontation between the Islamic regime and the United States or its Israeli ally. Gulf nations hosting U.S. military bases — Kuwait, Bahrain and Qatar — also fear Iran could retaliate against them.

U.S. Puts Squeeze On Iran's Oil Fields (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

A campaign to dry up financing for projects poses a threat to Tehran's ability to maintain exports, analysts say.

LONDON — As Washington wages a very public battle against Iran's quest for nuclear power, it is quietly gaining ground on another energy front: the oil fields that are the Islamic Republic's lifeblood.

Iran's oil industry has raked in record amounts of cash during three years of high oil prices. But a new U.S. campaign to dry up financing for oil and natural gas development poses a threat to the republic's ability to continue exporting oil over the next two decades, many analysts say.

The campaign comes at a moment of unique vulnerability for Iran's oil industry, which also faces challenges from rising domestic energy consumption, international isolation, a populist spending spree by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and trouble closing contracts with foreign oil companies — a recipe for potential disaster in a nation with one of the world's largest reservoirs of oil.

"If the government does not control the consumption of oil products in Iran … and at the same time, if the projects for increasing the capacity of the oil and protection of the oil wells will not happen, within 10 years, there will not be any oil for export," Mohammed Hadi Nejad-Hosseinian, Iran's deputy oil minister for international affairs, said in a telephone interview.

If Iran were to suddenly stop exporting its 2.6 million barrels of oil a day, such as in the event of a military strike, world oil prices probably would skyrocket. But a gradual decline might be offset by other OPEC members, analysts say, particularly as Iraq increases its oil production and Saudi Arabia carries out plans for significant increases in its production capacity.

The efforts by the United States and its allies over the last few months to persuade international banks and oil companies to pull out of Iran threaten dozens of projects, including development of Iran's two massive new oil fields that could expand output by 800,000 barrels a day over the next four years.

"Many European banks which had accepted financing some oil industries projects have recently canceled them," Nejad-Hosseinian said.

In addition, banks are no longer granting letters of credit for delivery of some supplies, ministry officials say. And as nations such as Japan begin to back out of Iran oil development under U.S. pressure, the government in Tehran is being forced to dig into its own reserve funds to get crucial new projects off the ground.

But Nejad-Hosseinian said Iran had recognized the gravity of the threat and launched steps to head it off, including new "smart" rationing cards, scheduled for distribution in March to check skyrocketing sales of cheap gasoline, and an overhaul of Iran's historically stingy contract terms in an attempt to lure big oil companies into skirting the U.S. roadblocks.

Iran also is hoping to turn to China and Russia for help. But U.S. officials already have warned that they will seek to hold China accountable under Washington's unilateral sanctions laws if it proceeds with a $16-billion project to develop Iran's North Pars gas field. China also has signed a memorandum of understanding under which it may take on development of the Yadavaran field in southwestern Iran, expected to boost production by 300,000 barrels a day.

Domestic problems

Iran's oil and natural-gas dilemma has no direct connection with the sanctions adopted last month by the United Nations Security Council, which are narrowly aimed at assistance to Iran's nuclear program. Although Tehran insists it has strictly peaceful intentions, the U.S. and others believe the program is linked to development of nuclear weapons.

Rather, the looming crisis stems from a series of domestic problems that have converged at a time when Iran is susceptible to U.S. attempts to capitalize on them to coerce Tehran's compliance on the nuclear issue.

DOJ_NMG_0113486

First is the condition of Iran's aging oil fields, which have never fully recovered from damage inflicted during the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s.

To maintain sufficient pressure to keep them pumping, Iran has to divert large amounts of natural gas that might otherwise be sold.

"You need billions of dollars invested in order to stand still — to avoid a decline," said Manouchehr Takin, a former Iranian petroleum geologist who is a senior analyst for the Center for Global Energy Studies in London.

Likewise, increased output from refinery construction is being outpaced by the swelling number of young Iranians with a fondness for gas-guzzling cars. Heavily subsidized gasoline is just 35 cents a gallon, a price that invites smuggling, and talk about raising the price has, until recently, gone nowhere.

Moreover, the country has one of the most extensive residential heating infrastructures in the world, with homes in the most remote villages warmed toastily with cheap natural gas.

Total domestic energy subsidies total $20 billion to $30 billion a year, Takin said.

"These subsidies are now costing the government roughly 15% of Iran's GDP. That should knock you over. That's a mind-boggling number," said Hossein Askari, professor of international business at George Washington University. "And the nub of the problem is that if you were to cut the subsidies, I think there would be riots in the streets."

Iran could be reinvesting in the oil and gas infrastructure, and it is to a degree, but Ahmadinejad also has diverted billions of dollars in oil revenue to social welfare programs, major infrastructure building programs in neighboring countries such as Afghanistan and importation of consumer products — to the consternation of many of those in his government.

Foreign investment

The heavy lifting in recent years has been left to foreign oil companies, which in the 1990s began working in Iran in substantial numbers for the first time since the Islamic Revolution.

U.S. sanctions in place since the seizure of the American Embassy in Tehran in 1979 have prevented U.S.-based oil companies from operating in Iran, but companies such as Royal Dutch Shell, France's Total and Italy's Eni have invested, some heavily, despite on-again, off-again threats by Washington to pursue sanctions against foreign companies under U.S. laws.

To a great degree, though, Iran has created its own woes by dragging out contract negotiations and offering only skimpy paybacks to foreign oil companies interested in building new production, industry analysts say.

"People have said that even with sanctions and all the rest, if Iranians want investment in their oil industry, what they need to do is offer decent terms, and whatever the sanctions, they would have companies flooding in," said one Western oil company official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"But the issue for us at this point is both political and commercial. The state of the country is such that it's just not the right time to be there."

That is the message Washington is trying to reinforce. For years, U.S. sanctions prohibited investments of more than $20 million in Iran's oil industry, but in practice, they were applied only to U.S.-based oil companies. But as the nuclear showdown has unfolded, and as it became clear the U.N. sanctions would not impose serious economic penalties on Iran, Bush administration officials decided on a different tack.

Envoys from the Treasury Department have approached international banks and companies, reminding them of Iran's record of financing militant Islamic organizations such as Hamas, in the Palestinian territories, and Hezbollah, in Lebanon, through the banking system and its defiance of U.N. resolutions on nonproliferation, and warning that investing in such a country may not be a good business risk.

Simultaneously, the Justice Department reportedly has opened investigations of several banks to determine whether investments in Iran violated U.S. sanctions laws. In late 2005, Dutch bank ABN Amro agreed to pay $80 million in fines stemming in part from improper transactions with Iran through its subsidiary in Dubai, United Arab Emirates.

UBS Bank and Credit Suisse of Switzerland recently announced they were suspending most new business with Iran, and British-based HSBC said it would no longer accept dollar transactions from within Iran.

"Banks are constantly doing risk assessments about what kind of business they want to be involved in," Stuart Levey, Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said in a telephone interview.

"There's a lot out there suggesting that there's an element of coercion involved. But I think that for a lot of these executives, the main thing driving them is they really don't want to be involved in facilitating terrorism or proliferation or any other crime."

More than two decades of U.S. sanctions have had little effect on Iran's oil industry — U.S.-based companies have been replaced, largely by Europeans. But this new attack on financing has rapidly started to dry up potential loans on dozens of projects, according to oil industry insiders in Tehran and the West.

DOJ_NMG_0113487

One of them is reportedly the giant Azadegan oil field in southwestern Iran near the Iraqi border. Japan's INPEX Holdings Inc. in October pulled out of all but a 10% stake in the $2-billion project under U.S. pressure, and alternative financing from foreign banks has failed to materialize, said one source with close connections to the Iranian Oil Ministry.

"It has been very effective. Nobody is prepared to loan Iran anything on anything," said Fereidun Fesharaki, an energy advisor to the Iranian prime minister in the 1970s who now heads the FACTS Inc. petroleum consulting firm in Honolulu.

In a report published this month by the National Academy of Sciences, Johns Hopkins University geography professor Roger Stern argued that the confluence of high domestic demand, a delay in adding production capacity, the diversion of natural gas to keep wells producing and other factors could lead to a decline of 33% to 46% in Iran's exports by 2011 and a halt to exports by 2015 or so.

Other analysts have said those forecasts are too dismal, and output is more likely to remain flat at about 4 million barrels a day. Iranian officials say they have signed $28.4 billion worth of new oil and gas development contracts over the last 15 months, and hope to increase production to 7 million barrels a day by 2014 — a goal that the International Energy Agency says will require $80 billion in investments.

The nuclear issue

Whether that will be realized could depend, in large part, on what happens on the nuclear issue.

In fact, Iran's oil and gas dilemma appears to point up a "genuine" need for civilian nuclear power, Stern said.

"When I first started hearing this claim that Iran needed these nuclear plans to substitute for oil and gas, I thought, 'That's ridiculous,' " he said. "So it has really been a surprise to me," he added, to see evidence that Tehran's stated purpose for the nuclear reactor is not "simply a weapons deception."

"I don't think they're nice guys," he said. "This is a regime that funds terrorism and is making outrageous claims that Israel should disappear. But it just happens to be a convenient truth for them that they do need nuclear power."

Revealed: Israel Plans Nuclear Strike On Iran (LONT)

By Uzi Mahnaimi, Sarah Baxter

Times of London, January 7, 2007

ISRAEL has drawn up secret plans to destroy Iran's uranium enrichment facilities with tactical nuclear weapons.

Two Israeli air force squadrons are training to blow up an Iranian facility using low-yield nuclear "bunker-busters", according to several Israeli military sources.

The attack would be the first with nuclear weapons since 1945, when the United States dropped atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The Israeli weapons would each have a force equivalent to one-fifteenth of the Hiroshima bomb.

Under the plans, conventional laser-guided bombs would open "tunnels" into the targets. "Mini-nukes" would then immediately be fired into a plant at Natanz, exploding deep underground to reduce the risk of radioactive fallout.

"As soon as the green light is given, it will be one mission, one strike and the Iranian nuclear project will be demolished," said one of the sources.

The plans, disclosed to The Sunday Times last week, have been prompted in part by the Israeli intelligence service Mossad's assessment that Iran is on the verge of producing enough enriched uranium to make nuclear weapons within two years.

Israeli military commanders believe conventional strikes may no longer be enough to annihilate increasingly well-defended enrichment facilities. Several have been built beneath at least 70ft of concrete and rock. However, the nuclear-tipped bunker-busters would be used only if a conventional attack was ruled out and if the United States declined to intervene, senior sources said.

Israeli and American officials have met several times to consider military action. Military analysts said the disclosure of the plans could be intended to put pressure on Tehran to halt enrichment, cajole America into action or soften up world opinion in advance of an Israeli attack.

Some analysts warned that Iranian retaliation for such a strike could range from disruption of oil supplies to the West to terrorist attacks against Jewish targets around the world.

Israel has identified three prime targets south of Tehran which are believed to be involved in Iran's nuclear programme:

Natanz, where thousands of centrifuges are being installed for uranium enrichment

A uranium conversion facility near Isfahan where, according to a statement by an Iranian vice-president last week, 250 tons of gas for the enrichment process have been stored in tunnels

A heavy water reactor at Arak, which may in future produce enough plutonium for a bomb

DOJ_NMG_0113488

Israeli officials believe that destroying all three sites would delay Iran's nuclear programme indefinitely and prevent them from having to live in fear of a "second Holocaust".

The Israeli government has warned repeatedly that it will never allow nuclear weapons to be made in Iran, whose president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has declared that "Israel must be wiped off the map".

Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary, has described military action against Iran as a "last resort", leading Israeli officials to conclude that it will be left to them to strike.

Israeli pilots have flown to Gibraltar in recent weeks to train for the 2,000-mile round trip to the Iranian targets. Three possible routes have been mapped out, including one over Turkey.

Air force squadrons based at Hatzerim in the Negev desert and Tel Nof, south of Tel Aviv, have trained to use Israel's tactical nuclear weapons on the mission. The preparations have been overseen by Major General Eliezer Shkedi, commander of the Israeli air force.

Sources close to the Pentagon said the United States was highly unlikely to give approval for tactical nuclear weapons to be used. One source said Israel would have to seek approval "after the event", as it did when it crippled Iraq's nuclear reactor at Osirak with airstrikes in 1981.

Scientists have calculated that although contamination from the bunker-busters could be limited, tons of radioactive uranium compounds would be released.

The Israelis believe that Iran's retaliation would be constrained by fear of a second strike if it were to launch its Shehab-3 ballistic missiles at Israel.

However, American experts warned of repercussions, including widespread protests that could destabilise parts of the Islamic world friendly to the West.

Colonel Sam Gardiner, a Pentagon adviser, said Iran could try to close the Strait of Hormuz, the route for 20% of the world's oil.

Some sources in Washington said they doubted if Israel would have the nerve to attack Iran. However, Dr Ephraim Sneh, the deputy Israeli defence minister, said last month: "The time is approaching when Israel and the international community will have to decide whether to take military action against Iran."

Hamas Pledges To Boost Forces In Gaza (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 7, 2007

Hamas defied President Mahmoud Abbas' decree Saturday that its paramilitary unit is illegal, saying it will fight any attempt to disband the force in an increasingly bloody faceoff between the Islamic militant group and Abbas' Fatah party.

Three more Hamas supporters were killed in the factional fighting that is threatening to plunge the Palestinian territories into civil war.

The two groups have been wrangling over power since Hamas defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections a year ago and gained control over most Palestinian government functions. However, Fatah continued to dominate security forces and last spring, Hamas formed its own security unit known as the Executive Force, recruiting many former members of its military wing.

Tensions between the rival security forces erupted into large-scale fighting last month. Since then, more than two dozen people have been killed.

Abbas outlawed the Executive Force on Saturday, two days after Hamas gunmen stormed the home of a top pro-Fatah security commander and killed him and seven bodyguards. It was the deadliest battle yet during the recent wave of infighting.

Abbas' office said the decision was made "in light of continued security chaos and assassinations of a number of our fighters ... and in light of the failure of existing agencies and security apparatuses in imposing law and order and protecting the security of the citizens."

The statement did not explicitly threaten force, saying only that the Hamas militia "will be dealt with accordingly as long as it is not immediately folded into legal security forces."

Abbas also confirmed the U.S. was sending aid to boost Palestinian security forces loyal to him. President Bush is asking Congress to provide $83 million for those forces, U.S. officials said Friday.

Abbas' office said late Saturday he spoke to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on the current situation ahead of her upcoming visit. The U.S. views Abbas, a moderate who seeks peace talks with Israel, as a legitimate negotiating partner. But Washington, along with Israel and the European Union consider Hamas, which is committed to Israel's destruction, a terrorist group.

DOJ_NMG_0113489

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak called on the Palestinians to halt their fighting. Egypt frequently mediates between opposing Palestinian factions.

Abbas claims authority over most Palestinian security forces, but Hamas controls the Interior Ministry, which also has security responsibilities. The various forces were formed more than a decade ago by the late Yasser Arafat, who created rivalries to keep potential challengers weak.

After years of corruption and fighting with Israel, the forces have become largely ineffective, resulting in widespread lawlessness, particularly in the Gaza Strip.

In the Hamas stronghold of Gaza, leaders of the group defiantly rejected Abbas' decree.

Interior Ministry spokesman Khaled Abu Hilal said Abbas was giving the green light for attacks on Hamas security men and that the unit would "deal firmly" with anyone who attacks it. He also announced plans to double the size of the Executive Force, which now has 6,000 men, compared with some 18,000 security men aligned with Fatah.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas accused Abbas of trying to deepen the rift between the two camps.

"I'm completely convinced that there are those who don't want the Palestinian scene to enjoy calm and stability or to create the appropriate atmosphere for starting serious and deep dialogue aimed at reaching a national unity government," he said.

Abbas has been urging Hamas to join Fatah in a coalition in an effort to end international sanctions against the Hamas-led government that have crippled the Palestinian economy. But months of negotiations broke down in late November, sparking the latest wave of violence.

Previous attempts by Abbas to disband the Hamas militia or integrate it into existing security units have failed.

Late Saturday, three members of a pro-Hamas family were slain by gunmen from a rival clan considered to be Fatah supporters, witnesses and family members said. The same Fatah family has kidnapped about 10 Hamas supporters in recent days, Hamas officials said.

Hamas' radio station in Gaza said one of the dead was a member of the Executive Force.

Also Saturday, gunmen in the West Bank stopped the car of Nablus' deputy mayor, Mahdi al-Khamdali of Hamas, and took him away in another car, security officials said. There was no immediate claim of responsibility, but the officials said they believed the kidnappers were Fatah supporters.

A pro-Hamas university professor in Nablus was shot and seriously wounded by gunmen who fired at his home late Saturday, security officials said.

Abbas Bans Hamas Militia (WT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas yesterday declared Hamas' militia in the Gaza Strip illegal, and the Islamic movement responded by defiantly announcing plans to double the size of the paramilitary unit.

Three more Hamas supporters were killed in the factional fighting that is threatening to plunge the Palestinian territories into civil war.

Mr. Abbas outlawed the Executive Force, issuing the decree two days after Hamas gunmen stormed the home of a top pro-Fatah security commander in northern Gaza and killed the man and seven bodyguards. It was the deadliest battle yet during the recent wave of infighting.

Mr. Abbas' office said the decision was made "in light of continued security chaos and assassinations of a number of our fighters ... and in light of the failure of existing agencies and security apparatuses in imposing law and order and protecting the security of the citizens."

In Gaza, Hamas' stronghold, leaders of the group defiantly rejected Mr. Abbas' decree and announced plans to double the size of its Executive Force to 12,000. Interior Ministry spokesman Khaled Abu Hilal of Hamas said that Mr. Abbas was giving the green light for attacks on Hamas security men and that the unit would "deal firmly" with anyone who attacks it.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas accused Mr. Abbas of trying to deepen the rift between the two camps.

"I'm completely convinced that there are those who don't want the Palestinian scene to enjoy calm and stability or to create the appropriate atmosphere for starting serious and deep dialogue aimed at reaching a national-unity government," he said.

Late yesterday, three members of a pro-Hamas family were slain by gunmen from a rival clan considered to be Fatah supporters, witnesses and family members said. The same Fatah family has kidnapped about 10 Hamas supporters in recent days, Hamas officials said.

The Palestinian infighting initially was largely confined to Gaza, but in recent days, it spread to the West Bank with a series of kidnappings and shootings.

DOJ_NMG_0113490

Gunmen in the West Bank yesterday stopped the car of Nablus' deputy mayor, Mahdi al-Khamdali of Hamas, pulled him out and took him away in another car, security officials said. There was no immediate claim of responsibility, but the officials said they believed the kidnappers were Fatah supporters.

In Ramallah, gunmen stormed the offices of the Hamas-controlled Interior Ministry, shot the office manager in the legs and took him away, security officials said. The man, also a Hamas supporter, was released in a nearby town and hospitalized, the officials said.

Shopkeepers in the West Bank city of Hebron closed their stores in a protest action ordered by the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, a violent group affiliated with Fatah.

Fatah and Hamas have been wrangling over power since the Islamic group defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections a year ago and gained control over most Palestinian government functions. Mr. Abbas, who was elected in a separate election, retained his post as president, and Fatah continued to dominate security forces.

Challenging that position, Hamas formed its own security unit, the Executive Force, last spring, recruiting many former members of the Hamas military wing.

Tensions between the rival security forces kept building in the streets until large-scale fighting erupted last month. Since then, more than two dozen people have been killed.

Mr. Abbas claims authority over most Palestinian security forces, but Hamas controls the Interior Ministry, which also has security responsibilities. The various forces were formed more than a decade ago by the now-deceased Yasser Arafat as part of his autocratic style of rule, in which he created rivalries to keep potential challengers weak.

After years of corruption and fighting with Israel, the Fatah forces -- which number about 18,000 -- have become largely ineffective, fueling widespread lawlessness.

Abbas Asks Dissolution Of Hamas Military Police (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 6 — After two days of intense fighting between Hamas and his Fatah faction, the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, demanded Saturday that Hamas-run paramilitary police be integrated into Fatah-dominated security forces.

Hamas warned Mr. Abbas that he was making a mistake and that it would resist any effort to disband the group, known as the Executive Force. The Hamas Interior Ministry immediately announced that it had plans to double the size of the Executive Force to 12,000 men and called on Palestinians to join it.

Mr. Abbas made his demand after the deaths of many Fatah men in clashes with the Executive Force over the last two days. In his statement on Saturday, Mr. Abbas called the force illegal and said it "will be treated as such if it is not immediately integrated into legal security services as stipulated by basic law."

It is not clear whether Mr. Abbas's statement is simply declaratory or whether he would order his security forces to take action against the paramilitary group if Hamas did not meet his demands.

A Hamas government spokesman, Ghazi Hamad, said that "to take such a decision under pressure and the current tense conditions is a mistake that will not contribute to peace and to resolving existing problems." The spokesman for the Hamas Interior Ministry, Khaled Abu Hillal, took a sharper tone, saying, "We warn against making any move, which will be met with force."

Mr. Abbas tried unsuccessfully to ban the Executive Force once last year, finally agreeing with Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniya to integrate it into the Palestinian Authority.

But Hamas and Interior Minister Said Siam have kept effective control of the force, which is dominant in Gaza, arguing that the Fatah-dominated security services were lax, corrupt, badly trained and failed to keep order in the territory.

The Hamas force currently consists of more than 5,000 well-armed and well-trained fighters.

Mr. Abbas is the commander-in-chief of all armed men in the Palestinian Authority, but where the authority of the Prime Minister and Interior Minister fit into the equation has been a confusion ever since the job of prime minister was invented as a way of reducing the power of the late Yasir Arafat.

Mr. Abbas was the first prime minister and complained, when he quit after four months, that Mr. Arafat would not relinquish control over the security services. That struggle over the security forces is more complicated now because both the prime minister and interior minister are from Hamas.

Hamas is also making efforts to expand the force to the occupied West Bank, where it is much weaker, given the regular presence of Israeli troops.

DOJ_NMG_0113491

The Bush administration is asking Congress for $86 million to improve the equipment and training of Mr. Abbas's Presidential Guard and to expand the group, which has 3,700 members. American officials describe the effort as a way to balance Hamas and deter it, but say they are not trying to finance a civil war.

Mr. Abbas, in principle, controls the 45,000 security forces on the Palestinian Authority payroll, but it is unclear how many of them come to work, let alone obey his commands.

Separately, the Dagmoush clan in Gaza kidnapped several Hamas members Saturday. The clan, which is believed by Gazans close to Hamas to have captured an Agence France-Press photographer this week, is said to be insisting that it will not release the man, Jaime Razuri of Peru, until Hamas hands over fighters who the Dagmoush say were responsible for killing clan members.

Late Saturday, three members of a pro-Hamas family, the Diri, were killed by gunmen from the Dagmoush clan and five were wounded, witnesses and family members said.

Two Hamas officials were also seized in the West Bank, including the deputy mayor of Nablus, Mehdi Hambali. In Ramallah, masked gunmen abducted an Interior Ministry official, Ihad Suleiman Ghidhan. He was found alive an hour later with three bullets fired into his legs.

Fatah gunmen from the Aksa Martyrs Brigades forced a strike in the West Bank city of Hebron, preventing stores from opening to protest Hamas's attacks in Gaza.

Abbas Bans Hamas Police Force (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Maher Abukhater, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

Palestinian leader acts amid factional fighting. A defiant Interior Ministry says it will double the militia's size.

RAMALLAH, WEST BANK — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas on Saturday outlawed the Hamas-led Interior Ministry's police force, the most powerful armed unit outside his control in factional fighting that has left 33 people dead in the last month.

The ministry responded with defiance. It announced plans to double the size of the black-uniformed paramilitary force and vowed to resist Abbas' order that its 6,000 members be incorporated into the security apparatus loyal to the president's Fatah movement.

The dueling announcements raised the prospect of an intensified armed standoff. Abbas' only means of enforcing the order appeared to be coercive action by police and security units under his command, but they are relatively weak in the Gaza Strip, Hamas' stronghold.

In an effort to strengthen Abbas, U.S. officials have said they expect to ask Congress for nearly $100 million in aid to help train and supply his expanding Presidential Guard. The Bush administration and Israel have recently coordinated arms shipments to Abbas' forces from Egypt.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is scheduled to meet with Abbas here this month to discuss efforts to weaken and isolate Hamas, the Iranian-backed Islamic movement that leads the Palestinian government. Hamas resists Abbas' efforts to start peace talks with Israel, and refuses to recognize the Jewish state.

Saturday's statement by Abbas came two days after a unit of the Interior Ministry police, known as the Executive Force, besieged the Gaza home of a Fatah commander, Col. Mohammed Ghayeb, killing him and his bodyguards and seriously wounding his wife and brother.

Hamas officials said Ghayeb had been responsible for the deaths of two of their fighters.

Abbas ordered the Executive Force disbanded "in light of continued lawlessness and assassinations," the statement said. It said its members would be treated as outlaws unless they were incorporated into forces commanded by the president.

Interior Ministry spokesman Khaled abu Hilal called Abbas' announcement "a green light to those who seek to shed the blood of the Executive Force members" and said the force would "deal firmly" with anyone who attacked it.

Intermittent fighting among the Palestinians erupted after elections a year ago created a division of power between the president and Hamas, which won control of parliament and formed a government in March. The split paralyzed most governing institutions, and the rival movements began conducting politics through armed force.

Abbas claims authority over the various armed Palestinian forces created in the 1990s by Yasser Arafat, the late Fatah and Palestinian Authority leader. Today they include two police agencies with 15,000 members each in addition to the elite Presidential Guard, which is being enlarged from 4,000 to 6,000 members.

Hamas formed the Executive Force in March, saying the Fatah-led forces had become corrupt and ineffective.

DOJ_NMG_0113492

Shortly afterward, Abbas tried to disband the Executive Force but failed. Hamas officials have said they are open to the idea of incorporating the force into the president's security apparatus, but only if Abbas overhauls its command structure to make it less partisan.

The announcement Saturday said Abbas planned a reshuffle of commanders but gave no details. On Thursday, he appointed Brig. Gen. Jamal Kayed, a Fatah loyalist who is believed to have good relations with Hamas, to head one of his police agencies in Gaza.

Many Palestinians on both sides of the divide say the only way Abbas can end the violence is through a power-sharing agreement with Hamas. The two sides discussed such a pact for much of last year, until Abbas broke off talks with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh in November.

The two men met early Friday for the first time since then and seemed to be working together to restore calm after the killings Thursday.

Haniyeh said Saturday that Abbas' outlawing of the Executive Force "contradicted the positive atmosphere" of their meeting. He said the Executive Force is legal. Abu Hilal said the Interior Ministry was taking applications to expand the force to 12,000 members.

Factional fighting continued Saturday.

In the West Bank, gunmen abducted the Hamas deputy mayor of Nablus from his car and stormed the Interior Ministry offices in Ramallah, where they wounded the office manager in the legs.

In Gaza City, three members of a pro-Hamas family were killed by gunmen from a rival clan considered to be Fatah supporters.

The Hamas radio station said one of the dead was an Executive Force member.

Jews, Arabs And Jimmy Carter (NYT)

By Ethan Bronner

The New York Times Book Review, January 7, 2007

PALESTINE PEACE NOT APARTHEID

By Jimmy Carter.

264 pp. Simon and Schuster. $27.

This is a strange little book about the Arab-Israeli conflict from a major public figure. It is premised on the notion that Americans too often get only one side of the story, one uncritically sympathetic to Israel, so someone with authority and knowledge needs to offer a fuller picture. Fine idea. The problem is that in this book Jimmy Carter does not do so. Instead, he simply offers a narrative that is largely unsympathetic to Israel. Israeli bad faith fills the pages. Hollow statements by Israel's enemies are presented without comment. Broader regional developments go largely unexamined. In other words, whether or not Carter is right that most Americans have a distorted view of the conflict, his contribution is to offer a distortion of his own.

Yasir Arafat is portrayed as someone who disavowed terrorism. Hafez al-Assad, who was president of Syria until 2000 when he died and his son took over, is quoted for an entire section, offering harsh impressions of Israel, including the opinion that it "initiated the 1967 war in order to take even more Arab land." Carter does not contradict him. The separation barrier that Israel is building along and inside parts of the West Bank is not to stop suicide bombers and other violent attacks. Its "driving purpose," Carter says, is "the acquisition of land."

Such misrepresentations — and there are others — are a shame because most of what Carter focuses on is well worth reading about. The barrier (which he calls a "wall" even though a very small percentage is wall) does indeed take land from the Palestinians. His chapter on the endless humiliation of daily life for the Palestinians under Israeli occupation paints a devastating and largely accurate picture of confiscated farm produce, unfair competition from Israeli goods, withheld foreign donations, leveled houses and legal dead ends. Carter is right that insufficient attention is being paid, but perhaps that is because his picture feels like yesterday's story, especially since Israel's departures from southern Lebanon and Gaza have not stopped anti-Israel violence from those areas.

This book has something of a Rip van Winkle feel to it, as if little had changed since Carter diagnosed the problem in the 1970s. All would be well today, he suggests, if his advice then had been followed. Forget Al Qaeda (the name does not appear in this book), the nuclear ambitions of Iran and the rise of the Taliban in Afghanistan. If Israel had "refrained from colonizing the West Bank," he asserts, there would have been "a comprehensive and lasting peace." The debate about the Israeli occupation "will shape the future of Israel; it may also determine the prospects for peace in the Middle East — and perhaps the world."

DOJ_NMG_0113493

This is an awfully narrow perspective. The Middle East could well be the source of the next major war and the chances of avoiding it would be increased if the Israeli question were settled. Moreover, if Israel had not built settlements throughout Gaza and the West Bank, solving its dispute with the Palestinians would probably have been — and would be — a lot easier.

But there are other factors to consider, including that for the most radical leaders of the Muslim world — and their numbers are not dwindling — settling the Israel question does not mean an equitable division of land between Israel and Palestine. It means eliminating Israel.

To see the narrowness of Carter's perspective, it is worth returning to 1979, the year of the Egypt-Israel peace treaty that resulted from Carter's Camp David mediation as president, a hugely significant accomplishment. Carter rightly accuses Menachem Begin, then Israel's prime minister, of deception regarding the expansion of West Bank settlements. Begin promised to freeze the settlements. Not only did he not do so; he had no intention of doing so. Carter lost re-election in 1980 to Ronald Reagan and suggests that Reagan's nod-and-wink tolerance of Israeli actions — its bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor, annexation of the Golan Heights, settlement building and 1982 invasion of Lebanon — were the beginning of the end of the process he had set in motion.

Yet the trouble that was brewing even before these events suggests they may not have been the central issue Carter sees them as. Egypt was instantly ostracized from the Arab world because of its agreement with Israel. Moreover, 1979 was the year of the Iranian revolution, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and Saddam Hussein's consolidation of power in Iraq. As much as Israeli policies fueled Arab rage — and they certainly did — these other forces contributed heavily to the state of affairs today.

This does not mean that the problems on the ground have no impact. Israel's friends will increasingly tell you that the dispute is not about land or occupation at all but about the growing radicalism of the Muslim world and its refusal to countenance a Jewish state in its midst. The confiscation of land, the roadblocks and border closings, the preference given to Israeli products within the occupied areas over locally made ones do not amount to much, they say. And those who focus on them are engaging not only in anti-Israel propaganda but in a kind of anti-Semitism.

Which is what some are hinting unfairly of Carter. The Anti-Defamation League has run large advertisements in major newspapers, including this one, attacking the book for Carter's propagation of "myths like Jewish control of the government and media." Across the land, Jewish leaders and their friends are asking each other what exactly Carter's problem is with the Jews.

Their biggest complaint against the book — a legitimate one — is the word "apartheid" in the title, with its false echo of the racist policies of the old South Africa. But overstatement hardly adds up to anti-Semitism.

There is, however, another subtler issue and it has to do with Carter's religious focus. There is a weird scene toward the start of the book in which Carter, a born-again Christian, goes to see Prime Minister Golda Meir on his first visit to Israel in 1973. She asks his impressions. "I said that I had long taught lessons from the Hebrew Scriptures and that a common historical pattern was that Israel was punished whenever the leaders turned away from devout worship of God. I asked if she was concerned about the secular nature of her Labor government."

Meir, a secular chain smoker, could only shrug. Carter seems impressed with his own temerity, as he calls it. But the episode hints at his tone deafness about Israel and Jews. Today, those most opposed to Israel's withdrawal from the West Bank are not the secular Labor Party leaders that Carter worried about. They are the leaders of the religious Zionist parties who consider the West Bank not a Palestinian area where Jews once lived, but their God-given birthright that must not be yielded. Carter never tells us how he squares his notions of God's punishment of secular Jews with the policies of such devout politicians.

In A Divided Israel, Angry Words Or No Words At All (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 6 — Two of Israel's most important relationships in the world are with the United States and Egypt. In the past 10 days, the Israeli government of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has managed to embarrass both of them.

First, Defense Minister Amir Peretz approved building a new settlement in the occupied West Bank, in the Jordan Valley, far beyond the current separation barrier, and then seemed astonished when the United States called the action a violation of commitments made under the 2003 peace plan, known as the road map.

Then, on Thursday, only hours before Mr. Olmert was to sit down at a summit meeting with the Egyptian president, Hosni Mubarak, the Israeli Army conducted a botched arrest raid in daylight in the center of Ramallah, the capital of the West Bank. In the ensuing mayhem, four Palestinians died, 20 were wounded, the target got away and Mr. Olmert had to sit through a humiliating tongue-lashing on live television from Mr. Mubarak.

Neither incident was of fundamental importance, and neither, it seems, was intended to create the ensuing ruckus. And neither action, Mr. Olmert's aides insisted, had been approved by the prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0113494

But together, Israeli politicians and analysts suggest, the moves reflect a malfunctioning Israeli government, deeply split over personalities, politics and policies. It has lost the confidence of most Israelis, according to the opinion polls, which makes Israeli leaders even less likely to take bold political steps domestically or internationally.

It is a government weak on security experience, as well, meaning that Mr. Olmert of Kadima and Defense Minister Peretz of Labor are unlikely to challenge the views and actions of the Israeli military. The rivalry between the men — a political competition between party leaders that has veered into mutual contempt — means that they and their staffs barely speak to one another.

This picture does not include the bitter rivalries within the Labor Party, as Mr. Peretz appears fatally weakened, or between Mr. Olmert and his Kadima party colleague, Tzipi Livni, the deputy prime minister and foreign minister, who Mr. Olmert thinks is angling for his job.

"There's a mess, but it's part of a more general mess," said, a senior Labor legislator on the Foreign and Defense Committee. "There's a breakdown in communications between the prime minister and the minister of defense. It's enough to look at them together. When they sit down, they don't say a word."

On Friday, Mr. Olmert denied a report that he would fire Mr. Peretz, but there is little doubt that he may do so if the Labor Party itself does not convince its current leader to change portfolios.

Adding to the tension is a traditional attitude by the Israeli military that it should be the prime judge of security issues. When Yitzhak Rabin was prime minister in the 1990s, he used to say that Israel would fight terrorism as if there were no peace negotiations and negotiate peace as if there were no terrorism, meaning that decision making for each track was separate. That sometimes led to politically awkward moments comparable to the two recent ones.

"Over the years, the army and intelligence have called the shots, no matter the political impact," Ms. Avital said. "There's a decision made in principle in a given scenario, but when and how to do a raid is left to their discretion and they don't give a hoot about the political timing. No one coordinates with the political level and there's little civilian control over operational decisions."

The situation becomes worse, however, when the military has little respect for its political masters, Ms. Avital concedes, suggesting that Mr. Peretz's time as defense minister is limited.

Shlomo Avineri, a former Israeli official who teaches at Hebrew University, says that the events of the last few weeks are accidental, but inevitable. "This is a government where the prime minister and defense minister don't really control their own people in the security services and don't feel strong enough to challenge them," he said, and are unable to read the military mind the way that former generals like Mr. Rabin and Ariel Sharon could. Both Olmert and Peretz are on the defensive," Mr. Avineri said. "It's a bad scene, and it doesn't make for strong government."

Mark Heller, of the Institute for National Security Studies at Tel Aviv University, said the problem "goes beyond the prime minister and defense minister not respecting one another." Worse, "neither one is respected by the public after the Lebanon war, especially in security matters," he said. "So neither of them is prepared to put his judgment up against that of a high-ranking military officer."

"A House Not in Order" was the headline on a stinging analysis in Haaretz by the political reporter Aluf Benn. Mr. Olmert, he wrote, "is looking more and more like a tragic hero, unable to recover from the disaster that befell him in the form of the second Lebanon war."

Mr. Olmert and his cabinet decided to go to war in southern Lebanon against Hezbollah in the course of an hour on July 12, after Hezbollah made another raid into Israel and succeeded in capturing two Israeli soldiers. That raid followed the capture of another Israeli soldier during a raid from Gaza carried out by Hamas on June 25.

The government, in office only four months after an election campaign that saw Ariel Sharon collapse into a coma, decided that a strong riposte was necessary to restore Israel's military deterrence.

But the cabinet was not set up for war. Mr. Olmert, though an experienced politician, had little security experience; his unlikely defense minister, Mr. Peretz, a trade union leader, had even less. And the chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, was an air force man.

The war was neither quick nor clean, ending in a United Nations mandated cease-fire after 34 days and no clear victory. Mr. Olmert, Mr. Peretz and General Halutz have kept their posts, but their credibility, both individually and as a team, was badly damaged.

Ms. Livni, though relatively silent during the fighting, later made no secret of her belief that the war could have ended much sooner with the same results; Mr. Olmert, prideful and prickly, has not appreciated her effort to emphasize her disagreements. Only last week, Ms. Livni announced that she was prepared to become prime minister and would run for the job if Mr. Olmert continued to ignore her opinions.

DOJ_NMG_0113495

Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Mr. Olmert, said she had never seen "Olmert so angry" as he was about the Thursday raid while he was about to meet Mr. Mubarak. The military "had the authority to carry out a raid, but this goes beyond authority to common sense," she said. "No one in the army was thinking about the timing and relevance."

After the fuss over the new settlement, Maskiot, Mr. Peretz insisted that his predecessor had really approved it, and then the government argued that it had been set up as a settlement in the early 1980s, even though it had fallen into disuse and was only being used for training.

"These are lame excuses, and anyone can see through them," Mr. Heller said. "Notwithstanding the rhetoric, it's clear that the government doesn't have the political courage to enter into a confrontation with settlers."

Violence In Somalia Over Disarmament (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

KISMAYO, Somalia, Jan. 6 — Hundreds of Somalis stormed Saturday into the streets of Mogadishu, Somalia's already unsteady capital, to hurl rocks at Ethiopian troops allied with the government and to protest a disarmament program that Somali leaders ended up scrapping.

Meanwhile, near Kismayo, along Somalia's southern coast, Ethiopian-led forces continued to hunt down the last remnants of the once powerful Islamist forces, who ruled much of the country until Ethiopia and its powerful army intervened last month.

According to Abdul Rashid Hidig, a government official in Kismayo, the Ethiopian-led forces blew up several of the Islamists' armed pickup trucks, leaving hundreds of fighters cornered in a remote jungle with their backs to the Indian Ocean and no way to escape. "I think it will be over very soon," Mr. Hidig said.

Still, a pack of gunmen attacked a government patrol near Kismayo's market on Saturday night, and the cracks and whistles of their high-powered rifles echoed across what had been a rather quiet town. It was unclear if anyone was hurt.

Despite much tactical success in recent weeks, Somalia's transitional government appears to have failed its first leadership test: disarmament. After 16 years of anarchy, the streets of Mogadishu are awash with military-grade weaponry, much of it in the hands of illiterate teenagers. Scooping up these guns was one of the first goals of the transitional government, which had struggled for the past two years to assert control and then, nearly overnight, found itself in charge of a needy, violent country.

On Monday, Ali Mohammed Gedi, a veterinarian turned transitional prime minister, demanded that all Somalis surrender their weapons in three days. Only a handful of Mr. Gedi's allies complied, so the prime minister extended the deadline, but still, most Somalis did not give up their guns.

Even former military officers disagreed with Mr. Gedi's approach, saying it would take months, not days, to disarm the populace and that the government should negotiate with militiamen and clan elders.

With the new deadline set to expire Saturday morning and with Mr. Gedi threatening house-to-house searches, riots exploded.

No matter that officials in the government had decided at the last minute to abandon the disarmament program, at least temporarily. By the time the government got the word out Saturday, hundreds of people had already flooded into Mogadishu's streets. Residents quickly erected roadblocks out of chunks of concrete and flaming tires, and some witnesses said men with rocket-propelled grenades lurked in doorways, prepared to attack government troops.

According to several protesters, the demonstrations were organized by the defeated Islamist movement, which still has thousands of supporters, many armed, in the capital. The supporters had melted back into the population late last month after the Islamists abandoned Mogadishu, ceding it to Ethiopian and Somali forces without a fight.

On Saturday, women in a kaleidoscope of colored shawls shook Korans in their hands and shouted "Down, down, Ethiopia!" and "The infidels must die!" Ethiopia is a country with a long Christian history, though it is about half Muslim. Somalia's Islamist leaders have repeatedly tried to stir up support by casting the Ethiopian troops as infidel invaders.

The demonstrators surged through downtown Mogadishu lighting fires with plastic jugs of gasoline, throwing rocks at cars and punching fists through windows.

"Unless we do this, the Ethiopians will never leave," said Nuro Ibraheim, a 28-year-old woman. The protesters surrounded a military camp used by Ethiopian and government troops and began to pelt it with stones. According to witnesses, Ethiopian troops first fired in the air. When that did not work, the witnesses said, the soldiers aimed into the crowd and several people were hurt. Hospital officials said one teenage boy was killed.

By midday, the violence had flared out, and the demonstrators had gone home.

"We have postponed the disarmament until an unspecified time," said Salad Ali Jelle, the deputy defense minister. "We are now talking with clan elders about how to proceed."

DOJ_NMG_0113496

The transitional government, a mix of clan elders, foreign-educated professionals and former warlords, was formed in 2004 with the help of United Nations officials and has a mandate to rule until proposed elections in 2009. The transitional government concedes that it needs outside muscle to maintain order once the Ethiopians go home.

Americans officials have been heavily lobbying African allies, especially Uganda, Nigeria and South Africa, to contribute troops to a peacekeeping force. On Sunday, Jendayi E. Frazer, the United States assistant secretary of state for Africa, is scheduled to visit Mogadishu for four hours to meet with Somali leaders and intellectuals.

The trip is still tentative because of the continuing turmoil. If Ms. Frazer does arrive, she will be the highest ranking American official to set foot in Somalia since American forces pulled out of the country in 1994, the year after 18 Americans were killed during an attempt to capture a warlord in Mogadishu.

Somalis Rail At Ethiopian Forces (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Two Killed as Protesters Smash Cars, Throw Stones in Mogadishu

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 6 -- Hundreds of angry and fed-up Somalis demanded that Ethiopian troops leave the city Saturday, smashing cars, burning tires, and hurling stones and threats as a prevailing sense of insecurity deepened in the patched-together neighborhoods of Mogadishu.

A volatile mix of grievances fueled the clashes between demonstrators and Ethiopian troops, leaving at least two people dead.

Tensions are rising over the presence of the Ethiopian troops, who are perceived here as having U.S. backing and last week pushed out an Islamic movement widely credited with bringing security to the capital. Almost immediately after taking control, the ascendant prime minister, Ali Mohamed Gedi, announced that he would begin forcibly disarming Somalia's matrix of clans, whose members are accustomed to relying on their own stashes of AK-47 assault rifles for protection in a country that has been without a central government since 1991.

Following the protests, Gedi said the disarmament would be postponed indefinitely. A planned visit to Mogadishu on Sunday by the U.S. assistant secretary of state for African affairs, Jendayi E. Frazer, appeared in doubt amid security concerns.

"They are saying disarmament when you can't safely sleep at home without people guarding you," said Ugas Abulaihi Farah, leader of the Suleiyman sub-sub-clan, clutching a gold-handled cane. "My people are angry about this. . . . Before disarming, there should be security."

But at the moment in Mogadishu, there is little of that.

As Gedi's internationally recognized government scrambles to establish ministries, police and other services from scratch, the city is reverting to its old forms of self-governance. Clan and sub-clan leaders who trace their lineage back to Adam and control thousands of people and weapons say that Gedi has not consulted with them. The city's old collection of warlords and freelance militias seems to be reemerging, as groups rebuild roadblocks and checkpoints that for years rendered the city impassable.

Fighters who were loyal to the ousted Islamic movement remain hidden in the city's Byzantine neighborhoods of corrugated steel and graceful arches, barbed-wire coils and donkey carts. According to one fighter, young militiamen are awaiting instructions from their leaders, who reportedly are on the run along the Indian Ocean coast near the Kenyan border, where U.S. warships are on patrol.

The Islamic Courts movement, which took power in June, included moderate leaders as well as some suspected of having ties to al-Qaeda and of sheltering three suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. The Islamic Courts leaders have denied those charges, and analysts say the connection between the movement and al-Qaeda has been exaggerated.

The Islamic movement's fundamentalist brand of Islam was foreign to most Somalis, who adhere to a more moderate interpretation but seemed willing, at least at first, to tolerate the social restrictions in exchange for security.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi grew increasingly uncomfortable with the prospect of an Islamic government on his border, and in late December, Ethiopian troops backing Gedi's government swept the Islamic movement from power.

Within days, Mogadishu shifted from a period of unusual calm, during which people could freely drive across the capital from corner to corner, to the current sense of uncertainty, with the occupation of Ethiopian troops and the return of militias.

"People have no clear idea what's going on in the city," said Mohamud Uluso, a former banker who had attempted to mediate between the Islamic Courts and the nascent Somali government. "There are roadblocks everywhere and large numbers of unemployed youths not going to school. . . . People are charged internally. People are charged to explode."

DOJ_NMG_0113497

The protests began in the dark hours of Saturday morning and spilled into the early afternoon, with Ethiopian troops firing into the air from among the crowds in a neighborhood that had been a stronghold of the ousted Islamic movement. Women and children were among those flooding the streets and wielding sticks in the air. By afternoon, Gedi had rescinded the disarmament deadline and the city seemed to snap back into its old rhythms.

On sandy, lumpy Adde Road, about three miles from where the protests broke out, people hauled wood to a building under construction and loaded bags of pasta onto donkey carts.

Somali Fighters: We'll Heed Al Qaeda's Call (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia (AP) -- Somalia's interim government on Saturday indefinitely postponed plans to forcibly disarm Mogadishu, as hundreds of people burned tires, looted vehicles and said they wouldn't give up their guns. Two people were reported killed and at least 17 people were wounded.

The protest came a day after al Qaeda's deputy leader called on Muslim militants to attack Ethiopian troops, who helped government forces chase Somalia's Islamic militia from the capital last week. Some Islamic fighters hiding in Mogadishu said they would heed the call.

About 400 protesters gathered at Tribunka Square in a southern neighborhood, shouting, "Down, down with Ethiopia," and demanding an end to the disarmament plan.

"We don't want disarmament only in Mogadishu. We want all the people [of Somalia] and all the clans to be disarmed simultaneously," said Dahil Abukar, one of the protesters.

Gunfire broke out during the demonstration, but it was not immediately clear what set off the violence.

A nurse at Medina Hospital said a government soldier was killed when his own hand grenade exploded accidentally. Dr. Dahir Mohamud at the same hospital said a 13-year-old boy was killed by bullets and the hospital was treating 17 other people wounded by gunshots.

Abdirahman Dinari, spokesman for the 2-year-old U.N.-backed transitional government, told The Associated Press that plans to forcibly disarm the city this week had been delayed.

"The prime minister has decided to postpone disarming people by force until an unspecified time," Dinari said. He did not say why Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi reversed his stand.

The ease with which Somalis can get weapons is a major problem in this chaotic African nation. It has not had an effective government since clan-based warlords toppled a military dictatorship in 1991 and plunged the country into anarchy.

The Council of Islamic Courts militia had brought a semblance of stability to Mogadishu after seizing control six months ago, but it terrified residents with a version of Quranic rule that included public executions and floggings of criminals.

Government troops, backed by the Ethiopian military, routed the Islamic militia from much of southern Somalia last week. Many of the militiamen are now besieged at the southernmost tip of Somalia with their backs to the sea, but the government estimates 3,500 fighters are hiding out in Mogadishu. (Map)Al Qaeda's call gains supporters

Some of the fighters in hiding told The Associated Press on Thursday that they would heed a call from Ayman al-Zawahiri, al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden's deputy, for guerrilla attacks and suicide bombings against the troops from Ethiopia, which has a large Christian population.

"I am committed to die for the sake of my religion, and the al Qaeda deputy's speech only encourages me to go ahead with my holy war," 18-year-old Sahal Abdi in Mogadishu said in a phone interview.

Leaders of the Islamic movement previously vowed to launch an Iraq-style guerrilla war.

Ethiopian soldiers, tanks and warplanes intervened December 24 in support of the interim Somali government, which at the time controlled only the western town of Baidoa. But Ethiopia's government wants to pull out in a few weeks, saying it cannot afford to keep its troops in Somalia.

The government is trying to train and expand its own military and police while an international diplomatic effort seeks to put a foreign peacekeeping force in place.

A meeting of U.S., European Union, African and Arab diplomats ended in Kenya on Friday. The U.S. pledged to provide $40 million to Somalia in political, humanitarian and peacekeeping assistance. Uganda has pledged at least 1,000 peacekeepers.

The EU said it also would help pay for a peacekeeping force envisioned at 8,000 soldiers.

On Friday, U.S. warships patrolled offshore to prevent militiamen from escaping by sea.

The U.S. 5th Fleet said vessels were being boarded to look for militants, including three al Qaeda suspects wanted for the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa. The Islamic council has denied U.S. allegations that the three were leaders in the Somali movement. (Watch who is being hunted)

DOJ_NMG_0113498

Ethiopia's Intervention May Destabilize Region (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

Unless it is followed by diplomacy and aid, the battle against Somalia's Islamists may radicalize moderate Muslims.

MOGADISHU, SOMALIA — By launching a war against Somalia's Islamists, Ethiopia says it was drawing a line in the sand against religious extremism in East Africa. But without quick diplomacy and international aid, analysts caution that the war could radicalize the region's traditionally moderate Muslims.

"This could bode ill for both Somalia and eastern Ethiopia, but perhaps even northern Kenya," said John Prendergast, Africa analyst at International Crisis Group, a conflict-resolution think tank based in Washington.

Signs of a budding insurgency already are emerging in Mogadishu. Gunshots and riots rocked Somalia's capital on Saturday as Ethiopian troops clashed with Somalian protesters. A 13-year-old Somalian boy was killed. Anonymous pamphlets distributed in some neighborhoods warned locals to steer clear of Ethiopian and allied soldiers from Somalia's transitional government. The pamphlets pledged guerrilla tactics and suicide attacks.

At least one Ethiopian soldier was killed by Somalian gunmen last week near the town of Kismayo. On Thursday, a group of Ethiopian soldiers in Mogadishu was attacked with a hand grenade tossed from a truck; no one was injured.

"They will never take our country!" anti-Ethiopian demonstrators chanted Saturday as they marched through Mogadishu. "We will fight for our religion."

The protests came as Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Jendayi E. Frazer prepared to make a brief visit to Mogadishu to support efforts to deploy Africa Union peacekeepers in Somalia. The visit would be the first in years to Somalia by a senior U.S. official.

American officials supported Ethiopia's intervention, accusing Somalia's Islamic Courts Union of having links to terrorism. The U.S. has earmarked $40 million for Somalia's recovery.

Although Ethiopia is about half Muslim and half Christian, extremists in Somalia and elsewhere are characterizing Ethiopia's presence here as a Christian occupation. On Friday, a deputy leader of the Al Qaeda terrorist network posted a website message calling for attacks on Ethiopian troops in Somalia.

Many believe the U.S. encouraged Ethiopia to lead the assault last month to put an African face on the war, though Ethiopian officials say the U.S. opposed a direct military attack in Somalia. For better or worse, analysts say, America is now linked to Somalia's recovery.

"The U.S. is tethered to this intervention," said Ken Menkhaus, a Somalia expert and political science professor at Davidson College in North Carolina. "Because of the impression that we subcontracted the war out to Ethiopia, we're going to be held responsible."

Winning support from the Hawiye subclans that previously opposed the transitional government is crucial, experts said. In the beginning, these clans praised the Islamic Courts Union for restoring security to the capital. But when the tough talk of courts leaders brought Ethiopian soldiers to Mogadishu's doorstep, clan leaders withdrew their support.

"The courts overreached," Prendergast said. "As soon as it appeared that the stability that the courts once offered would be replaced by open warfare with Ethiopia, the clan leaders took back their weapons."

Sought-after foothold

In the past, efforts by radicals to establish a beachhead in the Horn of Africa met with limited success in Somalia. Intelligence officials said Al Qaeda's efforts to penetrate Somalia after the 1991 collapse of the dictatorship encountered stiff resistance from clan leaders.

But the sight of Ethiopian jets bombing targets in Mogadishu and driving out Islamists may unite the region's Muslims. Prendergast warned against declaring victory too soon.

"To believe that the Islamists are defeated now would be the same as believing that the Sunnis were defeated when the U.S. marched into Baghdad," Prendergast said.

For now, the war appears to have cemented Ethiopia's standing as a dominant force in the Horn.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi secured a friendly Somalian government that isn't likely to push hot-button issues such as control of the contested Ogaden region in eastern Ethiopia. He also strengthened ties with the United States by establishing Ethiopia as America's leading regional partner in the U.S.-declared war on terrorism.

Ethiopians say the U.S. and rest of the world should thank them for holding the line against the spread of Islamic fundamentalism.

"We have to make sure that religious extremism doesn't take hold in Africa," said Bereket Simon, a minister of state in Ethiopia. He said his nation, home to sub-Saharan Africa's second-largest Muslim population after Nigeria, acted in self-defense.

DOJ_NMG_0113499

But Menkhaus said that success could be measured only in the coming months. "A lot depends on what kind of insurgency emerges," he said.

If Somalia's problems bleed across its borders, the ripple effects could include a destabilization of Ethiopia's Muslim community and reduced tourism for Kenya, Menkhaus said.

Ethiopia's victory also draws Somalia a step closer to its African neighbors. Historically, Somalis have been divided over whether to consider themselves part of Africa or orient themselves toward the Arab world. Former dictator Mohamed Siad Barre, who was ousted in 1991, straddled the fence.

Islamic courts leaders were working to forge closer ties with Arab-led countries, such as Yemen and Sudan.

Mohammed Abduallahi Afra, director of parliament in the transitional government that collapsed in 2003, worries that the regional balance of power could be upset.

Recent events could stir up animosity between Ethiopia and Eritrea, which never settled a border dispute that led to war in 1998. Kenya and Djibouti have been improving ties in recent years, but they were divided over how to handle Somalia, Afra said.

A history of conflict

This isn't the first time Somalia has found itself caught in an international tug of war. In the 1970s, Somalia and Ethiopia were Cold War pawns, heavily armed by the Soviet Union and United States, respectively. Then communists seized control of Ethiopia, and the superpowers simply swapped allies. A 1977 war between Ethiopia and Somalia was fueled largely by the U.S. and Soviet Union.

Analysts say U.S. policymakers now have a short window of time to bring change. Ethiopian troops plan to leave Somalia in a matter of weeks and the transitional government needs substantial assistance to survive on its own.

Since withdrawing U.S. troops in 1994 after 18 American servicemen were killed in Mogadishu in October 1993, U.S. engagement in Somalia has been limited. About 1,500 U.S. troops are based in Djibouti to fight terrorism, train African security forces and improve infrastructure in the region. But the base has no representation or activity in Somalia, a representative said.

Last year, Mogadishu warlords, with support and funding from the CIA, formed an anti-terrorism alliance that began pursuing and kidnapping Islamists sought by the U.S., including three suspects in the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania.

The move not only undermined Somalia's transitional government but also built public support for the Islamic fighters.

Ted Dagne, Africa specialist for the Congressional Research Service, said U.S. policymakers must pressure the transitional government to reach out to moderate Islamic leaders and the Mogadishu clans who feel excluded.

Somalia's underlying problems remain unresolved, he warned. They include a weak transitional government, clan rivalries and warlords seeking to reassert their power.

"Unless there is sustained and careful support for the process, Somalia will go back to where it was before," Dagne said.

Richardson Heads To Sudan With 3 Goals (AP)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 7, 2007

Heading on a diplomatic mission to Sudan, Gov. Bill Richardson said Saturday he hopes to persuade the country's president to accept more U.N. peacekeepers in war-ravaged Darfur, a goal that has eluded world leaders.

The New Mexico Democrat, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, said in an Associated Press interview that he does not expect to settle President Omar al-Bashir's dispute with the U.N. over troop levels during the trip beginning this weekend.

He planned to meet with rebel leaders in Darfur on Tuesday and al-Bashir in Khartoum, the capital, on Monday. Sudan's state news agency confirmed Saturday that Richardson would meet the president; several Western officials were unable to get a meeting with the Sudanese leader during their recent visits.

Richardson, who was U.N. ambassador under President Clinton, said he has three goals for his visit to the African nation: increasing the U.N. force in Darfur, improving the humanitarian situation and helping encourage a cease-fire.

"I'll consider it a success if we accelerate movement in those areas," Richardson said over breakfast at the governor's mansion before departing. "But I don't want to raise expectations. I don't think we'll settle the U.N. issue."

The dispute is over a three-stage plan to send some 20,000 peacekeepers and police to Darfur to provide protection to the 2.5 million people uprooted since early 2003 as a result of sectarian conflict. More than 200,000 people have died, victims of violence as well as malnutrition and disease.

Al-Bashir indicated in late December that he would go along with a plan that would create a hybrid U.N.-African Union force. But al-Bashir's U.N. ambassador quickly ruled out any U.N. peacekeeping operation in Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0113500

President Bush's special envoy to Sudan, Andrew Natsios, met with al-Bashir last month. Natsios said he insisted al-Bashir allow 60 U.N. troops and civilians into Darfur by the end of the year, but the State Department says only 20 civilians have been deployed.

Natsios, who is scheduled to visit China this week to ask for help in bringing peace to Darfur, has not responded to a request for comment about Richardson's trip.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Friday the U.S. was urging all parties in the conflict to refrain from violence "that prevents a durable cease-fire."

Richardson said he is visiting Sudan in cooperation with Natsios and he said Bush has "done the right thing" in Darfur, sending in humanitarian aide and speaking out at the U.N.

"The thought is that if we go in with a bipartisan appeal, we might be able to make progress with Bashir," Richardson said.

The governor, who left Saturday afternoon by private jet for Khartoum, said he hoped to depart Sudan on Wednesday night or Thursday morning.

The Sudanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs "expressed hope that the visit would contribute to correcting the image of the situations in Darfur (in the) US Congress," the official news agency said Saturday.

Richardson is making the trip at the request of the Save Darfur Coalition, which is paying for the travel bills. The group asked Richardson's help because he has a good relationship with al-Bashir and has successfully negotiated with him in the past.

Associated Press writer Alfred de Montesquiou in Cairo, Egypt, contributed to this report.

Bomb Attack On Bus In Sri Lanka Kills 11 (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Jan. 6 — A powerful bomb blew up a passenger bus on Saturday, killing 11 people and wounding more than 40 others on the southern coast of Sri Lanka.

The bombing was the second in less than 24 hours. The authorities are investigating the first blast, which killed six people and wounded 50 on Friday northeast of the capital, Colombo.

A government statement blamed the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam for the explosions.

“The government believes that the L.T.T.E. is attempting to divert attention from the continuous defeats they have been suffering at the hands of the security forces during the recent past,” the statement said. “The government reiterates that terror attacks will not deter its efforts to find a peaceful solution to the national problem or its counterterrorism measures to defeat terrorism.”

The rebels had no immediate comment. They routinely deny involvement in attacks. The Tigers have been fighting for more than two decades to carve out a separate state for the island’s Tamil minority.

The bombing on Saturday took place near the busy town of Hikkaduwa, in an area that is popular with tourists.

The body of a woman who was believed to have planted the parcel bomb was found near the bus, said Jayantha Gamage, the senior police official in the area. He said most of the damage and casualties were to the rear section of the bus, which bore a gaping hole.

The Personal Politics Of Bangladesh (WP/AP)

By Matthew Rosenberg, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Feuding Women Lead Top Parties

DHAKA, Bangladesh -- For 15 years Bangladesh has been dominated by the revolving-door premiership of two women whose rivalry is among the most ferocious in the democratic world.

Former president Jimmy Carter tried to get Khaleda Zia and Sheikh Hasina to shake hands in 2004, but couldn't even persuade them to look at each other. At a party in November, the two held court in different corners of the room.

It's the stuff of political slapstick, except that this feud is rooted in the assassination of one woman's father and the other's husband, and the result today is anything but funny.

"We have floods, cyclones, many people die. But Zia and Hasina are worse," said Abul Islam, a 51-year-old Dhaka shop owner. "The two ladies are our worst disaster."

Many Bangladeshis -- illiterate men pedaling rickshaws through Dhaka's squalid streets, or educated women sipping tea in stately homes -- will say the rivalry is the cause of all the country's problems of poverty and corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0113501

That's an overstatement, perhaps; those problems existed before 1971, the year Bangladesh became independent and the two women were at home raising their children, and have continued since. It was political instability, wholly male-generated, that led to the assassinations that brought Zia and Hasina to prominence.

But their rivalry has done nothing to improve things. Bangladesh is deeply corrupt and, in many parts, barely governed, raising concerns about instability in this strategic Muslim country already contending with Islamic militancy. Now, with an election set for Jan. 22, tempers are rising again.

Zia was elected in 1991, Hasina in 1996, and Zia again in 2001.

Zia's latest term ended in October, and the race between her Bangladesh Nationalist Party and Hasina's Awami League had already been bloody, with dozens killed in street clashes, before Hasina announced Wednesday that the 17-party alliance she leads would boycott the election. She alleged bias by the interim government.

Bangladesh is roughly the size of New York state with four times the population -- 147 million at last count -- and grindingly poor. Yet nationwide strikes repeatedly bring it to a standstill, shutting factories that churn out J. Crew sweaters and Banana Republic shirts and earn more than 75 percent of the country's hard currency.

"Foreigners think we are a moderate Muslim country because we have two women in charge," said Obaidul Kader, a 42-year-old businessman.

"But that's only thinking in religious terms," he said. "Maybe our ladies are not Islamic extremists, but they are not moderate people. Their hate is not moderate."

At a glance, they don't look all that different. They are close in age -- Zia, 61, and Hasina, 59. Both appear in public wearing flowing saris and shawls. Both go by grand feudal titles -- Begum Zia and Sheikh Hasina.

Some might see them as evidence of women's liberation in Bangladesh. But patriarchal traditions run deep here.

"They can't sit down and discuss their problems like men," Kader said, as if Bangladesh had not had coups and assassinations before the women took over.

Both women became heads of parties that had lost their male leaders to killers. Hasina's father was Prime Minister Mujibur Rahman, assassinated along with most of his family by army officers in 1975. Hasina was out of the country at the time.

In the killing's aftermath, Zia's husband, Gen. Ziaur Rahman, became president, a post he held until 1981, when he too was assassinated by soldiers. Zia then took over his party.

Zia suspects that Hasina's Awami League was behind her husband's slaying, while Hasina believes Zia's husband knew about the plot against her father.

Despite their suspicions, the two put aside their differences to fight the decade-long dictatorship of Lt. Gen. Hussein Mohammed Ershad, and both spent much of the 1980s in and out of prison.

When democracy was restored in 1991, Zia led her husband's Bangladesh Nationalist Party to victory and was elected prime minister.

The party had picked her as leader because she "was a symbol that could unify party workers," said Nazim Kamran Chowdhury, a former BNP lawmaker.

"We thought she believed in the ideals we had," he said. But "the moment she became prime minister she was more interested in the trappings of power rather than the exercise of power. There was no discussion, no policy initiatives."

He and others describe Zia as having lived a cloistered life until her husband's assassination.

"She was a person who never had to go to a market, has never been to a bank to open a bank account -- doesn't know everyday life," Chowdhury said.

Hasina, who has been married to nuclear scientist Wajed Miah since 1968, was active in student politics at Dhaka University but shares the same reputation for being removed from the many who live on less than a dollar a day.

No one has seen the two women speak to each other-- not a "Hello," "How are you?" or "Goodbye" -- in years.

"In true democracies, you have political parties running on different platforms but working together to govern," said Chowdhury, the former lawmaker.

But both parties led by the women are relatively centrist, with few issues separating Zia and Hasina. "They have no conception of what democracy is -- they just want to rule," Chowdhury said. "The state, running it -- they get to decide who gets government jobs, give business to supporters."

So why not elect someone else? Analysts blame social conservatism -- a reluctance of the poor and illiterate to question those perceived as their betters -- and thuggish political tactics to ensure that people who do not support either party nonetheless turn out to vote for one of them.

As for the small middle and upper classes, most are tied to one party or the other -- and the rest are simply afraid to gamble on something new.

DOJ_NMG_0113502

"I've got major property holdings, I import electronics," said a middle-aged businessman who maintains ties with both camps and spoke on condition of anonymity. "I can't take foolish risks. They could shut me down."

Police Ignore Serial Killings In Delhi Slum, Exposing Unequal Justice For India's Poor (NYT)

By Amelia Gentleman

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

NEW DELHI, Jan. 6 — When Vandana Sarkar, an impoverished migrant worker, went to the police in October to report that her 20-year-old daughter was missing, she recalled Friday, officers laughed and said, "Why do you people have so many children if you can't look after them?"

Their casual response should not have come as a surprise. At least 30 other sets of parents had reported children missing from the same slum area in Noida, an affluent suburb of Delhi, over recent months. Some say they were dismissed as "drunken trouble-makers." Others claim officers refused even to register their complaints.

It was only when 17 chopped-up bodies, most of them belonging to children, were found in the sewers behind the home of a wealthy local resident on Dec. 29 that the Noida police were finally stirred into action.

What seems clearly a case of serial killing on the fringes of the capital has become a national scandal, with public horror at the brutal details interwoven with outrage at the police department's failure to investigate.

That India has a two-tier justice system is nothing new. Only widespread protest drove the courts to order a retrial for a rich young man acquitted in February of fatally shooting a model at a party in 1999. In December, the accused, Manu Sharma, was found guilty and sentenced to life in prison.

And when the 3-year-old son of an Indian executive disappeared near his Noida home in November, it was instantly national news. The police immediately began a huge hunt, found the abductors and returned the child to his distraught parents.

But the case of the dead and missing slum children has provided a brutally stark example of how the law does not work for the marginalized, shocking even the most jaundiced observers of the nation's legal processes.

The bags full of dismembered body parts found on Dec. 29 were pulled one by one from an open sewer behind a whitewashed two-story house belonging to Moninder Singh Pandher, a businessman. He and his servant, Surender Kohli, were arrested and charged with kidnapping, raping and killing the victims, some reported to be as young as three.

A police spokesman told the news media the next day that Mr. Kohli, when confronted with photographs of some of the victims, confessed to having killed 10 women and 5 children. Mr. Kohli said that he and Mr. Pandher had lured some of the victims into the house with toffees and chocolates, the police said. The Noida police chief, R.K.S. Rathore, said that other victims were young women who were offered jobs at the house.

The officials said that according to Mr. Kohli's confession, the two men sexually abused their victims, then strangled them and chopped up their bodies, concealing the remains in the drains. An autopsy report said the bodies were sliced with "butcher-like" precision, Agence France-Presse reported.

Neither suspect has spoken publicly but Mr. Pandher's son, Karan Pandher, warned against prejudging his father. "He is just a suspect," Karan Pandher told reporters on Saturday, Agence France-Presse reported. "He is not a monster."

The police said the body parts included 12 skulls belonging to children and 5 belonging to adults. Thirteen of the dead were quickly identified. Mrs. Sarkar's daughter was one.

The sluggish police response to the disappearance of dozens of children has horrified the nation as much as the crime itself. Residents said as many as 38 children have been reported missing over the last two years from the slum, Nithari, but that the police recorded only 19 cases, according to Indian news media. Many parents, the reports said, were told their children must have run away.

Groups like India's National Commission for Women were disturbed by reports of women disappearing from the Noida slums as early as August 2005. Nirmala Venkatesh, a commission member, was working with six families missing daughters, none of whom had managed to persuade the police to investigate.

"The police system failed," she said. "They were ignorant, they were careless."

On Wednesday, the national government opened an inquiry into the police failures. The next day, six policemen were dismissed for failure to investigate reports of the missing children, accused by the state government "of dereliction of duty and gross negligence in responding to complaints made by parents of missing children." Four other officers were suspended, and widespread condemnation is growing.

"There was shocking inaction," Ved Marwah, the former Delhi police chief, said in a television interview.

DOJ_NMG_0113503

The Asian Age, an English language daily newspaper, condemned the police for turning away the missing children's parents "with contemptuous disdain for two long years only because they were poor villagers with no influence of any kind, political or otherwise."

Hundreds of angry Nithari residents have been protesting all week in the street where the bodies were found. On Monday, they stormed past the officers guarding the house and broke into the premises, pelting neighboring houses with stones.

Now, barricades have been erected near the house, and relatives of the dead wait alongside protesters for more news. Parents with missing children also come, trying to establish whether any of the unidentified victims might be their child.

A woman named Dayawati, also from a nearby slum, came holding a black-and-white passport photo of her son, Vipin, 16, who has been missing for four months. "When I told the police he had disappeared, they told me to look for him myself," she said. "Things would have been different if I'd been rich. Then I could have bribed them to make them investigate."

For Mrs. Sarkar, as for so many bereft parents, the furor comes too late. She said she had described to police officers the yellow suit her daughter Rupa was wearing when she went out to work early on Oct. 5, 2006. The clothes, she said in an interview, were found in the sewer, in a bag alongside body parts.

Brandishing a state government check for 500,000 rupees — roughly $11,300 — in compensation, she said: "My child's life is worth more than this. It's as if they want us to keep quiet — but I'm not going to remain silent."

The money, she said, could help look after Rupa's 18-month-old son, Amit. But, she said, as a migrant worker from East Bengal with no identity papers, opening a bank account is nearly impossible and she does not know how to go about cashing the check.

Before her daughter disappeared, Mrs. Sarkar said, she walked with her every morning past the house where the two men charged with the murders lived. The two women worked as maids at nearby houses.

It is just a 30-second walk, but it crosses the divide between the India of the excluded and destitute, and the India of the privileged elite. The extended Sarkar family shares one large wooden bed, which takes up most of a tiny rooftop room in the heart of Nithari. Neighbors live less well: in mud huts, straw houses and shacks made of plastic sheeting and corrugated tin, breathing in the stench from a vast rubbish dump where cows and pigs forage.

Beyond the open sewer, across a makeshift bridge made of discarded metal pipe, is the tree-lined street where Mr. Pandher and Mr. Kohli lived. Here a dozen new houses flaunt their owners' recent wealth, acquired in India's booming economy, with displays of extravagant architectural fancy: large, arched windows; verandas with elaborate wrought-iron railings; and marble-fronted buildings. The entrances are blocked from public gaze with high gates, and guarded by watchmen.

"I never saw anyone in that house," Mrs. Sarkar said. "I only know that rich people live on that street."

It was only when she watched police removing body parts on her way home from that day in December, and heard about the killings, that she understood what had happened to her daughter.

"Where was the help when I needed it?" she said. "No one would listen to me. The police officers looked at the photograph of my daughter and said: 'She looks so beautiful. She probably eloped.' No one ever bothered to come to my house to follow up on the case."

In Mexico, "People Do Really Want To Stay" (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Chicken Farmers Fear U.S. Exports Will Send More Workers North for Jobs

PEGUEROS, Mexico -- Even as his village emptied, Pedro Martin stayed behind. His schoolmates abandoned the scrub-covered hills of central Mexico for the land they called El Norte-- the North. They mopped floors in Fresno, poured concrete in Tempe and tended other people's children in Galveston, measuring their lives in dollars.

Martin worked at a poultry farm. His wages rose to 2,000 pesos per week, about $185. Meager by the standards of the north, it was enough to build a brick house with white tile floors. Enough to buy a car, and to stay in the village and watch his three boys grow, resisting the gravitational pull the United States exerts on much of rural Mexico.

"Up north, even though they pay more, you're not necessarily living as well," Martin said, as church bells echoed down lanes of pastel-painted houses. "You feel out of place. Here, you can walk around the whole town and it's comfortable. Life is easier."

But now, Martin worries that life in the central Mexican state of Jalisco is about to be shaken by globalization. Already much of Mexico's farm country has been overwhelmed by an influx of crops from the United States in the years following the North American Free Trade Agreement. Over the next two years, the final provisions of the trade pact kick in, opening Mexico to unlimited imports of poultry from its northern neighbor. Mexican farms will compete directly with an American agribusiness nurtured by subsidies on the corn that feeds the birds.

DOJ_NMG_0113504

"If a lot of chicken comes in from the United States, we're not going to be able to maintain our farms," said Martin, 39. "What's going to happen? People are going to get fired. People are going to go north."

NAFTA, as the landmark trade agreement is known, was supposed to work the other way around. In the early 1990s, as politicians in the three countries of North America sold the pact, they promised it would spur enough development in Mexico to create millions of jobs, raise wages and diminish the lure of the north.

But since 1994, the year NAFTA took effect, Mexico's economy has grown sluggishly. Not enough jobs have materialized, while Mexico's working-age population has swelled. Meanwhile, the United States has been a magnet for Mexican laborers willing to take on low-paying, unpleasant work.

More than 6.2 million Mexicans now live in the United States illegally, according to Mexico's National Council of Population. Two-thirds arrived after NAFTA.

For Mexico, as for most developing countries, free trade was a gamble. It opened the world's most lucrative market, the United States, to wares produced in Mexico's factories, and to produce grown on Mexican soil. But it also lifted protections on Mexico's manufacturers and farmers, bringing an influx of products from the north.

As NAFTA's final provisions take effect next year, tying Mexico's fortunes more tightly to world markets, how will its economy adjust? And how will the latest wave of trade liberalization alter the calculations for millions of Mexicans wanting to stay home, but constantly feeling the tug of the north?Baby Boom Fuels Emigration

The demographic wave that has carried unprecedented numbers of Mexicans to the United States is the consequence of a baby boom that began in Mexico four decades ago, when improvements in rural health care allowed more infants to survive.

From 1993 to 2006, as those born during the boom reached adulthood, Mexicans of working age swelled from 34 million to 44 million, according to Agustin Escobar, a sociologist at the Center for Higher Research in Social Anthropology in Guadalajara. Over the same period, Mexico's businesses added only 8 million jobs that pay decent wages and benefits, exacerbating a backlog of about 15 million Mexicans needing work, Escobar said.

Population pressure, combined with the lifting of subsidies on the farm, sent rural Mexicans in search of higher wages. They moved within Mexico in vast numbers. Many crossed the border. By 2002, 14 percent of all people born in Mexican villages were living in the United States, according to J. Edward Taylor, an agricultural economist at the University of California at Davis. Mexicans in the United States sent home nearly $17 billion in 2004, according to the Bank of Mexico.

"If you want to buy a house, you have to go to the States," Escobar said. "People go to America to make their Mexican dream come true."

NAFTA, as the politicians sold it, was supposed to make Mexican dreams attainable at home.

Mexico's government promised that the pact would add 1 million jobs a year. But jobs have been created at roughly half that rate. Mexico's economy has grown less than 3 percent a year since NAFTA. Not even a sustained expansion of 5 percent a year would have been enough to stem the surge of immigrants headed north, given the numbers of Mexicans entering the workforce, declared the 1997 Mexico-U.S. Binational Migration Study.

NAFTA did bring Mexico foreign investment. Jobs at its maquiladoras -- export factories set up in the 1960s, mostly near the border -- more than doubled from 540,000 to 1.13 million between 1993 and 2004. But in other factories, employment has slipped and average wages have dropped by 5 percent.

Economists emphasize that any assessment of NAFTA must include the financial crisis that savaged Mexico in 1994 and 1995, sowing unemployment. Some assert that without NAFTA and the exports it fueled, Mexico's recovery would have been slower. Many also say that Mexico's government squandered opportunities for growth by failing to improve highways and ports, and by leaving unchecked the monopoly power of the national telephone company, which has kept rates for Internet access and other telecommunication services high, discouraging new ventures. While Mexico has stagnated, China has exploded, capturing factory jobs.

Oddly, border enforcement may have stifled some of Mexico's gains. In a paper presented to the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Raymond Robertson, an economist at Macalester College, found that Mexico's increased foreign trade has been a factor pushing wages up at home, but that has been countered by the intensification of U.S. border security, which has kept people in Mexico, leaving more workers competing for jobs and pushing wages down.

The clearest reason why Mexico has not prospered under NAFTA is found on the farm, the workplace for about one-fourth of the population.

DOJ_NMG_0113505

From 1993 to 2003, exports of American agriculture to Mexico more than doubled, climbing from $3.6 billion to $7.9 billion, according to Gary C. Hufbauer and Jeffrey J. Schott in their book, "NAFTA Revisited." Over a similar period, Mexico lost nearly 2 million agricultural jobs, according to Mexico's National Employment Survey.

Mexico's agricultural exports to the United States also surged, climbing from $2.7 billion in 1993 to $6.3 billion in 2003. Huge farms have been developed to grow artichokes, tomatoes and other produce for the U.S. market. But those farms, many launched with American investment, typically pay about $13 a day. That's not enough to keep workers from leaving: They can make three to four times as much in even the lowliest U.S. jobs.

"I'm only here because someone had to stay home and take care of our mother," said Luz Maria Vazquez, 36, as she picked tomatoes in Jalisco, sporting a T-shirt from a tavern in McLean, Va. Six of her brothers and sisters were in the United States, most of them without papers, she said.

And the growth of Mexico's export farms, though good for the owners, has had a paradoxical effect on the country's markets. Produce not good enough for American stores is trucked instead to Mexican cities, sending local prices down. On a recent morning in Guadalajara, men unloaded crates of wrinkled bell peppers arriving from the northern province of Sinaloa -- rejects from the American market. Bell peppers had been selling locally for about $13 per crate. These were $10.

Two hours south, in the village of Ejido Modelo Emiliano Zapata, Ruben Rivera sat on a bench in a forlorn plaza, rather than working on his seven-acre farm. He used to grow tomatoes and onions, hiring 150 workers to help at harvest. Now he doesn't even bother to plant. He can buy onions in the supermarket more cheaply than he can grow them. A crop of tomatoes yields less than the taxes. He lives off the $800 sent home monthly by his three sons, who run a yardwork business in Macon, Ga.

"For people who can grow huge scale for export, NAFTA has been good," he said. "For people like us, it's been a bloodbath."

In the nearby town of Tizapan el Alto, where traditionally 90 percent of local people have farmed, one-third of all agricultural jobs have been wiped out in the last five years, said Mayor Ramon Martinez.

About 200 have gained jobs assembling electronics in maquiladoras on the edges of Guadalajara, earning as much as $23 a day, nearly double farm pay. Martinez is courting investment for a factory in his town. But roads and other facilities are in rough shape, and global investment is flowing to China.

"People do really want to stay," the mayor said, but with the pull of the north, almost half his town's official population of 19,000 has decamped for the United States. "We're basically exporters of people."In the Heart of Chicken Country

Jalisco has long been one of the primary sources of Mexican immigrants to the United States. And its farms produce more than 10 percent of Mexico's poultry. What happens next year, when the tariffs come off chicken imported from the United States, could test how continued globalization is altering life on both sides of the border.

In the town Atotonilco el Alto, Sergio Garcia's chicken houses are scattered among lemon orchards and rows of blue-green agave cactus, the source of tequila. Garcia is betting that Fresko Pollo, the chicken business his father started from the back of a truck in 1950, can survive the expected American onslaught by catering to local tastes. His workers weigh chickens and slaughter only those of ideal size. He runs a chain of retail shops, where he sells marinated breasts, chicken sausages and smoked chicken prepared at his processing plant.

"I'm not so worried, because we're not just producers," Garcia said. "Despite free trade, niches remain."

But he knows he faces a formidable foe. An archetype of efficiency, the American poultry industry is dominated by enormous brands that control all aspects of production -- employing computerized feed mills that mix grains, mechanized slaughterhouses, and hatcheries that use genetic science to breed disease-resistant chicks.

At Garcia's feed mill, workers shovel grain by hand. At his slaughterhouse, a man slices throats with a wood-handled blade.

Feed amounts to nearly 60 percent of the cost of raising a chicken. For the American poultry industry, the cost has been held down, historically, by subsidies for corn production. In 2005, American cropland for corn received a range of subsidies worth more than $10 billion, according to a Washington Post analysis of data from the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Labor, where Mexico has an advantage, makes up only about 5 percent of production costs.

Already, Garcia is feeling the pressure. Americans prefer breast meat, while Mexicans opt for dark. So U.S. poultry producers can sell leg quarters -- dark meat -- in Mexico at low prices and still make money. From January 2005 to January 2006, even though a 59 percent tariff applied to some chicken imports, the wholesale price of chicken leg quarters sold in Mexico City plunged by nearly one-fourth, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture. Next year, as NAFTA's final provisions kick in, the door opens to unlimited imports.

"The price will fall," Garcia said. "It could drop by half."

DOJ_NMG_0113506

In the village of Pegueros, a center of poultry, NAFTA is a word laden with anxiety. Corn farmers saw prices fall due to American imports, though demand for ethanol in the United States, made from corn, is now sending prices up. Dairy farmers have been decimated, a trend expected to intensify next year as protections on powdered milk expire.

The forces of trade have laid waste to the Mexican dream of Trino Franco, who came home three years ago to launch a dairy business with his three brothers after more than a decade in the north. He poured $40,000 into the venture -- everything he saved in Los Angeles, where he parked cars at a 24-hour gym from six in the morning until two in the afternoon, then worked security at a hotel until 11 at night.

But the price of milk has dropped by nearly one-fifth in the last year. The farm has lost money, forcing Franco, 38, to take a job as general manager at a larger dairy operation. He earns $200 a week, enough to keep him home with his wife and baby. For now.

"You can't see a good future in this area," he said. "That's why so many people cross the border."

Pedro Martin, still at home while so many friends and relatives make their lives in another country, is intent that his three boys -- 13, 8 and eight months -- stay in Mexico. On a recent morning, as firecrackers boomed in salute to Mexico's patron saint, Guadalupe, a procession of shiny SUVs pulled into Pegueros, their license plates advertising the riches of Texas, Virginia and California. People were returning for Christmas.

Martin professed no envy. His sister and her two boys are crammed into an $1,100-a-month apartment in San Francisco. The boys have to work to help pay the rent. "They're thinking of returning," Martin said. His own boys are growing up with the fresh air and broad vistas of Jalisco.

But in the adjacent town of Tepatitlan, the people in control of the poultry farms are fretting. They are organizing into cooperatives to improve their bargaining position as they brace for a flood of imports next year. The well-trod path to El Norte is never far from their minds.

"If there are corn subsidies in the United States and none here, we're dead," said Lorenzo Martin, president of the Tepatitlan Poultry Farmers Association and the head of one large producer. "If the U.S. starts selling things extra cheap outside the U.S., then it won't just be small farmers and individuals who will be leaving. It will be people like me."

Mexico's New President Sends Thousands Of Federal Officers To Fight Drug Cartels (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

TIJUANA, Mexico, Jan. 6 — President Felipe Calderón ran last summer on a promise to create jobs, but in his first five weeks as chief executive he has made it clear his first priority is to turn his government into the scourge of organized crime.

The president has sent thousands of federal police and troops into the drug-plagued states of Michoacán and Baja California to break up criminal organizations and stop the brutal violence they perpetuate. The federal forces have burned marijuana crops, arrested suspected drug gang members and disarmed local police forces the authorities say are crippled by corruption.

"We will continue with the operations that let us re-establish the minimum conditions of security in some parts of the republic, so that little by little we can take back our streets, our parks, our schools," Mr. Calderón said in a New Year's message to the nation.

But some opposition politicians and experts on the drug trade wonder if the federal interventions are not more flash than substance, and question if they will have a lasting impact on the drug trade and police corruption, whose roots run deep.

Mr. Calderón's predecessor, Vicente Fox, created an elite force to combat narcotics dealers and arrested dozens of drug cartel leaders during his six-year term. Rather than stanch the violence, however, the arrests led to a brutal war between the remaining traffickers for the smuggling routes and territory.

In the southwestern state of Michoacán, where more than 500 people were killed last year, the violence has persisted despite the president's decision to send in more than 7,000 officers and soldiers last month. Drug dealers killed about 21 people during the last three weeks of December, according to local news reports. This week, a mass grave was found with seven bodies bearing signs of gangland executions, and a 12-year-old boy was executed in what appeared to be a drug dispute.

Still, Mr. Calderón made a rare appearance dressed in military fatigues on Wednesday to congratulate troops in Michoacán and to tout their successes. Four top members of the Valencia drug gang were arrested and hundreds of acres of marijuana were burned, the authorities said.

In Tijuana on Tuesday, Mr. Calderón ordered 2,600 soldiers and 110 federal police officers to begin an operation aimed at ending the grip of mobsters on the local police department, slowing the flow of drugs and ending kidnappings and killings related to the trade.

DOJ_NMG_0113507

The officers began patrolling the streets with caravans of pickups filled with heavily armed officers in black combat outfits. The army set up roadblocks, while navy boats prowled the coast and helicopters buzzed overhead. Soldiers in camouflage uniforms pulled over cars at random and searched them. Federal and state police manned checkpoints in the town.

The federal government also stripped all 2,320 city police officers of their weapons on Wednesday night. The move prompted fears that anarchy would break out in the city streets, where drunken brawls, car thefts, muggings and drug-induced mayhem are a daily fact of life.

The city secretary of public security, Luis Javier Algorri, said Friday morning there were too few federal officers to keep order, much less ferret out drug gangs at the same time.

"We think they don't have the experience to deal with these sorts of problems," Mr. Algorri said. "And without firearms this kind of work will be hard to carry out."

The decision to disarm the local police reflects the belief among federal officials that many local officers are on the payroll of drug cartels as assassins, enforcers and, in some cases, kidnappers. Federal prosecutors say the lack of help from the local police in border towns, either because they are corrupt or afraid, makes it nearly impossible to dismantle drug cartels.

The mayor of Tijuana, Jorge Hank Rhon, said he welcomed the intervention. He did not dispute that a significant number of police officers were corrupt, saying their salaries are so low that drug lords can easily bribe them. "It's not the police," he said. "It's some policemen."

Many residents said they were tired of finding victims of mob executions in the streets in the mornings, as well as the wave of kidnappings that has rocked this border town over the last 12 months. Last year there were more than 300 killings in the city, most of them linked to drug gangs, including 25 police officers, authorities said.

In interviews, most residents said they welcomed the crackdown, even as some expressed skepticism the caravan-style patrols and roadblocks would do much to hurt drug traffickers.

David López, a 28-year-old importer, watched Wednesday night as about 25 federal policemen in full combat uniforms and carrying machine guns pulled over an expensive pickup truck outside a downtown nightclub. It seemed to him a showy waste to use a small army of officers to make a traffic stop.

Tijuana has always been a major corridor for drug smugglers because it is one of the busiest border crossings in the country. Since the 1990s, the infamous Arellano Félix family has controlled the traffic of cocaine, heroin, marijuana and synthetic drugs, but in recent years the organization has been weakened significantly, law enforcement authorities say.

Federal police commanders acknowledged their job would be difficult in a city of 1.5 million where most of them do not even know the street names, much less the workings of the criminal underworld.

Still, several expressed confidence they would prevail.

"It's a big city and there are a lot of people here who are crooked," said Inspector Alejandro Zapata. "But this is not going to end until we put a end to the Arellano Félix organization."

Armenian Genocide Question Hits Home (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

The former U.S. ambassador's use of the term leaves Congress poised for a battle between pragmatism and principle.

WASHINGTON — Nearly two years ago, John Evans did something no U.S. ambassador to Armenia before him had done: He used the word "genocide" — in public — to describe the deaths of about 1.2 million Armenians at the hands of Ottoman Turks.

It has long been a sore point with Armenian Americans that the U.S. government does not refer to the killings that began in 1915 as genocide, and Evans' use of the word did not signal a change in that policy. It did set off a slow-boiling controversy that eventually cost him his job.

Now, the issue is preparing to boil over again, setting up a clash between the Democratic-controlled Congress and the Republican White House. The dispute has stalled the confirmation of Evans' successor and strained U.S. relations with Turkey, a key U.S. ally in the Middle East.

"Based on what I've seen, this is headed to a confrontation," said a senior Democratic congressional aide. "It's an issue that's a flashpoint of controversy for both parties."

It started at UC Berkeley, in February 2005, soon after Evans took up his ambassadorship.

"I will today call it the Armenian genocide," Evans said, according to a transcript by one of the groups attending the gathering hosted by the university's Armenian studies program.

DOJ_NMG_0113508

Evans' comments floored — and pleased — his audience, even though he made it clear that he was articulating a personal view, not U.S. policy.

"I recall being surprised at that moment," said Stephan Astourian, executive director of Berkeley's Armenian Studies program, who organized the session.

Though Armenian Americans and others consider Evans' statement an act of courage for which he has been unfairly punished, policymakers call it a misjudgment that could fuel anti-Western sentiment in Turkey.

Historians have long used the term "genocide" to describe the murderous campaign against the Armenians in Turkey. Nearly the entire population of Armenians was executed, starved or forced into exile on the orders of the ruling Young Turk Party. Outside Turkey, there is little debate over the facts or the use of the word "genocide."

In Turkey, however, official history has long disputed the use of that term. As a result, American officials have used all sorts of others — "mass killing," "massacres," "atrocities," "annihilation" — but have stopped short of "genocide."

"We have never said it wasn't genocide," explained a senior State Department official, who agreed to discuss formation of U.S. policy in detail on condition he not be further identified. "We just haven't used that word."

State Department officials believe that Turks will come to their own acceptance of the term from internal debate.

"That debate needs to happen, but it needs to be a Turkish debate," the official said. "It has been our view that our position of encouraging that debate — and not allowing Turks an easy out to say, 'This is foreign pressure' — is more effective."

Most Armenian Americans and many members of Congress disagree, arguing that the U.S. government should call the killings "genocide."

In a short interview, his first since leaving the State Department, Evans declined to discuss his motives in making the genocide statement, but said that "it wasn't a slip of the tongue."

"I knew it was not the policy of the United States" to use the word "genocide," Evans said.

"Ninety years is a long time," Evans added, referring to the decades since the genocide began. "At some point you have to call a spade a spade."

In the months after Evans' remark, the State Department made clear its displeasure. By July 2005, "it was absolutely crystal clear" that he would be forced out, he said. Still, it took more than a year more for him to leave.

"Evans was a career foreign service officer, and you do not go after a career foreign service officer lightly," said a second State Department official.

Evans left Armenia in September and formally retired from the State Department last month.

Meanwhile, the American Foreign Service Assn., the organization that represents U.S. foreign service officers, granted Evans its 2005 award for "constructive dissent" by a senior diplomat. But weeks later, the group rescinded the prize, arousing suspicion that the State Department had intervened.

Foreign Service Assn. officials who agreed to discuss the matter said they took back the award after learning that Evans apparently did not first go through internal channels of dissent before publicly stating his views.

"Ambassador Evans' action — admirable as it was — did not fit the category of 'constructive dissent,' " the group said in a statement.

State Department officials said they felt blindsided by Evans' genocide remarks.

The unanswered questions about Evans' departure have stalled the nomination of a successor.

In May, President Bush nominated Ambassador Richard Hoagland, who most recently served as ambassador to Tajikistan. But in September, Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) put a parliamentary hold on Hoagland's nomination, blocking it until the end of the congressional session, when the nomination expired.

Some Armenian Americans took issue with Hoagland, complaining that in written responses to questions from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he was dismissive of the Armenian genocide. Last month, Menendez and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) demanded the administration send over a new nominee.

Bush will have to decide whether to renominate Hoagland. The administration appears to be standing behind him, and complains that he has been turned into a scapegoat over Evans' dismissal.

"Senators can say that our policy on the Armenian massacres is wrong, but it's wrong to punish the president's nominee for adhering to the president's policy," said the senior State Department official, adding that some of Hoagland's opponents had "twisted" his responses on the genocide.

"He's being tarred as a [genocide] denier," said the senior State Department official. "And the only reason it's being done is that they are angry about Evans for the wrong reasons."

DOJ_NMG_0113509

Not all Armenian Americans oppose Hoagland's nomination. The Armenian Assembly of America has said that although it opposes administration policy, it would support Hoagland. And the Armenian government has said that policy on the genocide issue should take second place to more immediate problems, including diplomatic relations with Turkey.

The Republic of Armenia became an independent state after the breakup of the Soviet Union in 1991, and today has a population of about 3 million.

To both Democrats and Republicans, support from Armenian Americans is important. There are an estimated 1.4 million Armenian Americans, with the largest population center in Glendale.

In the end, Democrats now in control of Congress may need to decide between pragmatism and principle.

"To the extent that Armenia goes without a U.S. ambassador, that's a bad thing by anyone's standard," said a Democratic staffer involved in the confirmation process. "We're 1,000% supportive of the Armenian community on the genocide issue. But in this case, the [State Department] policy is going to be very tough to change, and I don't think holding up an ambassador is going to get them to change their policy."

Warsaw Archbishop Resigns Amid Scandal (AP)

AP, January 7, 2007

Warsaw's new archbishop resigned amid a scandal about his cooperation with the communist-era secret police, Poland's Roman Catholic Church said Sunday.

Archbishop Stanislaw Wielgus, who took the office on Friday, has submitted his resignation, Poland's Episcopate said in a statement.

The church said Pope Benedict XVI asked the outgoing archbishop, Cardinal Jozef Glemp, to administer the archdiocese until a replacement is found.

A furor had grown around Wielgus since the allegations were first raised Dec. 20 by a Polish weekly, with demands that he step down from his post.

The church in Poland, a heavily Roman Catholic country, enjoys high esteem for its opposition to the former Communist government. Catholics here revere the late Polish-born Pope John Paul II — credited by some with hastening the regime's fall.

The scandal gained intensity after church officials said Friday that documents at a historical institute indicated Wielgus had willingly collaborated.

Newspapers Friday devoted their front pages to the revelations, even as Wielgus took canonical vows as required by church law ahead of his installation.

"Stop the installation," the daily Dziennik wrote in large bold print on its front page, arguing that to allow a "former agent" to hold a top church post would amount to a "moral scandal."

Wielgus acknowledged Friday that he did have contact with the secret service, but he said that documents indicating he collaborated were written by the secret police and reflected their account of events, not the truth.

The allegations first surfaced in the right-wing Gazeta Polska weekly, two weeks after the Vatican appointed him archbishop of Warsaw. Wielgus initially denied any collaboration.

Wielgus, who had been bishop of Plock since 1999, said Friday that he was leaving his fate in the hands of the pope: "With full humility, I declare to the Holy Father that I will submit to each of his decisions."

The Vatican had named Wielgus to replace Cardinal Jozef Glemp, who stepped down after more than 25 years as archbishop of Warsaw.

DOJ_NMG_0113510

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JANUARY 7, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Poisoning Of Ex-Agent Sets Off Alarm Bells (WP) ... 3
"Peace Mom" Turns Attention To Guantanamo (AP) ... 4
Cleric's Story Of Abduction, Torture (CHIT) ... 5
CIA Cases Spur Debate Over Torture (CHIT) ... 7
The Imperial Presidency 2.0 (NYT) ... 7

Homeland Response:

New Top Spy Inherits An Office Still Finding Its Way (WP) ... 8
FEMA Overhaul Delay Irks Legislators (WT) ... 9

War News:

Bush Plan For Iraq Requests More Troops And More Jobs (NYT) ... 10
Bush Fleshes Out Iraq Strategy Details (AP) ... 12
Critics Say "Surge" Is More Of The Same (WP) ... 13
Bush Aides Lay Groundwork For Iraq Surge (LAT) ... 14
Probable Troop Surge In Iraq Raises Questions About Mission, Numbers (GAN) ... 16
Bush Eyes A Troop Surge (NSDY) ... 17
Iraq Will Be Petraeus's Knot To Untie (WP) ... 18
A Change Of Course: Pelosi And New Democratic Congress May Face Crucial Test Over Iraq (SFC) ... 20
Sen. Lieberman Goes His Independent Way (WP) ... 22
A "Surge" In Iraq? (WP) ... 23
The Timely Death Of Gerald Ford (NYT) ... 24
Making The Surge Work (NYT) ... 25
Clarity On Iraq, And Beyond (WP) ... 26
30 Dead In Baghdad Clash; Bodies Hanged On Lampposts (NYT) ... 27
Iraqi Leader Plans Security Push (WP) ... 28
Offensive To Pacify Baghdad Begins (WT/AP) ... 29
Iraqi Army Says It Killed 30 Militants (AP) ... 29
Battle "Marks New Iraq Campaign" (BBC) ... 30
7 Iraqis Killed In Continued Violence (AP) ... 31
Maliki Unveils Effort To End Bloodshed (LAT) ... 31
Bomb's Lasting Toll: Lost Laughter And Broken Lives (NYT) ... 33
Before Hanging, A Push For Revenge And A Push Back (NYT) 35
A Slim Guidebook For Executing A Deposed Ruler (NYT) ... 38
Likely Blair Successor Blasts Hanging (AP) ... 39
UN Chief Urges Iraq To Suspend Executions (AFP) ... 39
UN Urges Stay Of Iraq Executions (BBC) ... 40
Not The Case (NYT) ... 41
Arab Nationalism's Last Gasp (LAT) ... 42
Antitank Mines Hamper Progress Of U.S.-Iraqi Assault (LAT) ... 43
Calming Voice Sought In A Restive Region (LAT) ... 45
Official: Evidence Doesn't Back Marines (AP) ... 46
U.S. Inquiry Backs Charges Of Killing By Marines In Iraq (NYT) 47
Marines' Photos Provide Graphic Evidence In Haditha Probe (WP) ... 48
Witness Accounts Of Attack On Civilians Revealed (LAT) ... 49
N.E. Toll In Iraq Nearly Doubles (BOS) ... 50
Case Tests Officers' Right To Dissent (LAT) ... 51
Contractors In War Zones Lose Immunity (BOS) ... 52
British Deals Seen Hurting Fight Against Taliban (WT) ... 53
Bombs Target NATO Convoys In Afghanistan (AP) ... 54
Afghan-Pakistani Bond Steadily Deteriorating (WP) ... 54
Solemn Duty In Section 60 (WP) ... 55

DOJ:

Hopis Pleased Member Recommended (AR) ... 57

Corporate Scandals:

More $200 Million Parachutes? Don't Be Shocked (NYT) ... 57
He's Not Out Of Cash, But Is Out Of The Club (NYT) ... 59

Criminal Law:

Racist Murder Or Suicide? New Mayor's Death Roils Town (AP)59
FBI: Man Tried To Extort $1.5M From Oprah (AP) ... 60
U. Student Sentenced For Hacking Into Professor's Accounts (DESERET) ... 60
Attack Of The Zombie Computers Is Growing Threat (NYT) ... 61

Civil Rights:

Gay "Marriage" Ballot Measures Running Their Course (WT) ... 63

Antitrust:

.S. Steel Continues To Explore Options (PTR) ... 64
US Airways Chief Digs In For Delta Fight (AJC) ... 65

Environment:

NRA Pressured To Resist Bush Energy Policies (WP) ... 67
Threatened By Warming (WP) ... 68

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Learning How To Fight America's Most Wanted (NYT) ... 68
Man Sets Fire To Richmond Church (SFC) ... 70
Metairie Store Gun Theft Suspect Being Sought (NOTP) ... 70

Gun Violence Across Puerto Rico Leaves 7 Dead On Kings Day (AP) ... 71

Immigration:

Complaints Rise Against Immigration Lawyers (WP) ... 71

Tax:

House Rules Change Clears Way For Tax Increases (WT) ... 73
A Balanced Budget (WP) ... 74

Congress-Administration:

Dems Prepare Slew Of Oversight Hearings (AP) ... 74
Medicare Drug Program Costing Less Than Estimates, U.S. Says (NYT) ... 76
Critics Warn Of Pitfalls In Democrats' Drug Plan (NYT) ... 76
Democrats Face Hurdles In Bid To Close Medicare Gap (WP) ... 77
Leadership Tries To Restrain Fiefs In New Congress (NYT) ... 78
Bipartisanship As The First Resort? (NYT) ... 80
It's Really About '08, Nancy (WP) ... 80
A Good Start For Congress (LAT) ... 82
Showdown In Washington (SFC) ... 82
The Ebb Of Prejudice (WP) ... 84
Congressional Budget Delay Stymies Scientific Research (NYT) 85
U.S. Selecting Hybrid Design For Warheads (NYT) ... 86
Justices Continue Trend Of Hearing Fewer Cases (WP) ... 88
Don't Pay Supes Like Members Of Congress (LAT) ... 89

Other News:

Upward Bound, Just Not As Fast (WP) ... 90
The Dollar Could Slip Some More (WP) ... 90
Setting The Bar On Earnings (NYT) ... 91
A Phantom Rebound In The Housing Market (NYT) ... 91
Investors Start The New Year Indecisively (NYT) ... 92
Gore Leaves Door Ajar For 2008 (WP) ... 93
Rangel Says Encouraging Obama On '08 Is No Big Deal (NYT) 93
Players (WP) ... 94
'08 Candidacy Could Shake Up Giuliani's Firm (NYT) ... 94
Bloggers Unleash A Virtual Campaign (WT) ... 97
The Invasion Of The Alpha Male Democrat (NYT) ... 98
The Jeb Bush Era Ends In Florida (WP) ... 99
Katie O'Malley Makes A Case For Keeping Her Job (WP) ... 101
Breakfast Of Champions (NYT) ... 102
They Came From Montana (NYT) ... 102
Paint My Sidewalk Blue (NYT) ... 103
An Election With No Losers (NYT) ... 104
For Veterans, Alaska's An Attraction (WP/AP) ... 105
Oh, Now The Right Wants To Talk Nice (LAT) ... 106
Saudis, France Urge Compliance From Iran (AP) ... 106
U.S. Puts Squeeze On Iran's Oil Fields (LAT) ... 107
Revealed: Israel Plans Nuclear Strike On Iran (LONT) ... 109
Hamas Pledges To Boost Forces In Gaza (AP) ... 110
Abbas Bans Hamas Militia (WT/AP) ... 111
Abbas Asks Dissolution Of Hamas Military Police (NYT) ... 112
Abbas Bans Hamas Police Force (LAT) ... 113
Jews, Arabs And Jimmy Carter (NYT) ... 114
In A Divided Israel, Angry Words Or No Words At All (NYT) ... 115
Violence In Somalia Over Disarmament (NYT) ... 117
Somalis Rail At Ethiopian Forces (WP) ... 118
Somali Fighters: We'll Heed Al Qaeda's Call (AP) ... 119
Ethiopia's Intervention May Destabilize Region (LAT) ... 119
Richardson Heads To Sudan With 3 Goals (AP) ... 121
Bomb Attack On Bus In Sri Lanka Kills 11 (NYT) ... 122
The Personal Politics Of Bangladesh (WP/AP) ... 122
Police Ignore Serial Killings In Delhi Slum, Exposing Unequal Justice For India's Poor (NYT) ... 123
In Mexico, "People Do Really Want To Stay" (WP) ... 125
Mexico's New President Sends Thousands Of Federal Officers To Fight Drug Cartels (NYT) ... 128
Armenian Genocide Question Hits Home (LAT) ... 129
Warsaw Archbishop Resigns Amid Scandal (AP) ... 130

DOJ_NMG_0113512

TERRORISM NEWS:

Poisoning Of Ex-Agent Sets Off Alarm Bells (WP)

By Peter Finn, Washington Post Foreign Service
The Washington Post, January 7, 2007
Nuclear Regulators Fear Wider Attempt

MOSCOW -- Ninety-seven percent of the legal production of one of the world's rarest industrial products -- the intensely radioactive isotope polonium-210 -- takes place at a closely guarded nuclear reactor near the Volga River 450 miles southeast of Moscow.

In an average year, about three ounces of the substance is made at the Avangard facility, a former nuclear weapons plant, then sold under strict controls to Russian and foreign companies that prize it for its abilities to reduce static electricity.

This fall, a microscopic quantity of polonium-210, from somewhere, found its way into the body of Alexander Litvinenko, a former Russian internal security agent living in London. He died an agonizing death in a hospital 22 days later.

Now an international investigation is trying to track that dose back to its source. Detectives from Scotland Yard have said nothing about where the trail of evidence may be leading; Russian officials have been more willing to talk, saying that Avangard is tightly audited and that illicit production of polonium-210 is technically possible at many of the world's reactors.

Still, Russia's near total domination of the world's legal trade in the substance has focused new international attention on the country's production system and controls. In addition, Litvinenko's death has created new concern among regulators that the substance might be used as an instrument of murder by terrorists.

Russia is the main source of polonium in part because it offers high quality and the best price for commercial users, according to Nick Priest, professor of radiation toxicology at Middlesex University and a former head of biomedical research at the Atomic Energy Authority in Britain. No polonium is produced in Britain, and officials in Russia said none has been exported commercially to Britain for at least five years.

Polonium-210 is produced in reactors by irradiating bismuth-209, an isotope of the element bismuth. The resulting substance is so radioactive that it has a half-life of only 138 days, meaning that half the atoms in a given quantity will disintegrate in that period.

Specialists say that around the world, reactors capable of this operation belong either to state agencies or universities and so are highly regulated. "Everything connected with polonium production and application is controlled by governments," said Boris Zhuikov, head of the radioisotope laboratory in the Nuclear Studies Institute of the Russian Academy of Sciences, in an interview. "You cannot just put any target inside a reactor. It is regulated and checked by many, many people. It would be discovered."

The Avangard plant operates under close Russian government scrutiny. Officials said four Russian organizations are licensed to handle the material made there: the chemistry faculty of Moscow State University; the Federal Nuclear Center in Samara, also on the Volga; Techsnabexport, the state-controlled uranium supplier; and one private company, Nuclon, which uses it for medical devices and transports isotopes to customers.

The controls have proved effective, Russian officials contend. "I can say with complete certainty that no deviations from the rules of storage and transportation of nuclear materials, including polonium, have been discovered at any structures of our fuel and nuclear complex," said Konstantin Pulikovsky, head of the Federal Service for the Oversight of the Environment, Technology and Nuclear Management, according to the Russian news agency RIA-Novosti.

Worldwide, polonium has been lost or stolen in at least 15 known incidents before 2006, most of them in the United States, according to the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog based in Vienna.

Priest said he believed that in Russia, audit safeguards could be circumvented if there was demand for polonium from officials with strong influence. Audits could also be an unreliable gauge of pilfering because during production, much more polonium is made than is actually needed, with the surplus never entering the officially recognized supply.

"When they do these runs, they produce a large amount because it's got a 138-day half-life and they don't want to be making it all the time. It's not possible to maintain complete control by measurement at the source," Priest said.

Other theories suggest that the polonium that killed Litvinenko might have been obtained from an officially tracked commercial supply after it reached its final customer.

DOJ_NMG_0113513

Polonium is commonly used in static eliminators in printing plants, photography labs and textile mills. In these applications, it is bound in extremely small quantities with other metals.

Extracting the substance from the molds in which these mixtures are made would be difficult because "polonium science is quite complicated," Priest said.

But with qualified scientists and the right lab conditions, it is possible. "I can see how they could be used to brew up a dose to kill one person," said Peter D. Zimmerman, a nuclear physicist and professor of science and security at King's College London. "It would require very delicate lab work."

In its pure form, polonium-210 is a soft, silvery metal. One microgram, or millionth of a gram, can be fatal, and the body of the poisoned Russian contained multiple times the lethal dose. One gram, about 0.035 of an ounce, could theoretically kill tens of millions of people.

The substance is self-heating and highly radioactive, but as long as it is housed in a sealed capsule of glass or metal, it can be safely transported in, for example, one drop of solution. It eludes radiation detectors in place at airports, border crossings and ports because it emits alpha rays, not the gamma rays the devices look for.

Polonium-210 can be dried into a substance such as chalk and turned into powder. Or it can be mixed with an aerosol solution, allowing it to be sprayed. But many scientists believe the probable method of transporting and dispensing it in the London killing was putting the isotope in a solution that could be tipped at arm's length into a drink or onto food.

"The ideal volume would be a couple of teaspoons of solution; it can sometimes be difficult to transfer a drop or something smaller," Priest said. "Once it's in the body, it irradiates the whole body."

Yet scientists in London did not discover the presence of polonium-210 until Litvinenko's urine was tested with an alpha ray detector at the Atomic Weapons Establishment, the British agency that maintains nuclear warheads. "It's so obscure that it will be among the last things people will look for," Priest said. "And except by extreme luck, there's no chance to work out in a short time what's happened, so it gives the people who did it a long time to get away."

The substance's great giveaway is that once discovered, its telltale traces are easily tracked. Out of its box, polonium smears everything. After Litvinenko's death, it was discovered in planes, cars, hotels and offices -- all places that the victim and people he met had visited around the time of the poisoning.

If it enters the body in tiny amounts, death is certain. The devastating effects were studied in the 1960s at a Moscow institute where the isotope was administered to dogs, rabbits and rats, according to Zhuikov. He said Soviet scientists wanted to understand polonium's potential in case humans were exposed to it, because the isotope was used in various applications in the country's nuclear and space programs.

The painful progression from severe vomiting and diarrhea to hair loss, internal bleeding and organ failure was clear in a photograph of a stricken Litvinenko lying in a London hospital. "If someone hates, really hates, then it's a good material [to use to] to kill," Zhuikov said. "This is real suffering."

The former agent's death has caused anti-terrorism officials to worry that an explosive or airborne dispersal of polonium, particularly in a crowded, enclosed space, could cause numerous fatalities and sow widespread panic, scientists said. Compromise a food or water supply, they said, and the consequences could be even more dire.

"You need a lot of the material," Zimmerman said. "But not more than it is reasonable to think could be diverted from the commercial stream."

The International Atomic Energy Agency is considering tighter controls on polonium.

An IAEA diplomat, who was not authorized to speak for quotation, said that in the wake of the Litvinenko case, concerns have risen at the agency about a mass poisoning through the introduction of polonium into the food chain or drinking water.

Ultimately, scientists such as Zimmerman would like to phase out polonium's commercial use and see the development of anti-static technology using other material.

"Peace Mom" Turns Attention To Guantanamo (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

HAVANA, Cuba (AP) -- American "peace mom" Cindy Sheehan called for the closure of the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, as she and other activists arrived in Cuba on Saturday to draw attention to the nearly 400 terror suspects held at the remote site.

Sheehan is among 12 human rights and anti-war activists who will travel across this Caribbean island next week, arriving at the main gate of the Guantanamo base in eastern Cuba on Thursday -- five years after the first prisoners were flown in.

"Anyone who knows me knows that I am not afraid of anything," Sheehan said when asked about the possibility of U.S. sanctions for traveling to communist-run Cuba, which remains under an American trade embargo.

"What is more important is the inhumanity that my government is perpetrating at Guantanamo," she told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0113514

Sheehan, 49, of Vacaville, California, became an anti-war activist known as the "peace mom" after losing her 24-year-old son, Casey, in Iraq in April 2004.

She drew international attention after camping outside President Bush's Texas ranch to protest the war in Iraq, and has been arrested numerous times for trespassing.

Sheehan arrived in Havana early Saturday evening with trip organizer Medea Benjamin of the California nonprofit groups Global Exchange and CODEPINK: Women for Peace.

Benjamin said group members believed they were exempt from U.S. travel restrictions on Cuba because they were traveling as professional human rights activists who will attend a daylong international conference in the Cuban city of Guantanamo on Wednesday, the eve of their protest.

The U.S. military still holds about 395 men on suspicion of links to al Qaeda or the Taliban, including about 85 who have been cleared to be released or transferred to other countries.

Cleric's Story Of Abduction, Torture (CHIT)

By John Crewdson, Tribune Senior Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, January 7, 2007

Letter opening salvo in CIA officers' trial

CAIRO -- "This is how they kidnapped me from Italy ... and how they tortured and imprisoned me in Egypt."

So begins a 6,300-word, handwritten letter, composed in an Egyptian prison cell by radical Muslim cleric Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr. His abduction by the CIA is at the center of an unprecedented judicial proceeding set to open in Italy this week that may ultimately expose to public view one of the agency's most sensitive and controversial operations in its secret war on terror.

In a kidnapping case against 26 Americans and five Italian intelligence operatives, including the one-time CIA chief in Rome and Italy's former top spymaster, Nasr, better known as Abu Omar, will speak to the court through his letter, telling his story for the first time in his own words.

According to Abu Omar's written account, obtained by the Tribune, he was walking to his mosque in Milan on Feb. 17, 2003, when he was stopped on the street by a man who identified himself as a police officer. The cleric wrote that he was pulled into a van, beaten and taken by plane to Egypt.

He described in detail how his Egyptian interrogators tried to get him to agree to become an informer, and he says he refused. What followed, according to his letter, was torture with electric shocks, beatings that caused him to lose the hearing in one ear, and sexual abuse.

For long periods of time, he said in his letter, he was kept in an underground cell "where you cannot distinguish between night and day and the cockroaches and rats and insects walk all over my body night and day."

Abu Omar has been locked away for nearly four years, most of it in Egypt's notorious Torah Prison, some 1,600 miles from the massive Tribunale in Milan, where a preliminary hearing in the case is to begin on Tuesday. Those proceedings could shine the first bright light on the U.S. practice of "rendering" terrorist suspects to other countries for interrogation that allegedly is often accompanied by torture.

Prosecutors in Milan have compiled evidence ranging from hotel and cell phone records to hundreds of hours of wiretapped telephone conversations. Now Abu Omar, through his letter, promises to be a prominent witness in the case.

Abu Omar, 43, is a native Egyptian who fled his homeland when he was young in order to escape what he said was political persecution. He married and had children in Albania and married a second time in Milan. Like uncounted millions of his brethren, he grew increasingly hostile toward Israel and the United States because of perceived injustices to Palestinians and other Muslims.

He was under surveillance by Italian authorities because of his suspected role in helping young European Muslims go to Iraq to take up arms against the expected U.S.-led invasion, which occurred a month after he disappeared from Milan.

While ultimately charged in Italy in April 2005 with helping Muslim fighters make their way to Iraq, Abu Omar had not been charged with a crime in the U.S. or Italy at the time of his abduction. Italian courts are divided on whether the recruiting of "foreign fighters" for a war violates Italy's anti-terrorism laws.

Some human-rights groups have cited Abu Omar's "rendition" as a prime example of the "outsourcing of torture" by the Bush administration. But his case is not unique. Egypt, which has often been accused of torturing prisoners, acknowledges taking custody of 60 to 70 radical Muslims abducted by the CIA.

The Americans charged in the Abu Omar case--25 current and former CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force colonel--are fugitives from Italian justice, and none of them are expected in court for this week's hearing. Prosecutors plan to ask the Milanese court to try the Americans in absentia, and the court is expected to agree.

DOJ_NMG_0113515

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield declined comment on any aspect of the case. The agency has refused to acknowledge that it played a role in the Milan rendition, or even that it occurred.

Except for a three-week period in 2004 when he was freed by the Egyptian courts for lack of evidence, Abu Omar's contacts with the world have been limited to a few visits from Nabila Ghali, the second of his two Muslim wives, and a handful of telephone conversations with Ghali and his first wife, Marsela Glina, who lives in Albania.

Testimony a surprise

Until recently, prosecutors in Milan assumed they would have to make their case against the 31 defendants without any testimony from Abu Omar, who is charged under a 25-year-old "emergency decree" with posing a danger to the Egyptian state.

After learning that Abu Omar was in Egypt, Milan's deputy public prosecutor, Armando Spataro, repeatedly asked the Egyptian government for permission to question him. When the Egyptians ignored Spataro's initial request, he sent a second one. When that request was ignored, a third followed last February. Spataro assumed his requests were being thrown away.

Then, last April, Abu Omar's Egyptian lawyer, Montasser El Zayat, who has earned a reputation for defending Muslim radicals, received a surprise summons demanding his client's presence before Egypt's chief appellate prosecutor, Sherif El Kady.

According to El Zayat, as a stenographer took notes Abu Omar answered El Kady's questions about his years as a Cairo university student, a brief jail term for political activity, his flight to Albania, and his life in Milan after being granted political asylum in Italy.

Whether Abu Omar's testimony was taken in response to Spataro's requests is not clear. The Egyptian Interior Ministry declines to discuss the case, and no transcript was ever sent to Milan or provided to El Zayat.

When Abu Omar learned from his wife Ghali that his testimony had never reached Italy, he wrote, in a measured Arabic hand, what Ghali refers to as "his memoirs"--his version of the story of his abduction and captivity.

The document is now in the possession of Spataro, who says he has verified its authenticity.

`Severely beaten'

Abu Omar wrote that he was grabbed on the street in Milan and thrown into a van by men who never spoke. When he tried to resist, he wrote, he was "severely beaten" until white foam spewed from his mouth and he became incontinent.

Suddenly, his kidnappers, evidently fearing a heart attack or some other cardiac event, "began to tear at my clothes quickly and one of them began to compress on my heart," performing heart massage.

The crisis averted, Abu Omar was taken to an airport. A short flight was followed by a longer one, which ended in Cairo shortly after 5 a.m.--in time, he wrote, for him to hear the first call for morning prayer echoing across the Egyptian capital.

Abu Omar wrote that he was driven to a building he later identified as the headquarters of the Egyptian intelligence service, where a man his captors described only as a "great Pasha"--a high-ranking official--asked him:

"Do you accept to work with us in exchange for your safe return to Italy?"

After refusing to become an informer, Abu Omar wrote, he was allowed to sleep and provided with some food before being given paper and pen, ordered to write his life story, and shown "many pictures of people in Italy (Egyptians, Tunisians, Algerians, Moroccans, etc.)."

Refusals to answer questions were met with electric shocks, "hand beatings," and threats of rape, Abu Omar claimed. "I was hung like slaughtered cattle," he wrote, "head down, feet up, hands tied behind my back, feet also tied together, and I was exposed to electric shocks all over my body and especially the head area to weaken the brain. ..."

He also described being tied up and placed on a mattress that was hosed down with water and connected to electricity.

Even when he was not being tortured, he wrote, "I was placed near the torture chambers for long periods of time to hear the screams of the tortured and their moans and their howls so that I would collapse psychologically."

According to El Zayat, Abu Omar has tried to commit suicide at least once in captivity.

Although Abu Omar did not mention it in the handwritten statement, his lawyer, El Zayat, said that his client told the Egyptian prosecutor in his earlier testimony that a man who looked, dressed and spoke English like an American had been present during the first several days of his interrogation.

Asked whether the mystery man had been present during the torture as well as the questioning, El Zayat replied in a recent interview here that his client was "not sure."

A former senior CIA official said it was standard procedure following a rendition for a CIA officer to visit the receiving country and assess how the case was proceeding.

Cell phone and hotel reservation records compiled by the Milan prosecutors show that Robert Seldon Lady, then the CIA's chief in Milan, traveled to Cairo four days after Abu Omar arrived here and that Lady stayed for two weeks.

Daria Pesce, an Italian lawyer representing Lady, who is one of the CIA operatives charged in Abu Omar's kidnapping, will say only that his visit to Cairo was "official" CIA business.

DOJ_NMG_0113516

CIA Cases Spur Debate Over Torture (CHIT)

By John Crewdson, Tribune Senior Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, January 7, 2007

The use of torture has been prohibited in the United States since the ratification in 1787 of the 8th Amendment to the Constitution barring "cruel and unusual punishment."

"We do not condone torture," President Bush has declared. "I have never ordered torture. I will never order torture. The values of this country are such that torture is not a part of our soul and our being."

Yet some human rights groups contend that a technique known as "waterboarding," which simulates drowning and reportedly has been used by the U.S. on some terrorist suspects, is torture. These groups also argue that some psychological interrogation techniques, such as sleep deprivation and exposure to loud music, contravene the 8th Amendment.

While those debates continue, there is no question that terrorism suspects such as Abu Omar have been captured abroad by the CIA and transported to third countries whose police and intelligence services routinely employ interrogation methods, such as electric shock, that everyone agrees constitute torture.

Bush said on March 16, 2005, that before a third-country "rendition" of a suspected terrorist can take place, the CIA must obtain from the receiving country "the promise that they won't be tortured."

Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales said on May 3, 2006, that the actual standard applied by the U.S. in choosing a destination country is less stringent: whether a suspect is "more likely than not" to be tortured.

Canadian government and United Nations investigations have found that individuals "rendered" by the CIA to Egypt and Syria were mistreated despite assurances that they would not be tortured.

"It's almost impossible to talk about rendition apart from the torture element," says Joanne Mariner, a lawyer with Human Rights Watch, "since that is and has always been one of the central issues with renditions. The CIA knows that Egypt practices torture routinely, particularly against suspected Islamists."

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), whose Judiciary Committee has just begun an investigation of CIA renditions, agrees.

"We diminish our own values as a nation--and lose credibility as an advocate of human rights around the world--by engaging in, or outsourcing, torture," Leahy wrote Gonzales in November.

According to the U.S. State Department's global survey of human rights, torture and abuse of prisoners in Egypt remain "common and persistent." The State Department report is also critical of Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Morocco and Syria, which have been recipients of other CIA renditions.

Under legislation implementing the United Nations Convention Against Torture, to which the U.S. is a signatory, it is a federal crime for U.S. government employees to participate in, conspire in or contribute to the torture of anybody, anywhere in the world.

Mariner and other human-rights lawyers think that rendering someone to a country where he is likely to be tortured may violate the law even if the CIA operatives involved in the rendition played no direct role in the torture.

"If the people involved in the process knew he was likely to be tortured, then they're responsible," said M. Cherif Bassiouni, distinguished research professor of law at DePaul University College of Law.

The Imperial Presidency 2.0 (NYT)

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

Observing President Bush in action lately, we have to wonder if he actually watched the election returns in November, or if he was just rerunning the 2002 vote on his TiVo.

That year, the White House used the fear of terrorism to scare American voters into cementing the Republican domination of Congress. Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney then embarked on an expansion of presidential power chilling both in its sweep and in the damage it did to the constitutional system of checks and balances.

In 2006, the voters sent Mr. Bush a powerful message that it was time to rein in his imperial ambitions. But we have yet to see any sign that Mr. Bush understands that — or even realizes that the Democrats are now in control of the Congress. Indeed, he seems to have interpreted his party's drubbing as a mandate to keep pursuing his fantasy of victory in Iraq and to press ahead undaunted with his assault on civil liberties and the judicial system. Just before the Christmas break, the Justice Department served notice to Senator Patrick Leahy — the new chairman of the Judiciary Committee — that it intended to keep stonewalling Congressional inquiries into Mr. Bush's inhumane and unconstitutional treatment of prisoners taken in anti-terrorist campaigns. It refused to hand over two documents, including one in which Mr. Bush authorized the Central Intelligence Agency to establish secret prisons beyond the reach of American law or international treaties. The other set forth the interrogation methods authorized in these prisons — which we now know ranged from abuse to outright torture.

DOJ_NMG_0113517

Also last month, Mr. Bush issued another of his infamous "presidential signing statements," which he has used scores of times to make clear he does not intend to respect the requirements of a particular law — in this case a little-noticed Postal Service bill. The statement suggested that Mr. Bush does not believe the government must obtain a court order before opening Americans' first-class mail. It said the administration had the right to "conduct searches in exigent circumstances," which include not only protecting lives, but also unspecified "foreign intelligence collection."

The law is clear on this. A warrant is required to open Americans' mail under a statute that was passed to stop just this sort of abuse using just this sort of pretext. But then again, the law is also clear on the need to obtain a warrant before intercepting Americans' telephone calls and e-mail. Mr. Bush began openly defying that law after Sept. 11, 2001, authorizing the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without a court order on calls and e-mail between the United States and other countries.

.

News accounts have also reminded us of the shameful state of American military prisons, where supposed terrorist suspects are kept without respect for civil or human rights, and on the basis of evidence so deeply tainted by abuse, hearsay or secrecy that it is essentially worthless.

Deborah Sontag wrote in The Times last week about the sorry excuse for a criminal case that the administration whipped up against Jose Padilla, who was once — but no longer is — accused of plotting to explode a radioactive "dirty bomb" in the United States. Mr. Padilla was held for two years without charges or access to a lawyer. Then, to avoid having the Supreme Court review Mr. Bush's power grab, the administration dropped those accusations and charged Mr. Padilla in a criminal court on hazy counts of lending financial support to terrorists.

But just as the government abandoned the "dirty bomb" case against Mr. Padilla, it quietly charged an Ethiopian-born man, Binyam Mohamed, with conspiring with Mr. Padilla to commit that very crime. Unlike Mr. Padilla, Mr. Mohamed is not a United States citizen, so the administration threw him into Guantánamo. Now 28, he is still being held there as an "illegal enemy combatant" under the anti-constitutional military tribunals act that was rushed through the Republican-controlled Congress just before last November's elections.

Mr. Mohamed was a target of another favorite Bush administration practice: "extraordinary rendition," in which foreign citizens are snatched off the streets of their hometowns and secretly shipped to countries where they can be abused and tortured on behalf of the American government. Mr. Mohamed — whose name appears nowhere in either of the cases against Mr. Padilla — has said he was tortured in Morocco until he signed a confession that he conspired with Mr. Padilla. The Bush administration clearly has no intention of answering that claim, and plans to keep Mr. Mohamed in extralegal detention indefinitely.

.

The Democratic majority in Congress has a moral responsibility to address all these issues: fixing the profound flaws in the military tribunals act, restoring the rule of law over Mr. Bush's rogue intelligence operations and restoring the balance of powers between Congress and the executive branch. So far, key Democrats, including Mr. Leahy and Senator Richard Durbin of Illinois, chairman of a new subcommittee on human rights, have said these issues are high priorities for them.

We would lend such efforts our enthusiastic backing and hope Mr. Leahy, Mr. Durbin and other Democratic leaders are not swayed by the absurd notion circulating in Washington that the Democrats should now "look ahead" rather than use their new majority to right the dangerous wrongs of the last six years of Mr. Bush's one-party rule.

This is a false choice. Dealing with these issues is not about the past. The administration's assault on some of the nation's founding principles continues unabated. If the Democrats were to shirk their responsibility to stop it, that would make them no better than the Republicans who formed and enabled these policies in the first place.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New Top Spy Inherits An Office Still Finding Its Way (WP)

By Walter Pincus, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

McConnell's Tasks Include the Ongoing Integration of Agencies as Well as Advising the President

President Bush's choice to be the second director of national intelligence, retired Navy Vice Adm. John M. McConnell, must pick up the job of restructuring the nation's $42 billion intelligence community, which after 19 months is still very much a work in progress.

At the White House on Friday, outgoing director John D. Negroponte said, "Admiral McConnell will continue to drive forward the reforms we have initiated, fully integrating the domestic, foreign and military dimensions of our national intelligence enterprise."

DOJ_NMG_0113518

McConnell responded, "I plan to continue the strong emphasis on integration of the community to better serve all of our customers."

He will manage the collection and analysis of intelligence from the 17 agencies and roughly 100,000 people in the U.S. intelligence community. Bush emphasized that the director also "determines the national intelligence budget." That was a major recommendation of the 9/11 commission, and one Congress adopted when it passed legislation in December 2004 creating the director of national intelligence (DNI).

The DNI's other major role is as the president's top intelligence adviser. That means being present six mornings a week when Bush gets his national security briefing. That session offers the DNI an opportunity not only to have time with the president, but to hear and take part in the ensuing discussion with Vice President Cheney, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and chief of staff Joshua B. Bolten, who are also in the room.

This part of the job requires the DNI to take time the night before to read the roughly 28-page daily briefing report and to show up at his Old Executive Office Building suite next to the White House at about 6:30 each morning to go over the latest intelligence. One person familiar with the process described it as worthwhile, "to get a sense of what's on everyone's mind."

Another aspect of the DNI's role as top intelligence adviser to the president is attendance at high-level White House meetings, which have been increasingly frequent since the Iraq war began. Those meetings can be handled by the deputy DNI, though no one currently holds that job. How McConnell will divide his time between this advisory role and the intelligence community duties, should he be confirmed, remains to be seen.

One of the early tasks he will face, according to a senior intelligence official, is reviewing the 2004 law that created his position to see whether changes need to be made. The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence has already scheduled hearings to review how the restructuring legislation is working out.

McConnell, 63, served in the Navy as a career intelligence officer, rising to vice admiral when he headed the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996. After his retirement from the Navy, he took a private-sector job in March 1996 with the Booz Allen Hamilton consulting firm, where he rose to be senior vice president.

John Moseman, a former senior CIA official who works with McConnell at Booz Allen, said McConnell has been "successful in helping it become an incredibly collaborative organization." That approach, "reaching across and pulling together teams of people," is a talent that is needed in the DNI job, where "you need collaboration at every level," Moseman said.

At the White House on Friday, McConnell said his private-sector work during the past 10 years "has allowed me to stay focused on national security and intelligence communities as a strategist and as a consultant." In many respects, he said, "I never left" the intelligence business.

Booz Allen makes it clear on its Web site that McConnell has played a leading role in its handling of contracts in the fields of intelligence and military affairs. "McConnell leads the firm's assignments in Military Intelligence and Information Operations for the Department of Defense, the Unified Combatant Commanders, Military Services, and Defense Agencies," according to the site.

FEMA Overhaul Delay Irks Legislators (WT)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

Lawmakers are frustrated with the lack of progress on a congressionally mandated overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, designed to ensure that flaws that dogged the response to Hurricane Katrina are fixed.

In a letter sent late last month to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and released last week, members of both the House and Senate homeland security committees complained about being kept in the dark over progress on the changes, which they feared was lagging.

"There are already some indicators that [the department] may not be effectively and promptly implementing" the new law, wrote Sens. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent, and Susan Collins, Maine Republican, and Reps. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat, and Peter T. King, New York Republican.

The law effectively reconstitutes FEMA as an independent agency within the department. Mr. Chertoff opposed the overhaul, which was included in the must-pass Homeland Security appropriations bill and signed by President Bush in October.

The lawmakers' letter requests "full and complete briefings" for staff on the implementation of the law "no later than January 8, 2007."

Lieberman spokeswoman Leslie Phillips told United Press International on Thursday that the Senate committee had heard no response from the department.

"We will give them a courteous amount of time to respond and then decide how to proceed," she said. Miss Phillips said the letter, and the subsequent decision to release it, followed "weeks and weeks of fruitless effort to get briefings."

DOJ_NMG_0113519

"It would be fair to say" that Mr. Lieberman was frustrated, she added.

Homeland Security officials denied they were dragging their feet, pointing out that it is a mammoth task to implement the reorganization, which is outlined in 180 pages of legislative language.

"The department was given until the end of March" to implement the reforms, spokeswoman Joanna Gonzalez told UPI, and "we look forward to briefing members of the committee."

But she said officials wanted to ensure that the transition plan was complete before they briefed Congress.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Plan For Iraq Requests More Troops And More Jobs (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6 — President Bush's new Iraq strategy calls for a rapid influx of forces that could add as many as 20,000 American combat troops to Baghdad, supplemented with a jobs program costing as much as $1 billion intended to employ Iraqis in projects including painting schools and cleaning streets, according to American officials who are piecing together the last parts of the initiative.

The American officials said Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, formally agreed in a long teleconference on Thursday with Mr. Bush to match the American troop increase, made up of five combat brigades that would go in at a rate of roughly one a month, by sending three more Iraqi brigades to Baghdad over the next month and a half.

Nonetheless, even in outlining the plan, some American officials acknowledged deep skepticism about whether the new plan could succeed.

They said two-thirds of the promised Iraqi force would consist of Kurdish pesh merga units to be sent from northern Iraq, and they said some doubts remained about whether they would show up in Baghdad and were truly committed to quelling sectarian fighting.

The call for an increase in troops would also put Mr. Bush in direct confrontation with the leaders of the new Democratic Congress, who said in a letter to the president on Friday that the United States should move instead toward a phased withdrawal of American troops, to begin in the next four months.

Mr. Bush is expected to make the plan public in coming days, probably in a speech to the country on Wednesday that will cast the initiative as a joint effort by the United States and Iraq to reclaim control of Baghdad neighborhoods racked by sectarian violence. Officials said Mr. Bush was likely to be vague on the question of how long the additional American forces would remain on the streets of Baghdad. But they said American planners intended for the push to last for less than a year.

A crucial element of the plan would include more than doubling the State Department's reconstruction efforts throughout the country, an initiative intended by the administration to signal that the new strategy would emphasize rebuilding as much as fighting.

But previous American reconstruction efforts in Iraq have failed to translate into support from the Iraqi population, and some Republicans as well as the new Democratic leadership in Congress have questioned if a troop increase would do more than postpone the inevitable and precarious moment when Iraqi forces have to stand on their own.

Congress has the power to halt the increases by cutting off money for Mr. Bush's proposals. But some Democrats are torn about whether to press ahead with such a move for fear that it will appear that they are not supporting the troops.

When Mr. Bush gives his speech, he will cast much of the program as an effort to bolster Iraq's efforts to take command over their own forces and territory, the American officials said. He will express confidence that Mr. Maliki is committed to bringing under control both the Sunni-led insurgency and the Shiite militias that have emerged as the source of most of the violence. Mr. Maliki picked up those themes in a speech in Baghdad on Saturday in which he said that multinational troops would support an Iraqi effort to secure the capital.

Some aspects of the plan were reported by The Wall Street Journal on Friday.

The officials would not say specifically whether the American troop increase would be carried out if the Iraqis failed to make good on their commitment to add to their own ranks. But they emphasized that the American influx, which would be focused in Baghdad and Anbar Province but could also include a contingency force in Kuwait, could be re-evaluated at any point.

The American officials who described the plan included some who said they were increasingly concerned about Mr. Maliki's intentions and his ability to deliver. They said senior Bush administration officials had been deeply disturbed by accounts from witnesses to last Saturday's hanging of Saddam Hussein, who said they believed that guards involved in carrying out the execution were linked to the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia that is headed by Moktada al-Sadr, whose name some of the executioners shouted while Mr. Hussein stood on the gallows.

DOJ_NMG_0113520

"If that's an indication of how Maliki is operating these days, we've got a deeper problem with the bigger effort," said one official, who insisted on anonymity because he was discussing internal administration deliberations over a strategy that Mr. Bush has not yet publicly announced.

The White House has refused to talk publicly about any of the decisions that Mr. Bush has made about his plan, which is tentatively titled "A New Way Forward." Even though speechwriters are already drafting Mr. Bush's comments, several of the crucial elements are not final, officials warned. That apparently includes the exact amounts of money Mr. Bush will ask of Congress to finance the jobs program or a longer-term job-training effort that will also be part of the strategy.

Mr. Bush has previously promised to remake American reconstruction efforts in Iraq, most notably in December 2005, when he said that the United States had learned from the failure of efforts to rebuild major infrastructure, mostly run by American companies. But subsequent efforts to focus on programs that would bring more immediate benefits to Iraqis have also faltered.

The details of Mr. Bush's latest military, economic and political initiatives were described by several sources, including some who said they doubted it would work. The jobs program, noted one, "would have been great in 2003 or even 2004, but we are trying it now in a very different Iraq," one in which the passion for fighting for sectarian control of neighborhoods may outweigh interests in obtaining employment.

The American officials who described the program included both advocates and critics of Mr. Bush's new strategy and representatives of three different executive branch departments. They would speak only on condition of anonymity because they were discussing internal deliberations about a plan that Mr. Bush had not yet announced.

The most immediate element of the new jobs program would amount to a major expansion of what is known in the military as the Commander's Emergency Response Program, which provides money to local officers to put civilians to work as a way of reducing resistance to the American presence in neighborhoods. While the effort has had some successes, they have largely been temporary. As a senior White House official noted in an interview recently, "You'd go into a neighborhood, clear it, try to hold it, and come back later and discover that it's all been shattered."

The new effort, officials said, would cost between a half billion and a billion dollars, some of which would be spent on other efforts to achieve stability and train Iraqis for more permanent jobs. The State Department and the Treasury Department have been brought into that effort.

The plan also calls for a more than doubling of the "Provincial Reconstruction Teams," relatively small groups of State Department officials empowered to coordinate local reconstruction efforts, chiefly hiring Iraqi companies. For much of the first half of 2006, the State Department was engaged in a bureaucratic dispute with the Defense Department about how these teams would be protected, including exploration of a plan to hire private protective forces that a White House official said "was too expensive." Now those teams will be expanded and embedded with combat brigades, officials said, in what would amount to the latest effort to demonstrate to Iraqis that the American forces in their midst were not simply occupiers.

Much of the plan described by officials seemed to be consistent with views supported by Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who will soon take over as the commander of ground forces in Iraq and who has been a strong advocate of an everyday American troop presence in neighborhoods.

Mr. Bush's speech is widely expected to make the case that Americans needed to commit to greater national sacrifice as part of what Bush administration officials acknowledge amounted to a last-ditch effort to salvage the mission in Iraq.

But almost as soon as his speech is done, a series of hearings will begin on Capitol Hill that Democrats intend to use to pick apart the details of the plan, with lawmakers questioning administration officials about whether a troop increase of any size can succeed this late in the war. Those hearings will also likely focus on whether the expanded American military commitment is linked to Iraqi military performance, a point that Bush administration officials would not address directly.

As described by those officials, Mr. Bush is stopping well short of declaring that the beefed-up American force will be sent only if the Iraqis also increase their own forces. But under the increase being contemplated, the reality is that every month between now and April or May, Mr. Bush will have a chance to decide whether to send an additional combat brigade into the country. "That's our moment of leverage," a White House official said.

Officials said a larger American troop commitment also would be used to illustrate Washington's increased resolve to deter adventurism by regional adversaries, especially Iran. Mr. Bush's speech is expected to include talk of a new diplomatic initiative to shore up confidence among Washington's Islamic allies in the region as well as to warn its adversaries. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to begin that initiative almost immediately after the speech, leaving for the Middle East by next weekend.

Parallel to an enlarged Baghdad security operation, Mr. Bush has signaled his desire to expand the number of American military trainers working with Iraqi security forces.

DOJ_NMG_0113521

In a speech in Baghdad on Saturday, Mr. Maliki said he was going to renew his efforts to rid the Iraqi Army and other security forces of sectarian influences.

"I announce here that all parties and political organizations, without exception, are forbidden from practicing their activities among the armed forces," he said during a speech given to mark Army Day.

In his speech, he mentioned the new Baghdad security plan, saying multinational forces would "support and back up our forces." But he said little specifically about an increase in American troops. Officials familiar with his thinking have said privately that he opposes any measure that would delay giving his administration complete control over Iraq's armed forces as soon as possible.

He once again tried to reassure critics of his administration that no outlaws could expect protection.

"The Baghdad security plan will not provide safe haven for all outlaws, regardless of their political or sectarian identities," he said.

Bush Fleshes Out Iraq Strategy Details (AP)

By Deb Riechmann,

AP, January 7, 2007

President Bush worked Saturday to finish his new war plan that could send as many as 20,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq and provide more money for jobs and reconstruction programs.

In Washington, Bush, who will announce his plan as early as Wednesday, held discussions with his national security advisers and then headed out of the White House for a bike ride. In Baghdad, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced that Iraqi forces would launch a new effort to wrest control of neighborhoods in the capital from Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads.

Military officials say Bush is considering sending two to five brigades — up to 20,000 troops — to help tamp down violence that is preventing political reconciliation and rebuilding efforts in Iraq. The idea of a troop buildup is getting a cool reception on Capitol Hill and from some military leaders who claim there is no military solution to the problems in Iraq where 140,000 troops already are deployed.

"Based on the advice of current and former military leaders, we believe this tactic would be a serious mistake," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said in the Democratic radio address Saturday. Instead, Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi want Bush to begin pulling troops out in four to six months.

"Our troops and their families have already sacrificed a great deal for Iraq," Reid said. "They have done their part. It's time for the Iraqis to do their part."

Some military officials, familiar with the discussions, say Bush could initially dispatch 8,000 to 10,000 new troops to Baghdad, and possibly Anbar Province, and leave himself the option of sending more later if security doesn't improve.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Sen. Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn., say that, at a minimum, another three to five brigades should be sent to Baghdad and one more to Anbar province. About 3,500 to 4,000 troops are in a brigade.

Most of the discussion about Bush's new plan has focused on U.S. troop strength, but the strategy he will unveil also will address political and economic issues. "The clear, hold and build counterinsurgency strategy requires a focus on all three," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said. "Our strategy will reflect that point."

Military analysts say Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, who recently finished his tour as the No. 2 general in Iraq, has recommended a short-term jobs program. Others familiar with the plan say Bush is favoring: short-term jobs programs and extending micro-loans to small business; increasing the amount of money that military commanders can spend quickly on local projects to improve the daily lives of Iraqis.

Bush is considering allocating more money for the Commander's Emergency Response Program, set up in 2003 to give field commanders money to solve local problems quickly — and show American compassion and good will. The program was allocated $753 million in the 2006 budget year. The president also has expressed interest in shoring up job-training programs for Iraqis and the work being done by State Department teams that coordinate local reconstruction efforts in Iraq, according to those familiar with discussions.

In a move reflecting Bush's aim to shift gears in Iraq, the White House on Friday announced that Bush has picked Adm. William Fallon, who commands American forces in the Pacific, to replace retiring Gen. John Abizaid as top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and will nominate Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who headed the effort to train Iraqi security forces, to replace Gen. George Casey as top American general in Iraq. Casey is becoming Army chief of staff.

Both Abizaid and Casey have expressed qualms in recent weeks about boosting U.S. forces in Iraq. Abizaid said an increase of 20,000 could not be sustained for long by the overburdened American military, and Casey said such a boost should be used only to advance U.S. strategic goals.

DOJ_NMG_0113522

Last summer, the U.S. military and Iraqi army flooded the capital with 12,000 additional troops to quell violence. By October, the U.S. military said the operation had not met expectations and the situation was disheartening. And the second half of last year ended up being one of the most violent periods in the central and western sections of the Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

Bush is expected to continue his briefings with lawmakers next week, culminating in a meeting with bipartisan leadership on Wednesday, according to lawmakers and aides.

Critics Say "Surge" Is More Of The Same (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Robin Wright, Ann Scott Tyson, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Past Troop Buildups Have Not Quelled Iraq

President Bush is putting the final touches on his new Iraq policy amid growing skepticism inside and outside the administration that the emerging package of extra troops, economic assistance and political benchmarks for the Baghdad government will make any more than a marginal difference in stabilizing the country.

Washington's debate over Iraq will intensify this week as Bush lays out his plans, probably on Wednesday or Thursday, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other administration officials face tough questions from Democrats in congressional hearings.

Although officials said the president has yet to settle on an exact figure of new troops, senior military leaders and commanders are deeply worried that a "surge" of as many as five brigades, or 20,000 troops, in Iraq and Kuwait would tax U.S. ground forces already stretched to the breaking point -- and may still prove inadequate to quell sectarian violence and the Sunni insurgency. Some senior U.S. officials think it could even backfire.

"There is a lot of concern that this won't work," said one military official not authorized to speak publicly about the debate at the Pentagon.

Meanwhile, the political and economic ideas under consideration all appear to be variations on initiatives that U.S. and Iraqi authorities have proved unable to implement successfully since the 2003 invasion or have tried and found wanting, according to former U.S. officials and experts on reconstructing war-torn countries.

Many officials at the State and Defense departments also doubt that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is capable of making the necessary reforms, given its track record of promising but not delivering since taking power in May and despite Maliki's assurances in a speech yesterday that he would hold Iraqis accountable for implementing a new Baghdad security plan.

A sense that the White House is preparing more of the same is generating deep skepticism among Democrats in Congress, many of whom have signaled strongly in recent days that they would resist sending additional troops to Iraq. And although Republicans say they are open to what Bush proposes this week, they are also asking much more pointed questions about the premises of the White House Iraq policy.

Administration officials are pushing lawmakers and the public to withhold judgment until they see all the elements of the new Iraq policy. Bush consulted with advisers yesterday, and White House speechwriters were working on this week's address. There are signs that there could be some surprises as the administration's debate moves from the staff level to the final deliberations of the president and his closest advisers.

Responding to skepticism about Maliki within some parts of the administration, the White House may make a deeper involvement in Iraq contingent on Maliki cracking down on militias and death squads while also undertaking bold political initiatives and developing a wider economic plan, U.S. officials say. The addition of new U.S. troops, for example, may be phased over several months and conditioned on Iraq following through on promised political reforms, the officials said.

One senior White House official said yesterday that the president considers the skepticism of lawmakers and the public "warranted" and that Bush will not "commit resources to a strategy that is not working." But the official said Bush was heartened by recent promises and plans from Maliki, citing the prime minister's speech in Baghdad yesterday in which he pledged a crackdown on sectarian militias, with U.S. assistance.

The official said U.S. and Iraqi leaders have been refining a new Iraqi security plan, first discussed when Bush and Maliki met in Jordan in November, in which Iraqi forces would take the lead with Americans in support. "It is not just rhetoric," the official said of Maliki. "He is actually putting forward specific plans and making different commitments than he has in the past." Speaking on the condition of anonymity because the president has not settled on a final plan, the official said Bush expects "a different result" from that of previous security plans.

Others have doubts. "I don't know that the Iraqi government has ever demonstrated ability to lead the country, and we shouldn't be surprised," said retired Army Lt. Gen. Jay M. Garner, who was the first U.S. official in charge of postwar Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0113523

"You'll never find, in my lifetime, one man that all the Iraqis will coalesce around." Iraqis are too divided among sectarian, ethnic and tribal loyalties, he said, and their loyalties are regional, not national.

Leon E. Panetta, a member of the Iraq Study Group, which recently delivered a wide-ranging set of recommendations about the way forward in Iraq, said in an interview that the test for him of the seriousness of the president's proposal will be whether Bush, in fact, conditions continued U.S. involvement on tangible progress from the Iraqi government.

"There has got to be some prospect that we are not just going to continue an open-ended commitment," said Panetta, who served in the Clinton White House as chief of staff.

As of yesterday, the president had not settled on a precise plan for adding to the 132,000 U.S. troops already in Iraq, officials said. Senior military and administration officials privately admit their deep concerns that the troop increase will backfire -- and leave the United States with no options left in six to eight months.

They note that since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003, the U.S. military has repeatedly carried out temporary troop increases of more than 20,000, but violence has continued to rise. The main difference under the new plan is that additional troops would be concentrated in the Baghdad vicinity, where there are currently seven U.S. brigades, and the increase could last longer, from six to 12 months, Pentagon officials said.

Meanwhile, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are worried about overstretching the Army and Marines.

The active-duty Army and Marine Corps lack a significant pool of ready and available forces to send to Iraq. The Army has one fully ready brigade of 3,500 to 4,000 troops on alert to deploy at any time. That on-alert brigade, most recently from the 82nd Airborne Division, has left for Kuwait in what could be the first phase of a troop increase, requiring that another unit take its place.

As a result, increasing ground troops would depend largely on extending units' time in Iraq and accelerating those preparing to go -- meaning longer war-zone tours and shorter periods back home for thousands of soldiers and Marines.

Under the plan, for instance, Army brigades would leave for Iraq sooner than planned, meaning soldiers would have less than 12 months at home to train and rebuild between tours -- a "red line" that outgoing Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker said he did not want to cross, according to a senior military official.

During its two-month interagency review, the Bush administration has struggled the most to come up with proposals to jump-start the stalled political process in Iraq, according to U.S. officials and Western diplomats. The fate of the revised strategy will be determined as much by new movement on Iraq's combustible political front as by success on the battlefield, administration officials said.

But the emerging package looks slim and, absent last-minute additions, appears to be more of the same, according to sources who have been briefed.

The centerpiece of the political plan is the creation of a national reconciliation government that would bring together the two main Shiite parties with the two largest Kurdish parties and the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party, according to Iraqi and U.S. officials. The goal is to marginalize Moqtada al-Sadr, the leader of the largest and most powerful Shiite militia and head of a group that has 30 seats in parliament and five cabinet posts.

To ensure participation of Sunni moderates, the Bush administration is pressing the Maliki government to take three other major steps: Amend the constitution to address Sunni concerns, pass a law on the distribution of Iraq's oil revenue and change the ruling that forbids the participation of former Baath Party officials.

The three major economic options on the table would revive dormant state-owned industries, launch a micro-finance program to give small loans to generate new businesses and expand a U.S. Agency for International Development stabilization program.

A fourth option would add major funds to a short-term work program to hire Iraqis to clean up trash or do repairs after U.S. and Iraqi troops secure neighborhoods. This Pentagon-run program is a way to lure unemployed men who had joined militias back into the mainstream economy, at least briefly, with the U.S. intention that Iraq would eventually spend its own money to create permanent jobs.

The idea to revive state-owned industries has come full circle. Iraq's economy under Saddam Hussein was state-controlled. When the first U.S. team arrived, its members looked to reenergize the industries as a key element in jump-starting the economy. But the subsequent Coalition Provisional Authority, run by L. Paul Bremer, opted to scrap the effort and emphasize a free-market economy, even though Iraq was ill equipped to make a dramatic conversion. The failure of a free market and the lack of both local and foreign investment has led the Defense Department to launch a massive reassessment.

Apparently absent from the final Iraq plan is any effort to engage Syria and Iran in trying to stabilize the country, a key recommendation from the Iraq Study Group, though the president will probably talk about new efforts to try to jump-start the Arab-Israeli peace process. Rice is expected to visit the Middle East to launch the effort later this month.

Bush Aides Lay Groundwork For Iraq Surge (LAT)

By Doyle McManus, Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — Two months ago, the nation's voters handed both houses of Congress to the Democrats in an election that reflected deep discontent with the war in Iraq.

This week, President Bush is responding to voters' message — by preparing to escalate the U.S. military commitment in Iraq with a "surge" that would add thousands of troops.

That might sound paradoxical, but aides say Bush's willingness to send more troops makes sense based on two beliefs that have long guided his war strategy. The first is that the price of leaving Iraq would be greater than the cost of staying. The second is that the public will accept the burdens of war if convinced that success is still possible.

"Is this a war, or is it not a war?" one official asked, previewing an argument the president is likely to make. "If it is, you have to be willing to sacrifice…. Americans are willing to do that as long as we have a clear strategy that offers a chance of success."

The details of the administration's surge plan haven't been disclosed, and officials say some details are still being ironed out. Bush is expected to unveil the plan in a nationally broadcast speech this week, probably Wednesday evening.

But even before the plan's announcement, Bush aides — speaking on condition of anonymity to avoid stepping on his lines — have been describing his thinking and trying out talking points.

Their summary: Bush believes that the United States still has a chance to stop Iraq from descending into civil war — and, on the other side of the equation, that the consequences of withdrawal would be disastrous. He thinks it's too early to turn primary responsibility for security in Baghdad over to Iraqi security forces, whose performance has been disappointing.

That leaves Bush with no easy options. But one choice that would keep the hope of victory alive — a choice that has growing support in the White House — is a surge aimed at stopping sectarian violence in Baghdad, coupled with rapid political reforms and a U.S.-funded job program to halt the growth of sectarian militias.

Officials said the job program, intended to employ young men who otherwise might join the militias, could cost as much as $1 billion if Congress approves it. The administration's plan will also include proposals for increased economic aid that would further increase the total bill, they said.

White House officials acknowledge that any surge proposal would meet opposition from critics who say the prospect of success is too low to risk more troops' lives. But the officials say they believe that most members of the public are still willing to hear Bush out and give him another chance to succeed.

"If you look at the polls, immediately leaving Iraq is not actually a popular option," one White House aide said. "Everybody figures that anxiety about the war … means 'get out.' But public opinion is more complex than that."

If Bush decides to send more troops, he will argue that the deployment is part of a broader change in strategy that offers a new chance of success, aides said.

"A president does have the ability to persuade," one added.

One official involved in the administration's policy discussion described it this way: "There are several strategic options to choose from. Do we cut and leave, and attempt to exit gracefully? Do we adjust the current strategy and be patient? Do we keep the current strategy without any adjustment? Or do we try to change the dynamic by increasing the troop levels and changing the strategy?

"Given an ample supply of patience on the part of the American people, [the current strategy] would work. However, the president now knows that there's not an ample supply of patience on the part of the American people…. So he has to change the dynamic…. Does he do it by reducing troops and withdrawing, or does he change the mix in a different way?"

If Bush does propose a surge, that will amount to his rejection of two options proposed in recent weeks. Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, opposed an increase in U.S. troops and called for a quicker transfer of responsibility to Iraqi forces. He is to retire in March.

A commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) called for a strategy similar to Abizaid's and added that most U.S. combat forces should be withdrawn from Iraq by early 2008. Bush has privately dismissed its recommendations as useless.

Aides said that if Bush opted for a surge of troops, it should not surprise anyone who paid attention to his public statements about Iraq.

"Victory in Iraq is achievable," the president told reporters two weeks ago. "It hasn't happened nearly as quickly as I hoped…. A lot of Americans understand the consequences of retreat. Retreat would embolden radicals. It would hurt the credibility of the United States."

In October, Bush told a group of conservative columnists he believed that the public would support the war as long as it thought success was possible.

DOJ_NMG_0113525

"People want to know, Can you win? They're with us if we can win," he said. "I'm from Texas. My buddies are saying, 'Are you doing enough?' not 'Are you doing too little?' They want to know, this mighty country … are we doing what it takes to win?"

Duke University public opinion scholar Christopher Gelpi, who has advised the Bush White House, said the administration faced an uphill battle.

"I think the public will be very unhappy with a surge proposal in the short term," he said. "Pressure for withdrawal was increasing before the election, and it's gotten even higher since the election. The Bush administration is unlikely to turn that around in the short term.

"If the White House is trying to say the election of 2006 was not a repudiation of the president's Iraq policy, that's not right," Gelpi added. "The election was a repudiation."

Still, he said, if a surge in troops succeeds in improving conditions in Iraq, public support for the war will probably increase. "If it works, the public will come around," Gelpi said. "I think he is pushing for a surge because he is willing to ride out public dissatisfaction in the short term, in hopes that he can improve the situation on the ground in Iraq and succeed in the long term…. In that sense, it's understandable."

But time may be short, Gelpi warned. "The quicker and sharper they can show some effect, the less the cost in U.S. lives is likely to matter," he said. "If it takes a year to show results, that's a real problem."

A Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll conducted in December found that 52% of Americans favored a fixed timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq, 26% supported keeping troops in Iraq as long as necessary and 12% favored sending more troops. That survey did not ask about immediate withdrawal, but a CNN poll in December showed 21% favored such a plan.

Lawmakers from both parties — Democrats emboldened to oppose the war and the GOP worried about its 2008 electoral prospects — expressed skepticism about Bush's plans last week.

"No matter what [Bush] does, he'll get chewed on," said an aide to GOP congressional leadership, speaking on condition of anonymity. "If he calls for a surge, he'll get chewed on. If he doesn't, he'll get chewed on."

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana, a moderate Democrat who was one of 15 senators who met with Bush on Friday to share their concerns, said: "The president has … the burden of proof to give specific reasons and clear direction if, in fact, he's going to call for a troop surge. What that surge would do, how big it would be, how long the troops would stay, what cities, what neighborhoods, what his specific mission was — I think the American people's patience is wearing thin with vagueness."

Several Republicans, including Sens. Richard G. Lugar of Indiana and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, have also expressed reservations about a surge plan.

As many as 10 of the Senate's 49 Republicans are either against or skeptical about the idea of a surge, the congressional aide said. "It would take a lot of specifics and a shorter-than-two-years time frame to bring them on board," the aide said.

In remarks last week, Bush suggested he would try to provide the details — although aides said he still rejected the idea of a fixed timetable. "One thing is for certain: I will want to make sure that the mission is clear and specific and can be accomplished," Bush said in a question-and-answer session with reporters.

Though most senators at Friday's White House meeting said they opposed any troop increase, they also suggested they were at least partially open to persuasion — even the Democrats.

"I would say that they were all opposed to it unless he comes up with some spectacular idea and a way to measure that idea," said Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark). "They weren't unequivocally against it, but most would say … the burden of proof was on the president."

Probable Troop Surge In Iraq Raises Questions About Mission, Numbers (GAN)

By John Yaukey

Gannett, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — The new plan for Iraq President Bush will unveil within days probably includes increasing U.S. troops there as part of a strategy to save Baghdad, which has sparked intense debate even among advocates who differ on how many troops to send and for how long.

Signs point to Bush sending between 15,000 and 30,000 more troops on top of the 140,000 already in Iraq.

The Pentagon has raised the number of troops to almost 160,00 before — about the level it would be if Bush sent an additional 20,000.

The question now is what would the troops do given the grim new realities of sectarian division and civil war in Iraq, and is it worth it to risk more American lives?

Some leading advocates of a surge argue the situation in Iraq is too dire for anything short of a major increase of 30,000 or more troops for as long as it takes to at least stabilize the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0113526

"It must be substantial and it must be sustained," presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said after a fact-finding tour through the Middle East. "(It) will mean more casualties and more hardships. ... We have to be prepared for this."

Leading Democrats believe a troop surge is misguided at best and have vowed to fight it if it's not tied to future troop reductions. They argue the problems in Iraq can only be solved politically.

"Adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point for no strategic gain," Democratic leaders wrote in a letter to Bush on Friday.

Despite the broad range of opinion on a troop increase, many different voices in the debate agree that if more forces are sent, they must be part of an explicit mission that addresses a series of critical issues:

The troops

The Army and Marines are already stretched, raising questions about where to get the troops.

Increasing the number of troops by 20,000 for several months is possible without calling up any Guard or Reserve units. Military analysts say it probably would by done in part by delaying the departure of two Marine regiments and speeding up Army deployments scheduled for spring.

A prolonged surge into 2008, experts say, could require tapping Guard and Reserve units, which provided close to half the U.S. force in Iraq in 2005.

And would the Iraqis do their part?

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki pledged to Bush on Thursday that he would commit three additional battalions to Baghdad, but his record of follow-through raises doubts.

In the ongoing failed effort to secure Baghdad that began last summer, dubbed Operation Together Forward, only two of six Iraqi battalions U.S. commanders requested showed up, according to Pentagon officials.

The mission

What would the mission be — more training of Iraqi troops, more fighting, or both — and how would success or failure be measured?

For the last year, the Pentagon has been stressing the training of Iraqi forces so they can lead the fight.

On the surface, this appears to be working. Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for the Multinational Force in Iraq, recently said 80% of Iraq's army divisions are now responsible for their own battle space compared with 10% last year.

And yet every death rate — for U.S. troops, Iraqi forces and civilians — has gone up.

If the new mission is to secure Baghdad, American troops are likely in for some tough urban combat.

Retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, former vice chief of staff for the U.S. Army and an advocate of an aggressive troop surge, said retaking the streets of Baghdad would inevitably entail "clearing neighborhoods ... and that's house by house."

The militias

Would U.S. troops be able to engage the mostly Shiite militias now running death squads in Baghdad? Should they?

Following a Thursday call between Bush and al-Maliki, White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "The prime minister stressed his determination to go after anybody responsible for violence — that would include not only insurgent groups and Saddam loyalists but also militias."

Who would do that? The mostly Shiite Iraqi forces that have allowed the death squads in Baghdad free run.

U.S. forces have twice openly confronted Shiite militias, once in combat and again with a network of roadblocks set up to look for a kidnapped Iraqi-American soldier. Both times they were ordered to stand down by Maliki, himself a Shiite.

The government

The purpose behind a troop surge in Baghdad presumably would be to provide Iraq's besieged government some breathing room to make difficult decisions.

This was tried two years ago.

A U.S. troop surge to 159,000 for Iraq's historic first elections in January 2005 had a temporary calming effect. But the new government's failure to get moving politically gave the insurgency an opening that led to a three-month spike in violence.

It raises the question: What would be the plan for U.S. troops now if the government remains paralyzed as it has been for months?

Or worse, the government crumbles as it nearly did recently when a block of Shiite lawmakers walked out in protest of a meeting between al-Maliki and Bush.

Bush has promised only that any new mission will be "clear and specific and can be accomplished."

Bush Eyes A Troop Surge (NSDY)

By Craig Gordon,

Long Island Newsday, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113527

But Bush is expected to announce a troop "surge" as early as Wednesday, even though some military experts and politicians from both parties say the results could be disastrous: a higher U.S. body count, call-ups of overstretched reserve units, and an American military pushed to the breaking point.

Plus, many fear, it probably won't work.

There is little reason to think a relative handful of troops could do what 140,000 U.S. troops have failed to achieve so far, especially in Baghdad, where 2006 was the deadliest year on record despite two previous military surges, these experts say.

"Breathing space"

Adding 20,000 more troops "is not a change in strategy. If Bush thinks that's a change, shame on him," said retired Army Col. Robert Killebrew, a respected former military planner. "It doesn't change the thrust of the war."

An administration source yesterday said the surge was a way to create "breathing space" for Iraqi security forces to grow strong enough to protect against sectarian and insurgent attacks, which U.S. officials had hoped they would start doing by now.

Instead, the plan would have U.S. forces move into Iraqi neighborhoods and protect the locals, the source said. That's dangerous duty that would put the troops in the line of fire and, critics say, merely continue Iraqi dependence on U.S. help.

In many ways, a surge would amount to a repudiation of the administration's current strategy, which has focused heavily on reducing U.S. presence in Iraq by pulling back from the fight and turning over more and more security duties to Iraqi forces.

Bush also has signaled that he will offer a massive economic and reconstruction aid package for Iraq, and propose an increase in funds that commanders on the ground can use for small local projects to build goodwill.

Even supporters of the plan paint it as essentially Bush's last stand: one final, high-stakes bid to salvage something approaching victory.

Now those supporters, including presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), fear Bush will back down in the face of opposition from Democratic leaders and some Republicans -- sending too few troops for too short a time to do any good.

"It has to be significant and sustained. Otherwise, do not do it," McCain said Friday. "Otherwise, there will be more needless loss of American lives."

How much is enough?

McCain and other supporters suggest that 20,000 to 30,000 troops are the minimum needed, and that they should stay 18 months to two years, a dramatic reversal of proposals last year that would have had troops coming home, not going in.

But supporters of a surge fear that Bush may consider as few as 10,000 troops for as little as six months, a more politically palatable approach.

The White House has been tight-lipped about Bush's thinking, but defense sources say he ultimately could tap as many as five brigades to reach a 20,000-troop increase. Another plan under consideration calls for an initial push of two or three Army brigades into Baghdad, around 10,000 troops, and two Marine battalions into the Sunni insurgent hotbed in Anbar province, about 1,500 troops, defense officials said.

Any surge would be accomplished by speeding up the arrival of Army brigades, extending their tours from 12 months to 15 months, and lengthening the tours of Marine units already in Iraq from seven months to 10 or 12 months, sources said.

But any such plan is full of potential pitfalls, experts say -- mainly, the Pentagon's difficulty sustaining any troop increase into late 2007 and 2008. Already some Army units alternate between one year in Iraq and a little more than a year at home -- not the two years between tours the Pentagon once promised.

"The issue isn't whether you can scare up 20,000 troops. The issue is, for how long?" said Loren Thompson, a military analyst with the conservative Lexington Institute think tank. "You just reach a point where the force barely can go home."

"No guarantee for success"

In a meeting with senators Friday, Bush pledged that any U.S. increase in Iraq would happen only if the Iraqi government stepped up its own efforts to rein in violence -- but the Iraqis have repeatedly failed to do their part.

During the most recent military push in Baghdad -- a plan Bush himself once heralded as a key step to improving security -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government provided only one-third of the troops it had promised, said one source familiar with the operation. This time, al-Maliki is pledging to send three Iraqi brigades to supplement additional U.S. forces.

Top Democratic leaders Friday urged Bush to abandon the notion of a surge. Even McCain, whose support for the idea seems like political poison for a man who wants to be president, is clear that it might not work.

A surge "will mean more casualties and extra hardships for our brave fighting men and women, and the violence may get worse before it gets better," McCain said. "We have to be prepared for this. ... Even if we send additional troops to Iraq in large numbers for a sustained period, there is no guarantee for success in Iraq."

Iraq Will Be Petraeus's Knot To Untie (WP)

By Rick Atkinson, Washington Post Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0113528

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

General Known to See Peace as Still Possible

Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who is President Bush's choice to become the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, posed a riddle during the initial march to Baghdad four years ago that now becomes his own conundrum to solve: "Tell me how this ends."

That query, uttered repeatedly to a reporter then embedded in Petraeus's 101st Airborne Division, revealed a flinty skepticism about prospects in Iraq -- and the man now asked to forestall a military debacle.

Long recognized as one of the Army's premier intellectuals, with a PhD from Princeton to complement his West Point education, Petraeus, 54, will inherit one of the toughest assignments handed any senior officer since the Vietnam War. He takes command of 132,000 U.S. troops in a country shattered by insurgency and sectarian bloodletting, with a home front that is divided and disheartened after 3,000 American combat deaths. If his riddle of 2003 remains apt, so does the headline on a Newsweek cover story about Petraeus in July 2004: "Can This Man Save Iraq?"

Skepticism is rife, inside and outside the Army. "Petraeus is being given a losing hand. I say that reluctantly. The war is unmistakably going in the wrong direction," retired Army Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey said in an interview yesterday. "The only good news in all this is that Petraeus is so incredibly intelligent and creative. . . . I'm sure he'll say to himself, 'I'm not going to be the last soldier off the roof of the embassy in the Green Zone.' "

Petraeus, if controversial among some peers who deem him arrogant or excessively ambitious, is seen by many others as perhaps the last, best hope for success in Iraq. "If anyone can pick up the baton and run with it, it is David Petraeus," said retired Gen. Gordon R. Sullivan, a former Army chief of staff.

After spending 2 1/2 of the past four years in Iraq, as a division commander and then as the officer overseeing the initial reconstruction of Iraqi security forces, Petraeus is known to believe that a stable, pacified Iraq is still possible -- if not probable -- but not without dramatically improved security. Having also served in Bosnia after the catastrophic civil war there, he has told friends that he sees troubling parallels between that country and Iraq. Two months ago, he said, "I actually stay awake occasionally at night trying to figure out the path ahead."

Upon Senate confirmation and the receipt of his fourth star, making him a full general, he is expected to spend some weeks assessing conditions in Iraq and drafting a strategic plan that goes beyond the current debate over whether to increase U.S. troop levels by up to five brigades, roughly 20,000 troops. That "surge" is consistent with the military's new counterinsurgency manual, much of which Petraeus wrote, which stresses protecting the indigenous population and imposing security as a condition for stability.

One of Petraeus's longtime Army patrons, now-retired Gen. Jack Keane, has advocated an even larger deployment this spring. But many strategists say such an increase is pointless without a sweeping economic reconstruction program and a robust rearmament of the Iraqi army with artillery, attack helicopters and other heavy weapons.

Many also say the additional forces to be used in any troop increase are already badly worn down by the military's intense operational tempo since the first deployments to Afghanistan in 2001. The new Democratic leadership in Congress on Friday pointedly rejected even a short-term escalation in U.S. forces in Iraq.

These problems and more confront Petraeus, who has told friends that he has no illusions about the complexity of the job at hand. Unaccustomed to failure, he is, in the words of one former aide, "the most competitive man on the planet." The son of a Dutch sea captain who took refuge in New York during World War II, Petraeus grew up in Cornwall on Hudson, a few miles outside the gates of the U.S. Military Academy, which he entered as a new cadet in July 1970.

"A striver to the max, Dave was always 'going for it' in sports, academics, leadership, and even his social life," the West Point yearbook noted in 1974. A month after graduation, he married Holly Knowlton, the daughter of the academy superintendent. They have two grown children.

As a young lieutenant, Petraeus entered an Army battered by defeat in Vietnam and badly frayed by drugs, lack of discipline and the American public's diminished esteem for the military. Accolades and achievements followed as he moved from post to post. Petraeus received all three prizes awarded in his class at Ranger School, perhaps the Army's toughest physical and psychological challenge, and he later won the George C. Marshall award as the top graduate in the Army Command and General Staff College class of 1983.

As he rose through the ranks, Petraeus alternated command and staff assignments with duty as an aide to several of the Army's most prominent four-star generals, a pattern that caused one envious peer to call him a "professional son." At Princeton University, Petraeus's dissertation, "The American Military and the Lessons of Vietnam," examined the caution that seized the high command after the war.

His intensity, cutting intellect and competitiveness have rubbed some officers the wrong way. Muttered jibes about "King David" have been heard around his command post. He remains obsessive about what he calls "the P.T. culture" -- physical training -- and has been known to challenge soldiers half his age to various athletic competitions. "If anyone beats him in the shorter runs, four miles or so, he takes them out for 10 miles and smokes them," a staff officer observed several years ago. At 5-foot-9 and 155 pounds, Petraeus evokes George Bernard Shaw's description of the British general Bernard L. Montgomery: "an intensely compacted hank of wire."

DOJ_NMG_0113529

Twice, accidents almost ended his career, or even his life. In 1991, as a battalion commander at Fort Campbell, Ky., he was shot in the chest with an M-16 rifle when a soldier tripped during a training exercise. Rushed into surgery at Vanderbilt University Medical Center in Nashville, he underwent five hours of surgery by Bill Frist, who a decade later became Senate majority leader. While skydiving in 2000, Petraeus survived the abrupt collapse of his parachute 60 feet up. His shattered pelvis was reassembled with a plate and long screws.

As commander of the 101st Airborne, Petraeus saw combat for the first time during the division's drive up the Euphrates Valley, with sharp firefights in Najaf, Karbala and Hilla. But it was during the division's subsequent occupation of Mosul and northern Iraq that he won widespread acclaim by resurrecting the local economy, restoring services and preserving order with strategic force, which included killing Saddam Hussein's two sons. Posters in the division bivouacs read: "What have you done to win Iraqi hearts and minds today?"

More than 60 soldiers from the 101st died during the deployment, and upon bringing the division back to Kentucky in February 2004, Petraeus remarked, "It's been a long, tough year, and I am older in more ways than just age."

His subsequent service as commander of the Multi-National Security Transition Command, responsible for training Iraqi security forces, was another long, tough year -- that stretched to 15 months. Tens of thousands of Iraqi soldiers and police were trained, with concomitant efforts to supply infrastructure, equipment and procedures. But the project at best remains an imperiled work in progress, with alarming signs of sectarian fractures spreading through the Iraqi security institutions that Petraeus is known to consider as crucial to restoring stability there as any additional coalition forces could be.

Both long stints in Iraq have given Petraeus an intimate knowledge of the country's ethnic fractures and the limits of American influence. "A certain degree of intellectual humility is a good thing," he once told a reporter. "There aren't always a hell of a lot of absolutely right answers out there."

His cordial relations with the media, and the Newsweek cover story that depicted him as a potential savior for the Bush administration, rankled some of his superiors in the Pentagon, according to two now-retired senior generals. When Petraeus was sent to command the U.S. Army Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., in 2005, some of his peers wondered whether his career was in eclipse.

In asking that nettlesome question four years ago -- "Tell me how this ends" -- Petraeus alluded to the advice supposedly given President Dwight D. Eisenhower in the mid-1950s when he asked what it would take for the U.S. military to save the beleaguered French colonial empire in war-torn Vietnam: "Eight years and eight divisions."

With only ten divisions now in the U.S. Army, and the American public's patience ebbing, Petraeus recently acknowledged that such a prescription is not likely to be any more acceptable today than it was in the 1950s.

Conrad C. Crane, a West Point classmate of Petraeus's who last year helped him write the new counterinsurgency manual, said: "There have been situations in our history where American generals were given tough problems to resolve, like Lincoln grabbing U.S. Grant in 1864. Those situations have all demanded steadfastness, fortitude, initiative and creativity. It will take all those traits in Baghdad.

"We've got a big problem," Crane added. "He's the right guy to fix it. If anybody can fix this, he can."

A Change Of Course: Pelosi And New Democratic Congress May Face Crucial Test Over Iraq (SFC)

By Marc Sandalow

San Francisco Chronicle, January 7, 2007

Washington -- President Bush and the new Congress are on a collision course over Iraq that could overshadow the Democrats' "100-hour agenda" and end up defining Rep. Nancy Pelosi's tenure as House speaker.

Even as the House takes steps this week to raise the minimum wage, expand stem cell research, strengthen homeland security and lower prescription drug prices -- an ambitious lineup -- much of the nation's focus will be on Bush, who is expected to deliver a major address to outline the future of American involvement in Iraq.

If the president, as expected, announces his intention to deploy as many as 20,000 additional U.S. troops in Iraq, he may encounter widespread political and public defiance.

It will quickly test the new Democratic majority's capacity to stand up to the commander in chief in a time of war, and the ability of the legislative branch to seize control of the White House's controversial foreign policy.

"This war needs to come to an end. It is my highest priority as speaker," Pelosi said Friday after less than 24 hours on the job. "The president is going to have to step back. Up until now, his judgment has been severely impaired on this war in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0113530

But the issue has been vexing to Congress, which has limited foreign policy options and has traditionally played a secondary role to the president. And Democrats are far more united in opposing Bush's war policy than in coalescing around an alternative.

It is with good reason that Iraq is not on Pelosi's 100-hour agenda -- legislation that she intends to have the House pass before the president delivers his State of the Union address later this month. Democrats are nearly unanimous in their support of the mostly domestic agenda, but they do not share a consensus on what to do next in Iraq, beyond a broad sense that the United States must begin to scale back.

"Democrats as a caucus have much more consensus around these economic issues," said Roger Hickey, co-director of the Campaign for America's Future, a liberal advocacy group, during an interview on the public radio program "Democracy Now."

Bush has been inviting lawmakers from both parties to the White House to discuss the future in Iraq. None has emerged with the impression that scaling back U.S. involvement is a leading option for the president. As Bush rattled off areas of potential agreement and bipartisan promise during his Saturday radio address, he did not mention Iraq.

Opposition to the war and Bush's approach in Iraq appeared to play a significant role in the Democrats' electoral success in November. Pelosi, as she assumed the speakership Thursday, declared that "nowhere were the American people more clear about the need for a new direction than in Iraq."

Sitting down with a small group of San Francisco journalists in her new office Friday, Pelosi bristled when a reporter said he wanted to change the subject from war to ethics.

"Wait a minute," Pelosi interrupted. "I believe the biggest ethical issue in this country is the war in Iraq. How we went there; how we put our troops out there without the equipment they needed; how, when they have given their all -- and they did their job very well -- they were abandoned in terms of political and diplomatic initiatives that are necessary to accompany a military effort."

As Pelosi's No. 1 priority, a change in the course of the war would be trumpeted as a great accomplishment. And while failure in Iraq might be blamed primarily on Bush and impair the GOP's ability to hold onto the White House in the 2008 election, it would also raise questions about whether Democrats were able to keep their pledge to usher in a new direction.

"The people have spoken. They expect change," said Rep. Barbara Lee, D-Oakland, one of the founders of the Out of Iraq caucus in the House.

For now, Democrats are counting on growing public opposition and congressional oversight to force that change.

Pelosi has held open the possibility of attaching conditions to the Pentagon's appropriation bill, which the House expects to receive in the next few weeks. And Democrats have scheduled at least five hearings on Iraq this week, three in the Senate and two in the House.

"Making policy openly, with transparency and accountability, will help," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Los Angeles, whose committee on government reform is expected to scrutinize Iraq contracts received by Halliburton and other private companies.

"They haven't been answering the tough questions," Waxman said, noting that Rep. Ike Skelton, the Missouri Democrat and new chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, never received a reply when he sent the White House a letter shortly after the start of the war asking about follow-through plans.

"Now you can be certain he will get an answer," Waxman said.

But Pelosi has ruled out using what many believe is the legislative branch's most potent weapon -- its ability to cut off the funds with which the Pentagon wages war. Congress took such an approach at the very end of the Vietnam War, though the United States had already committed to leaving.

A growing number of peace organizations, and a few members of Congress, have been promoting such a direction as the only way to force Bush to change course.

Pelosi said to cut the money supply could be dangerous to American troops in that the Pentagon could continue to wage war without the proper equipment.

"You have to face the ramifications of your decision. You can't just say, 'OK, let's cut if off, but I don't mean to hurt the troops,' " Pelosi said.

Bush has shown little sign that the November election will change his thinking on the almost 4-year-old war.

"I don't know if (voters) said, 'Come home and leave behind an Iraq that could end up being a safe haven for al Qaeda.' I don't believe they said that," the president said in a news conference the day after the vote.

In the buildup to Bush's speech -- which may come Wednesday, although a time and a place have yet to be announced -- White House press secretary Tony Snow has avoided answering questions about how the president could escalate a war after what appeared to be a rejection of his policy. Polls show about 3 of 4 Americans oppose the president's efforts in Iraq and fewer than 1 in 5 support a surge of troops.

DOJ_NMG_0113531

"What you're doing is, you're asking me, 'Is the president concerned about the public-opinion ramifications of a policy that he may or may not have chosen?' When the president chooses a policy, we can do the public polling questions. I think at this point it's preliminary," Snow said Friday.

But most observers foresee an intensified struggle between Bush and Congress.

"We can see a major clash coming between a Democratic Congress and the administration on this very, very fundamental issue," said Bruce Riedel, a former member of Bush's National Security Council and now a fellow at the Brookings Institution. "Not only do most Democrats on the Hill oppose the surge or have serious doubts about it, but more and more Republicans have doubts about the wisdom of the surge."

Even as the Democrats schedule votes on domestic issues for the rest of the month, Pelosi believes the new congressional scrutiny on Bush's Iraq policy will pressure lawmakers of both parties to join her demand for change.

"The opposition to the war and the call for change is coming from the American people," the speaker said.

"Nothing is more eloquent to a member of Congress than the voice of his or her constituents."

Sen. Lieberman Goes His Independent Way (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

He Calls for "Substantial" Troop Increase in Iraq

Standing under the grand dome of the Library of Congress on Friday, the three top Senate Democrats bitterly condemned sending more U.S. troops to Iraq, as President Bush is now considering.

"A bad idea," said Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.).

"A huge mistake," warned Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin (Ill.).

"Makes no sense whatsoever," fumed Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.).

Across town an hour earlier, at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, Connecticut Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman shared his own thoughts on Bush's plan. "We need an increase in troops there now," he asserted before an audience of military experts and academics. "It must be substantial, and it must be sustained."

Lieberman was sworn in last week as the chamber's one and only "independent Democrat," with the emphasis on "independent." On most issues, including big domestic priorities, he expects to vote as he has for the past 18 years, as a loyal Democrat. But on Iraq, Lieberman is more in sync with Bush than are many Republicans. He is a passionate defender of the war as a death struggle against Islamic terrorism.

The November election swept Republicans out of power in Congress and signaled that voters are deeply unhappy about the course of the Iraq war. The asterisk is Lieberman, who won a fourth term in an antiwar state with strong support from Republican and unaffiliated voters.

That has given Lieberman a mandate to be the man in the middle, an essential player to both parties while beholden to neither. Lately he has dropped the "Democrat" half of his affiliation, describing himself at the Friday event merely as an independent. He even holds out the possibility that he would back a supporter of the Iraq war, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), in the 2008 presidential race -- although his Connecticut colleague, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D), also may be running.

"I've had a very political two years, so I'm staying out of it for now," Lieberman demurred after his AEI address. "But you know, I'm independent, and I'm just going to watch it develop for a while. I'm going to support who's best for the country. But I wouldn't exclude the possibility" of endorsing McCain.

Bush is considering a temporary increase in U.S. force levels as he prepares to deliver a major speech on Iraq policy this week. Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) told the president in a letter Friday that they oppose the idea.

"There is no military solution in Iraq, only a political solution," Reid said. "Adding more combat troops to this civil war undermines our efforts to get the Iraqis to take responsibility for the future."

Lieberman got a hearty laugh at the AEI event when asked to comment on the Reid-Pelosi letter. "Speaking as an independent," he said with a smile, "needless to say, I respectfully disagree."

For Lieberman and McCain, the big worry is that Bush will order too small a troop increase to make a difference. "Unless you believe all is lost, we've got to do everything we can to win," Lieberman said.

Upon hearing of his colleague's comments, Durbin sighed and shook his head. "Joe Lieberman said that?" he asked.

Democrats grumble off the record that Lieberman is muddying an increasingly unified Democratic message on Iraq, but their public comments are cautious and generally complimentary. They pretended not to notice his brief appearance at the Library of Congress retreat, which overlapped with the AEI forum.

"It's important to hear a lot of views, which is quite different from what happens in the White House," Schumer said. Or, as Reid put it: "Joe Lieberman could so easily be with us, but he doesn't want to be. I respect that. He's a good man."

DOJ_NMG_0113532

On Dec. 29, during a quiet holiday week in Washington, Lieberman published an opinion piece in The Washington Post headlined, "Why We Need More Troops in Iraq." It recalled an earlier Lieberman op-ed, published in the Wall Street Journal on Nov. 29, 2005, headlined, "Our Troops Must Stay." That piece, which undercut a growing Democratic call for a withdrawal from Iraq, spurred antiwar candidate Ned Lamont to challenge Lieberman in last summer's Democratic primary. Lamont, a Greenwich millionaire and political neophyte, wound up winning the primary.

Lieberman's opposition to an Iraq withdrawal was not a radical position. It followed mainstream Republican thinking, and some Democrats shared the view. Sending more troops to Iraq is proving far more controversial. Two GOP senators who face potentially tough 2008 reelections, Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Susan Collins of Maine, have already said they oppose it. Other Republicans have expressed strong reservations.

One Lieberman trait that particularly rankles Democrats is his abiding loyalty to Bush. A few days after the Wall Street Journal published the senator's op-ed piece, Lieberman lectured at a foreign policy conference. "It is time for Democrats who distrust President Bush to acknowledge that he will be commander in chief for three more critical years," he said, "and that in matters of war we undermine presidential credibility at our nation's peril."

The senator was a bit more measured Friday, but his point was clear.

"The president of the United States gets this," Lieberman said. "I think he sees the moment that we are at in the larger war on terrorism and the significance of how we conclude the war in Iraq, how devastating it would be to the Iraqis, to the Middle East, to America if we simply withdrew. He needs our support."

A "Surge" In Iraq? (WP)

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

A troop increase that few in the Pentagon, Congress or the Iraqi government really want

PRESIDENT BUSH is widely expected to unveil a new strategy for Iraq this week that will include a substantial increase in U.S. troops. If he does, he will face a formidable task in convincing Congress and the public that such a "surge" makes sense. It's well known that many senior American generals, including the outgoing commanders of American forces in Iraq and the Middle East, have resisted a troop increase. The Iraqi government of Nouri al-Maliki appears, at best, lukewarm. Mr. Maliki's own plan, like that of the Iraq Study Group, calls for Iraqi forces to take over most of the fighting in the coming months. A majority of the new Congress, and most Americans, favor a winding down of the U.S. troop commitment, not an escalation.

Mr. Bush's first challenge if he proposes a surge will consequently be to convince the country that the fresh troops would have a vital and achievable mission. Those who have been arguing for the move -- notably, Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) -- say the purpose would be to pacify those sectors of Baghdad where sectarian fighting has been most intense. They argue that the main U.S. goal in Iraq, which is to forge a stable and sustainable government, can't be achieved unless there is a minimal level of security in the capital. The Iraqi army isn't yet able to impose order, they say; if the United States doesn't do it, the sectarian warfare will continue to escalate. Without a surge, Mr. McCain and Mr. Lieberman warn, the war will be lost.

This is a serious argument, and the two senators have been principled and even courageous in making it. But several questions give us pause. One is whether the administration and the Army will have the political and logistical capacity to carry out the sort of surge that the senators, and experts at the conservative American Enterprise Institute who support them, say is necessary: Total U.S. forces in Iraq would grow from fewer than 140,000 to as many as 175,000 and remain at that level indefinitely. Such a deployment would place severe new strains on the Army and probably require the alteration of Pentagon rules limiting the deployments of reservists. Some reports have said the administration is considering a more modest increase, both in numbers and in length of deployment. Mr. McCain says that would doom the strategy to failure.

There's no guarantee that the new American forces could stop the mayhem in Baghdad. But let's assume violence did plummet: The logic of the surge assumes that while U.S. soldiers ensured security, Iraq's Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish factions could be pressured into political accord. Yet given their recent behavior, it's hard to believe that the political leadership of any of Iraq's main factions is ready for compromise -- or will be during the limited window created by the surge. While Mr. Maliki occasionally speaks of accord, his government has pursued a sectarian agenda. If U.S. troops pacify Baghdad, Shiite politicians in the government may feel less rather than more pressure to compromise.

The constructive alternative to a surge is not the abandonment of Iraq. Instead, it is the fashioning of a strategy that positions the United States to support the country's moderate forces over the long term -- not just 18 months but the years that may pass before the country can be stabilized. That means a smaller and sustainable military force that can focus on training and backing up the Iraqi army and fighting al-Qaeda, and an aid program that supports the elected government while seeking to marginalize its extremist elements.

DOJ_NMG_0113533

The Iraq Study Group, the Maliki government and outgoing U.S. military commanders seemed to converge on this approach. Should he embrace it, President Bush would have a good chance of achieving a broad consensus on Iraq policy, something that is desperately needed if U.S. involvement -- and the painful loss of American lives -- is going to continue. If he chooses escalation, Mr. Bush will have to work a lot harder than he has before to explain the mission that justifies the risk and to build support in Congress and with the public.

The Timely Death Of Gerald Ford (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

THE very strange and very long Gerald Ford funeral marathon was about many things, but Gerald Ford wasn't always paramount among them.

Forty percent of today's American population was not alive during the Ford presidency. The remaining 60 percent probably spent less time recollecting his unelected 29-month term than they did James Brown's "Papa's Got a Brand New Bag." Despite the lachrymose logorrhea of television anchors and the somber musical fanfares, the country was less likely to be found in deep mourning than in deep football. It's a safe bet that the Ford funeral attracted far fewer viewers than the most consequential death video of the New Year's weekend, the lynching of Saddam Hussein. But those two deaths were inextricably related: it was in tandem that they created a funereal mood that left us mourning for our own historical moment more than for Mr. Ford.

What the Ford obsequies were most about was the Beltway establishment's grim verdict on George W. Bush and his war in Iraq. Every Ford attribute, big and small, was trotted out by Washington eulogists with a wink, as an implicit rebuke of the White House's current occupant. Mr. Ford was a healer, not a partisan divider. He was an all-American football star, not a cheerleader. He didn't fritter away time on pranks at his college fraternity, Delta Kappa Epsilon, because he had to work his way through school as a dishwasher. He was in the top third of his class at Yale Law. He fought his way into dangerous combat service during World War II rather than accept his cushy original posting. He was pals with reporters and Democrats. He encouraged dissent in his inner circle. He had no enemies, no ego, no agenda, no ideology, no concern for his image. He described himself as "a Ford, not a Lincoln," rather than likening himself to, say, Truman.

Under the guise of not speaking ill of a dead president, the bevy of bloviators so relentlessly trashed the living incumbent that it bordered on farce. No wonder President Bush, who once hustled from Crawford to Washington to sign a bill interfering in Terri Schiavo's medical treatment, remained at his ranch last weekend rather than join Betty Ford and Dick Cheney for the state ceremony in the Capitol rotunda.

Yet for all the media acreage bestowed on the funeral, the day in Mr. Ford's presidency that most stalks Mr. Bush was given surprisingly short shrift — perhaps because it was the most painful. That day was not Sept. 8, 1974, when Mr. Ford pardoned his predecessor, but April 30, 1975, when the last American helicopters hightailed it out of Saigon, ending our involvement in a catastrophic war. Mr. Ford had been a consistent Vietnam hawk, but upon inheriting the final throes of the fiasco, he recognized reality when he saw it.

Just how much so can be found in a prescient speech that Mr. Ford gave a week before our clamorous Saigon exit. (And a speech prescient on other fronts, too: he called making "America independent of foreign energy sources by 1985" an urgent priority.) Speaking at Tulane University, Mr. Ford said, "America can regain the sense of pride that existed before Vietnam" but not "by refighting a war that is finished as far as America is concerned." He added: "We, of course, are saddened indeed by the events in Indochina. But these events, tragic as they are, portend neither the end of the world nor of America's leadership in the world."

All of this proved correct, and though Mr. Ford made a doomed last-ditch effort to secure more financial aid for Saigon, he could and did do nothing to stop the inevitable. He knew it was way too late to make the symbolic gesture of trying to toss fresh American troops on the pyre. "We can and we should help others to help themselves," he said in New Orleans. "But the fate of responsible men and women everywhere, in the final decision, rests in their own hands, not in ours."

Though Mr. Ford was hardly the unalloyed saint of last week's pageantry, his words and actions in 1975 should weigh heavily upon us even as our current president remains oblivious. As Mr. Ford's presidential history is hard to separate from the Bush inversion of it, so it is difficult to separate that indelible melee in Saigon from the Hussein video. Both are terrifying, and for the same reason.

The awful power of the Hussein snuff film derives not just from its illustration of the barbarity of capital punishment, even in a case where the condemned is a mass murderer undeserving of pity. What really makes the video terrifying is its glimpse into the abyss of an irreversible and lethal breakdown in civic order. It sends the same message as those images of helicopters fleeing our embassy in April 1975: Iraq, like Vietnam before it, is in chaos, beyond the control of our government or the regime we're desperately trying to prop up. The security apparatus of Iraq's "unity government" was powerless to prevent the video, let alone the chaos, and can't even get its story straight about what happened and why.

DOJ_NMG_0113534

Actually, it's even worse than that. Perhaps the video's most chilling notes are the chants of "Moktada! Moktada! Moktada!" They are further confirmation, as if any were needed, that our principal achievement in Iraq over four years has been to empower a jihadist mini-Saddam in place of the secular original. The radical cleric Moktada al-Sadr, an ally of Hezbollah and Hamas, is a thug responsible for the deaths of untold Iraqis and Americans alike. It was his forces, to take just one representative example, that killed Cindy Sheehan's son, among many others, in one of two Shiite uprisings in 2004.

The day after Casey Sheehan's slaughter, Dan Senor, the spokesman for the American occupation, presided over a Green Zone news conference promising Mr. Sadr's woefully belated arrest on a months-old warrant for his likely role in the earlier assassination of Abdel Majid al-Khoei, a rival Shiite who had fiercely opposed Saddam. Today Mr. Sadr and his forces control 30 seats in the Iraqi Parliament, four government ministries, and death squads (a k a militias) more powerful than the nominal Iraqi army. He is the puppetmaster who really controls Nuri al-Maliki — the Iraqi prime minister embraced by Mr. Bush — even to the point of inducing Mr. Maliki to shut down a search for an American soldier kidnapped at gunpoint in Sadr City in the fall. (And, you might ask, whatever happened to Mr. Senor? He's a Fox News talking head calling for a "surge" of American troops to clean up the botch he and his cohort left behind.) Only Joseph Heller could find the gallows humor in a moral disaster of these proportions.

It's against the backdrop of both the Hussein video and the Ford presidency that we must examine the prospect of that much-previewed "surge" in Iraq — a surge, by the way, that the press should start calling by its rightful name, escalation. As Mr. Ford had it, America cannot regain its pride by refighting a war that is finished as far as America is concerned and, for that matter, as far as Iraq is concerned. By large margins, the citizens of both countries want us not to escalate but to start disengaging. So do America's top military commanders, who are now being cast aside just as Gen. Eric Shinseki was when he dared assert before the invasion that securing Iraq would require several hundred thousand troops.

It would still take that many troops, not the 20,000 we might scrape together now. Last month the Army and Marines issued an updated field manual on counterinsurgency (PDF) supervised by none other than Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, the next top American military commander in Iraq. It endorsed the formula that "20 counterinsurgents per 1,000 residents" is "the minimum troop density required." By that yardstick, it would take the addition of 100,000-plus troops to secure Baghdad alone.

The "surge," then, is a sham. It is not meant to achieve that undefined "victory" Mr. Bush keeps talking about but to serve his own political spin. His real mission is to float the "we're not winning, we're not losing" status quo until Jan. 20, 2009. After that, as Joseph Biden put it last week, a new president will "be the guy landing helicopters inside the Green Zone, taking people off the roof." This is nothing but a replay of the cynical Nixon-Kissinger "decent interval" exit strategy concocted to pass the political buck (to Mr. Ford, as it happened) on Vietnam.

As the White House tries to sell this flimflam, picture fresh American troops being tossed into Baghdad's caldron to work alongside the Maliki-Sadr Shiite lynch mob that presided over the Saddam hanging. Contemplate as well Gerald Ford's most famous words, spoken as he assumed the presidency after the Nixon resignation: "Our Constitution works; our great republic is a government of laws and not of men. Here the people rule."

This time the people do not rule. Two months after Americans spoke decisively on Election Day, the president is determined to overrule them. Our long national nightmare in Iraq, far from being over, is about to get a second wind.

Making The Surge Work (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

Picture the person you love most in the world. Now imagine that person shredded by a bomb or dropped off one morning in the gutter with holes drilled through the back of the head. Imagine your lifelong rage, and the terror of not knowing who will die next. Now imagine this has happened to someone in nearly every family on your block, and on the next block, and in the whole town.

This is Iraqi society.

And yet Gen. George Casey and Gen. John Abizaid wanted to put the burden of nation-building on the victims and initiators of this maelstrom. U.S. war strategy for the past three years has been to lighten the American footprint in Iraq and compel Iraqis to undertake the policing tasks we ourselves couldn't accomplish.

Over this time a chorus has arisen to oppose this strategy. The members of this chorus — John McCain, The Weekly Standard, whispering dissenters in the middling rankings of the military — argue that it's simply unrealistic to expect human beings in these circumstances to become impartial nation-builders. These dissenters have argued, since the summer of 2003, that the U.S. must commit more troops to establish security before anything else becomes possible.

DOJ_NMG_0113535

For over three years, President Bush sided with the light-footprint school. He did so for personal reasons, not military ones. Casey and Abizaid are impressive men, and Bush deferred to their judgment.

But sometimes good men make bad choices, and it is now clear that the light-footprint approach has been a disaster. If the U.S. had committed more troops and established security back in 2003, when, as Fareed Zakaria of Newsweek recently reminded us, the Coalition Provisional Authority had 70 percent approval ratings, history would be different.

It is now 2007, and President Bush has finally replaced Donald Rumsfeld, Casey and Abizaid. The question now is whether the policy that should have been implemented in 2003 can still be implemented four years on — after so many thousands have died.

Many in and out of the administration think so, hence all the talk about a surge — putting 20,000 more troops into Baghdad, finally occupying the dangerous neighborhoods, finally starting a jobs program, finally forcing national reconciliation.

Unfortunately, if the goal is to create a stable, unified Iraq, the surge is a good policy three years too late. For that surge to succeed now, it would have to accomplish the following tasks: compel the Maliki government to deliver public services in a nonsectarian way; convert the Shiite theocrats who now dominate the Iraqi government into ecumenical multiculturalists; persuade the rabid Sunni leaders to accept a dependent role in the new Iraq; induce the traumatized Iraqi people to hang together as the blood flows; sustain, over 18 months, American political support for an arduous policy that begins with a 17 percent approval rating.

The odds that the surge can accomplish these tasks are vanishingly small. The tragic truth is that the social context for this military strategy has changed since 2003.

But another surge may be realistic. This surge would begin by giving up the dream of national reconciliation and acknowledging that Iraq is in the process of dividing itself.

As the best reporting from Baghdad makes clear, today's Iraqi leaders have little interest in healing the Sunni-Shiite divide. People are retreating to their sectarian homelands by the tens of thousands. In an ever-radicalizing climate, the Sadrs are supplanting the Sistanis, and genocidal Sunni leaders are replacing the merely racist ones.

Perhaps, in other words, it's time to merge the military Plan B — the surge — with a political Plan B — flexible decentralization. That would mean using adequate force levels (finally!) to help those who are returning to sectarian homelands. It would mean erecting buffers between populations where possible and establishing order in areas that remain mixed. It would mean finding decentralized governing structures that reflect the social and psychological facts on the ground.

The record shows that in sufficient numbers and with sufficient staying power, U.S. troops can suppress violence. Perhaps more U.S. troops can create a climate in which decentralized arrangements can evolve.

We can't turn back time. But if the disintegration of Iraqi society would be a political and humanitarian disaster, perhaps we should finally commit military resources, and create a political strategy, commensurate with the task of salvaging something.

Clarity On Iraq, And Beyond (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

President Bush's choices on Iraq come down to two: clarity, or continued confusion of goals, methods and priorities. His impending address to the nation will reveal which choice he has made. It will also mold his foreign policy agenda for the gathering twilight of his presidency.

Bush will signal whether Iraq will remain the center of his grand designs for the Middle East or will recede to being one more troublesome conflict in a zone of deadly turbulence and trade-offs. Events, and one key aide, point Bush toward the latter course, with its promise of salvaging his legacy elsewhere.

The aide is Condoleezza Rice, who has developed a personal exit strategy for Iraq. She is tossing that reputation-damaging hot potato to John Negroponte, a former ambassador to Baghdad who is resigning as director of national intelligence to become Rice's deputy at the State Department.

His arrival will allow Rice to continue her minimalist personal engagement with Iraq. She will focus her considerable management skills instead on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. A day or so after the president's midweek speech, she will embark on a high-profile Middle Eastern trip dedicated to reviving the two-state solution Bush has endorsed.

Negroponte's move -- which may enhance the influence of new Defense Secretary Robert Gates, given his own intelligence background -- is a key element in the changes of military commanders and diplomats that have been unveiled to frame Bush's speech. But the president must not confuse the administration's organization chart with a blueprint for a way out of Iraq. Only clarity of purpose will lead to that outcome.

Here is a four-point program that Bush could adopt to clarify and bolster U.S. purposes, especially if he is going to "surge" more troops into the Iraq theater, as is widely anticipated:

DOJ_NMG_0113536

Â· Bush should acknowledge that his hopes for establishing Iraq as a united, free-market democratic model for the Arab world have fallen far short. Iraqis have chosen a more violent, sectarian and decentralized national reality that they must now stabilize or destroy on their own.

The best way to dramatize that shift would be to call a one-month halt to U.S. offensive actions -- a truce, in effect -- and encourage Iraqis to do the same. This would facilitate the holding of a peace conference in Baghdad, in which blood-stained radicals such as Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr and Hadith al-Dari, the inflammatory voice of Sunni insurgents, would be asked to participate.

Â· Bush's speech should recognize that Iran has legitimate interests in security in Iraq and the Persian Gulf region, and he should pledge that the United States will not use Iraq as a springboard for action against the Iranian regime.

These implicit security guarantees -- if met by a proper response from Iran -- could be the basis for a broad U.S.-Iranian dialogue and an eventual regional conference to endorse and implement the work of the Baghdad conference.

Â· The United States should also be prepared to extend guarantees of territorial security for Arab states in the Gulf region. Bush should announce that he wants consultations with Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Egypt, Jordan and other Arab states -- as well as principal U.S. allies in Europe -- on extending a U.S. or NATO nuclear umbrella over friendly states in the Gulf.

This would be a direct defensive response to Iran's destructive drive for a nuclear program that can produce atomic weapons. U.S. guarantees would enable Arab states to forgo developing their own nuclear arsenals, just as the U.S.-Japan bilateral security treaty is intended to keep Japan nuclear-free.

Â· As the first president to have explicitly endorsed a Palestinian state, Bush should use Rice's new burst of Middle East activism to reinforce the changes in Iraq strategy his speech will disclose. U.S. officials hope Rice can get Israel to release 450 Palestinian prisoners soon as a first step toward Hamas giving up the kidnapped Israeli soldier it holds.

But this heavy new U.S. involvement in the peace process must be included, along with the nuclear guarantees and the Baghdad conference, in a binding U.S. offer to the region's Sunni rulers in return for their cooperation in calming Iraq now. Bush must show the Saudis, Jordanians and others that they have much to gain from cooperation and much to lose from continuing to tolerate or encourage the catalytic Sunni-initiated violence that is destroying Iraq and increasing Iran's influence.

There are many challenges to overcome in constructing this Grand Bargain. But proposing and pursuing it gives Bush his best opportunity to explain to Americans and the rest of the world the complicated and dangerous new realities that his policies have helped create. Desperate times demand desperate measures, and desperate speeches.

jimhoagland@washpost.com

30 Dead In Baghdad Clash; Bodies Hanged On Lampposts (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 6 — A fierce clash left at least 30 people dead in central Baghdad late Saturday night as Iraqi Army forces fought with gunmen in an area where several residents had been killed and their bodies hanged from street lampposts, the Iraqi military said.

The fighting took place in the neighborhood around Haifa Street, a mostly Sunni Arab enclave with a small Shiite population.

A spokesman for the Defense Ministry, Muhammad al-Askari, said that an Iraqi Army unit had gone into the area after receiving reports that Sunni fighters had set up a fake security checkpoint and were taking Shiites aside and shooting them.

The bodies of many of those killed at the roadblock were then hanged from the lampposts, Mr. Askari said.

He said that Iraqi soldiers had moved in and surrounded the fighters at the checkpoint. In initial fighting there, 30 of the men were killed and several more were arrested, Mr. Askari said, adding that the neighborhood remained locked down. There was no way to verify the figures.

Residents living nearby said that they were hearing continued fighting through the night but that it was impossible to know precisely what was happening.

In the same neighborhood, there were reports of clashes as government forces moved to collect 27 bodies dumped behind a local hospital. But it was unclear whether the firefight with Iraqi troops was related.

The government said Saturday that 72 bodies were recovered around the city on Saturday, most showing signs of torture.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki announced Saturday the beginning of a new Baghdad security operation and promised to purge the government security forces of militia fighters and others with sectarian aims.

But Mr. Maliki has promised such a crackdown before, and his government has been increasingly seen by Sunnis in Iraq and abroad as dominated by Shiite interests.

DOJ_NMG_0113537

Iraqi Leader Plans Security Push (WP)

By Joshua Partlow, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Premier Promises Nonsectarian Campaign Against "Outlaws" in Baghdad

BAGHDAD, Jan. 6 -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki warned Baghdad residents Saturday to expect the disruptions of a heightened military presence and said his government was ready to launch the latest effort to pacify the violent Iraqi capital.

As if to punctuate the announcement, the Iraqi army clashed with insurgents in a Sunni Arab neighborhood on the west bank of the Tigris River in Baghdad. The fighting along Haifa Street, raging into the night, killed 30 insurgents, and Iraqi soldiers captured eight others, including five Sudanese fighters, Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari said.

Despite fierce ongoing fighting in western Iraq and violence capable of erupting almost anywhere, Baghdad remains the heart of the country's sectarian conflict. Maliki, in his speech at a morning ceremony honoring the Iraqi army, warned rival political parties against interfering in his plan, which Askari said would start "very soon."

"The Baghdad security plan will not offer a safe shelter for outlaws, regardless of their ethnic and political affiliations, and we will punish anyone who hesitates to implement orders because of his ethnic and political background," Maliki said.

Maliki's words appeared intended to counter the perception that the plan would focus on combating Sunni insurgents. An aide to Maliki, Hasan Suneid, a Shiite Muslim lawmaker, told the Associated Press that the Iraqi army would devote 20,000 additional troops to the capital and begin by combating Sunni insurgents in western Baghdad.

Askari said there would "definitely be more troops" but declined to provide a figure.

Maliki's speech provided few details about the tactical or strategic changes guiding the forthcoming effort. But his aides described an effort that relies on U.S. troops to combat Sunni insurgents on the outskirts of Baghdad. Those areas are where the Sunni insurgents plan and manufacture the deadly explosives that detonate regularly in the city.

"Maliki believes that it is in this ring that the attacks are coming from," one of his aides said.

The Iraqi forces would target the most violent neighborhoods, and commanders would have a greater degree of autonomy in their assigned sections of the city, Askari said.

Maliki believes that if the additional troops can effect a decrease in violence over the next two months, then he can negotiate more effectively with Shiite militia leaders in the city and improve his chances of disarming them, his aides said.

The announcement was greeted with little enthusiasm in Baghdad, where sectarian killing has escalated despite repeated attempts at cracking down on insurgents and militiamen. During Operation Together Forward, an effort to secure the capital last summer, more than 10,000 additional U.S. and Iraqi soldiers failed to halt the worsening violence.

Wamid Nadhmi, a political analyst in Baghdad, said Maliki had promised several times to restore security in Baghdad and was now offering "a new plan, without explaining why the other plans were complete failures."

Alaa Makki, a leading Sunni lawmaker, said that in principle, he wants American troops pulled out of Iraq, but not during this "urgent emergency situation."

Without an effective Iraqi military, "we'll be left with a serious security vacuum and will be lost. It will be filled with forces that are already operating here," he said. "This is a necessary action now, and that's because really the previous plan failed to achieve success."

During the last Baghdad security plan, the Iraqi government pledged more troops than it provided. The number of new troops now being discussed, in the low tens of thousands, will probably not be able to "fundamentally change" the violent neighborhoods in Baghdad, said Anthony H. Cordesman, a military expert.

"You can win every tactical clash, but we couldn't be there in enough numbers" to create stability and foster economic development, said Cordesman, an analyst for the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "At some point, you've got to leave and go on to the next place."

A joint statement by the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, and Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said that coalition troops "will provide appropriate assistance as determined by Iraqi and coalition field commanders, for the implementation of the new plan for securing Baghdad and its surrounding environs."

Violence flared Saturday after a relative lull last week during the Muslim holiday Eid al-Adha. Nearly 100 corpses were collected Saturday across the country, in addition to the fighting on Haifa Street, the Associated Press reported.

In the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karrada, a car bomb attack targeted the convoy of the commander of the Baghdad emergency police force, Ali al-Yassiri, said Col. Hassan Abdullah, an Interior Ministry duty officer. The explosion missed the police commander but killed two civilians and wounded three others.

The fighting on Haifa Street was not the start of Baghdad's security plan, said Askari, the Defense Ministry spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0113538

"It's not part of the Baghdad security plan. They were terrorists who set up imaginary checkpoints," he said. "We were there, and we arrested them and the clashes took place."

Offensive To Pacify Baghdad Begins (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

BAGHDAD -- In the opening battle of a major drive to tame the violent capital, the Iraqi army reported it killed 30 militants yesterday in a firefight in a Sunni insurgent stronghold just north of the heavily fortified Green Zone.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, speaking only hours earlier at a ceremony marking the 85th anniversary of the Iraqi army, announced his intention for the open-ended attempt to crush the militant fighters who have left Baghdad in the grip of sectarian violence.

Hassan al-Suneid, a key aide and member of Mr. al-Maliki's Dawa Party, said the Iraqi leader had committed 20,000 soldiers to the operation and would call upon American troops and air power only when needed.

A stern Mr. al-Maliki told the nation the operation in Baghdad would continue "until all goals are achieved and security is ensured for all citizens."

"We are fully aware that implementing the plan will lead to some harassment for all beloved Baghdad residents, but we are confident they fully understand the brutal terrorist assault we all face," he said.

State television said eight militants, including five Sudanese fighters, were captured in the battle near Haifa Street, a Sunni insurgent stronghold on the west bank of the Tigris River, where police reported finding the bodies of 27 torture victims earlier in the day.

Police reported 97 persons were killed or found dead, 80 of them assassination victims dumped in Mosul, Baghdad and south of the capital.

Mr. al-Suneid, who is also a member of parliament, said the new drive would focus initially on Sunni insurgent strongholds in western Baghdad.

Sunnis were likely to object, given that a large measure of today's violence in Baghdad is the work of Shi'ite militias, loyal to Mr. al-Maliki's key political backer, the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Mr. al-Suneid and Mr. al-Maliki insisted that this drive to contain militants, as opposed to a largely ineffective joint operation with American forces in the second half of last year, would succeed because it would be in the hands of Iraqi commanders who have been promised American backup and air power if they call for it.

But U.S. political and military leaders -- in a message of congratulation on Iraq's Army Day -- tempered Iraqi claims of full independence.

"As stated by the prime minister today, [U.S. forces] will provide appropriate assistance as determined by Iraqi and [American] field commanders, for the implementation of the new plan for securing Baghdad and its surrounding environs," said the statement from U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and overall American commander Gen. George W. Casey.

Mr. al-Suneid said President Bush signed off on the plan when he and Mr. al-Maliki spoke by videoconference Thursday. The two leaders began formulating the operation during a November summit in Amman, Jordan.

Last summer, the U.S. military and Iraqi army flooded the capital with 12,000 additional troops.

The last half of 2006 was one of the most violent periods in the center and west of the country since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion to topple dictator Saddam Hussein.

Iraqi Army Says It Killed 30 Militants (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

BAGHDAD (AP) — In the opening battle of a major drive to tame the violent capital, the Iraqi army reported it killed 30 militants Saturday in a firefight in a Sunni insurgent stronghold just north of the heavily fortified Green Zone.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, speaking only hours earlier at a ceremony marking the 85th anniversary of the Iraqi army, announced his intention for the open-ended attempt to crush the militant fighters who have left Baghdad in the grip of sectarian violence.

Hassan al-Suneid, a key aide and member of Maliki's Dawa Party, said the Iraqi leader had committed 20,000 soldiers to the operation and would call upon American troops and airpower only when needed.

A stern Maliki told the nation the operation in Baghdad would continue "until all goals are achieved and security is ensured for all citizens.

"We are fully aware that implementing the plan will lead to some harassment for all beloved Baghdad residents, but we are confident they fully understand the brutal terrorist assault we all face," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0113539

State television said eight militants, including five Sudanese fighters, were captured in the battle near Haifa Street, a Sunni insurgent stronghold on the west bank of the Tigris where police reported finding the bodies of 27 torture victims earlier in the day.

Suneid, who is also a member of parliament, said the new drive would focus initially on Sunni insurgent strongholds in western Baghdad.

Sunnis were likely to object, given that a large measure of today's violence in Baghdad is the work of Shiite militias, loyal to Maliki's key political backer, the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

An Iraqi army general said commanders would operate independently, a sharp break with Iraqi military tradition of heavy central control, and would be held individually responsible for failure.

Any civilians carrying arms faced automatic detention, he said, and would be shot if they resisted, the general said on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information.

Suneid and Maliki insisted that this drive to contain militants, as opposed to a largely ineffective joint operation with the Americans in the second half of 2006, would succeed because it would be in the hands of Iraqi commanders who have been promised American backup and airpower if they call for it.

But U.S. political and military officials — in a message of congratulation on Iraq's Army Day — tempered Iraqi claims of full independence.

"As stated by the prime minister today, MNF-I (U.S. forces) will provide appropriate assistance as determined by Iraqi and coalition (American) field commanders, for the implementation of the new plan for securing Baghdad and its surrounding environs," said the statement from U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and overall American commander Gen. George Casey.

Suneid said President Bush signed off on the plan when he and Maliki spoke by video conference Thursday. The two leaders began formulating the operation during a November summit in Amman, Jordan.

Bush was widely reported to be planning to send at least 9,000 additional American forces to the capital from outside Iraq as part of his long-awaited strategy revisions in the fourth year of a war in which more than 3,000 American troops and tens of thousands of Iraqi's have died.

Last summer the U.S. military and Iraqi army flooded the capital with 12,000 additional troops, but by October, the U.S. military spokesman said the operation had not met expectations and the situation was disheartening.

The last half of 2006 was one of the most violent periods in the center and west of the country since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion to topple Saddam Hussein. The U.S. death toll in the capital spiked with the presence of extra American troops on the street during Operation Together Forward II, which has been supplanted by the new Iraqi-dominated drive to cleanse the capital of militant fighters.

In the earlier drive, the Iraqi army failed to send much of the promised troop strength, making it impossible to secure neighborhoods after American forces cleared them of insurgent and militia fighters.

The Iraqi army general said Iraqi forces, while nominally operating independently, would rely heavily on American support.

Bush hopes to prove that the Iraqi military and security forces are capable of controlling violence by the end of the year, opening the way for an American withdrawal.

Maliki, whose political survival depends heavily on al-Sadr, the radical anti-American cleric, is eager to show his independence of American occupation forces. He wants the Americans to quickly turn over security control to Iraqi forces and withdraw to the outskirts of Baghdad and other cities, where they would be out of sight but could be called to action.

Military commanders said operations against the al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia in its Sadr City stronghold would be left largely to a joint force made up of U.S. soldiers and the Iraqi Special Operations Command division under Brig. Gen. Fadhil Birwari, a Kurd. Soldiers in the division are a mixture of Kurds and Arabs from both the Sunni and Shiite sects.

The prime minister has repeatedly rejected U.S. demands to move against the Mahdi Army.

Violence surged in Iraq Saturday after a week of relative quiet. Police reported 97 people were killed or found dead, 80 of them assassination victims dumped in Mosul, Baghdad and south of the capital.

Battle "Marks New Iraq Campaign" (BBC)

BBC.com, January 6, 2007

Iraqi army has reportedly killed 30 militants and arrested several others, including a number of Sudanese nationals, in a gun battle in Baghdad.

State TV said the firefight took place near Haifa Street, a Sunni district which housed top officials during Saddam Hussein's regime.

The engagement in the centre of the city is believed to mark the start of a new security drive in the capital.

Iraq's PM has pledged to take action against all illegal armed groups.

DOJ_NMG_0113540

Earlier, 71 bodies, apparently the victims of sectarian violence, were found dumped at locations in Baghdad.

Twenty-seven were left near a Sunni shrine in the central Sheikh Marouf area. Police said they were the victims of execution-style killings.

Elsewhere, at least two people died when a parked car exploded near a fuel station in the Doura district of the city.

In another incident, a car bomb was detonated beside the motorcade of a senior police official, Major-General Ali Yasser. He survived, but a bystander was killed.

Meanwhile, the US military said its forces had killed four suspected insurgents and detained a fifth in the city. It said all five had been armed, and that they were suspected of involvement in making roadside bombs.

'No refuge'

Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said the new security plan would be implemented by the Iraqi army, supported by US forces.

Bush may send thousands more US troops to Baghdad Mr Maliki said the new security plan would create inconveniences for the people of Baghdad, but it was for their own good.

In a speech to mark Iraqi Army Day, he said: "We will rely on our armed forces to forcefully implement the plan and the multinational forces will support our forces."

He added: "There will be no refuge from this plan for anyone who is operating beyond the law, regardless of their sect or their political affiliation."

It comes only days before President George W Bush is due to outline his new strategy for Iraq.

He is widely expected to send thousands more troops to Iraq, despite calls from the new Democratic Party leaders of Congress for the US to begin withdrawing its forces.

Hanging row

Mr Maliki also said his government could review relations with any country which criticised the execution of ex-leader Saddam Hussein.

Mr Maliki said the hanging was a "domestic affair" for the benefit of Iraq's unity, adding that the former president had received a fair trial.

Mobile phone images showing Saddam Hussein being taunted appeared on the internet days after the execution.

On Saturday, new UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon urged Iraq not to execute two of Saddam Hussein's co-defendants, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and former chief judge Awad al-Bandar.

Mr Ban was criticised this week for not stating the UN's opposition to the death penalty over Saddam Hussein's hanging.

Several Sunni Arab countries criticised the hanging as sectarian.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said it had turned the former leader into a martyr.

7 Iraqis Killed In Continued Violence (AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 7, 2007

Gunmen killed three Sunni Muslim shopkeepers Sunday in a mixed neighborhood of Baghdad, and two pedestrians died in a roadside bomb, police said.

The shopkeepers were killed in Baghdad's southwestern Baya district. Two cars of gunmen screeched through the neighborhood's main marketplace, opening fire on wholesalers peddling food, clothing and housewares, a police officer said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media. One person was also injured.

In eastern Baghdad, a roadside bomb missed an Iraqi police patrol but killed two pedestrians and wounded two others, police said. Nearby, police said drive-by shooters sprayed bullets at four guards for the Iraqi finance ministry, killing one and injuring two others.

In Diwaniyah, 80 miles south of the capital, gunmen assassinated Akeel al-Khalidi, a defense ministry employee, as he left his house for work, another police officer said on condition of anonymity out of fear of reprisals.

Another roadside bomb went off near an American military convoy in Iskandariyah, 30 miles south of Baghdad, damaging one Humvee, police said. There was no word on casualties, and U.S. troops sealed off the area.

Maliki Unveils Effort To End Bloodshed (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

Unlike the U.S. plan, the new one relies on Iraqi troops, not police. In Baghdad, soldiers kill 30 suspected insurgents.

BAGHDAD — Iraqi soldiers killed 30 suspected insurgents in a furious gun battle Saturday in downtown Baghdad, authorities said, in what appeared to be the opening salvo of a new plan by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to secure the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0113541

Maliki announced the new effort to end bloodshed in Baghdad on Saturday, five months after the U.S. military launched a plan to quell sectarian fighting that is widely regarded as a failure. Killings have steadily increased in the capital as insurgents and Shiite Muslim militia death squads continue to operate with impunity.

Maliki's speech, to commemorate Iraqi Army Day, took place on a day when at least 71 corpses were found in the streets of Baghdad, one of the largest such discoveries in a civil war in which scores of bodies turn up daily.

Most of the victims had been bound, blindfolded, tortured and executed with gunshots to the chest or head. Twenty-seven of the bodies were found near the Sheik Omar cemetery, a Sunni Arab burial ground in downtown Baghdad. Some of the victims had been strangled.

Many of the dead were presumed to be the victims of Shiite death squads, police sources said.

Maliki said that he would crack down on Sunni Arab and Shiite militants with equal vigor.

"The Baghdad Security Strategy will not be a shelter to the outlaws regardless of their political or religious affiliation, and we shall punish anyone who thwarts the strategy or presses their sectarian or partisan agenda," he said.

Shortly after Maliki's address, Iraqi soldiers fought with suspected insurgents in downtown Baghdad. The gun battle took place on Haifa Street, a road that some U.S. soldiers call "Sniper Alley" because of the large number of attacks that have taken place there.

Maliki revealed little about the new plan except that the military would have the main responsibility, a shift from the previous operation, which relied on police officers. Iraq's police forces are widely believed to have compromised the U.S. plan to quell sectarian fighting.

The old plan called for U.S. and Iraqi forces to clear the capital, neighborhood by neighborhood. Once an area was cleared of insurgents and militia fighters, Iraqi police were supposed to take over.

But Shiite militiamen in the police forces were accused of collaborating with death squads and implicated in killings of Sunni Arabs in "cleared" areas. The entire 8th Brigade of the national police was suspended after witnesses reported that men in police uniforms raided a meat-processing plant in October and kidnapped 26 Sunni Arab workers.

Sunni Arabs also complained that the security plan seemed to focus more attention on their communities than on Shiite militia strongholds such as Baghdad's Sadr City. Maliki criticized early U.S. incursions into the area. His Shiite alliance consists of political parties with armed militias.

The Iraqi army is believed to be less sectarian than the police, but it too has faced accusations of Shiite dominance. U.S. military commanders in Diyala province exerted more control over the Iraqi army's 5th Division in October after that Shiite-dominated force conducted abusive, arbitrary sweeps of Sunni Arab neighborhoods. Shiite-dominated Iraqi army units also have been accused of human rights abuses in towns such Fallouja and Rutbah in Al Anbar province.

Maliki also said he would fight joblessness "through public- and private-sector reconstruction," and he renewed his call for negotiations to bring Sunni Arab militants into the political process.

"Let's fold up the black past and work together to build a free, democratic and diverse Iraq without discrimination or marginalization," Maliki said.

The prime minister's speech appeared to dovetail with discussions in the Bush administration about increasing the number of U.S. troops to help secure Baghdad and other problem areas.

The Bush administration also is likely to propose a new reconstruction package focusing on creating jobs and refurbishing mothballed factories.

In many areas throughout central and western Iraq, poor security has brought industry to a standstill.

Maliki also called on Iraq's parliament to attend to pressing constitutional issues, oversight of anti-corruption agencies and the controversial de-Baathification effort, which left thousands of former regime members without jobs.

But parliament has not achieved a quorum in five weeks and is scheduled to take a recess after it completes Iraq's annual budget.

Maliki also used his speech to rebuff critics of the hanging of Saddam Hussein a week earlier. Shiite guards were recorded on a camera phone jeering and cursing the former Iraqi president as he stood on the gallows with a noose around his neck. Sunni Arab leaders in the Middle East criticized Maliki's decision to execute Hussein on a Muslim holiday.

"These countries know very well that Saddam trampled over everything holy and divine," Maliki said. "We see such behavior as provocative and interference in the internal matters of Iraq and an insult to the feelings of Saddam's victims."

The execution of two of Hussein's former aides is expected to take place soon.

Meanwhile, bloodshed continued in Iraq. In northeast Baghdad, gunmen stormed the home of a police colonel and killed his wife, four children and three other relatives.

U.S. soldiers killed four suspected insurgents during a Baghdad raid, the military announced.

DOJ_NMG_0113542

A car bomb in the Baghdad neighborhood of Dora killed three people, and gunmen in Yarmouk killed the driver of Iraq's minister of higher education. A car bomb targeting the director of Baghdad's Emergency Police killed a bystander.

In the southern port city of Basra, two Iraqis were found dead near a soccer stadium. Police said they were investigating to determine whether the men were the interpreters kidnapped along with an American on Friday near Basra.

Bomb's Lasting Toll: Lost Laughter And Broken Lives (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 6 — If the cost of this war is measured in human lives, one block in southeast Baghdad has paid more than its share.

On a hot morning two summers ago, 34 children were killed here in a flash of smoke and metal. They were scooping up candy thrown from an American Humvee. The suicide bomber's truck never slowed down.

More than 3,000 Iraqis are dying every month in this war — roughly the total deaths in the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon or all the American troops killed since the war began. But behind the headlines and statistics, most of the war is experienced in Iraqi living rooms and on blocks like the one here, where families struggle with the intense pain of loss.

And while American war planners discuss the way ahead, Iraqis on this scarred block are stuck in the past on the morning of July 13, 2005, when time stopped and the war truly began for them.

"Our life now, it's not a life, it's a kind of dream," said Qais Ataiwee Yaseen, whose two boys, ages 8 and 11, were killed that day. "Life has no taste. I even feel sick of myself."

In the early years of the war, the street — a dusty, trash-strewn strip of concrete that runs between Baghdad's southeast highway and the neighborhood of Naariya — was mostly quiet, home to a mix of Shiite and Sunni families who had known each other for years.

But the cruelty of the war intervened when the bomber struck, apparently aiming at a convoy of American Humvees parked at the end of the street. One American soldier and 34 Iraqis were killed. All were boys, and all but four were younger than 15. The youngest was 6. In all, 29 families lost children; one lost three sons.

In the seconds after the explosion, the world narrowed to one child for Sattar Hashim, a 39-year-old security guard whose son had gone out to see the American patrol. Mr. Hashim moved frantically through the wreckage, just outside his front gate, a scene now burned into his memory. He found his son unconscious, his body torn by shrapnel.

"I pray to God that no one in this world will ever have to face such a scene," he said, remembering the scene as he sat in his sparely furnished living room with the curtains drawn. "As if they had been scattered on the ground. Legs. Arms. Heads. Bodies still burning."

His son died in a hospital operating room several hours after the explosion.

Suicide bombings often stop clocks nearby, throwing the delicate mechanisms out of balance. The minute hand freezes the moment that the bomber detonates, and cleanup crews find clocks hanging crookedly on walls hours later, with the moment of loss fixed forever on the clocks' faces.

For the parents in Naariya, the clocks are frozen at a quarter after 10. The deaths that morning tore a hole in the life of the block, and more than a year later, many people have been unable to put their lives back together. Some have drifted away from their spouses. Others changed jobs or stopped going to work altogether. Reminders of the loss were everywhere: Class sizes were smaller. Soccer tournaments for 12-year-olds stopped. Bug collecting was no longer a hobby.

The pain caused strange things to happen. Mr. Yaseen lost his knack for numbers and found himself fumbling in front of customers at the hardware store where he had worked for years. Eventually, he quit. Reading and writing became difficult for Zahra Hussein, the mother of 11-year-old Hamza. She had lost her ability to concentrate and some of her eyesight.

Hadi Faris, Hamza's father, stopped his work as a driver. He could not control his thoughts, and concentrating on the road and split- second decisions was too onerous.

"I kept thinking how life is cheap, how so many innocent people are killed," he said, sitting in front of a kerosene heater in a small guest room.

After some months, he applied for, and was given, a job as a guard in his son's school. It felt somehow reassuring to do after his son's death what could not be done during his life: protect.

"I felt that all the kids were Hamza," he said. "My main job was to protect them all."

Life became empty and quiet for the children who were left. Adel Ali, 12, lost four of his best friends, most of his small soccer team and his entire bicycle-racing brigade. They had all shared a surge of happiness in the form of a birthday cake with candles, a first for most of the children, just days before the explosion. The experience was recorded in a grainy photograph of nine little boys making monkey faces. All but two are dead.

DOJ_NMG_0113543

Adel spends his afternoons alone at home. In the early evening, he plays soccer with the older boys. They do not know the names of famous players that he and his friends gave each other when they made good plays. They do not know the sheer joy of riding bicycles while holding a rope together. They do not understand his loneliness.

"We used to play together, and the adults would play in another place," said Adel, his small fingers zipping and unzipping a fleece pullover at his neck.

The attack seemed calculated to make Iraqis despise Americans, in a pattern that would eventually succeed and change the direction of the war. But while some of the parents interviewed seem to have developed that hatred, many had not and even expressed respect. Mr. Faris said that immediately after the bombing he saw a soldier with a mangled arm trying to pick up a wounded child.

More Americans came to the area several weeks later and brought small trinkets to houses, in what Iraqis assumed was something of a peace offering.

"We never hurt the Americans, and the Americans never hurt us," Mr. Faris said.

A constant theme of the war for Iraqis has been their complete lack of control over chaotic, life-changing events. Like victims of a car wreck on an empty highway, they sit in pain and hope that help will come along.

Mr. Yaseen is haunted by the helplessness he felt that morning when he found his younger son, Ali, still alive. He was badly burned and missing his feet.

"I said to myself — two feet, it is nothing," he said. But within several hours the child was dead.

"I did not have the ability to do anything for him," Mr. Yaseen said. "To save him."

Memories rush back at inconvenient moments. Mr. Yaseen has one in which his older son, Abbas, who loved bugs, begged him not to put poison down for the ants, saying, "They also have families and houses."

Even trifles sting. Ali, called English Ali for his tidiness and admiration for Americans, had only bread to eat for breakfast that morning.

"I'm like a dead man," said Mr. Yaseen, crying into his hands. "I have no ambitions. I have no goals in life. I have lost everything."

His wife and daughter have moved out, and he has retreated into his apartment, a 12-foot by 14-foot room. He stopped shaving. The room is now piled with baskets of laundry, old children's toys and a metal bassinet.

"I live in this room," he said. "I sleep in this room. I eat in this room. This is my whole life. As if I'm in prison."

Meanwhile, the war ground on, and the block was not immune to changes.

In February, poor Shiites rampaged in neighborhoods throughout eastern Baghdad. Naariya started to lose Sunnis. New graffiti in black paint across from Mr. Yaseen's house spelled praise for a Shiite cleric.

Three Shiite families from Diyala, a violent province north of Baghdad, arrived with the stunned look of refugees who just lost everything but their lives.

"There are no smiles on their faces," Ms. Hussein said. "You can tell they lost somebody."

Attacks on Shiites by Sunni militants started to wear, and families on the block began asking about the backgrounds of newcomers.

A small statue erected in the children's memory was blown up, and a bomb was planted under a date palm tree nearby, but it did not explode. During the Ramadan holiday in October, around 20 Sunni men disappeared from the neighborhood. Their bodies turned up in different neighborhoods several days later.

Mr. Hashim heard of the kidnappings but was afraid to ask about them.

"We woke up one day," he said, "and a family had left." The 2005 explosion gouged the pavement in front of his house, and afterward he had a large blast wall built. The wall had the added benefit of shielding him from seeing the crater in the street day after day.

For Adel, the 12-year-old whose friends were killed, memories returned in spurts. Some time after the July attack, he took his bicycle to the balcony of his house and threw it off. He was angry about what happened, Ms. Hussein said. A month ago, his life became even more isolated: a guard and a teacher from his school were killed, and Adel's father began keeping him home.

The boys come back in unexpected ways. Hamza's sister sees her brother's face in a boy who lives in a house on her way to school. She gives him candy sometimes. Mr. Yaseen often sees his boys in dreams.

In one, Abbas asks him why he is crying. He spoke of his own burial in a reassuring way. "He tried to make it easy for me," Mr. Yaseen said.

Speaking of the deaths, Mr. Hashim said: "It formed a hole, a big hole. Before the street was crowded. Cars had to go slowly. Now it's empty."

DOJ_NMG_0113544

Before Hanging, A Push For Revenge And A Push Back (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

This article was reported by John F. Burns, James Glanz, Sabrina Tavernise and Marc Santora and written by Mr. Burns.

BAGHDAD, Jan. 6 — When American soldiers woke Saddam Hussein in his cell near Baghdad airport at 3:55 a.m. last Saturday, they told him to dress for a journey to Baghdad. He had followed the routine dozens of times before, traveling by helicopter in the predawn darkness to the courtroom where he spent 14 months on trial for his life.

When his cell lights were dimmed on Friday night, Mr. Hussein may have hoped that he would live a few days longer, and perhaps cheat the hangman altogether.

According to Task Force 134, the American military unit responsible for all Iraqi detainees, Mr. Hussein "had heard some of the rumors on the radio about potential execution dates." But never one to understate his own importance, he had told his lawyers for months that the Americans might spare him in the end, for negotiations to end the insurgency whose daily bombings rattled his cellblock windows.

As Mr. Hussein prepared to walk out into the chill of the desert winter, dressed in a tailored black overcoat, that last illusion was shattered. After being roused and told that he was being transferred to Iraqi custody, a task force statement e-mailed to The New York Times a week later revealed, "he immediately indicated that he knew the execution would soon follow."

"As he left the detention area, he thanked the guards and medics for the treatment he had received," said Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, spokesman for the task force. Mr. Hussein was then driven to a waiting Black Hawk helicopter for a 10-minute flight to the old Istikhbarat prison in northern Baghdad, where a party of Iraqi officials awaited him at the gallows. "During this brief period of transfer, Saddam Hussein appeared more serious," the task force said.

The time as the helicopter took off was 5:05 a.m., and Mr. Hussein had 65 minutes to live. But as he flew over Baghdad's darkened suburbs, he can have known little of the last-minute battle waged between top Iraqi and American officials — and among the Americans themselves — over whether the execution, fraught with legal ambiguities and Islamic religious sensitivities, should go ahead.

American opposition to executing him in haste centered partly on the fact that the Id al-Adha religious holiday, marking the end of the annual Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca, began for Sunnis at sunrise on Saturday. In Baghdad, the sun was to rise at 7:06 a.m. Iraqi government officials had promised the hanging would be over before the dawn light began seeping through the palms that shade the capital's streets.

The taunts Mr. Hussein endured from Shiite guards as he stood with the noose around his neck have made headlines around the world, and stirred angry protests among his fellow Iraqi Sunnis. But the story of how American commanders and diplomats fought to halt the execution until midnight on Friday, only six hours before Mr. Hussein was hanged, is only now coming into focus, as Iraqi and American officials, in the glare of international outrage over the hanging, compete with their versions of what happened.

Tensions Boil Over

It is a story of the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, trying to coerce second-tier American military and diplomatic officials into handing over Mr. Hussein, first on Thursday night, then again on Friday. The American push back was complicated by the absences of Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and the top American military commander, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who were both out of Iraq on leave. The American message throughout was that rushing Mr. Hussein to the gallows could rebound disastrously, as it did.

It is a story, too, of the Americans disagreeing among themselves. After a final call to Mr. Maliki at 10:30 p.m. Friday, American and Iraqi officials said, Mr. Khalilzad concluded that there was no prospect of persuading the Iraqis to delay the execution and passed that message to Washington. The conclusion found little favor with the military, who were the ones who had to transport Mr. Hussein to the gallows.

For General Casey and Mr. Khalilzad, close partners here, the messy ending for Mr. Hussein was made worse by the confirmation this week that Mr. Bush will soon replace both men as he refashions his Iraq war policy.

There were disputes among the Iraqis as well. At least one senior judge from the tribunal that sentenced Mr. Hussein to die, and three American lawyers who worked closely with the Iraqis at his trials, fought their own rearguard battle, telling fellow Iraqis how surprised they were that he received the death sentence in the narrow case that produced it — the "systematic persecution" of Dujail, a small Shiite town north of Baghdad, after an alleged assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein there in 1982.

In interviews with dozens of American and Iraqi officials involved in the hanging, a picture has emerged of a clash of cultures and political interests, reflecting the widening gulf between Americans here and the Iraqi exiles who rode to power behind American tanks. Even before a smuggled cellphone camera recording revealed the derision Mr. Hussein faced on the gallows, the hanging had become a metaphor, among Mr. Maliki's critics, for how the "new Iraq" is starting to resemble the repressive, vengeful place it was under Mr. Hussein, albeit in a paler shade.

DOJ_NMG_0113545

The hanging spread wide dismay among the Americans. Aides said American commanders were deeply upset by the way they were forced to hand Mr. Hussein over, a sequence commanders saw as motivated less by a concern for justice than for revenge. In the days following the hanging, recriminations flowed between the military command and the United States Embassy, accused by some officers of abandoning American interests at midnight Friday in favor of placating Mr. Maliki and hard-line Shiites.

But for Mr. Maliki's inner circle, the hanging was a moment to avenge decades of brutal repression by Mr. Hussein, as well as a moment to drive home to Iraq's five million Sunnis that after centuries of subjugation, Shiites were in power to stay. At the "White House," as his officials now describe Mr. Maliki's headquarters in the Green Zone, a celebratory dinner began Friday night even before the Americans withdrew their threat not to hand over Mr. Hussein.

An Iraqi who attended the hanging said the government saw the Americans as wasting time with their demands for a delay until after the four-day Id al-Adha holiday, and for whatever time beyond that required to obtain the legal authorizations they considered necessary. For the Americans to claim the moral high ground afterward by disavowing the hanging, the Iraqi said, was disingenuous.

"They cannot wash their hands, this is a joint responsibility," he said. "They had the physical custody, and we had the legal custody. At one point, I asked, 'Is it our call or is it your call?' They said, 'It's your call.' I said, 'If it's our call, we've made the decision.' " Legal niceties could not save Mr. Hussein, he said, concluding, "The man has to go."

In a speech on Saturday, a week after the hanging, Mr. Maliki showed that he remains as angry as the Americans. Hitting out at governments and human rights organizations around the world that have condemned the hanging, he said they were hypocritical. "We're wondering where these organizations were during the crimes of Anfal and Halabja," he said, referring to Mr. Hussein's persecution of Iraqi Kurds. "Where were they during the mass graves and the executions and the massacres that killed hundreds of thousands of Iraqis?"

Differing Timelines

The countdown to the hanging began eight weeks earlier, on Nov. 5, as Raouf Abdel-Rahman, the chief judge in the Dujail case, passed death sentences on Mr. Hussein and two associates, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, Mr. Hussein's half-brother, and Awad al-Bandar, chief judge of Mr. Hussein's revolutionary court, for crimes against humanity in the hanging of 148 men and boys from the Shiite town. "Go to hell, you and the court!" Mr. Hussein yelled as bailiffs ushered him out.

The widespread expectation was that the appeal of the death sentences would run for months, allowing time for the more notorious Anfal case, involving charges of genocide in the killing of 180,000 Kurds, to be completed before Mr. Hussein was hanged. American lawyers in the embassy's Regime Crimes Liaison Office, the behind-the-scenes organizer of the trials, predicted Mr. Hussein's execution in the spring.

When the tribunal's appeals bench announced that it had upheld the death sentences on Dec. 26, three weeks into the appeal, even prosecutors were stunned. Defense lawyers said Mr. Hussein was being railroaded under pressure from Mr. Maliki, who told a BBC interviewer shortly after the Dujail verdict that he expected the ousted ruler to be hanged before year's end.

The suspicion that the judges had submitted to government pressure was shared by some of Americans working with the tribunal, who had stifled their growing disillusionment with the government's interference for months. Among a host of other complaints, the Americans' frustrations focused on the government's dismissal of two judges seen as too indulgent with Mr. Hussein, and its failure to investigate seriously when three defense lawyers were killed. The appeals court's apparent eagerness to fast-forward Mr. Hussein to the gallows — and the scenes at the execution itself — was, for some of the Americans, the last straw.

On the Thursday before the hanging, American military officials were summoned. Both Mr. Khalilzad and General Casey were on vacation, so the American team handling negotiations with Mr. Maliki and his officials was headed by Maj. Gen. Jack Gardner, head of Task Force 134, the detainee unit, and Margaret Scobey, head of the embassy's political section.

Iraqi officials said neither carried much weight with Mr. Maliki, who had learned through bruising confrontations to be wary of alienating Mr. Khalilzad and General Casey, both of whom have direct access to President Bush. At the Thursday afternoon meeting, tempers frayed. According to an Iraqi legal expert at the meeting, Iraqi officials demanded that the Americans hand over Mr. Hussein that night, for an execution before dawn on Friday.

General Gardner responded with demands of his own, for letters affirming the legality of the execution from Mr. Maliki, President Jalal Talabani and the chief judge of the high tribunal that convicted Mr. Hussein, the Iraqi legal expert said. The focus was on two issues: a constitutional requirement that Iraq's three-man presidency council approve all executions, and a Hussein-era law forbidding executions during religious holidays.

DOJ_NMG_0113546

Mr. Talabani, a death penalty opponent, refused to sign off on the hanging, but did sign a letter for Mr. Maliki saying he had no objections if the government went ahead. The Iraqis, bolstering their case, said that the Hussein tribunal's own statute, drafted by the Americans, placed its rulings beyond review. They dismissed the holiday ban on executions, saying Iraq's death penalty law had been suspended by the Americans in 2003 and that the new Iraqi Parliament, in reviving it in 2004, had not reinstituted the ban.

An Iraqi participant who opposed the hanging said that Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Mr. Maliki's national security adviser, said angrily, "This is an Iraqi issue," and added, "Who is going to execute him anyway, you or us?" When the Americans insisted they would not hand over Mr. Hussein without the letters, another Iraqi official exploded: "Just give him to us!"

By Thursday evening, pressures for a quick hanging were growing. Esam al-Gazawi, a Hussein lawyer, said by telephone from Jordan that his legal team had been denied a final visit to Camp Cropper, the American detention center, and that they had been told to send somebody to collect Mr. Hussein's personal belongings.

Around midnight on Thursday, the meeting broke up, and General Gardner contacted commanders at Camp Cropper to tell them to stand down. By then, the American command had entered what it called its "X-hour sequence," a 10-hour countdown to the execution that provided a timeline for everything the Americans needed to do to ensure Mr. Hussein's "secure and dignified" delivery to the execution site.

Negotiations resumed Friday morning. In Phoenix, 10 time zones away, General Casey was monitoring the exchanges in signals traffic from Baghdad. American military officials remained opposed to an immediate hanging, telling Mr. Maliki that beyond the legal issues, there was a question of his government's need to gain international support by carrying out the hanging in a way that could withstand any criticism.

"We said, 'You have to do it by international law, you have to do it in accordance with international standards of decorum, you have to establish yourselves as a nation under law,' " an American official recounted. When Mr. Maliki said the Americans should respect Iraq's right to decide matters for itself, American officials said, one of the Americans said: "Forget about us. You're in front of the international community here. People will be watching this."

The arguments continued deep into the Iraqi night. General Gardner and Ms. Scobey returned at one point to the former Republican Palace, the American headquarters in the Green Zone, seeking Washington's advice. Workarounds for the legal problems were discussed.

At 10:30 p.m., Ambassador Khalilzad made a last-ditch call to Mr. Maliki asking him not to proceed with the hanging. When the Iraqi leader remained adamant, an American official said, the ambassador made a second call to Washington conveying "the determination of the Iraqi prime minister to go forward," and his conclusion that there was nothing more, consistent with respect for Iraqi sovereignty, that the United States could do.

Senior Bush administration officials in Washington said that Mr. Khalilzad's principal contact in Washington was Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and that she gave the green light for Mr. Hussein to be turned over, despite the reservations of the military commanders in Baghdad. One official said that Ms. Rice was supported in that view by Stephen J. Hadley, Mr. Bush's national security adviser.

"It literally came down to the Iraqis interpreting their law, and our looking at their law and interpreting it differently," the official said. "Finally, it was decided we are not the court of last appeal for Iraqi law here. The president of their country says it meets their procedures. We are not going to be their legal nannies."

Mr. Khalilzad had suggested that the Iraqis get a written ruling approving the execution from Midhat al-Mahmoud, the chief judge of Iraq's Supreme Judicial Council; Mr. Mahmoud refused. Then, the Iraqis played their trump card: a call to high-ranking Shiite clerics in the holy city of Najaf, asking for approval from the marjaiya, the supreme authority in Iraqi Shiism. When his officials reported that they had it, Mr. Maliki signed a letter authorizing the hanging. It was 11:45 p.m.

The Americans suggested that foreign reporters be invited to the hanging, along with United Nations observers. American commanders feared the concern for procedure might be swept away by the urge for revenge. "Anybody who's been involved in a firefight will tell you there's a moment when rage takes over," an American official said. The Iraqis dismissed the idea of outside observers and assembled an execution party of 14 Shiite officials and a Sunni cleric invited to help Mr. Hussein with his prayers.

The 'X-Hour Sequence'

At Camp Cropper, the X-hour sequence was running for a second night. Helicopters were positioned. Special security measures went into effect along the flight path. The Americans dispatched sniffer dogs along the route of Mr. Hussein's final steps and into the execution chamber, the only time any American set foot there.

Before he left the camp, Mr. Hussein bade farewell to American soldiers who guarded him during the latter stages of his 1,110 days in solitary confinement. There, and again after the helicopter carrying him landed at 5:15 a.m. at Camp Justice, the American military post in the Kadhimiya district of northern Baghdad that encloses the Istikhbarat prison, the former dictator went man to man, thanking each of the Americans for looking after him.

DOJ_NMG_0113547

At 5:21 a.m., he was led into the prison, a forbidding, four-story concrete building that once housed the headquarters of Mr. Hussein's military intelligence agency and now is a base for an Iraqi Army brigade. The Americans took him to a holding room and exchanged papers with the prison governor formalizing the transfer.

"At that point, he was dignified," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the American command's chief spokesman, said at a briefing later. "He said farewell to his interpreter. He thanked the military police squad, the lieutenant who was the squad leader, the medical doctor we had present, the American colonel who was on site." He added, with emphasis, "And then we had absolutely nothing to do with any of the procedures or any of control mechanisms or anything from that point forward."

At 5:30 a.m., the Iraqis took over. An American official who watched said Mr. Hussein's demeanor "changed in the Iraqi prison when the Iraqi governor assumed control of him." Mr. Hussein had long since told his American captors that he trusted them but not the Iraqis.

"He was still dignified, but he was scornful," the American official said.

Mr. Rubaie, the security adviser, said that when Mr. Hussein stepped into the execution block, an ill-lighted concrete structure behind the main prison building where thousands of hangings took place under Mr. Hussein, he seemed composed.

"He made some joking remarks," he said. "He said to me, 'Don't be afraid,' as if I was going to be hanged. I didn't reply, but one of the guards shouted, 'You did bad things to Iraq.' And he said, 'I made this backward country into an advanced and prosperous nation.' "

After that, the story is taken up by the illicit cellphone video that has caused an uproar among Iraqi Sunnis and across the world, showing Mr. Hussein erect on the gallows in his black overcoat and gray beard, staring ahead, and answering back, as taunts flowed from Shiites gathered in front of the platform.

Mr. Hussein got halfway through the most sacred of Muslim prayers. "There is no God but God, and Muhammad. ..." The trapdoor clanged open. It was 6:10 a.m.

Securing the Body

Before 7 a.m., helicopters ferried Iraqi officials back to the Green Zone, along with Mr. Hussein's body. For nearly 17 hours, Mr. Maliki and his officials remained locked in a dispute with Sunni officials and leaders of Mr. Hussein's Albu Nasir tribe, with Mr. Maliki's officials refusing to release the body, saying they wanted no shrine to him. Throughout, the body, in a white shroud, remained inside the ambulance in the parking lot behind Mr. Maliki's office.

For the last time, the Americans intervened, flying a delegation from Tikrit, Mr. Hussein's hometown, to Baghdad, and returning them 110 miles north again after Mr. Maliki, at nearly midnight, agreed to let the body go.

It was transferred to a pine coffin, loaded onto the open back of a police pickup, and driven back to Landing Zone Washington, the Green Zone helipad.

Upset by events in the execution chamber, and concerned at attracting any fresh anger from Iraqi Sunnis, the Americans ordered their troops not to touch Mr. Hussein's body after the execution, even as it was loaded and unloaded from their helicopters.

This left Iraqi officials to unload the stretcher carrying the body when the execution party returned to the Green Zone from the prison. Mr. Rubaie, the security adviser, said he helped carry the stretcher bearing the body from the helicopter to a waiting ambulance.

"We weren't walking, we were jogging" to the ambulance, he said. "This was a chapter we wanted to get done and finished with. We just wanted it to be over."

A Slim Guidebook For Executing A Deposed Ruler (NYT)

By Mary Jo Murphy

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

THE Ceausescus of Romania were dragged to their executions on Christmas Day 1989 with Nicolae singing "The Internationale" and Elena alternately directing her captors to hell and snapping at them, "I was like a mother to you."

Or so go accounts by some of the executioners. Videotape shown on Romanian television in the aftermath records scenes from a farcical tribunal but stops as the couple are led away after they're condemned, picking up again only after the deed is done, the bullet-pocked bodies cooling where they fell.

The event did not need cellphones and YouTube to peel back the veneer of civility.

But while there is no manual for such occasions — modern history gives us relatively few instances of absolute rulers being deposed, tried and executed — all the talk last week after the hanging of Saddam Hussein suggests that we viewers thought there was some greater codification of the protocols and proprieties than was apparent in the mocking scene that unfolded.

Certainly the hanging of Mr. Hussein and the shooting of the Ceausescus lacked the decorously scripted quality of the beheading of Charles I in 1649, which from trial to scaffold might have lent a template. It had "a deliberate air of formality and solemnity," said Dr. Jason Peacey, a lecturer at University College London who has studied the regicide. There were "rival ideas about how to go about putting the king on trial," but it was decided to "not do things in the dark and in the corner and behind closed doors."

The British monarch never recognized the legitimacy of his judges but still played his role elegantly, even reaching an accommodation with his executioner. "Stay for the sign," Charles reminded him as he laid his neck on the block. The executioner did, swinging the ax only after Charles spread wide his arms in a kind of benediction.

Dr. Peacey and his colleagues discussed the "remarkable similarity" of the Hussein trial to Charles's in one regard: the appearance of legality was deemed important.

But events have a way of overtaking such considerations. Trotsky favored a trial for Czar Nicholas II of Russia, a step which "would have shown the population all of Nicholas's alleged crimes and thus served as both public political education and a ritual of humiliation and thus desacralization of a ruler who claimed divine sanction," said Mark D. Steinberg, a professor of history at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign who has written on the czar's fall.

Somebody, perhaps Lenin, was in a hurry, however, Mr. Steinberg said, and "whoever ordered it, what resulted was a brutish affair — secret, in the middle of the night, in a basement, with not only the czar and czaritsa killed but also children and servants."

Those who did the killing encountered a hitch, too. The family "were wearing what amounted to jeweled bulletproof vests," Mr. Steinberg said. When the bullets ricocheted off corsets and gems, the firing squad resorted to bayonets and rifle butts.

Is there an optimal way to execute a deposed ruler, then? If speed is paramount, "by far the best is the guillotine for dispatching anyone," said Geoffrey Abbott, author of "Execution: The Guillotine, the Pendulum, the Thousand Cuts, the Spanish Donkey and 66 Other Ways of Putting Someone to Death" and a former yeoman warder at the Tower of London. Points there, then, for the executions of Louis XVI and Marie-Antoinette ("Pardonez-moi," she said to her executioner as she trod on his foot, assuring that at least some niceties were observed).

Mr. Abbott would not say which of the 70 ways might have suited Mr. Hussein, but if the idea is to "pay the penalty untinged by revenge," then "I would say firing squad," he said. "The thought of a military execution is more honorable than a crude hanging."

Emperor Maximilian of Mexico got the former in 1867; Zulfikar Ali Bhutto of Pakistan the latter in 1979. In recalling Bhutto's execution, a jailer later wrote: "On the other side of the jailhouse's wall, in the prime minister's house, Bhutto Sahib used to get anything he wished for, from anywhere in the world. And today he could not even fulfill his simple wish of having a cup of tea."

Likely Blair Successor Blasts Hanging (AP)

AP, January 7, 2007

The likely successor to British Prime Minister Tony Blair condemned Saddam Hussein's execution as "deplorable" on Saturday.

Treasury chief Gordon Brown said he opposed the death penalty and hoped lessons would be learned from the mistakes made in Saddam's hanging, as well as from other difficulties encountered in Iraq.

"Now that we know the full picture of what happened, we can sum this up as a deplorable set of events," Brown said in an interview taped Saturday to be aired by the British Broadcasting Corp. on Sunday.

Brown's denunciation contrasted with Blair's silence on the issue. Blair, the chief U.S. ally in the war in Iraq, faces increasing pressure to share his views on the execution and has said he would speak about it in the coming week.

The former Iraqi dictator was taunted by onlookers as he was hanged Saturday, and an illicitly recorded video of his death was later leaked and distributed on the Internet.

Brown, who is expected to succeed Blair when the prime minister steps down this year, said the execution "has done nothing to lessen tensions between the Shiite and Sunni communities."

On Tuesday, Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott also described the circumstances surrounding Saddam's execution as "deplorable."

Blair's office said the prime minister did not necessarily support Prescott's view. However, Blair has endorsed an investigation into the manner of the execution.

UN Chief Urges Iraq To Suspend Executions (AFP)

AFP, January 7, 2007

UN chief Ban Ki-moon has "strongly" urged the Iraqi government to suspend imminent executions amid an international outcry over the bungled hanging of Saddam Hussein a week ago.

DOJ_NMG_0113549

Iraq's embattled prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, meanwhile, threatened to "review" relations with countries that criticized Saddam's execution and announced a new security crackdown in the chaos-wracked country.

In a statement released by the United Nations, Ban "strongly urged the Government of Iraq to grant a stay of execution to those whose death sentences may be carried out in the near future."

Ban's cabinet chief, Vijay Nambiar, sent a letter Saturday to Iraq's UN representative reiterating Ban's backing of a call by the top UN human rights official "for restraint by the Government of Iraq in the execution of death sentences imposed by the Iraqi High Tribunal," the statement said.

"The letter also refers to the Secretary General's view that all members of the international community should pay due regard to all aspects of international humanitarian and human rights laws."

Two former Saddam henchmen -- Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and Awad Ahmed al-Bandar -- are expected to be hanged soon. They were found guilty along with Saddam of executing 148 Shiite civilians from Dujail, north of Baghdad, in the 1980s.

Their executions, due Thursday, were postponed to Sunday, Shiite lawmaker Baha al-Araji from the group of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr told AFP earlier this week.

A senior official with Maliki's office said the executions were postponed "due to international pressure."

The December 30 hanging of Saddam sparked an outcry after the leak of an unofficial, grisly cellphone video of his execution that showed a guard taunting the former dictator moments before his death.

The UN secretary general's appeal to the Iraqi government Saturday for restraint followed a similar UN appeal in the case of the execution of Saddam, who was hanged within days after a court upheld his death sentence.

Ban, who took office on Monday, has declined to condemn or defend Saddam's hanging.

Iraqi's premier Maliki lashed out a critics Saturday, threatening to "review" relations with countries that criticized the bungled execution and arguing the hanging was an internal matter.

"The Iraqi government could be obliged to review its relations with any state that fails to respect the wish of the Iraqi people," warned Maliki, who has ordered an investigation into the illegal filming of the execution.

"We consider the execution of the dictator an internal affair that concerns only the Iraqi people," he said.

Maliki said the criticism would not deter his government from punishing other officials of the ousted regime.

"We will go ahead in applying the law against those who abused the Iraqi people and whose hands are stained with the blood of innocents," he said.

A number of international leaders have criticized Saddam's hanging, saying it appeared more like a sectarian lynching than a court-directed punishment after a guard, believed to be a Shiite, taunted the Sunni former president in his final moments.

The strongest criticism came from Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who said the execution had made Saddam a "martyr".

The man tipped to succeed Tony Blair as British prime minister, finance minister Gordon Brown, condemned the manner of Saddam's execution in an interview to be broadcast on BBC television Sunday.

"Now that we know the full picture of what happened, we can sum this up as a deplorable set of events," Brown said.

US President George W. Bush on Thursday acknowledged that the execution should have been "more dignified."

UN Urges Stay Of Iraq Executions (BBC)

BBC.com, January 7, 2007

New UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon has urged Iraq to suspend the execution of two of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's co-defendants.

His appeal comes amid growing international criticism of the handling of Saddam Hussein's hanging, at which he was taunted and filmed.

Mr Ban was criticised this week for failing to state the UN's policy of opposing the death penalty.

Saddam Hussein's intelligence chief and chief judge are also due to be hanged.

Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and Awad al-Bandar were convicted along with Saddam Hussein for their part in the killing of 148 Shia Muslims in the Iraqi village of Dujail in the 1980s.

Saddam Hussein was hanged on 30 December.

Campaign

In a letter to the Iraqi representative at the UN, Mr Ban urged restraint in carrying out death sentences imposed by the Iraqi High Tribunal

The BBC's Keith Adams says Mr Ban's comments on Saddam Hussein's hanging caused a stir this week - his first in the job.

DOJ_NMG_0113550

He said capital punishment "was for each and every member state to decide" - words that seemed at odds with the UN's policy of opposing the death penalty.

Our correspondent says Mr Ban now seems to be asserting the established UN stance.

The UN said Mr Ban's letter "also refers to the secretary general's view that all members of the international community should pay due regard to all aspects of international humanitarian and human rights laws".

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has reacted angrily to the international outcry over the execution.

He said his government could review relations with any country that criticised the action.

Mr Maliki said the hanging was a "domestic affair" for the benefit of Iraq's unity, adding that the former president had received a fair trial.

International protest has continued, however. On Saturday Rome's mayor lit up the Colosseum to highlight Italy's support for a global ban on the death penalty.

Italy this week began a diplomatic push to have the issue taken up by the UN General Assembly.

Former Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi called the execution a "political and historic error".

The UK's finance minister, Gordon Brown, described the way Saddam Hussein was executed as "deplorable" and "completely unacceptable".

He said the manner of Saddam Hussein's death would do nothing to ease the tension between Sunnis and Shias.

Several Sunni Arab countries have criticised the hanging as sectarian.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said it had turned the former leader into a martyr.

Not The Case (NYT)

By Noah Feldman

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

Even among those who opposed the Iraq war from the start, there was always hope that bringing Saddam Hussein to justice would be a saving grace of the entire misbegotten enterprise. Now it seems that even this comfort will be denied. Far from healing old wounds, as some suggested it would, his conviction by the Iraqi special tribunal has exerted little effect on the deepening civil conflict between Shiites and Sunnis. The often circuslike atmosphere of the trial, as well as the murder of three defense lawyers, led groups like Human Rights Watch to condemn the tribunal as flawed and illegitimate. And the charge for which Saddam Hussein received the death penalty did not include his most heinous acts. His execution must still remind the world of the horror of the atrocities he committed while in power. But unfortunately, the disarray of the legal process calls greater attention to the failings of the United States, the Iraqis and the international community in dealing with all that has come after.

Since its inception, the tribunal has been haunted by a fundamental problem that bedevils the new Iraqi government more generally: the nature and origin of its authority. That the Iraqi dictator deserved to be punished was never in question. But from what source did the tribunal, which was established under U.S. occupation and then affirmed by the sovereign Iraqi government, derive the right to do so? This was not an academic question. Saddam Hussein was found guilty and sentenced to hang for sending 148 men and boys to their deaths in the aftermath of an attempted assassination against him in the Shiite town of Dujail in 1982. Under Iraqi law at the time, the president was immune from prosecution. In order to satisfy the rule of law - and to avoid the appearance of victor's justice - the tribunal needed to be able to explain its basis for applying the law that was used to find him guilty.

In part, the tribunal sought to draw legitimacy from international law. The court found Saddam Hussein guilty not of ordinary murder but of "crimes against humanity," a grand-sounding, internationally recognized charge with intuitive moral force. When the phrase "crimes against humanity" was used at the Nuremberg trials in 1945, the convening nations did not bother to explain what gave them the right to define and punish such crimes. It was presumed self-evident that certain actions were so terrible that they must be treated as illegal, even if they might have been permissible under Nazi German law when they took place. The so-called Rome Statute, which created the International Criminal Court in The Hague in 2002, specifically defined crimes against humanity in terms drawn from the Nuremberg charter, and the definition used by the Iraqi special tribunal was copied from there.

Yet it is hard to believe that the Iraqi tribunal could convincingly claim its authority from the international community. Like the United States, Iraq has not ratified the Rome Statute. Indeed, the Iraqi tribunal explicitly avoided submitting itself to international standards so that it would be able to apply the death penalty, which most of the international community rejects. This resulted in near complete withdrawal of international cooperation in the investigation of Saddam Hussein's crimes and the trial itself, and the tribunal lost some of the perception of fairness that would have come from broader international participation.

So where, if anywhere, did the Iraqi tribunal get the right to punish Saddam Hussein for crimes against humanity? Sovereign nations like Iraq can, of course, punish whatever crimes they choose, and can change or abrogate their own earlier laws to do it. But there is something unsatisfying about offering this as an account, for it diminishes the tribunal's credible claim that the Iraqi dictator's actions reverberated worldwide, implicating not just Iraq but all of humanity. There must be some deeper source of law, apart from treaties or the dictates of the United Nations Security Council, that bans the systematic killing of innocents.

DOJ_NMG_0113551

The most persuasive answer is that a law prohibiting crimes against humanity derives its authority from the inherent moral responsibility that lies with whoever has the capacity to punish truly heinous deeds. To be sure, in some cases the international community will bear that responsibility. In the case of Iraq, though, the international community was not in a position to act, not only because of the question of the death penalty but also because many of its members denied the legality of the invasion. Responsibility rested with the powers that actually held Saddam Hussein within their grasp. Their right - and their duty - was to bring him to justice.

By these lights, the decision to charge Saddam Hussein with crimes against humanity was morally and legally justified. Nevertheless, the process fell short of what is needed to invoke the transcendent norms of universal justice. This was a profound failure. As with the other shortcomings of Iraq's government, many players were at fault here: the Americans for failing to provide security for the Iraqis, including the defense team; the Iraqis for failing to get the trial - or the country - to run smoothly; the international community for sanctimoniously disengaging.

But the fact that blame is to be shared does not mitigate the tragedy of this missed opportunity.

Arab Nationalism's Last Gasp (LAT)

By Robert D. Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

Saddam Hussein's execution likely means the end of the foolish secular Arab nationalism movement.

JUST AS THE demise of Slobodan Milosevic in Yugoslavia closed the lid on national communist parties in Eastern Europe, the demise of Saddam Hussein in Iraq appears likely to do the same for secular Arab nationalism across the Middle East.

And just as communism exited the European stage exposed for what it always truly was — fascism without fascism's ability to make the trains run on time — secular Arab nationalism will exit the stage revealed for what it always was: a despotic perversion of the western nation-state that lasted as long as it did mainly because of secret-police techniques imported from the former Soviet Union.

Arab nationalism's roots go back to the revolt against European colonialism in the early decades of the 20th century. But as it developed, it faced a serious problem: Because it was organized around the artificial national borders that these same colonialists had drawn — which generally ignored ethnic and sectarian lines — the result, in too many cases, was multiethnic rivalry and the subjugation of one part of the population by another.

In Iraq, for instance, the national borders created a state in which the majority Shiites were subjugated by the minority Sunnis (as we all now know). In Syria, the majority Sunnis came to be subjugated by the minority Alawites, who constitute a branch of Shiism (and who had been favored in the armed forces by the French). In Lebanon, it was the Shiites who ended up subjugated by both Christians and Sunnis.

No sooner were these independent new states created than the ties of faith and tribe were undermining them. A fragile unity of sorts could only be achieved by recourse to secular nationalism, which, on paper at least, aimed to transcend those bitter rivalries.

Indeed, the more artificial the state, the more extreme the secular ideology had to be to hold it together. To secure unwieldy tribal assemblages, for instance, an austere state socialism was required in Algeria, and a form of "Dear Leader Absolutism" in Libya. Because Syria and Iraq were also artificial constructs, these two states resorted to Baathism — another bastardized form of state socialism.

Contrast all this with places such as Morocco, Tunisia and Egypt, which were age-old civilization clusters whose identities, rather than artificial, harked back to antiquity. It should be no surprise that these places produced more benign forms of secular government.

The two extremes in the Arab world became Tunisia and Iraq. Tunisia, a small country of Sunni Arabs with no internal divisions, which traced its borders back to ancient Carthage, produced Habib Bourguiba, the Arab version of the enlightened Turkish modernizer Kemal Ataturk. Iraq, a Frankenstein monster of a country assembled from warring ethnic and sectarian groups by the British, produced Saddam Hussein, the Arab Stalin.

The defining fact of the Cold War years in the Middle East was competition among these insecure new states for the right to inherit the mantle of the deceased Ottoman Turkish empire, which had held sway over most of their territories for centuries. Because Israel served as a symbolic replacement for European colonialism, each new state tried to outdo the other to prove its anti-Zionist bona fides.

DOJ_NMG_0113552

Egypt, the Arab world's demographic hub, had the advantage, especially as its leader, Gamal Abdel Nassar, psychologically mobilized the Arab masses by standing up to an invasion by Britain, France and Israel in October 1956, leading to a withdrawal of these "colonial" powers from the Suez Canal. Thus began the high-water mark of secular Arabism, which lasted until Nasser's humiliation by the Israelis in the 1967 war.

The Palestine Liberation Organization emerged in the waning years of Nasserism. It was modeled after the other secular nationalist movements — so much so that its foundational text, the 1938 book "The Arab Awakening," was written not by a Muslim but by a Greek Orthodox Christian, George Antonius. Another Christian, George Habash, became one of the PLO's most radical guiding lights.

The defining organizational attribute of secular Arab nationalism was the military emergency regime — witness Egypt, Syria and Iraq — that justified its existence by the continued state of war with Israel. Also working against liberal change in the Middle East was the influence of the Soviet Union. With Soviet military and economic aid for the secular nationalists came the techniques of East Bloc security services.

Nowhere was this more apparent than in the two Baathist countries, Syria and Iraq. The result of made-in-Moscow surveillance techniques was the emergence in the early 1970s of a new class of dictator — Hafez Assad in Syria and Saddam Hussein in Iraq — who, unlike their predecessors, were not overthrown by yet another general or colonel after a short time in office.

These new men stayed in power for decades because anyone who opposed them, no matter how furtively, was soon identified and destroyed.

Thus it was that the Nasserites, the Baathists from Syria and Iraq and the austere pseudo-Marxists from Algeria vied with each other for influence. The PLO, as the supreme symbol of the anti-Zionist struggle, was the beneficiary of the competition. But when the Berlin Wall collapsed and aid from the East Bloc began to dry up, Palestine had still not been liberated, even as creaky, authoritarian bureaucracies across the Arab world were decaying.

Beneath the carapace of secularism, a disturbing brew of religious and sectarian tensions had always simmered. Islamism emerged from an upwardly mobile peasantry that had drifted into Arab cities from the countryside. In the countryside, Islam was an integral part of a traditional existence and generally nonpolitical, but in these pseudo-Westernized cities, filled with the worst sorts of temptations, religion required a severity and ideological component in order to keep families together and teenage boys from slipping into crime.

Alas, what really killed secular Arab nationalism — much more so than the dark influence of the Soviet police state or the mobilizing distraction of the Zionist threat — was the combination of a bad form of urbanization and what Middle East expert Michael Hudson in the 1970s labeled the "primordial identifications" of tribe and sect and religion.

As the secularized Arab state withered, these sub-state loyalties reemerged full bore, making even further mockery of the borders of the Arab world — because tribe- and faith-based communities have little use for national borders.

Those who proclaim today that the only real solution to the Arab dilemma is political freedom are correct. The problem is that they are describing a process that could encompass several bloody decades. After all, it took centuries for stable democracy as we know it to evolve in Europe. In this Darwinian shaking-out process, the new forms of political legitimacy may more closely resemble militarized social welfare organizations such as Hezbollah and the Al Mahdi army than the ramshackle contrivances of the European model that we saw in the post-colonial era.

Right before the trap door was opened, Hussein's executioners chanted "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada," referring to Shiite militia leader Muqtada Sadr — because what was supposed to have been retribution for crimes against humanity had, despite all of our efforts, turned into another sectarian killing. Such is the abyss that follows secular Arab nationalism.

ROBERT D. KAPLAN is a correspondent for the Atlantic Monthly and a visiting professor at the U.S. Naval Academy. He is the author of "The Arabists," among other books.

Antitank Mines Hamper Progress Of U.S.-Iraqi Assault (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

SAMOUDI, IRAQ — All they wanted was a hot meal.

Three days into a wet, cold offensive through a lawless region east of Baghdad, Iraqi soldiers persuaded their American counterparts to let them pull back to their command post for a dinner that wasn't out of a Meals Ready to Eat packet.

As dusk fell Saturday, an urgent message came in over a crackling radio: A blast, apparently an antitank mine, had ripped through one of the vehicles in the Iraqi convoy. Flames shot out of the stricken Humvee and ignited ammunition, sending rounds streaking into the sky. One Iraqi was killed in the blast and three were injured.

Along another stretch of road, two mines exploded Saturday less than 15 yards apart, injuring five American soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0113553

This morning as U.S. and Iraqi troops started to pull out, two more antitank mines tore through two Iraqi troop carriers one after another, injuring at least 21 soldiers, five seriously.

Antitank mines have become one of the top threats as U.S. and Iraqi forces press their assault in a Sunni insurgent redoubt said to be riddled with weapons caches, secret tunnels and training ranges. Their convoys have hit at least 10 explosive devices since the operation was launched early Thursday, most of them antitank mines.

"We used to be pretty good about finding IED [improvised explosive device] tripwires and such," 1st Sgt. Michael S. Clemens said. "But since they started using antitank mines, that hasn't worked so well."

The devices first were used in the area in November, when U.S. forces faced off against fighters maneuvering through the irrigation canals that lace the region.

U.S. vehicles have been upgraded to withstand many attacks, including in some cases adding armor around their fuel tanks that Iraqi vehicles lack. U.S. forces also have developed strategies to mitigate the impact of the blasts, including driving very slowly so the effects are concentrated on the engine box, not the passenger compartment.

Iraqi forces are often less cautious. And they sometimes attach extra fuel containers to the sides of their vehicles, U.S. soldiers noted. It was not immediately clear whether that played a part in Saturday's fiery explosion.

After three days of slow, methodical searches through remote hamlets in the region about 40 miles east of Baghdad, some Iraqi soldiers had started complaining Saturday that they were tired from spending a rain-soaked night in uncovered troop carriers. Adding to the frustration, the day coincided with a scheduled troop rotation, when most had expected to go home. U.S. officers decided it would boost morale to allow them to drive back for a hot meal.

"We do not like the MREs," said one Iraqi 1st lieutenant, wrinkling his nose in distaste. He gave his name only as Ali.

Capt. Stephen Dobbins, a troop commander in the U.S. Army's 5th Squadron, 73rd Cavalry, was driving on the opposite side of a canal road Saturday when one of the American vehicles was hit.

The charred carcass of a Humvee damaged in the first blast had already been loaded onto a truck and driven over the same stretch of road when another Humvee rounded a bend and touched off the deafening blast. Dobbins jumped out of his vehicle and strode down the road to help oversee the response.

Soldiers rushed forward to pull dazed and bloodied comrades from the stricken vehicle. Medics applied bandages and intravenous drips. Black Hawk helicopters swooped in to collect the four most seriously wounded, including one soldier with two possibly broken legs and another sitting upright on a stretcher with a blackened face and bloodshot eyes.

The explosion had blown out the front of the vehicle, sending bits of twisted metal and a backpack flying at soldiers standing nearby. A panel that protects the gun turret dangled from its hinges, and the passenger compartment was filled with bits of equipment.

Once the wounded were seen to, soldiers turned to salvaging the wrecks.

As he turned back toward his Humvee, Dobbins paused to kick dirt over blood spots.

"I don't want them to be able to come back and see that we were bleeding," he said. "It's a trophy for them."

About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces are involved in the assault aimed at reclaiming an area military commanders say has become a haven for Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups.

The troops have been moving from village to village, hunting for weapons, fighters and intelligence. All military-age men are questioned and tested for explosives residue. But in most homes, soldiers are finding only women and children.

In Samoudi, many homes stood eerily empty Saturday as U.S. and Iraqi forces moved through the large farming community. At one house, rows of brightly colored plastic shoes were neatly lined up outside the door, and the remnants of the previous night's meal had not yet been washed from the pots in the kitchen. There was black leather furniture in the living room, a television set and a motorcycle, which U.S. forces call "the insurgents' Humvee."

"That's an awful lot of nice stuff to leave behind," Dobbins said.

Those who remained contended that there was nothing suspicious about their neighbors' disappearance.

"People are jittery when the forces come, so they gather together," said Madeha Alwan, a tall, weathered woman sitting cross-legged on the floor with her husband's second wife, his sister and a throng of children. "These children couldn't sleep last night, so we brought them here together." Her husband, she said, was tending to his sheep.

Searching through fields and grain stacks, troops found sniper rifles, hand grenades and ammunition boxes. Six men were detained for questioning.

In one building along a notoriously mined road, soldiers found equipment to amplify a radio or wireless phone signal and a map they believed might indicate weapons caches.

U.S. forces think the building served as an observation point, part of an elaborate early warning system that includes fires, flares and gunshots to alert fighters that vehicles are approaching. Thirteen men were detained there, the military said.

DOJ_NMG_0113554

Calming Voice Sought In A Restive Region (LAT)

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

The Marines hope to persuade Iraqi women in Al Anbar province to talk their men into fighting the insurgency.

BAGHDADI, IRAQ — The living room of the local sheik is filled to the bursting point with women. Some are covered in traditional garb and say little. Others take pictures and talk excitedly. They have come together for an unlikely gathering in this patriarchal society: a women's discussion group.

The U.S. military is reaching out to women in several communities in the rebel stronghold of Al Anbar province, in hopes of persuading them to tell their husbands and sons to help in the fight against the insurgency.

"We want to empower the women to the point where they can have a positive influence on the men, when they're alone, in the home, in the bedroom," said Marine Master Sgt. James Allen, who helps coordinate the effort but, as a man, cannot attend the gatherings.

Angela Khadijah Williams, a public diplomacy officer with the State Department, goes a step further. She believes outreach to Iraqi women is essential.

"If you don't bring them in, you're not going to win," said Williams, who is based at Camp Fallouja to help with what the military calls the Women's Engagement Program.

In this community along the Euphrates River, 120 miles from Baghdad, Sheik Mal Allah has given approval to a women's group and allowed it to meet in his home. The turnout was so good for the recent session, he joked that if any more came, "they'd break my house."

Allah also is a member of the City Council and, along with his brother, has rallied residents to resist intimidation and hijacking of food by insurgents in surrounding cities. His brother is a colonel with the local police.

"You are my brothers," the sheik told a group of visiting Marine brass.

The women's outreach effort is in its first stages with no tangible results so far, another reason the Marines say the fight against the insurgency in Al Anbar is a long process where patience is key.

"Right now, we're relationship-building, listening to these women … building trust," said Marine Cpl. Jennifer McNamara, who is involved with a group in another community.

In Baghdadi, female Marines and Navy corpsmen have given lectures to the group on prenatal and child care and other health issues.

The U.S. has donated sewing machines. The Marine Corps plans to provide a building inside the troops' guarded compound here where the women can meet safely.

Brig. Gen. Robert Neller, deputy commanding general of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, said he hoped the women would realize that "the insurgency has nothing to offer these people."

The sheik has taken a strong stand against the insurgents. "They want to take us back in history," he said through an interpreter.

After initially being resistant to helping the Americans, the sheik has come to believe the United States presents the best opportunity to combat the insurgents and compensate for a government in Baghdad that he does not believe cares about this Sunni Arab community.

"Nobody helps us from the Iraqi government," he said. "They do nothing to remove our sadness."

So far, few sheiks are as willing as Allah to embrace the idea of women's participation. In Qaim, near the Syrian border, for example, the men initially gave their approval to a meeting of women but then withdrew it.

Finding a sheik to step forward in the fight against the insurgency is not easy, Marines said. In the nearby community of Hit, no sheik has been as bold as Allah.

"Identifying trustworthy, reliable people willing to step up and take a position of responsibility has been difficult," said Army Capt. Will Bardenwerper, whose unit has responsibility for Hit.

"There's just been so much murder and intimidation," he said.

Even when a sheik offers help, the Americans have learned to be cautious. Some sheiks claim authority they don't have. Some make promises they don't keep, Marines said.

A sheik functions as a kind of village elder, often receiving payments from members of his tribe.

The insurgency threatens to disrupt long-standing economic arrangements. The Americans try to convince sheiks that the Marines can help them retain their economic position and status.

Allah decided to help the Americans because food supplies for his community were routinely stolen by insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0113555

The U.S. sent his brother to a police academy in Jordan so the man would become part of the police department rather than form a militia.

At the recent meeting at Allah's house, the women of Baghdadi were attentive and apparently eager for more sessions.

McNamara said that in the gatherings she had attended, the women seemed to appreciate having someone listen to them.

The Marines are trying to be culturally sensitive, McNamara said.

"We're not going to tell them, 'Throw off your veils and be free,' " she said. "We're not trying to change their culture."

Official: Evidence Doesn't Back Marines (AP)

By Robert Burns,

AP, January 7, 2007

U.S. criminal investigators found no evidence to support the claim of Marines charged in the deaths of unarmed Iraqi civilians that five were shot after trying to flee the scene of a roadside bombing that killed one Marine, a senior defense official said Saturday.

Investigators determined that all five Iraqis were shot within arm's length of each other and no more than 18 feet from the white taxi they were ordered to exit by members of a Marine squad in the western Iraqi town of Haditha, said the official, who is familiar with reports produced by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service.

The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to publicly discuss details of the killings on Nov. 19, 2005.

Two Marines are charged with murder in the five deaths. They are Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich and Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz.

Two other Marines — Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt and Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum — face murder charges in connection with the deaths of other Iraqi civilians shot shortly after the killings by the taxi.

Through his lawyers, Wuterich has claimed he acted appropriately and within military rules governing the use of deadly force in combat.

Mark Zaid, an attorney for Wuterich, said in an interview Saturday he was highly disappointed that information from the government's investigative report on Haditha had been leaked to the media. He called it an effort by unidentified Pentagon officials to "portray a negative slant of these Marines."

Tatum's attorney, Jack Zimmerman, said he got the report the day after Christmas and has not "even begun to crack it." He called disclosure of details from the report a "serious, serious violation" and said he may ask the military to investigate the source of the leak.

Attempts on Saturday to reach lawyers for DelaCruz and Sharratt were unsuccessful.

Dela Cruz told investigators he fired bullets into the five bodies as they lay on the ground and that he later urinated on one, the defense official said.

These details about the deaths were first reported in Saturday's Washington Post, which said it obtained a copy of a lengthy government investigative report. The Post published photos from the investigative file that had not previously been made public; one shows the five Iraqis sprawled near the taxi.

One of the five may have been kneeling at the time he was shot, the defense official told The Associated Press.

In addition to the four Marines facing murder charges, four other Marines who were not at the scene were charged with dereliction of duty for failing to report or properly investigate the killings. In all, the case involves the deaths of 24 Iraqi civilians.

The Haditha investigation is the biggest U.S. criminal case involving civilian deaths so far in the Iraq war.

Members of an explosive ordnance disposal team that was summoned to the scene scoured the taxi and found no weapons or evidence of bomb-making materials, the defense official said. At least two, and possibly four, of the five Iraqis were students; the other was the taxi driver, who was taking the students to school.

The Marines claimed later that the five were attempting to flee and that they fit the profile of military-age men who, in the past, had acted as spotters for insurgents setting off roadside bombs. Zaid said Wuterich's position is that the five had disobeyed the Marines' orders, issued in Arabic, and were starting to flee. He said the report that they were up to 18 feet from the taxi supports Wuterich's position.

The NCIS investigators determined that the five had no apparent link to the bombing that morning in Haditha that shattered a Marine Humvee utility vehicle and killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas; two other Marines were injured.

The shooting of the men near the taxi was the first in a series of violence responses by the Marines, according to the NCIS investigation. The Marines subsequently raided four nearby houses, killing 18 unarmed civilians inside three of the residences. One other was shot dead outside. Among the dead were women and children.

The Marines were with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, based at Camp Pendleton, Calif.

After the deaths, the Marines announced that 15 civilians had been killed in Haditha from a roadside bombing and a Marine firefight with insurgents. The Marines said eight insurgents also were killed. The Marines have since acknowledged that that report was false.

The matter, involving an unusually large number of civilian casualties, was not investigated by the military until a Time magazine reporter inquired about the deaths in January 2006.

The military launched the first phase of its investigation in February, and in March it began a separate administrative probe focusing on how the matter was reported in official Marine Corps channels and whether there was an attempted cover-up. On the basis of that investigation, four Marines were charged with dereliction of duty.

The NCIS began its probe in March and it grew into the agency's largest criminal investigation in years.

One worry of military prosecutors is that American investigators failed to persuade the families of the any of the 24 dead to permit their bodies to be exhumed and examined to obtain forensic evidence.

The NCIS had hoped to gain access to the bodies so they could, for example, compare wounds on the bodies to the blood stain patterns at the scene and to other evidence and witness statements.

U.S. government officials went so far as to propose through the Iraqi government in Baghdad last year that a nongovernment humanitarian organization with medical credentials be permitted to exhume and examine the 24 bodies, but the families rejected that approach.

___

Associated Press Writer Elliot Spagat in San Diego contributed to this report.

U.S. Inquiry Backs Charges Of Killing By Marines In Iraq (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

An American government report on the killing of 24 Iraqis, including several women and children, by marines in the village of Haditha in 2005 provides new details of how the shootings unfolded and supports allegations by prosecutors that a few marines illegally killed civilians, government officials said yesterday.

The report, by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, contains thousands of pages of interviews with marines, Iraqi Army soldiers who had accompanied them and Iraqi villagers who had seen the attack. The shootings followed a roadside bombing that killed a young lance corporal and wounded two other marines, said a senior Defense Department official and another official who had read the report.

The evidence contained in the report, the most exhaustive of several inquiries begun by the military last year to determine what happened in Haditha that day, led prosecutors to charge four enlisted marines with murder. Four marine officers, who were not present during the attack, were also charged with dereliction of duty and other crimes for failing to properly report details of the episode.

The details of the investigation, first reported by The Washington Post yesterday, corroborate accounts of how the killings took place over a period of hours, as described by senior military and Defense Department officials last year in The New York Times.

But the report broadly expands those descriptions, and provides additional evidence, sworn testimony and accounts of witnesses that both prosecutors and lawyers for the accused marines are likely to use in upcoming courts martial, officials said.

The four enlisted men charged with unpremeditated murder, all members of a squad of Company K, Third Battalion, First Marines, are: Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich of Meriden, Conn.; Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz, 24, of Chicago; Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt, 22, of Carbondale, Pa.; and Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum, 25, of Edmond, Okla.

The attack on the Iraqis began after the roadside bomb blew up one of four Humvees the marines were traveling in on Nov. 19, 2005. Minutes after that, the report portrays Sergeant Wuterich, the squad leader, and Sergeant Dela Cruz as killing five men who had nervously piled out of a taxi that had stopped near the marine convoy, the officials said.

The men “were shot by Wuterich as they stood, unarmed, next to the vehicle approximately 10 feet in front of him,” the report said, according to a person who has read it.

Sergeant Dela Cruz said that as he approached the taxi, he saw some men standing near it with their hands in the air, officials said. After Sergeant Wuterich shot them, he continued shooting as they lay on the ground, and later urinated on one of them, an official said.

The marines, taking small arms fire from several locations near homes on either side of the convoy, attacked a home nearby, killing six people, including a young boy, a woman and two elderly people, none of them armed, the report said, according to officials and people who have read it.

The report said that marines told investigators who interviewed them months later that they believed they had permission from their superiors to fire at will inside that home and a second home they raided minutes later, officials said. They said an officer, First Lt. William Kallop, who arrived with other marines after the roadside bomb to support the squad under fire, told them to commandeer one of the homes.

In one of the houses the marines raided, the report said, a 13-year-old girl, Safah Yunis Salem, said she survived by pretending to be dead after marines killed several family members, including her 3-year-old sister and 5-year-old brother, government officials said.

One person who has read the N.C.I.S. report and who is sympathetic to the marines' account of events said that its thousands of pages provides evidence for both prosecution and defense teams, and that drawing conclusions from it about the guilt of any of the accused marines is difficult.

"For every statement that said X happened, there's another statement that said Y happened," this person said, speaking only after being granted anonymity, because he was not authorized to discuss the report.

An N.C.I.S. spokesman declined to comment on the report, which it has not officially released, and said the agency was troubled by the leak of it to The Post. "N.C.I.S. strives to ensure the integrity of every investigation and finds the idea that someone might leak any of its investigative products to be deeply troubling," the spokesman said.

Several lawyers representing the accused marines expressed anger at the Defense Department, which they blamed for allowing the report to be given surreptitiously to a newspaper and, they said, potentially damaging their clients' cases.

"The defense lawyers are extremely upset," said Mark Zaid, a lawyer for Sergeant Wuterich, the squad leader who is charged with killing at least a dozen Iraqis. "The release of the entire evidentiary set is unethical and appears to have been done by certain Pentagon officials with the intent to harm the defendant's defense."

The report offer some contradictory evidence, and omits other issues about how the marine chain of command handled the aftermath of the attack that have rankled certain people within the military and defense department. One issue is the cash payments that commanders approved giving to families of people killed in the attacks.

Maj. Gen. Richard A. Huck, the commander of the Second Marine Division at the time, and Col. Stephen W. Davis, then the regimental commander, should have suspected the killings were improper, one Defense Department official said yesterday. Though the Marine Corps' official view of the Haditha matter remained that 15 Iraqis were killed by the roadside bomb, the Marine Corps nonetheless approved $2,500 payments to each of at least 15 families of people killed in the episode.

"The numbers simply never added up, and the Marines never acknowledged it," the Defense Department official said.

Marines' Photos Provide Graphic Evidence In Haditha Probe (WP)

By Josh White, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Capturing images of war on their digital cameras, as many troops in Iraq have done, Marines took dozens of gruesome photographs of the 24 civilians who were killed in Haditha, Iraq, in November 2005.

The images -- which investigators tracked down on several laptop computers and digital media drives, some in the United States -- provide visual evidence of a series of shootings outside a taxi and inside three homes that military criminal investigators have alleged were murders.

Much like the photographs that emerged in the Abu Ghraib prison abuse cases, the Haditha images have provided investigators powerful and visceral evidence of what happened. But unlike the detainee photographs, which were turned over to officials who then investigated the case, the Haditha images were discovered months after the shootings as more than 60 Naval Criminal Investigative Service agents scoured the globe for them.

Investigators found photographs on laptop computers that were shipped back to the United States and recovered images that had supposedly been deleted from a Sony PlayStation Portable memory drive, according to investigative documents.

Marines were found to have downloaded the images from each other's devices, traded them and loaded them onto personal Web sites; one Marine told investigators he saw some of the photographs set to music on another Marine's computer. Some were e-mailed from Iraq to a civilian in the United States, but none surfaced publicly until now.

Among the images, there is a young boy with a picture of a helicopter on his pajamas, slumped over, his face and head covered in blood. There is a mother lying on a bed, arms splayed, the bodies of three young children huddled against her right side. There are men with gaping head wounds, and a woman and a child hunkered down on their knees, their hands frozen around their faces as if permanently bracing for an attack.

Several Marines took photographs on Nov. 19, 2005, some of them as part of an intelligence-gathering operation and some in order to record what had happened to a Humvee that was destroyed by a massive roadside bomb, killing Lance Cpl.

Miguel "T.J." Terrazas. The photographs of the bomb crater and the shredded vehicle show the power of the explosion that set the Haditha incident in motion.

The images are contained in thousands of pages of NCIS investigative documents obtained by The Washington Post. Post editors decided that most of the images are too graphic to publish.

Ed Buice, an NCIS spokesman, said he could not comment on an open investigation: "NCIS strives to ensure the integrity of every investigation and finds the idea that someone might leak any of its investigative products to be deeply troubling."

One Marine who decided to hold onto the photographs made it certain that officials would have a clearer view of what happened that day. Lance Cpl. Andrew A. Wright, who arrived on the scene after the violence to care for the bodies, took photographs of the dead and kept a full set.

"I decided that it was in my best interest to obtain the photos I had taken that night," Wright told investigators. "Even though there was no investigation at the time, I felt that the photographs would be evidence if anything came up in the future. In my opinion, the people that I photographed had been murdered."

Because the killings in Haditha were not investigated until four months afterward -- initially, Marine officers decided the shootings did not appear out of the norm -- the photographs are in some cases the only hard evidence. Officials are hoping to use them to reconstruct the events because they have not been able to exhume the Iraqi victims' bodies.

NCIS officials are comparing the images with the Marines' statements about what happened.

Investigators have found 44 photographs that a civil affairs officer took in the days after the incident as part of an effort to make condolence payments to the families of the dead. The pictures show pockmarked walls and bloodstained floors.

Investigators also found video from an unmanned aircraft that was aloft in the region that day, but it began recording after the first reports of a roadside bomb and the initial shootings, according to the documents. The video shows Marines conducting door-to-door searches, according to an intelligence officer's statement.

Defense lawyers for four Marines who have been charged with murder in the killings said they believe it will be hard to prove anything based on the photographs alone, other than that the Marines killed the people while hunting for insurgents. The Marines have told investigators that they were following their rules of engagement.

Marine Corps officials believe that many of the photographs -- which show the results of grenade explosions inside civilian homes and close-range rifle shots -- are inflammatory by their nature, no matter whether a crime was committed. Investigators have gone to great lengths to keep them private. It is possible that even the most grim images will surface publicly in military court proceedings.

Witness Accounts Of Attack On Civilians Revealed (LAT)

From Times Wire Services

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — A Marine squad just hit by a roadside bomb in Iraq ordered five unarmed Iraqi civilians out of a taxi, and the squad leader shot them, witnesses say in a report obtained by the Washington Post.

The report by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which reveals previously undisclosed details about the Haditha incident, says a taxi happened upon the scene shortly after the explosion. Witnesses told investigators that the Marines' squad leader, Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, ordered the passengers out of the car.

Naval investigators said that Wuterich shot the Iraqis one by one as they stood next to the vehicle, about 10 feet from him, the Post reported Saturday.

Another Marine allegedly fired shots into the victims' bodies as they lay on the ground.

"They didn't even try to run away," said one witness, a young Iraqi soldier working with the Marine squad. "We were afraid from Marines and we saw them behaving like crazy. They were yelling and screaming."

Four Marines have been charged in the Nov. 19, 2005, deaths of 24 civilians, including women and children, that occurred immediately after a roadside bomb killed one Marine and injured two. In addition, four officers, who were not there during the killings but were accused of failures in investigating and reporting the deaths, have been charged.

Marines took dozens of gruesome photographs of the civilians who were killed, the newspaper reported today in a subsequent article.

Much like the photographs that emerged in the Abu Ghraib prison abuse cases, the images — which investigators tracked down on several laptop computers and digital media drives, some in the United States — provide visual evidence of what happened. But unlike the detainee photographs, which were turned over to officials, who then investigated the case, the Haditha images were discovered months after the shootings as more than 60 Naval Criminal Investigative Service agents scoured the globe for them.

The killings have led to the biggest U.S. criminal case involving civilian deaths in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0113559

After the taxi passengers were shot, the report says, the Marines raided nearby houses, firing indiscriminately in a bloody, door-to-door sweep, killing 14 unarmed inhabitants in 10 minutes.

The four Marines charged with murder in the killings are: Wuterich; Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz; Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt; and Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum. They face a maximum penalty of life in prison if convicted.

N.E. Toll In Iraq Nearly Doubles (BOS)

By Raja Mishra, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 7, 2007

Most of 40 killed in '06 were men under age 25

The number of New Englanders killed in combat in Iraq nearly doubled last year to 40, mostly men under age 25 cut down by increasingly lethal hidden roadside bombs, according to a Globe analysis.

Military analysts said the numbers underscore a troubling aspect of the war: Insurgents have been able to outwit American forces by improving roadside bombs and other improvised explosive devices, resulting in a steady stream of deaths among the young soldiers and Marines typically assigned to daily patrols.

In New Hampshire, 2006 was particularly difficult for military families. The number of Iraq deaths jumped from two in 2005 to eight, and five of last year's dead were younger than 25, leaving a trail of unfulfilled aspirations.

Behind the grim statistics are such young men as Ryan T. McCaughn , whose dreams of opening a bar and grill vanished in an instant in November when an improvised explosive device ripped through the 19-year-old Marine lance corporal as he hunted insurgents in Anbar Province.

"He was my heart and soul," said his mother, Nicole Cote , 44, of Manchester, N.H. "He was always talking about his future, about having kids and being a father."

Of the 40 New Englanders killed in Iraq last year, 26 -- 65 percent -- were under age 25, according to the Globe analysis. Overall, among the most recent 1,000 Americans killed, between late October 2005 and the end of December, about 56 percent were younger than 25, according to a recent Pentagon study.

"The people out on patrol are the most likely to be in that age group," said David J. Danelo , a Marine who fought in Iraq and the author of "Blood Stripes: The Grunt's View of the War in Iraq," a combat memoir.

"Young people assume the greatest risk in this war," he said.

Overall, New England fatalities in Iraq have fluctuated over the course of the war, dipping in 2005, then increasing last year to nearly the level of 2004, the first full year of combat.

The victims are often such young people as 19-year-old Michael L. Ford of New Bedford, one of the youngest Massachusetts men to die last year in Iraq, killed by an improvised explosive device in April. He sent his father a letter from Iraq that said only "Hi," typical of his sense of humor, his family said. Ford planned to convert his Marine Corps experience into a career in law enforcement.

Scott Procopio , 20, of Saugus, became engaged to his longtime sweetheart, Kristal Cerbone , just six months before he was killed by an IED in April.

McCaughn had his own plans.

"The one thing he always talked about was opening his own restaurant," Cote said. "It would have a full-service bar and serve all kinds of food."

McCaughn graduated in spring 2005 from Central High School in Manchester, where he took culinary courses. He saw the military as a way to pay for further culinary training and left for boot camp on Parris Island, S.C., one week after graduation.

"He was the kind of person that thought about everyone else," said his mother, her voice trembling. "He was special, very special."

The deaths of older servicemen were no less tragic. David J. Babineau , 25, of Springfield, killed last June, left behind two sons, ages 2 and 4, and ambitions of becoming a five-star general.

Increasingly, the agent of these deaths is the improvised explosive device.

The devices caused about 22 percent of the deaths among the first 1,000 troops killed, according to the Pentagon analysis. But among the most recent 1,000 deaths, they accounted for 47 percent of fatalities.

The numbers were even starker among New England military personnel killed last year: 57 percent of Massachusetts deaths and 75 percent of New Hampshire deaths were caused by IEDs.

Military specialists said the increasing frequency of IED deaths showed the insurgents' tenacity. IEDs are hidden along roadsides and sidewalks, and often triggered by cellphone signals or hidden timers.

DOJ_NMG_0113560

"It's a really cheap, easy, and anonymous way to attack. I could show you how to make one in about 20 minutes," said Paul Rieckhoff , an Iraq veteran and executive director of Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America. "By the time I left in the winter of 2004, they were in full bloom."

The US military now teaches IED detection and handling during basic training. Humvees and other personnel carriers have been upgraded with armor.

In response, insurgents have come up with more sophisticated devices. They have also made bigger IEDs by using the tons of explosives that were stolen from unguarded Iraqi military buildings in the weeks after the US invasion in March 2003.

"There's been a competition between ourselves and the insurgents. Over time, the IEDs have gotten bigger, more powerful and the triggering devices have gotten more sophisticated," said Boston University international relations professor Andrew J. Bacevich , whose son is fighting in Iraq. "We've never been able to get the lead on that competition."

And with President Bush expected to announce this week that he will send tens of thousands of more troops to Iraq, military specialists predicted that roadside bombs will kill many more young Americans.

"A lot of these young people don't speak the language and don't have a good grasp of what's going on around them," said military analyst Loren B. Thompson of the Lexington Institute, a nonpartisan think tank in Arlington, Va. "It's easy for insurgents to use IEDs against them. And it will continue."

Case Tests Officers' Right To Dissent (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

1st Lt. Ehren Watada's lawyer likens his client's comments against the war and the administration to those of retired military officials.

Do military officers have the right to publicly voice dissent about their commander in chief and U.S. war policy?

That question highlighted last week's pretrial hearing at Ft. Lewis Army base near Seattle for 1st Lt. Ehren Watada, the nation's first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq. Watada faces a court-martial and six years in prison for failing to deploy with his Stryker Brigade last year and for making four public statements criticizing President Bush and the Iraq war.

"This is an important case that will test the limits of dissent within the Army officer corps," said Eugene R. Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice in Washington, D.C.

Watada, a 28-year-old Honolulu native who enlisted after the Sept. 11 attacks, said he gradually came to the conclusion that the Bush administration had lied about the basis for war and had betrayed the trust of the American people, making Watada ashamed to wear the uniform. In media interviews and in a speech at a peace convention, Watada also said that the Iraq war was "not only morally wrong but a horrible breach of American law," and that soldiers could stop it by refusing to fight.

Civilians would unquestionably be free to make such remarks under the 1st Amendment, but Army officials argue that soldiers voluntarily surrender some of that freedom when they choose to join the military. Watada's statements constitute the criminal offense of "conduct unbecoming an officer," Army officials argue.

"While service members do have freedom to speak, what you say must be in keeping with good order and discipline in the military and with national security," said Ft. Lewis spokesman Joseph Piek.

Watada's attorney, Eric Seitz, argued last week that even military personnel could voice dissent, particularly on issues of such public importance as war. In motions to dismiss the charges of unbecoming conduct, Seitz argued that Watada's dissent was respectfully delivered and did not rise to the moral failings the military code was meant to punish, which include "dishonesty, unfair dealings, indecency, indecorum, lawlessness, injustice and cruelty."

"Whether or not one agrees with Lt. Watada's conclusions, it was no sign of personal degradation or moral unfitness for him to speak his conscience on gravely important issues of war and peace," Seitz argued.

Seitz also argued that Watada was being selectively prosecuted; he noted that several high-ranking retired military officials had criticized the war effort and not been charged with any offenses.

Retired officers who draw a military pension are still subject to military law.

But two of those cited in Seitz's motion, Army Maj. Gens. John Batiste and Paul D. Eaton, said in interviews that they drew sharp distinctions between Watada's conduct as a still-active-duty officer and their own remarks after they left the service.

"It is totally inappropriate if not unauthorized for an active-duty officer to publicly criticize the chain of command," said Eaton, a 33-year military veteran who led the Iraqi security forces training program before stepping down last January. He subsequently called then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld "incompetent" and urged Rumsfeld to resign in an op-ed article.

Americans should not let sentiment against the unpopular Iraq war lead them to endorse behavior that undermines the military system and threatens national interests, Eaton said.

DOJ_NMG_0113561

"The American people have to have absolute faith that when the call to duty goes out, soldiers do precisely what their commander in chief asks them to do," Eaton said.

"What the American people can't have is an Army of people who on any given day can wake up and say, 'That's not what I want to do.' "

Batiste, who commanded the 1st Infantry Division in Iraq until March 2005, also said he had been careful not to criticize the war effort until he made what he called a "gut-wrenching decision" to resign from the military after 31 years. Batiste subsequently called for Rumsfeld's resignation and blasted U.S. policy for failing to commit enough resources to win the war, for watering down Geneva Convention prisoner protections and for promoting democracy over security.

"You don't [criticize] in public — not while you're wearing the uniform," Batiste said. "It's contrary to the culture and norms of the military."

Others have hailed Watada as a courageous soldier of conscience, including retired U.S. Army Col. Ann Wright and international law expert Francis Boyle.

Fidell of the military justice institute said officials chose not to prosecute soldiers who put "Impeach Nixon" bumper stickers on their cars in the 1970s. In contrast, he said, officials successfully pursued unbecoming-conduct charges against a military doctor who urged soldiers not to fight during the Vietnam War; the conviction was upheld by the Supreme Court.

Lt. Col. John Head, the military judge in Watada's case, is expected to issue a written decision this week on whether to dismiss the unbecoming-conduct charges before Watada's February court-martial trial. Those charges carry a maximum four-year sentence.

Head will also rule on whether to grant Watada's request for a hearing on the legality of the Iraq war. The lieutenant is arguing that the Bush administration failed to obtain proper authorization for the war and that the Nuremberg principles adopted after World War II require soldiers to refuse illegal orders. But Seitz said the judge indicated last week that he would probably not permit the hearing.

Contractors In War Zones Lose Immunity (BOS)

By Farah Stockman, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 7, 2007

Bill provision allows military prosecutions

WASHINGTON -- An estimated 100,000 employees of US defense contractors working in Iraq are no longer immune from military prosecutions, because of a little-noticed provision in a 2007 defense spending bill aimed at holding private contractors accountable for crimes committed in war zones.

For the past three years, an unprecedented number of private contractors in Iraq have performed jobs previously reserved for the military, with immunity from military rules that govern troops and from criminal prosecution in Iraqi courts.

The legal loophole caused outrage during the Abu Ghraib scandal in 2004. Soldiers involved in abusing prisoners were sentenced in military courts, but the civilian interrogators working alongside them for Titan Corp. and CACI International, two private firms, faced no punishment.

The 2007 Defense Bill, enacted in October, placed contractors and others who accompany the military in the field under the same set of military laws that govern the armed forces.

"Basically 100,000 contractors woke up to find themselves under the Uniform Code of Military Justice," said Peter W. Singer , a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution who specializes on civilian military contractors and whose article on a defense blog Thursday called attention to the change.

Previously, the code applied to "persons serving with or accompanying an armed force in the field" only during a war, which US courts interpreted to mean a war declared by Congress. No such declaration was made in the Iraq conflict. Now, Congress has amended the code to apply to persons accompanying an armed force during a "declared war or contingency operation."

The amendment, spearheaded by Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, was the latest in a series of moves by lawmakers to plug legal loopholes that had allowed contractors who had committed crimes overseas to escape justice. A Senate aide said the amendment passed with little discussion. "There was a concern about whether we have an adequate allocation of legal responsibility for contractors," said the aide, who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to speak to the media. "If they are not subject to Iraqi law, what law are they subject to?"

But the provision might also have unintended consequences, if the military chooses to use its new power to court-martial civilians. For instance, the language in the law is so broad that it can be interpreted as saying that embedded journalists and contract employees from foreign countries would also be liable under the military code. Other punishable offenses under the code include disobeying an order, disrespecting an officer, and possession of pornography -- far less serious than the crimes that Congress envisioned when drafting the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0113562

Contractors have yet to react publicly to the changes. A spokeswoman for L-3 Communications, which has sent hundreds of translators to work with the US military in Iraq, said the company could not comment on government policy. Calls to Halliburton, another major US contractor in Iraq, were not returned.

Some military law specialists said the move to allow civilians to be tried in military courts would raise alarm bells with human rights groups and the United Nations, and in US civilian courts.

"I think there should have been some kind of hearing before Congress passed this measure," said Eugene R. Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice, a nonprofit organization in Virginia. "Ultimately, if this power is used, it will create a substantial issue that would likely reach the Supreme Court, and it will put us at odds with contemporary international standards."

Fidell said that US courts have a history of throwing out convictions of civilians who were tried in military courts, including the 1957 case of a wife who killed her husband on a military base.

"There was a period of decades that you could have crimes by US persons overseas that could never be punished," he said.

In 1970, during the Vietnam War, a civilian contractor convicted of larceny in a military court had his conviction overturned because Congress had never formally declared war in Vietnam, and therefore the court-martial had no jurisdiction.

In 2000, in Bosnia, a group of employees from DynCorp International , a Virginia-based security contractor, were accused of stockpiling illegal weapons and participating in a prostitution ring. Military investigators found a home video of an alleged rape and extracted a confession from one of the men, but they were never prosecuted because they were deemed immune from court-martial and from Bosnian laws.

That same year, Congress passed the Military Extraterritorial Jurisdiction Act, which asserts that US federal courts can prosecute civilians working for the Defense Department overseas. But that law was largely geared toward crimes committed by relatives of troops and has never been widely used to prosecute contractors, Singer said.

Congress eventually broadened that law to include all US government contractors, but US civilian prosecutors have been reluctant to take on such cases because witnesses and victims are thousands of miles away in a war zone. The Justice Department team responsible for initiating such charges has not gone forward with any of the nearly two-dozen cases referred by the Pentagon and the CIA, partly because of lack of evidence, according to The New York Times.

Fidell said the Defense Department could decline to prosecute the cases, just as the Justice Department has, even though Congress has given the department the power to do so. Only a handful of contractors have been prosecuted in US courts, mostly for financial crimes under a whistle-blower statute that protects the US government from fraud.

British Deals Seen Hurting Fight Against Taliban (WT)

By Ahmed Rashid, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan -- British policy in Afghanistan is seriously damaging Western efforts against the Taliban, diplomats from allied countries have warned.

Officials from the United States and European members of NATO say Britain is increasingly at odds with its coalition partners over its policy of making arbitrary peace deals with the Taliban, while at the same time declining to put pressure on Pakistan to stop providing sanctuary to the Taliban leadership.

Diplomats in Kabul and Islamabad, the capitals of Afghanistan and Pakistan, say Britain's "go-it-alone policies" are threatening military preparations for a major Taliban offensive expected next month.

Western officials have strongly criticized a deal in Musa Qala in Afghanistan's Helmand province, where thousands of British troops are fighting a resurgent Taliban faction.

British commanders say the deal was struck with tribal elders, but it has been claimed that the agreement was actually made with the Taliban, who controlled the town. British officers deny the accusation.

The truce is now reported to be breaking down, with large numbers of heavily armed Taliban returning to Musa Qala.

Britain wants more such deals, but the United States and some NATO allies have rejected the idea.

Lt. Gen. David Richards, the British commander of the 32,000-strong NATO force, will be replaced this year by Lt. Gen. Dan MacNeil, an American who is expected to cancel all such agreements, officials said.

"We're going to have to fight those [Taliban]. I don't see any opportunity or need to negotiate," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher said recently.

Europe's other contention is over the relationship with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf.

NATO is trying to forge a common front to put pressure on Gen. Musharraf to end the sanctuary that elements within Pakistan's intelligence services provide the Taliban.

DOJ_NMG_0113563

The issue is of critical importance in the next few weeks as the Taliban is expected to recruit thousands of men and collect arms and other supplies for its spring offensive.

But Britain has resisted such pressure. Instead, Prime Minister Tony Blair lavished praise on Gen. Musharraf when Mr. Blair visited Islamabad in November.

The reason, diplomats say, is the cooperation between Britain's MI6 intelligence agency and Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) agency on Britain's domestic terrorist threat from British-born extremists of Pakistani origin.

"Even though British troops in Helmand are facing attacks from Pakistan-based Taliban, London is willing to sacrifice that issue in exchange for getting ISI help on its home-based terrorist problems," a senior European official said.

Bombs Target NATO Convoys In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

A roadside bomb struck a NATO vehicle in southern Afghanistan on Saturday, wounding one soldier, while a suicide bomber in a car wounded four soldiers in the country's east, officials said.

The roadside bomb hit the NATO vehicle in Zhari district in Kandahar province, wounding one soldier, said Capt. Andre Salloum, a spokesman for the NATO-led force. He did not disclose the nationality of the wounded soldier.

A suicide bomber, meanwhile, plowed his car into a NATO convoy in eastern Afghanistan's Paktika province on Friday, wounding four soldiers, said Mohammad Akram Akhpelwak, the province's governor.

The bomber struck the convoy, which also included Afghan security forces, in Bermel district, he said.

A NATO spokesman confirmed the blast and said some soldiers were wounded but he did not disclose the number. Most of the troops in that region are American.

The Bermel region borders Pakistan, and a U.S. base there sees frequent rocket attacks. Afghan and Western officials say that militants cross the border to launch attacks against Afghan and foreign troops in the country.

Afghan-Pakistani Bond Steadily Deteriorating (WP)

By Pamela Constable, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Plan for Border Fence, Mines Seen Deepening Distrust

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Jan. 6 -- A proposal by Pakistan to plant land mines along the border with Afghanistan, aimed at preventing Islamic insurgents from using Pakistan as a sanctuary, has aroused angry protests by Afghan leaders who say the mines would endanger innocent travelers and divide tribal lands whose inhabitants do not recognize the border.

The contretemps is the latest sour note in a deteriorating relationship between the neighboring Muslim governments, both staunch U.S. allies that are linked by the common threat of terrorism but divided by bitter cross-charges of failing to curb a growing Islamic insurgency that operates on both sides of the border.

On Thursday, after a lengthy meeting in Kabul with Pakistani Prime Minister Shaukat Aziz, Afghan President Hamid Karzai said there was still an increasing "lack of trust" between the countries. The plan to mine and fence the border, Karzai said bluntly, "will not prevent terrorism, but it will divide the two nations."

The tension has persisted despite a series of high-level meetings between Karzai and senior Pakistani officials, including the two-day visit by Aziz to the Afghan capital this week and a private session with President Bush at the White House in September that brought Karzai together with the Pakistani president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf.

Taliban insurgents have spread across southern Afghanistan in the past year, battling NATO troops and launching hundreds of attacks, including suicide bombings against government facilities, military convoys and schools. Afghan and Pakistani officials have repeatedly blamed each other for failing to control the violent groups.

Karzai and his aides accuse Pakistan of allowing Taliban leaders and their sympathizers to seek refuge across the border, especially in the semiautonomous tribal districts. Recently, U.S. officials have made the same claim after months of defending Musharraf as an important partner in the war against terrorism.

"The Taliban have been able to use those areas for sanctuary and for command and control and for regrouping and supply," Richard A. Boucher, a senior State Department official, said during a visit to Canada two weeks ago, although he noted that Pakistani authorities had historically not "held sway" in the tribal regions.

Pakistani officials, in turn, maintain that they have tried every possible means of reining in the Islamic fighters, first sending about 80,000 army troops to the restive border areas and then negotiating agreements with tribal leaders who pledged to control or eject armed Islamic groups. Both efforts have met with major problems.

"We have been the target of a whisper campaign that we are not doing enough, but no one has yet defined what enough is," Tariq Azim Khan, Pakistan's minister of state for information, said in an interview Saturday. "We have gone the extra mile, and we have lost many troops. This is a joint fight and a joint struggle, but we can only look after our side of the border. The Afghans have to look after their side, too."

DOJ_NMG_0113564

Pakistan's latest proposal, to lay mines and string barbed wire along parts of the 1,500-mile border, has struck some observers as either cynical or far-fetched, but officials here insist that they are serious about it and that the work will begin sometime this month. They said they have made careful plans to avoid areas of heavy legal cross-border traffic and focus on others where clandestine crossings occur.

"If people take the legal routes, there will be no problem. They will be clearly marked," the information minister said. "Our intention is to go after those who want to move illegally," he said, comparing Pakistan's plan to the strenuous efforts made by U.S. authorities to stop illegal immigrants crossing from Mexico.

The minister noted that in addition to insurgent fighters, drug traffickers use hidden routes to bring opium out of Afghanistan, which produces 90 percent of the world's heroin supply. He suggested that drug-related groups, who are powerful in southern Afghanistan, could be using their influence against the border-sealing plan.

But Afghan reaction to the proposal has been negative for other reasons. Many Afghans have echoed Karzai's assertion that it would arbitrarily divide the Pashtun tribes that live on both sides of the border, while insurgents would continue to slip across.

Moreover, Afghanistan has endured terrible human suffering from hundreds of thousands of land mines laid during 25 years of military conflict, first by the occupying Soviet army in the 1980s and then by warring Afghan Islamic militia factions in the 1990s. The United Nations and other aid groups have spent millions of dollars on mine clearance, but many areas are still infested with the deadly devices.

"We are against planting mines on the border because we have many bad memories of mines in Afghanistan," Mir Wali Khan, a member of Afghan's parliament from Helmand province, said in a telephone interview Saturday. "This cannot possibly stop the terrorists, and it's not even clear where the border is. Pakistan always lies about trying to help us. They don't want a stable Afghanistan, they are just interfering in our affairs."

The information minister and other Pakistani officials insist that it is very much in Pakistan's interest to have Afghanistan become stable and peaceful, in part because Pakistan is tired of hosting several million refugees from years of Afghan conflict and is worried that renewed turmoil could send a new flood of people fleeing across the border. During his visit to Kabul this week, Prime Minister Aziz stressed Pakistan's determination to begin registering and returning all remaining refugees.

Taliban officials, for their part, have sent contradictory signals about their relations with Pakistan. Some have boasted that they can move freely in the tribal areas and also in the southern border city of Quetta, Pakistan, where the Taliban leadership council is widely reported to be based. But a statement this week attributed to Mohammad Omar, the fugitive Taliban leader, insisted that the entire movement was based in Afghanistan and was not receiving any foreign assistance.

Omar and other Taliban officials have vowed to step up their attacks against the Afghan government, its civilian collaborators and the 40,000 NATO troops stationed in Afghanistan, whom they condemn as infidel occupiers. They have rejected recent proposals by Karzai for tribal meetings or peace negotiations.

Solemn Duty In Section 60 (WP)

By Brigid Schulte, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Rising Death Toll of Young Service Members Complicates an Arlington Tradition

On a winter day when the rows and rows of white headstones were shrouded in a band of low-lying mist at Arlington National Cemetery, Jane Newman took her place in the white-gloved military honor guard. As the ashes of the latest fallen soldier arrived, she placed her hand over her heart in the civilian salute.

She didn't know this soldier or the family that shuffled behind his urn, shoulders stooped in grief. As usual, she knew only his name, Keith E. Fiscus. His age, 26. His years of service in the Army, four, and the names of his next of kin. Yet when she went through the paperwork that morning, she felt a pang. He was one more soldier killed in Iraq.

When she was invited five years ago to become an Army Arlington Lady, Newman, the wife of a 30-year Army artillery officer and herself a retired Army nurse, was drawn to the group's mission: that no soldier is ever buried alone. Every fourth Tuesday of the month, she spends the day at Arlington, standing graveside, hand over heart, at up to six funerals a day.

When she started, most of the soldiers she was burying were World War II veterans or soldiers who had lived long lives. Handing a condolence card on behalf of the Army chief of staff and saying a few kind words from the "Army family" to a grieving widow was never easy. But these days, as the death toll from the Iraq war has topped 3,000 and many of the buried are young soldiers, Newman and other Arlington Ladies are finding it difficult to do their solemn duty. Some have asked to be excused.

"I find myself saying, 'Stiff upper lip, Jane,' " she said after a funeral. " 'Stiff upper lip.' "

DOJ_NMG_0113565

An Arlington Lady does not cry. An Arlington Lady is not a professional mourner. She is not a grief counselor, according to their strict Standard Operating Procedure. She is there simply so that somebody is. Since 1973, when the Army chief of staff's wife saw a veteran's funeral with no one attending, an Army Arlington Lady, in muted civilian dress and often muddy pumps, has stood graveside at every funeral at Arlington as the personal representative of the chief of staff. Occasionally, she is the only one there.

She is part of a society open only to military wives or widows and then only to those invited to join. The Navy ladies formed in 1985. The much smaller Air Force had Arlington Ladies as far back as 1948. Now, the Navy, Air Force and Army have about 50 Arlington Ladies each. The Marines do not want to participate. The Marines take care of their own, the groups have been told.

Arlington Ladies adhere to a strict dress code -- no slacks, no bright colors. Sunglasses are permitted at all times. They stand at attention with the honor guard. Their role in the ceremony is brief: When the flag has been presented to the grieving family, they approach, offer a few words of comfort and a handwritten note and back away, never once turning their backs on the flag.

"We add a little more personal touch to the military funeral," explained Margaret Mensch, chair of the Army Arlington Ladies. "Yet not too personal."

Getting too personal got one Arlington Lady in trouble last year. After a particularly emotional funeral in section 60, where the dead from Iraq and Afghanistan are buried, she kissed the foreheads of the widow and mother. "She was reprimanded for that," Mensch said.

But it was just that gesture that Cindy Upchurch, the mother of Spec. Clinton Upchurch, who was killed by a makeshift bomb in Iraq, needed that day. "It was a blessing," she said recently. "I don't remember who the Arlington Lady was, but she was elderly and she was so kind. You could tell she was heartbroken. And at that point in a mother's life, when you've lost a child in a violent death, in a war, you need some human touch."

Lt. Col. William Barefield, Arlington's senior Army chaplain, says he sees Arlington Ladies as healers. "I watch the families. After we present the flag, you sense a little bit of sadness, like 'Oh, it's over,' " he said. And that's when the Arlington Ladies walk into what he calls the "eye of the storm -- the unbelievable sorrow for a death in war. They represent someone at the highest level of government. It's an acknowledgment that this life was one of a kind."

Their duty days are still filled with the funerals of old veterans. Of all the troops killed in Iraq and Afghanistan, fewer than 300 are buried at Arlington National Cemetery. "Some are so young," Mensch said, "the families want them closer to home."

Mensch has been attending funerals, stoic and tearless, for nearly 30 years. But the young ones killed in combat are difficult. When one of the dead on her schedule one day turned out to be her former honor guard escort, killed in Iraq, she had to steel herself. "You are still. You just don't cry. When I got there, I thought, 'Just concentrate on that leaf on that tree over there,' " she said. "A military funeral is very dignified. Very precise. It may sound cold, but that's the beauty of it."

Alba Thompson, an Army Arlington Lady, gets down on her knee and touches the hand of the widow or mother. It's hard, regardless of age, to approach what she calls this "sacred space." But it's especially hard when it's a young widow. Once, a widow wore a strapless dress. She caught herself wondering: Had she never been to a funeral before? Or was this his favorite dress?

"I tell them, 'I don't know what I can say right now to make you feel better. Just remember that thousands of people come through here, and when they see the name of your husband or your son, they'll know he was a good and honorable man. They'll know he served his country,' " she said. "Some of them nod, and some of them are bitter."

Only the Navy Arlington Ladies will meet the families before the service and send follow-up notes several months later to see how families are faring. The Army is just so much bigger -- and soldiers make up the majority of those killed in Iraq and Afghanistan -- so the Army Ladies can't, Mensch said. Nor does she want to intrude on families. "We're strangers to them."

On that December morning, Jane Newman found herself tearing up as six soldiers in dress uniform carefully smoothed and folded the American flag that had been draped over Fiscus's ashes. And taps always makes her catch her breath. When the flag was presented to Fiscus's mother, who collapsed over it, and the acrid air burned from the three volleys of rifle fire, Newman approached the mother. Perhaps it was better, she said later, that she didn't know Sgt. Fiscus once called his mother "as tough as woodpecker lips" and his hero. Better not to know, as she later read in the newspaper, that Pamela Fiscus had asked her son not to go to this war.

She draped her hand over the woman's shoulder and told her, with a quiver in her voice, that the nation was grateful for her son's sacrifice. The mother continued clutching the flag, head bowed and weeping.

And because this is a controversial war, because recent polls show that the majority of Americans, including Pamela Fiscus, oppose it, Newman finds it difficult to say that sometimes. "It's particularly hard when the family is wondering, 'Are they dying in vain for this?' "

DOJ_NMG_0113566

Those fears, said Paula McKinley, chair of the Navy Arlington ladies, are not new. "They have permeated every war since World War II." And all the more reason that an Arlington Lady be present. "We have to understand that every person buried at Arlington was a hero to someone."

As they sit at their desks between funerals, the Arlington Ladies keep their politics to themselves. They are military wives. They do their duty. And sometimes, not everyone comes out alive. Having been wives or mothers of soldiers, pilots and sailors, the Arlington Ladies know what it means when a commitment is made to serve.

As Keith Fiscus's family remained at the columbarium to mourn in private, Newman and her escort returned to the administrative building to warm up. "She was so upset," Newman said of Fiscus's mother. "It's a son. And you're not supposed to bury your children."

Later that day, the Defense Department announced that another soldier had died in Iraq.

DOJ:

Hopis Pleased Member Recommended (AR)

By Az In D.c., Billy House

The Arizona Republic, January 7, 2007

News last week that Hopi Tribe member Diane Humetewa was being recommended by Arizona's senators to President Bush as a potential nominee to be the next U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona was met with excitement in the village of Kykotsmovi.

Justice Department officials said Friday that they've determined she would not be the first Native American U.S. attorney in the entire nation, because past and former U.S. attorneys from states including Utah, South Dakota, New Hampshire and West Virginia have claimed Native American heritage. But she would be the first Native American U.S. attorney for the Arizona district if nominated and confirmed.

Hopi Tribal Vice Chairman Todd Honyaoma Sr. said Humetewa is a member of the Tobacco/Rabbit Clan from the Village of Kykotsmovi.

"We could not be more proud of and exhilarated for our sister and daughter," he said.

"The Hopi way is that we place a high value on education and serve as stewards to our communities and to the world. Ms. Humetewa has exemplified this value many times in her life," Honyaoma said.

"She will make history."

First days

After being sworn into office, Arizona's Rep. Harry Mitchell joined House Democratic leaders at a news conference Thursday urging colleagues to vote for a package of laws to improve ethics in Congress.

The House later acted on several measures, including those to bar members from accepting meals and gifts from lobbyists and requiring lawmakers to publicly disclose the pet projects, referred to as earmarks in legislative form, they want.

Mitchell, a former state senator, said there wasn't much of a difference between a Washington news conference and one in Arizona, "other than there was just more reporters and more cameras."

But he said he was genuinely surprised by one thing last week - the 15 minutes given to House member to cast their votes on the floor.

"I was comparing it to my state senator experience," he said, when everyone simply sat at their desks and voted.

"Here you get 15 minutes and people are walking around and talking," Mitchell said. "It's quite a bit different . . . there's no order . . . well, you have to get used to the order."

Reach the reporter at billy.house@arizonarepublic.com or 1-(202)-906-8136. Read his blog on Washington politics at dcblog.azcentral.com.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

More $200 Million Parachutes? Don't Be Shocked (NYT)

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

IT has been a bit bewildering to watch two failed chief executives in the last two weeks or so waltz away from their companies toting severance packages worth more than $200 million each. But pay experts say shareholders had better get ready for more of the same.

DOJ_NMG_0113567

Last week, Robert L. Nardelli hightailed it out of Home Depot with $210 million, fast on the heels of Hank McKinnell, whose farewell package of a similar amount from Pfizer was disclosed Dec. 21. Both were paid profusely for failure, thanks to contracts struck years ago by the companies' directors.

Keep in mind that both packages supplemented pay that these executives received during their tenures. Mr. Nardelli's $210 million, for example, came on top of the $63.5 million he made running Home Depot for six years.

That exit numbers like these have shocked many shareholders proves how much inadequate disclosure has kept executive pay hidden from view. But with new rules from the Securities and Exchange Commission on improved pay disclosures, more of these "holy cow" moments will be coming soon to a proxy near you.

Under the new rules, companies will have to disclose potential payments to executives in the case of a termination or a change in control at the company, wrought perhaps by a merger. Unfortunately, the S.E.C. did not require that these payments be made in tabular form and totaled, which would have made it simple for time-pressed investors.

For the most part, however, the figures will be there in black and white.

Are we likely to see any $200 million numbers? Yes, said Mike Sorensen, a principal at Exequity, a law firm in Libertyville, Ill., that does compensation work. He expects such largess to show up at roughly 10 of the nation's 100 largest companies.

"There are a lot of big numbers out there for many companies," Mr. Sorensen said. "Directors right now are looking at these things and saying, 'Wow, these are really embarrassing; we have to revisit this.' But that won't happen overnight."

A CHIEF executive with 10 years of service at a top-100 company might typically be in line to receive $50 million to $60 million in pension obligations, deferred compensation and cash severance, Mr. Sorensen estimated.

That doesn't include the value of executives' share grants, however, which is a wild card. Executives who have received oodles of options over the years and never sold a share will have a much larger total value, for example, than executives who have exercised options regularly and sold shares.

But for all the work that went into the new disclosure requirements, they still leave shareholders in the dark in several crucial areas, said Brian Foley, an independent compensation consultant in White Plains. As a result, the total pay picture will still elude us.

"Things are not going to quite make it to the surface the way they should have," Mr. Foley said. "The summary compensation is not even close to one-stop shopping, which is what one S.E.C. commissioner said was the goal."

For example, Mr. Foley said the new rules should have required a cumulative tally of exercised stock options, restricted stock awards that could be cashed in and long-term incentive payouts. That way, shareholders could see how much wealth executives had already banked.

Another missing figure: dividends paid on restricted stock and unvested stock awards.

Neither do the rules require disclosure of how much the company has contributed to an executive's defined-contribution plan, such as a 401(k). For executives who have been at a company for a long time, this can be a big number, Mr. Foley said.

Also on his wish list is full disclosure of the impact of financial restatements on executive pay dispensed in previous years, especially for executives who were directly involved in activities that led to restatements. It is not as if restatements are rare: during the first nine months of 2006, according to the research firm Glass Lewis & Company, 967 companies restated their financial results, 6.5 percent more than did so in the same period the previous year. These restatements almost certainly mean that some executives were paid for results they did not actually achieve.

But the biggest hole in the new rules, Mr. Foley said, is that they do not require the disclosure of compensation or benefits that have been paid between the end of the year covered by the proxy statement and the date of its filing, which could span several months. Often, he said, companies make large grants in the early months of their fiscal years, but shareholders don't find out about them until more than a year later, unless they pore over insider-trading forms.

"What is the excuse for not having an update section that picks up the big-ticket items like employment agreements and equity awards that went to the big guys?" Mr. Foley asked. "The proxy at the time of mailing ought to be more current."

Last week's outcry over Mr. Nardelli's exit pay certainly means that boards will be looking at their companies' tallies, even if they are preliminary. When they do, directors should quickly correct past compensation mistakes, said Jesse M. Brill, publisher of CompensationStandards.com, a Web site specializing in pay issues.

Two practices are eroding public trust in the system, he said. The first is the granting of stock to executives who already own so many shares that additional awards cannot possibly motivate them further. The second is to continue giving retirement, severance and change-in-control pay to people who have already accumulated "several lifetimes of wealth."

"Many boards will need to implement a coordinated offset," Mr. Brill wrote, "so that when accumulated gains from equity and long-term incentives reach an agreed-upon amount, post-employment provisions become unnecessary and are canceled out."

DOJ_NMG_0113568

This is surely going to be a neck-wrenching change for executives and directors who seem unable to comprehend the concept that enough is enough. Breaking executives of their more-more-more habits won't be easy, of course. Thank Mr. Nardelli for getting directors' attention, at least.

Shareholders can do their part by withholding their support for any director who doesn't try to cut back on excess pay. That could make the coming proxy season more entertaining than ever.

He's Not Out Of Cash, But Is Out Of The Club (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

On the very same day that he left Home Depot last week with an exit package worth at least $210 million, Robert L. Nardelli walked away from another prominent position — without a cent.

While he was still Home Depot's chairman and chief executive, Mr. Nardelli volunteered as the chairman of a disaster-response task force at the Business Roundtable, a kind of club for corporate chieftains that lobbies for their interests.

Last month, he met at the White House with Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, and other top government and military officials to discuss improved collaboration on disaster preparedness.

On Tuesday, though, Mr. Nardelli had to quit the group. The Business Roundtable is only for sitting chief executives.

At least he is in good company. The roundtable's former chairman, Hank McKinnell, had to quit last year after he was pushed out of Pfizer, coincidentally with his own $200 million severance package.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Racist Murder Or Suicide? New Mayor's Death Roils Town (AP)

AP, January 7, 2007

WESTLAKE, Louisiana (AP) -- In the hours before his death on the evening of December 30, the first black mayor of this overwhelmingly white town started learning his new job.

About noon, he set City Hall's alarm system for the first time. He got instructions on how to raise and lower the U.S. flag. He had already ordered a new mayoral letterhead with his name on it and a button-down shirt embroidered "Gerald Washington, Mayor."

A few hours later he indulged in a hobby, placing a $4 bet at a nearby horse-racing track.

But by 10 p.m. Gerald "Wash" Washington was dead in the deserted parking lot of a former high school, a bullet wound in his chest. His gun was found by the body.

The coroner and the sheriff have pronounced Washington's death a suicide -- a finding that has embroiled this oil-refinery town in conspiracy theories, with Washington's kin and friends insisting he had no reason to end his life. (Watch what relatives have to say and why a second autopsy was ordered)

Some have accused police of covering up a murder -- perhaps a racially motivated one.

"This is the South, so of course everybody's going to say it was some white guy shooting a black guy," said Dr. Terry Welke, the Calcasieu Parish coroner who ruled that Washington killed himself.

Welke said soot from the pistol was deep in the wound, indicating the gun was touching Washington's chest when the trigger was pulled. That, he said, suggested suicide. He also said that while most gunfire suicides involve a bullet to the head, it is not unusual for people to kill themselves with a shot to the chest.

But the coroner and the sheriff have offered no reason for why Washington would have killed himself. No suicide note was found. And there is no evidence he bade farewell to anyone, put his financial affairs in order, or gave any other indication he was about to kill himself, authorities said.

Washington's son, Geroski, accused the sheriff's office of doing a sloppy job, and asked the state police to take over the investigation.

"We were dissatisfied with the time frame of the investigation and the way it was opened and closed. We're thinking it's a cover-up because of the quick and fast work they did and didn't do," he told the American Press, the local newspaper.

State police entered the case earlier this week and took the body to Baton Rouge for another autopsy. The state police said it is interviewing friends of Washington's family, but it would not otherwise comment on the investigation.Popular, with 'a smile that would light up this room'

DOJ_NMG_0113569

Gerald Washington, 57, was a Vietnam veteran, a retired refinery supervisor who spent 12 years as a city councilman. He stood about 6-feet-5 and enjoyed rumbling around town on his Harley Davidson, dressed in leather pants and chaps. Colleagues described him as magnetic, outgoing and always friendly.

"He had a smile that would just light up this room," said the outgoing mayor, Dudley Dixon. "He had a just dominating personality."

Washington's popularity was obvious: He defeated a white opponent in last fall's election with 69 percent of the vote in this town, which is 80 percent white. Westlake, population 4,500, is near Lake Charles, about 200 miles west of New Orleans.

On the day of his death, Washington met Dixon about noon at City Hall, where he learned about the alarm system. The men lowered the flag to half-staff, to commemorate the death of former President Ford.

A passing motorist called 911 just before 10 p.m., after spotting Washington's body in the parking lot of the school administration building that used to be Mossville High, where Washington went to school and played basketball. Washington lay on his back, in a T-shirt and baseball cap, the coroner's office said.Pearl-handled revolver and betting slip near body

Near the body was a pearl-handled revolver. On Washington's body investigators found a betting slip from Delta Downs from 4:44 p.m.

The coroner said the reaction of Washington's family to the suicide finding -- disbelief -- is not unusual.

"Almost every case of suicide is like that," he said. "Suicides give us more grief than anything else."

That explanation hasn't dampened rumors in town, particularly among blacks, that it should be a murder case.

"Someone lured him to Mossville," said Pat Hartman, 61, a lifelong resident of Mossville, the neighboring town where she and Washington went to school. "Why would he want to go to Mossville, to kill himself at his alma mater?"

"That boy didn't kill himself. Somebody killed him."

FBI: Man Tried To Extort $1.5M From Oprah (AP)

AP, January 7, 2007

Atlanta man allegedly threatened to release taped conversations

CHICAGO - A man has been charged with trying to extort $1.5 million from Oprah Winfrey by threatening to release recorded telephone conversations he claimed would hurt her reputation, according to the FBI and published reports.

Keifer Bonvillain, 36, targeted a person identified only as “a public figure and the owner of a Chicago-based company,” according to a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court. The Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Sun-Times, citing unnamed sources, reported Saturday that Bonvillain’s target was Winfrey.

Bonvillain, of Atlanta, was arrested Dec. 15 in the parking lot of an Atlanta hotel and released on $20,000 bail. He was scheduled for a preliminary hearing in Chicago on Monday.

Story continues below ? advertisement

According to the complaint, Bonvillain met a California-based employee of the Chicago company at a party more than two years ago, then recorded conversations with the employee about the owner and her business.

In mid-October he sent the owner an e-mail, telling her an employee said awful things about her, the complaint states.

‘It was a big mix-up,’ suspect says

A month later, Bonvillain sent a letter saying he had tapes of the conversations, an FBI agent alleges in the complaint. In response, another associate of the company called Bonvillain and learned he had taped 12 hours of those discussions.

Over the next few weeks, Bonvillain told the associate he wanted to publish a book based on the tapes and claimed he had received offers of $500,000 to $3 million from tabloids and book publishers, the complaint said.

“There are a lot of people who would want these,” Bonvillain said, according to the complaint.

The associate, who was working with the FBI, agreed to a $1.5 million price, wired Bonvillain $3,000 in earnest money and arranged to meet him in the parking lot, the complaint said. Bonvillain was arrested the next day.

U. Student Sentenced For Hacking Into Professor's Accounts (DESERET)

By Geoffrey Fattah, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, January 7, 2007

A 22-year-old University of Utah computer science student has been sentenced to four months incarceration and 120 days home confinement after admitting to hacking into his professor's university and personal accounts, changing grades and reading personal e-mails.

During a sentencing hearing in U.S. District Court on Thursday, You Li promised U.S. District Judge Tena Campbell to lead a more honest life. "Those things were so wrong and were against my conscience and my beliefs," Li said.

DOJ_NMG_0113570

Li, a Chinese national, was arrested by FBI agents at a campus dormitory last February. According to a grand jury indictment, Li was accused of using a software program to break into the university's math department computer system in December of 2004.

Li has admitted to using a professor's user name and password to attempt to change his grades in classes, read e-mails and obtain other passwords and bank account information.

According to federal prosecutors, Li also accessed the professor's personal e-mail account and installed a key-logging software that recorded the professor's other user names and passwords as well as other actions.

Li's attorney, Robert Steele, said his client has been "humbled" by his mistakes and assured the court his client would not get into any more trouble.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Scott Garland said Li's actions went beyond just changing a grade and that the student ventured into his professor's bank account and personal life.

Campbell called Li's actions "abhorrent" but noted Li's personality and potential did not warrant heavy prison time.

Li was sentenced to serve four months at a local county jail contracted with the federal system and then 120 days home confinement. Li cannot access an online-enabled computer without prior written permission by the court and is not to possess any data encryption programs.

Garland said punishment for Li's crime was necessary to send a message to other computer science students. In particular, Garland said the U.S. Justice Department is concerned about such students being recruited by organized crime groups.

Li faced a maximum of up to 15 months. Steele said had Li been sentenced to more than 12 months he would have been considered an aggravated felon and would have been immediately deported to China. As it is now, Li will still face an immigration review.

Attack Of The Zombie Computers Is Growing Threat (NYT)

By John Markoff

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

In their persistent quest to breach the Internet's defenses, the bad guys are honing their weapons and increasing their firepower.

With growing sophistication, they are taking advantage of programs that secretly install themselves on thousands or even millions of personal computers, band these computers together into an unwitting army of zombies, and use the collective power of the dragooned network to commit Internet crimes.

These systems, called botnets, are being blamed for the huge spike in spam that bedeviled the Internet in recent months, as well as fraud and data theft.

Security researchers have been concerned about botnets for some time because they automate and amplify the effects of viruses and other malicious programs.

What is new is the vastly escalating scale of the problem — and the precision with which some of the programs can scan computers for specific information, like corporate and personal data, to drain money from online bank accounts and stock brokerages.

"It's the perfect crime, both low-risk and high-profit," said Gadi Evron, a computer security researcher for an Israeli-based firm, Beyond Security, who coordinates an international volunteer effort to fight botnets. "The war to make the Internet safe was lost long ago, and we need to figure out what to do now."

Last spring, a program was discovered at a foreign coast guard agency that systematically searched for documents that had shipping schedules, then forwarded them to an e-mail address in China, according to David Rand, chief technology officer of Trend Micro, a Tokyo-based computer security firm. He declined to identify the agency because it is a customer.

Although there is a wide range of estimates of the overall infection rate, the scale and the power of the botnet programs have clearly become immense. David Dagon, a Georgia Institute of Technology researcher who is a co-founder of Damballa, a start-up company focusing on controlling botnets, said the consensus among scientists is that botnet programs are present on about 11 percent of the more than 650 million computers attached to the Internet.

Plagues of viruses and other malicious programs have periodically swept through the Internet since 1988, when there were only 60,000 computers online. Each time, computer security managers and users have cleaned up the damage and patched holes in systems.

In recent years, however, such attacks have increasingly become endemic, forcing increasingly stringent security responses. And the emergence of botnets has alarmed not just computer security experts, but also specialists who created the early Internet infrastructure.

DOJ_NMG_0113571

"It represents a threat but it's one that is hard to explain," said David J. Farber, a Carnegie Mellon computer scientist who was an Internet pioneer. "It's an insidious threat, and what worries me is that the scope of the problem is still not clear to most people." Referring to Windows computers, he added, "The popular machines are so easy to penetrate, and that's scary."

So far botnets have predominantly infected Windows-based computers, although there have been scattered reports of botnet-related attacks on computers running the Linux and Macintosh operating systems. The programs are often created by small groups of code writers in Eastern Europe and elsewhere and distributed in a variety of ways, including e-mail attachments and downloads by users who do not know they are getting something malicious. They can even be present in pirated software sold on online auction sites. Once installed on Internet-connected PCs, they can be controlled using a widely available communications system called Internet Relay Chat, or I.R.C.

ShadowServer, a voluntary organization of computer security experts that monitors botnet activity, is now tracking more than 400,000 infected machines and about 1,450 separate I.R.C. control systems, which are called Command & Control servers.

The financial danger can be seen in a technical report presented last summer by a security researcher who analyzed the information contained in a 200-megabyte file that he had intercepted. The file had been generated by a botnet that was systematically harvesting stolen information and then hiding it in a secret location where the data could be retrieved by the botnet master.

The data in the file had been collected during a 30-day period, according to Rick Wesson, chief executive of Support Intelligence, a San Francisco-based company that sells information on computer security threats to corporations and federal agencies. The data came from 793 infected computers and it generated 54,926 log-in credentials and 281 credit-card numbers. The stolen information affected 1,239 companies, he said, including 35 stock brokerages, 86 bank accounts, 174 e-commerce accounts and 245 e-mail accounts.

Sensor information collected by his company is now able to identify more than 250,000 new botnet infections daily, Mr. Wesson said.

"We are losing this war badly," he said. "Even the vendors understand that we are losing the war."

According to the annual intelligence report of MessageLabs, a New York-based computer security firm, more than 80 percent of all spam now originates from botnets. Last month, for the first time ever, a single Internet service provider generated more than one billion spam e-mail messages in a 24-hour period, according to a ranking system maintained by Trend Micro, the computer security firm. That indicated that machines of the service providers' customers had been woven into a giant network, with a single control point using them to pump out spam.

The extent of the botnet threat was underscored in recent months by the emergence of a version of the stealthy program that adds computers to the botnet. The recent version of the program, which security researchers are calling "rustock," infected several hundred thousand Internet-connected computers and then began generating vast quantities of spam e-mail messages as part of a "pump and dump" stock scheme.

The author of the program, who is active on Internet technical discussion groups and claims to live in Zimbabwe, has found a way to hide the infecting agent in such a way that it leaves none of the traditional digital fingerprints that have been used to detect such programs.

Moreover, although rustock is currently being used for distributing spam, it is a more general tool that can be used with many other forms of illegal Internet activity.

"It could be used for other types of malware as well," said Joe Stewart, a researcher at SecureWorks, an Atlanta-based computer security firm. "It's just a payload delivery system with extra stealth."

Last month Mr. Stewart tracked trading around a penny stock being touted in a spam campaign. The Diamant Art Corporation was trading for 8 cents on Dec. 15 when a series of small transactions involving 11,532,726 shares raised the price of the stock to 11 cents. After the close of business that day, a Friday, a botnet began spewing out millions of spam messages, he said.

On the following Monday, the stock went first to 19 cents per share and then ultimately to 25 cents a share. He estimated that if the spammer then sold the shares purchased at the peak on Monday he would realize a $20,000 profit. (By Dec. 20, it was down to 12 cents.)

Computer security experts warn that botnet programs are evolving faster than security firms can respond and have now come to represent a fundamental threat to the viability of the commercial Internet. The problem is being compounded, they say, because many Internet service providers are either ignoring or minimizing the problem.

"It's a huge scientific, policy, and ultimately social crisis, and no one is taking any responsibility for addressing it," said K. C. Claffy , a veteran Internet researcher at the San Diego Supercomputer Center.

DOJ_NMG_0113572

The $6 billion computer security industry offers a growing array of products and services that are targeted at network operators, corporations and individual computer users. Yet the industry has a poor track record so far in combating the plague, according to computer security researchers.

"This is a little bit like airlines advertising how infrequently they crash into mountains," said Mr. Dagon, the Georgia Tech researcher.

The malicious software is continually being refined by "black hat" programmers to defeat software that detects the malicious programs by tracking digital fingerprints.

Some botnet-installed programs have been identified that exploit features of the Windows operating system, like the ability to recognize recently viewed documents. Botnet authors assume that any personal document that a computer owner has used recently will also be of interest to a data thief, Mr. Dagon said.

Serry Winkler, a sales representative in Denver, said that she had turned off the network-security software provided by her Internet service provider because it slowed performance to a crawl on her PC, which was running Windows 98. A few months ago four sheriff's deputies pounded on her apartment door to confiscate the PC, which they said was being used to order goods from Sears with a stolen credit card. The computer, it turned out, had been commandeered by an intruder who was using it remotely.

"I'm a middle-aged single woman living here for six years," she said. "Do I sound like a terrorist?"

She is now planning to buy a more up-to-date PC, she said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gay "Marriage" Ballot Measures Running Their Course (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

The legislative approval of a marriage constitutional amendment in Massachusetts last week means that at least three states have a good chance of having such measures on their 2008 ballots.

But this is a considerably smaller crop of amendments than in previous elections, and there are signs that the state amendment strategy may have run its course.

The push to get voters to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman in state constitutions started in 1998, when traditional-values activists in Hawaii and Alaska used the tactic to overrule state Supreme Court decisions legalizing same-sex "marriage."

The amendment strategy took off after the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court legalized same-sex "marriage" in November 2003, and now 27 states have voter-approved marriage amendments.

But no other state court has followed the Massachusetts court -- in fact, nine recent court decisions have upheld state marriage laws -- "so, yes," the issue has "died down," said Glen Lavy of the Alliance Defense Fund, an Arizona-based legal organization active on same-sex "marriage" cases.

"But that doesn't mean that people are less interested ... and don't forget California," he said. The California Supreme Court will hear arguments on its same-sex "marriage" case this spring. If it reverses the state appellate court and finds a constitutional right to same-sex "marriage," "there will be a marriage amendment on the [California] ballot next year," Mr. Lavy said.

Meanwhile, of the 23 states without marriage amendments:

·Florida, Indiana and Massachusetts are on track to put an amendment before voters in 2008. Florida has an amendment petition drive under way; lawmakers in the other states must pass the amendments a second time before they can be put before voters.

·Lawmakers in Iowa, Maryland, Minnesota, North Carolina and Pennsylvania debated but failed to pass amendments in their last sessions. Amendment bills could resurface, but would face strong opposition.

·New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer and California Assemblyman Mark Leno have taken stands in favor of legalizing same-sex "marriage." In 2005, California lawmakers made history when they passed a bill creating "gender-neutral" marriage. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger vetoed it, saying the people or the courts should decide the issue. Last year, Rhode Island lawmakers introduced pro-homosexual "marriage" bills for the ninth time, homosexual rights advocates said.

·In Illinois, a petition drive to put a nonbinding marriage amendment on the 2006 ballot failed, and the Arizona marriage amendment was defeated at the polls. It's not known if Illinois activists will try for another amendment, but Mr. Lavy said that "there's a good chance" a new Arizona amendment will appear.

DOJ_NMG_0113573

·Connecticut, New Jersey and Vermont appear to have settled the same-sex "marriage" issue by enacting civil union laws, and there are signs New Hampshire lawmakers may follow suit.

·Delaware, Maine, New Mexico, Washington, West Virginia and Wyoming do not appear to have much, if any, activity on the amendment issue.

ANTITRUST:

.S. Steel Continues To Explore Options (PTR)

By C.M. Mortimer, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, January 7, 2007

U.S. Steel Corp. still is eyeing Middletown, Ohio-based AK Steel Corp., or it could go shopping for a raw materials supplier in Central or Eastern Europe as steel industry consolidation continues, analysts said.

Merger mania was resurrected when Nucor Corp., the second-largest U.S. steel producer behind U.S. Steel, last week agreed to acquire Toronto-based Harris Steel Group Inc. for about $1.07 billion.

Conjecture over a possible U.S. Steel takeover of AK Steel surfaced in March. "Last year, their board was looking at AK Steel, and I heard they're still watching it," said independent analyst Charles Bradford, of Soleil Securities in New York.

Bradford said he understood U.S. Steel may be looking in Central and Eastern Europe, where assets are cheaper.

"Domestically, they have the iron ore and coke they need. In Central Europe, they don't have any of that. They may also be looking at smaller, government-owned steel companies," said Bradford, who did not identify potential foreign targets.

U.S. Steel operates a plant in Kosice in the Slovak Republic, the largest flat-rolled steel producer in Central Europe. The company operates U.S. Steel Serbia, too.

U.S. Steel CEO John Surma told analysts during a third-quarter conference in November that the company is not ruling out acquisitions. "We think there still could be opportunities to expand our footprint," he said.

"We believe in consolidation, and we continuously evaluate strategic opportunities focusing mostly in North America and Europe. Any acquisition we would make, however, would have to create value for our company and our shareholders. It has to generate a good return on capital, has to be accretive and generate cash," said Charles L. Rice, spokesman for U.S. Steel.

AK Steel declined comment on speculation involving U.S. Steel, said spokesman Alan H. McCoy.

Bradford said another potential target could be Illinois-based IPSCO Inc., a producer of tubular products and steel plate, with annual steelmaking capacity of 4 million tons. "It could be a good fit for U.S. Steel because IPSCO has assets in Canada," he said.

U.S. Steel may be interested in a steel processing company, said Ivan Feinseth, director of research for Matrix USA, LLC, New York.

Feinseth named Columbus, Ohio-based Worthington Industries, which processes steel and makes steel products for the automotive and aerospace industries, and Los Angeles-based Reliance Steel & Aluminum Co., a large metals service company, which also produces hot-rolled and cold-finished steel.

Feinseth said a potential acquisition target could be Grupo IMSA, a Mexican steel processor whose products include galvanized metal plate, cold and hot-rolled metal plate.

U.S. Steel may also look overseas.

"They may do something in Europe to bolster their raw material position there," said Leo Larkin, equity analyst for Standard & Poor's in New York.

Larkin said U.S. Steel's interest in AK Steel may be lukewarm, and obstacles could include labor difficulties, health care and pension liabilities and potential anti-trust reviews. "It could happen, maybe my anti-trust concern is overblown," Larkin said.

AK Steel generated revenue of about $6 billion in 2005. The company remains mired in an 11-month labor dispute at its Middletown plant, with the International Association of Machinists Local Lodge 1943, which represents about 1,800 members.

U.S. Steel's stock has surged in the past year on speculation it could be an acquisition target. It closed Friday at $69.72, down 92 cents. It gained 46 percent in 2006.

"All of the big steel companies could be interested," said Matrix USA's Feinseth, who estimated the value of U.S. Steel anywhere from $85 to $90 per share.

S&P's Larkin mentioned POSCO, a South Korean steelmaker, as a possible suitor. "POSCO has a strong balance sheet, and they're in an expansion mode. It would strike me as logical, and they have the financial strength to pull it off," Larkin said.

POSCO shipped about 30 million tons of steel, generating about $26 billion in revenue in 2005. During the same period, U.S. Steel shipped about 25 million tons of steel and generated revenue of about $14 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0113574

C.M. Mortimer can be reached at cmortimer@tribweb.com or (724) 836-5252.

US Airways Chief Digs In For Delta Fight (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 7, 2007

Don't mistake the relative quiet of the past two weeks for a sign that US Airways' resolve to buy Delta Air Lines is weakening, says Doug Parker, CEO of US Airways.

"We believe our offer is more than fair, and as a result, don't intend on ... backing off," Parker said in a telephone interview last week. "We certainly don't intend on pulling the offer."

Parker made his carrier's $8 billion-plus offer public on Nov. 15, and Delta — which had already rebuffed his private approaches — fired back with a volley of objections, employee anti-merger rallies and a formal plan to emerge from Chapter 11 on its own. The dust settled during the holidays.

Parker says he expects things to soon heat up again, pointing out that Delta's creditors recently hired retired Continental Airlines Chief Executive Gordon Bethune to evaluate the rivals' proposals or other potential alternatives for Delta.

"Gordon is a decisive, extremely knowledgeable individual who ... they clearly didn't bring in just to look at the stand-alone plan. They brought him in to look at strategic alternatives," said Parker.

Another potential flash point: Delta has asked for a bankruptcy court hearing Feb. 7 to begin pitching its stand-alone plan to creditors. They will ultimately vote on whatever reorganization plan Delta uses. Delta's plan values the company at $12 billion when it comes out of bankruptcy and would pay creditors with stock. US Airways argues its cash-stock offer is better for creditors and that a merger will create a stronger airline.

"I think you'll start seeing more urgency this month," said Parker during the interview from US Airways' headquarters in Tempe, Ariz. The conversation has been edited for clarity and length.

Q: Have you gotten any indication as to how the unsecured creditors committee views the US Airways offer?

A: We've met with the committee a couple of times. Their advisers have come back and asked us a number of questions. My own personal view is I think they appreciate the value of the synergies, and I believe they're doing their work now. They've just hired Gordon Bethune, which we think is a positive development — not because we have any idea what Gordon's views are, but just because I know Gordon is a decisive, independent person who knows the airline business very, very well.

Q: What has the committee asked the most questions about?

A: It doesn't seem to be one area of focus. They've spent a lot of time going through the synergy analysis, the $1.65 billion a year [in estimated annual savings from a merger], with our team. I know they've hired their own antitrust counsel to come up with their own views of the antitrust issues, which you know we feel very sanguine about and Delta feels very differently about. They obviously need to get their own views on that. ... So most of the time with us has been on our proposal and synergies.

Q: How soon do you expect the unsecured creditors committee to take some sort of position?

A: I don't know. It's really up to them. ... The process only becomes urgent to the extent that the Delta stand-alone plan is moving in a way that is inconsistent with our merger proposal. ... So long as Delta remains in bankruptcy and there aren't things being approved or disapproved by the bankruptcy court that are inconsistent with our plan, there's no urgency.

Q: There's the Feb. 7 hearing about the disclosure statement on Delta's reorganization plan. [If the statement is approved by the bankruptcy judge, Delta would be allowed to start seeking creditors' votes backing its proposal.] What does that hearing mean to the US Airways deal?

A: Right now there's a request for a hearing. If indeed that hearing took place on that date, yeah, that would drive some urgency around this process, and I think it will. ... My guess is if the creditor committee wants to support that date, they have a lot of work to get done before that date.

Q: Does that mean it might force you guys to bump up your offer? Does it mean you might have to somehow figure out how to intervene in that hearing?

A: ... It doesn't drive any additional action at this point from US Airways, but I think what it does drive is action from the committee to get themselves ready. The ball's in their court. ... The dialog will continue with the committee, and we're following their lead. ... But as we stand here today, our offer, we think, is well in excess of [Delta's] stand-alone plan in terms of value, and we don't feel any need to amend the offer.

Q: If the committee does finally come out and say we're not interested in your offer, does that kill it?

A: We'd have to reassess at that point. I don't know the answer to that and don't want to speculate.

Q: Does the hostility of Delta employees toward this deal give you or the creditors any pause?

A: It certainly doesn't give us any. I understand it. As we went through the US Airways-America West merger [in which Parker's America West bought the larger carrier and took its name, as it now proposes to do with Delta], there clearly was reluctance on the US Airways side. ... Indeed, even on the America West side, there was some concern about why we were hitching ourselves to that boat. So we had to spend a lot of time communicating with our employees about where the company is going. ... But the fact is, change creates anxiety, and anxiety can turn into fear.

In a situation where we don't have the ability to communicate [with Delta employees] ... it's not surprising at all. I expect over time as this develops for us to have those opportunities. What the employees at Delta will see is that all we're trying to do is build a better Delta Air Lines, and that's only better for the employees. ... I think the culture of Delta is one of its strongest assets and one of the things we want to build on.

Q: There seems to be a widepread belief around here that the merged carrier would be based in Tempe (America West's headquarters before it merged with US Airways, which had been based near Washington) ...Would you consider putting the headquarters in Atlanta to save the deal?

A: I won't speculate on negotiating tactics and really don't want to speculate on where the headquarters might be. The answer is we just don't know right now. ... We don't even know what the management team's going to look like, so to decide where it's headquartered is just premature at this point. What we do know is that both Phoenix and Atlanta are going to be extremely important to this new airline, and there are going to be a lot on management people in both cities.

Q: Why is it so hard to figure out where the headquarters will be?

A: Well, you need to know what the management structure looks like when you're done. ... I think there's a view that ... it will be a US Airways management team that prevailed, and that's certainly not my view. What I know is that we put together US Airways and America West, and most people see me and [a few other high-ranking executives] are all America West, [but] the fact is a third of our officers came from US Airways, and that percentage gets higher as you move on down the ranks.

But you don't know what that management team looks like until you start figuring out who wants to be part of the team and who doesn't, and how it all fits best. In the case of US Airways-America West, it was a good bit easier because their headquarters in Crystal City, Va., consisted of like two or three floors of people. ... That's not the case in Atlanta. It's a much harder decision to make.

Q: What odds do you give yourself of getting this deal through?

A: I feel very good about our chances. The market has clearly spoken in favor of our transaction. The bonds of Delta are at 70 percent [of face value]. The day we announced this transaction they got all that [gain] in the first day, and they stayed there. So I feel extremely good about the market reaction, and I feel very good as a result about where it's going to end up. [The value of Delta's bonds jumped more than 50 percent when US Airways announced its proposal on Nov. 15 and about 10 percent more shortly before Delta disclosed its stand-alone plan.]

If I go back to Nov. 15, is there any disappointment? The only thing I would say is six weeks later, we still haven't begun due diligence [on the proposed merger with Delta] despite that market reaction.

Q: We noticed that Julius Maldutis [a longtime airline securities analyst and consultant] this week was quoted as saying he doesn't think US Airways will go forward with the deal ... because of Delta employees' hostility. When you talk to creditors, is that a concern?

A: They haven't mentioned it to us. ... That has not come up as an issue.

Q: As time goes on, does that help or hurt your proposal?

A: There's nothing that gets worse with time with our proposal. The only thing that gets worse is if Delta emerges stand-alone.

Q: At least from the outside, it looks like Delta has done pretty well at lining up potential support on the unsecured creditors committee. (Delta has settled with its pilots union, Boeing and the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., all committee members.) Isn't that making your job harder?

A: If you accept the premise, yeah — which I don't. The committee has a fiduciary obligation to the creditors. They recognize as much as we do what's happened to the bond prices since our proposal came out, and they need to do what's best for the creditors of Delta, which is who they represent. I don't know what it means to be making progress with individual members of the committee, because the committee in itself represents all creditors.

Q: Does the possibility that the creditors committee is using US Airways to get a richer reorganization plan from Delta or a higher bid from another buyer keep you awake at night?

A: Look, we've assumed from the start that the bankruptcy process is essentially an auction process. ... We welcome any competition and any other offers, and we believe we will prevail against any of them.

Staff writer Dave Hirschman contributed to this article.

DOJ_NMG_0113576

ENVIRONMENT:

NRA Pressured To Resist Bush Energy Policies (WP)

By Blaine Harden, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Hunters Wary of Limited Land Access

SEATTLE -- After years of close association with the Republican Party and hard-nosed opposition to federal land-use regulation, the National Rifle Association is being pressured by its membership to distance itself from President Bush's energy policies that have opened more public land for oil and gas drilling and limited access to hunters and anglers.

"The Bush administration has placed more emphasis on oil and gas than access rights for hunters," said Ronald L. Schmeits, second vice president of the NRA, a member of its board of directors and a bank president in Raton, N.M.

The new emphasis on the issue of access to public lands, which Schmeits said is at the "discussion" level among the NRA's directors, would represent a strategic shift for the NRA, whose leadership in Washington has long maintained that its 4 million members were not complaining or even asking questions about access to public lands.

But, during the past six years, an increasing number of the country's 46 million hunters and anglers, including Republican-leaning shooting organizations such as the Boone and Crockett Club, have been grumbling about the Bush's administration fast-tracking of oil and gas drilling leases on public lands.

"We find that our members are having a harder time finding access to public land," said Schmeits, who recently pushed the NRA to lobby for congressional protection of the game-rich Valle Vidal forest on federal land in New Mexico. "Gun rights are still number one, but there will be more time and effort spent on this issue [by NRA leaders] as we move forward."

Such a change in policy could undercut a key argument that the NRA uses to raise money, sway voters and help elect candidates. It has long warned its members that many environmentalists are advancing a subversive gun-grabbing agenda masterminded by liberal Democrats.

Andrew Arulanandam, the group's spokesman in Washington, said he agrees with Schmeits that members are voicing increasing concern about access to hunting land and that the NRA is focusing on the problem.

This comes at a politically challenging time for what has long been one of the most feared lobbying groups in Washington. The NRA is increasingly being criticized as out of touch by some members of the Outdoor Writers Association of America. A new gun ownership group is trying to win the support of disaffected hunters. Also, there is some complaining within the gun industry that NRA policies might be bad for business.

"The core, the dream, the passion that drives gun ownership is hunting and getting out on the wide open spaces," said a senior gun company executive who did not want to be quoted by name for fear of retribution from the NRA. "In the same way the Bush administration has overreached on Iraq, the NRA has overreached on gun rights. We are losing our grip on this green environmental thing."

The NRA found new strength and increased membership with its battles against gun control during the Clinton era, while cementing ties with the Republican Party. An NRA official was videotaped boasting in 2000 that the association would open an office in the Bush White House. No such office opened, but close identification now with an unpopular president and a party that has lost control of Congress may be hurting the NRA.

"If Republicans have a bad year, the NRA is going to have a bad year," said Charlie Cook, the political analyst who runs the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "The Democrats have learned in recent years to shut the hell up about guns. Once they did, they started to win some elections."

In November's midterm elections, a number of prominent NRA-backed Republican incumbents were defeated, including Sen. George Allen of Virginia, Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana, Sen. James M. Talent of Missouri and Rep. Richard W. Pombo of California.

Top Democratic leaders appear to have taken the shut-your-mouth-about-guns lesson to heart. Aides to the new speaker and majority leader in the House said that Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California and Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland have no intention of bringing up gun control in the coming year.

For six years, the NRA joined the Bush administration in opposing the Clinton-era roadless rule, a broad land-protection measure that put nearly a third of the national forests off limits to most development -- while keeping them open for hunters and anglers willing to walk or ride horseback into the backcountry.

DOJ_NMG_0113577

The 2001 rule, which was overturned by the Bush administration but reinstated by a federal judge in September, had little initial support from state fish and game agencies, Western governors or many major hunting groups. The NRA opposed the rule, arguing that it was too broad and prevented older, less mobile and disabled hunters from using prime hunting lands.

But years of aggressive oil and gas leasing on prime hunting areas in the federal lands of the Rocky Mountain West seem to have made those protections more attractive. Fish and game agencies in Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Idaho, Washington, Oregon and Montana now support the roadless rule, as do most of the region's governors and more and more hunters.

"It is a no-brainer," said Hal Herring, a contributing editor for Field and Stream magazine and an avid hunter who lives near Montana's Rocky Mountain Front, the only area in the lower 48 states where grizzlies, elk and bighorn sheep still come out of the mountains to feed on the plains.

"The NRA stance on the roadless rule is a mistake," Herring said, echoing the view of many prominent outdoor writers. "There are no more roadless areas being produced."

A reader poll in 2003 by Field and Stream found that 41 percent of hunters saw shrinking wildlife habitat as the biggest threat to hunting in America, while 25 percent saw anti-gun legislation as a major threat to hunting.

Trying to seize on these sentiments, a rival gun group, the American Hunters and Shooters Association (AHSA), was founded two years ago by former Washington Redskin Ray Schoenke and John Rosenthal, a real estate developer in Boston. "I believe that we have reached a tipping point where the majority of hunters and shooters realize the NRA isn't representing their interests," said Rosenthal, who is a longtime activist for handgun control.

The group concedes that, so far, the NRA has more executives than the new group has members. That has not stopped the NRA from attacking the AHSA in its magazine, America's 1st Freedom, as a "cold, calculated attempt by the gun-ban lobby to thieve the hard-earned political credibility of gun owners and hunters."

Threatened By Warming (WP)

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Polar bear as harbinger

THE BUSH administration has done everything in its power to do as little as possible about climate change. Yet the reality of global warming has a way of intruding even on the most willfully heedless of politicians. Not even an administration dead set against mandatory curbs on carbon emissions can deny that the habitat of the polar bear, as Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne put it the other day, "may literally be melting." In response, the administration is proposing to list the polar bear as a threatened species under the Endangered Species Act.

Such a listing would have symbolic and practical importance. Polar bears live most of their lives on sea ice, which is diminishing in an Arctic region warming much faster than more temperate regions of the globe. A formal designation, following a lengthy period of comment and analysis, would acknowledge that the law compels action at least to mitigate the effects of global climate change. What's more, it's hard to see how one could act to preserve polar bear habitat without taking steps to reduce fossil fuel consumption and slow the rate of carbon emissions into the atmosphere.

The administration proposed the polar bear designation only after environmental groups petitioned for it and then sued to force a decision. Still, when confronted with the need to make a decision, it made the right one -- and thereby set the stage for action down the road. Cuddly, loveable animals -- even ferocious ones that can kill a seal with a single blow of a monster-strong paw -- have a way of precipitating steps that non-furry creatures just can't manage. Unfortunately, the threat to these majestic giants of the North is all too real.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Learning How To Fight America's Most Wanted (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

NEW HAVEN

I'M holding a gun for the first time and trying to look as if I know what I'm doing, as my partner and I pursue a suspect in a fatal bank robbery.

We take him by surprise in his motel room, and my partner tries to handcuff him. The suspect's brother unexpectedly emerges from the bathroom, and the momentary confusion allows the suspect to reach for a gun. I shoot once and hit the wet bar. The suspect's aim is better, and within 1.6 seconds, I am dead. Left unprotected, my partner takes two bullets to the head, and our assailants gleefully escape.

DOJ_NMG_0113578

Witnessing this exercise in humiliation was a roomful of people who, like me, had signed up for an invitation-only "Citizens' Academy" course given in the fall by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Connecticut. As part of our weekly training, we shot guns in computerized simulations, subjected ourselves to lie detector tests and met some of the graduates of a "body farm" in Knoxville, Tenn., where federal agents blow up, bury, submerge and do other unspeakable things to donated corpses to sharpen their crime-solving skills.

Though the two dozen of us taking the class often wondered why the government runs such a course, Citizens' Academy has been around for at least 13 years. One stated objective is to help the bureau improve relationships with the communities it serves. Another is "to demystify the bureau," as Kimberly K. Mertz, the special agent in charge of the F.B.I. in Connecticut, explained.

The cautious side of me fretted whether to participate, given the personal information I had to divulge in the mandatory background check. Did I have to mention religious affiliations? What about my library card? Withholding information, the application noted, was a potential crime. I inquired whether I was also subjecting my husband to a background check.

"Why, is he a Communist?" I was asked.

"Not lately," I sputtered.

On Sept. 14, having learned that my loved ones and I had passed muster, I was waved past a fortified guard booth and seated near a minister, a chiropractor, a lawyer and other working people who had been deemed by the F.B.I. to be "business, religious, civic and community leaders."

Like me, at least a few had prior dealings with the bureau. For instance, one classmate, Rocco Orso, the purchasing agent for the City of Waterbury, volunteered that his phone had been wiretapped for six months during a federal investigation into bid-rigging. Agents discovered instead in 2001 that the city's mayor, Philip A. Giordano, was molesting young girls. Mr. Orso said he was eventually told by the F.B.I. that he "was the most honest man in Waterbury." A city lawyer confirmed the comment and the agent's admonition to "give the man a raise."

Such efforts to rein in municipal corruption, white-collar fraud and organized crime have long been the F.B.I.'s stock in trade. But international terrorism has created new pressures, and the bureau's top brass has been deflecting calls for reorganizations that would separate newer intelligence-gathering functions from its historic crime-fighting mission.

Our eight weeks — three hours every Thursday night — inside the F.B.I. did not provide enough information to resolve these larger questions. But it did give us a feel for some of the 100 or so agents in Connecticut and their boss, Ms. Mertz. An Iowa native, she ran the public corruption unit in Washington from 1999 to 2001 and is now one of eight women running one of the bureau's 56 field offices. When we met, she was wearing pearls and strappy black heels and had her hair in a pony tail, and if she was packing a weapon, it was artfully tucked away inside her fitted suit.

Less than 3 percent of those who apply to be agents make the cut, and her staff was suitably impressive. David Rhieu, her chief division counsel, sometimes thumbs through 4,000 laws to determine if a situation merits federal jurisdiction. In 2002, when a man took hostages at Fairfield University, Mr. Rhieu determined that the standoff's impact on traffic on Interstate 95 justified his agency's intervention.

Dan O'Brien, the agent who runs the bureau's Meriden, Conn., office, quoted Oscar Wilde's "I can resist everything except temptation" in describing public officials and their cheating ways. Stuart Robinson, the head of a public-corruption squad in Bridgeport, instructed us that when catching crooks, "you want to get to the beehives, not catch bees." Erin McNamara, an agent who recovered some of the $200 million that the former financier Martin R. Frankel had amassed by defrauding insurance companies, told us about finding a 15-carat diamond disguised as a Sucrets lozenge. Judy Eide, another agent, shared tales of "tipsters" who call the bureau's hot line to complain, "I ordered a mail-order bride, and did not get it."

We each left with a graduation certificate, or a reasonable facsimile, signed by Robert S. Mueller III, the F.B.I. director. And some of the lessons continue to resonate, especially after a Nov. 25 melee with police outside a Queens strip club left an unarmed man dead on his wedding day.

Our introduction to shootouts had taken place weeks before, in September, and I have no idea who was right or who was wrong on that tragic night in New York.

But one reason for letting us wield a 9-millimeter semiautomatic pistol hooked up to a $50,000 training device was to sensitize us to the split-second decisions that law enforcement agents must make in the name of public safety and to the fact that their lives are on the line. None of us wielding that gun were terribly experienced with weapons, and the full range of human frailties, from eyeglasses to middle-aged paunches, was on display that day. So the experiment had its built-in limits.

Surely, I asked, people who are better trained can disarm an assailant without killing him, say, by aiming at the hand holding the gun? Our instructors looked at me as if I watched too many westerns. Few agents are sharpshooters, they said, and their priority must be stopping the threat. One instructor, a former marine, noted that assailants often keep shooting after they've been wounded.

DOJ_NMG_0113579

To minimize the chance of confrontations with tragic consequences, federal authorities say they collect a great deal of information about the individuals they are following and their habits before kicking in doors. By the time they make an arrest, agents generally know which night of the week a suspect orders pizza, Ms. Mertz said, jokingly. Many agents, we were also told, have never discharged their weapons in the line of duty. That goes for Ms. Mertz. “Most agents never do,” she said.

After failing at the simulator, I can see, perhaps, how I had overestimated others’ proficiency with weapons and their ability to control situations that might be beyond control. Leaving the F.B.I. building, I ran into a longtime agent, Mark Gentil, and told him about my lousy shooting. He asked which scenario had done me in. I told him the motel scene.

“Oh, that’s a hard one,” he said, extending some welcome sympathy as I headed out into the night.

Man Sets Fire To Richmond Church (SFC)

By Carrie Sturrock, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 7, 2007

(01-06) 16:50 PST RICHMOND -- A man set fire to a Richmond church early Friday evening after interrupting a practicing choir.

The man walked into St. Cornelius Parish at 225 28th Street shortly before 8 p.m. and poured a flammable liquid on the altar and a nativity scene and then set it ablaze, according to fire officials and a witness.

A short time later, police arrested Robert Mills, 40, of San Pablo on suspicion of arson.

Seven members of the choir, including a 10-year-old boy, were singing the gospel song "Jardinero" in Spanish when a man entered the church who seemed to be speaking to himself, then announced, "Do you want to leave or do you want to stay? Because I'm burning this f— place down," said choir member Veronica Monroy, 32, of Albany.

Monroy said she asked him, "Who are you? Why are you doing this?"

She said he simply replied, "I'm just telling you. Either you want to burn or you want to leave."

He then opened what appeared to be a red can of gasoline and poured it on the altar and Nativity scene, Monroy said, adding that everyone left the church as he did this, except one choir member who stayed back.

Monroy said that man told her the intruder took out a lighter, lit a piece of paper and then threw the flame on the liquid. The choir member tried unsuccessfully to fight the fire with an extinguisher, Monroy said.

She said she had never seen the man at the church before, which she estimated had thousands of members.

After allegedly setting the blaze, Mills left through the same door as the choir members. As he did so, some people outside the church followed him and told police he had entered nearby Nicholl Park.

Police found Mills hiding in the southeastern corner of the park in some shrubbery at Leona Street, and arrested him at 8:10 p.m. as firefighters extinguished the flames, Johnson said.

Mills will likely be charged with arson. The district attorney may also consider charges of false imprisonment because the church was occupied at the time of the fire, said Johnson.

"If they establish it's a hate crime, they could go in that direction," he added.

Firefighters received word of the fire at 7:47 p.m. When they arrived, the church was suffused with smoke, but they quickly got the fire under control by 8:19 p.m, said Richmond Fire Department Battalion Chief Byron Berhel. No one was injured.

The fire destroyed the altar, nativity scene, a lectern and carpeting. Berhel said there was also extensive smoke damage throughout the relatively large building.

"You can't get that smoke scent out 100 percent," he said. "A lot of the stuff is probably going to have to be replaced."

He said the arson was unusual.

"You don't find people going into a church and deliberately setting a fire," he said. "That's a first for me."

Monroy said the damage is sad to look at. Still, church officials have planned masses for tomorrow in the church gym and parishioners will later come together to repair the building.

"That is just going to keep us more united," said Monroy. "Our faith is very strong. That's one thing we can say. We're going to get up and we're going to continue."

Metairie Store Gun Theft Suspect Being Sought (NOTP)

By From Staff Reports

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 7, 2007

Police trying to ID second man in heist

The Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office on Saturday released the identity of a suspect being sought in Monday's theft of more than 120 guns from a Metairie sporting goods store and announced a $10,000 reward for information leading to his arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0113580

Jermaine Surtain, 28, who once lived in the 5700 block of Tullis Drive, Algiers, is wanted on a warrant accusing him of burglarizing Puglia's Sporting Goods, 1925 Veterans Memorial Blvd., said Col. John Fortunato, a Sheriff's Office spokesman.

The office is also seeking the public's help in identifying a "person of interest" who rented a vehicle thought to be used in the break-in, Fortunato said.

Authorities think the burglary was committed by four men possibly using a black Dodge Durango. The men made a hole in a wall to get in around 2:30 a.m., then broke display cases and took 115 handguns, several shotguns and two assault rifles.

Authorities identified Surtain as a suspect through the cooperation of the Sheriff's Office, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the West Bank Major Crimes Task Force. The task force is made up of officers from the Sheriff's Office and the Gretna, New Orleans and Westwego police forces.

After the burglary, authorities recovered four handguns that apparently had been dropped during the break-in. Another handgun taken in the burglary was recovered Saturday at a house in New Orleans, Fortunato said.

He said Surtain has a criminal record and also will be booked with possession of a firearm by a felon when he is arrested.

Sheriff Harry Lee said he was greatly concerned about the theft of the guns, and he asked Crimestoppers to double its usual $2,500 reward for information leading to an arrest and indictment, Fortunato said. He said the ATF is offering $5,000 more.

Anyone with information can call the Sheriff's Office at (504) 364-5300.

. . . . . .

A reward is available for information leading to an indictment. Call Crimestoppers at (504) 822-1111 or toll-free at (877) 903-7867.

Gun Violence Across Puerto Rico Leaves 7 Dead On Kings Day (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico (AP) — Seven people were killed in shootings across Puerto Rico on Saturday, prompting the U.S. territory's top police official to plead for lawmakers to pass tougher gun laws.

The violence, which marred the Caribbean island's Three Kings Day celebrations, included a drive-by shooting of a minivan outside a fast-food restaurant in which two people died and two others were injured in a San Juan suburb, police said.

At a news conference, police chief Pedro Toledo urged the approval of pending legislation that would make it more difficult for islanders to import weapons from the U.S. mainland. Gunmakers have opposed the restrictions.

"Our biggest concern is the amount of weapons and ammunition on the streets," Toledo said.

The two victims killed in the parking lot in Guaynabo were identified as Leslie Machado Becerril, 18, and Christian Collazo Pacheco, 24. The other slayings were reported in Manati, Toa Alta, Caguas, Humacao and Loiza.

The U.S. territory of 3.9 million people averaged just more than two homicides a day last year. The 739 slayings marked a slight decrease from 2005. In most cases, the murders were linked to the drug trade, according to police.

IMMIGRATION:

Complaints Rise Against Immigration Lawyers (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Complex Statutes, Criminal Schemes Heighten Concerns

Complaints against immigration lawyers working in and around the nation's capital are rising, say officials who investigate allegations of attorney misconduct.

Last year, the D.C. Office of Bar Counsel received 59 complaints about immigration lawyers, up from 49 in 2005 -- when, for the first time, immigration law drew more complaints than any other specialized practice area.

The bar counsel office is finalizing 2006 totals for other categories, but complaints about immigration law appear likely to rank near the top again.

Such a distinction is no small feat in a city flush with lawyers and no small worry in a region long established as a destination for immigrants, particularly those from Africa and Latin America.

"There are a lot of unhappy immigrant clients out there, and some of them have very good reason to be unhappy," said D.C. Deputy Bar Counsel Elizabeth A. Herman, who has handled immigration complaints for more than a decade.

From the simply confused to the unquestionably criminal, bad lawyers have become a concern for the immigration bar and for the nation's immigration tribunals.

DOJ_NMG_0113581

Federal sanctions have been rising in recent years. Established in 2000, the bar counsel at the Executive Office for Immigration Review, the Justice Department branch that oversees U.S. immigration courts and the Board of Immigration Appeals, disciplined 47 immigration lawyers last year and 54 the previous year -- up from 22 in 2000.

"You have a very vulnerable population," said Jennifer Barnes, who has been the bar counsel for the immigration review office since the position was created. Many immigrants, she said, don't speak English, and few understand the statutes and regulations that are second perhaps only to the tax code in complexity. "And you have attorneys out there looking to take advantage of that vulnerability," she said.

Perhaps the most notorious Washington area immigration hustler in recent history is Arlington lawyer Samuel G. Kooritzky, who was imprisoned in 2003 after he was convicted of engaging in a massive fraud. Kooritzky's firm, Capital Law Centers, specialized in applying for state labor certifications, which businesses use when they cannot find a U.S. citizen for a particular job. An immigrant can then use a certification to apply to the federal government for a green card.

Kooritzky's firm submitted thousands of fake applications for labor certifications without telling the businesses they were being used. He charged immigrants $8,000 to $20,000 for the service and raked in millions before the fraud was discovered. Kooritzky received a 10-year sentence.

The breadth of Kooritzky's criminal enterprise is hard to match, but there are some contenders. In November, a few were in court in the District.

A federal judge sent a Northwest Washington lawyer, Mohamed Alamgir, to prison for more than three years. From 1996 to 2003, Alamgir filed hundreds of false labor and immigration forms as part of a scheme to obtain permanent residency for immigrants by claiming they had jobs awaiting them in the United States, prosecutors said.

But there were no jobs. In some cases, Alamgir paid employers who agreed to participate in the scheme. In others, he put up friends or relatives as employers. And in still others, he mingled fake applications with legitimate ones. In all, the fraud took in more than $2 million.

A D.C. Superior Court judge jailed another lawyer, Richard A. James, who, despite having been disbarred, continued to practice immigration law. Given a suspended sentence in 2002 for flouting his disbarment in 2000, James was ordered not to practice. But he did, working out of an office on I Street NW where one of his specialties was helping foreign physicians immigrate to the United States. He's serving an eight-month sentence for contempt.

But most of the wrongdoing that keeps bar counsels busy does not rise to the criminal level.

It is the missed deadline, the unreturned phone call, the obviously overlooked opportunity that frustrate many eager immigrants and prompt a large share of the complaints. Such lapses might be less grievous in other legal arenas, but immigration law is stringent, and immigration tribunals are exacting in their application of it, say lawyers who practice before them.

That is why bar counsel offices such as the District's have made immigration law a priority. "The consequences for missing a deadline are draconian," Herman said. "In civil court, if you miss a deadline, you just file a motion for more time. In immigration court, you can't do that and expect a good result."

Some aggrieved immigrants file complaints. Some have no choice but to file in order to ask an immigration judge to reopen a case. But many never do, being unaware of their rights or reluctant to exercise them for fear of further complicating their situation, advocates for immigrants say.

Complaints can take months or years to investigate and resolve. Documents must be gathered, transcripts of proceedings might have to be ordered and lawyers must be given a chance to respond.

When D.C. bar counsel Wallace E. "Gene" Shipp Jr. elects to seek a sanction, his lawyers have to try the case before a Board of Professional Responsibility hearing committee, then argue it before the board, which ultimately makes a recommendation to the District's highest court, the Court of Appeals.

In 2005, for example, the court upheld a reprimand for a lawyer who had failed to file an appeal that his client had requested after the client was denied asylum and then neglected to tell his client that the appeal had not been filed; the lawyer was in a dispute with the client over how much of a $625 fee had to be paid up front.

Bad lawyering carried consequences for Fanny Saavedra and her family, they said. Born in Bolivia, Saavedra has been in the United States illegally for more than a decade, since she overstayed a tourist visa, was arrested in a workplace raid and ordered deported.

After her husband, Rene, also of Bolivia, won permanent residency in 2000, Fanny should have been right behind him in line for a green card, said her current attorney, the Rev. David Brooks. But their attorney at the time said that Fanny could not piggyback on Rene's residency and would need to wait until he became a citizen.

The lawyer was wrong, Brooks said. But not until last year, as Rene was preparing to become a citizen, did they learn that they didn't have to wait.

DOJ_NMG_0113582

The couple's three children -- ages 3, 7 and 9 -- were born in the United States and are citizens, and Fanny Saavedra's teenage daughter, born in Bolivia, was able to gain permanent residency in 2002 as Rene Saavedra's stepchild.

In her own Gaithersburg home, only Fanny Saavedra is in the country illegally, haunted by the memory of the raid that led to her deportation order. Even the news that her case has been reopened and will be heard by an immigration judge this month has done little to quell her anxiety.

"It's like trauma for me," the 40-year-old housekeeper said. "I'm afraid, really afraid. I don't want to leave my kids."

But the idea of filing a grievance seemed like asking for more trouble when the family was focused on legalizing Fanny Saavedra's status. "We didn't make a complaint, because we didn't want any more legal problems with our situation," Rene Saavedra said.

In a field dominated by solo practitioners and firms of two to three lawyers, even conscientious ones can find it hard to keep up with changes in the law and the strict demands of immigration courts.

"A lot of people get into this practice and they mean well, and they get overwhelmed -- they get totally overwhelmed," said Michael Maggio, whose Dupont Circle firm, Maggio & Kattar, has one of the area's biggest immigration practices.

Last year, the American Immigration Lawyers Association created a practice and professionalism center to provide guidance for lawyers navigating immigration law, as more are entering the immigration field. The association has grown from fewer than 4,000 members in 1994 to more than 10,000. Only New York and Miami have more members than the Washington region, which has about 800.

When a lawyer's lapse costs an immigrant whatever opportunity he or she had, the aftermath can be heartbreaking.

"No matter what we do to show the lawyer did wrong, [the immigrant] may still be deported," Herman said, drawing on her experience with the D.C. bar counsel office. "It's more than frustrating. It's tragic in some cases. They may be separated from their children. They may be deported to a country they haven't lived in since they were an infant. Their whole lives are turned upside down."

Fanny Saavedra wakes up with such fears every day, despite her attorney's confidence that she'll be allowed to stay. "My husband, he always supports me," she said. "Whatever happens, we'll be together. If we go back, we're going to go back, all of us."

TAX:

House Rules Change Clears Way For Tax Increases (WT)

By Donald Lambro, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

One of the first key procedural votes in the Democrat-controlled House last week established legislative rules that Republicans say will make it easier to raise taxes by a simple majority vote.

The straight party-line vote received little attention Thursday as Rep. Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, was elected speaker of the House. But Republican leaders and conservative tax-cut advocates said it opened up a huge loophole in a Republican-imposed rule drawn from the Republicans' 1994 Contract with America, which requires a supermajority, or three-fifths vote, to raise taxes.

Democrats unanimously voted down a motion offered by Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio that would have prevented them from waiving the rule, a move that tax-cutters said signaled the Democrats' intention to raise taxes between now and the 2008 elections.

"American taxpayers need to hold on to their wallets because the new House rules concerning taxes are not worth the paper they're written on," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform (ATR).

"After spending an entire year on the campaign trail claiming she will not raise taxes, the first vote Nancy Pelosi brings to the floor for a vote as speaker will open the door to billions and billions of dollars of tax increases over the next two years," Mr. Norquist said.

Many liberal Democrats vowed in the midterm election campaigns to repeal the Bush tax cuts for those in the top income-tax brackets, and party leaders already have scheduled a vote to eliminate tax breaks for oil companies, which would effectively raise taxes on the nation's energy-producing corporations.

"The Democrats have a more established record of wanting to raise taxes than Republicans do. So to have them reject making the rule unwaivable indicates they want to preserve the option to raise taxes," said Jo Maney, spokeswoman for the Rules Committee, through which all legislation must pass.

DOJ_NMG_0113583

"The Democrats were smart in crafting the new rules," said Dan Clifton, ATR's chief economist. "They did not change them but made additions to them. Now the three-fifths rule can be waived by a simple majority," or 218 votes.

"President Clinton got a bare majority 218 votes for his tax increases in 1993. So all the Democrats have to do is vote to waive the three-fifths rule, and they've got a tax increase," Mr. Clifton said.

Democratic officials saw Mr. Boehner's motion as a move to tie their hands on future tax policy, and the majority leadership effectively held all of its troops in line to oppose it, even though some of its members ran on pledges not to raise taxes.

"In the coming months, the Democrat-controlled Rules Committee will be pressured to repeal or waive the Contract with America's barriers against unfair tax increases to make it easier for the Democrat majority in Congress to raise taxes," Mr. Boehner predicted.

The Democrats also approved the so-called "pay-as-you-go" rule as part of the House rules package. The rule says that when taxes are cut, lawmakers must offset any revenue loss with either new or higher taxes elsewhere, or reductions in spending.

But the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget said Friday that the pay-as-you-go rules "do not always work perfectly, and it may be useful to consider changes to improve the technical workings of [pay-as-you-go] to make it more effective."

A Balanced Budget (WP)

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

In 2012. Maybe.

SO PRESIDENT Bush is promising a balanced federal budget -- three years after he leaves office. That's a worthy goal, and we look forward to seeing, when the budget is released next month, how, exactly, he hopes to achieve it. But we'd be more impressed by the professed commitment to fiscal discipline if it weren't, in large part, Mr. Bush's own policies that made that far-off target look like an achievement. Or, better yet, if we had any confidence, based on performance, that this theoretical balance is based on realistic projections. Or if there were any acknowledgment from Mr. Bush that his sacrosanct tax cuts would have to be adjusted to meet this goal.

The traditional Democratic Party rap against the Bush administration's fiscal policies goes like this: He inherited a projected 10-year budget surplus of $5.6 trillion and turned that into a projected $3 trillion deficit. The truth is more complicated: The surplus was always, to some extent, illusory, and some of the budgetary deterioration was due to circumstances -- an economic slowdown, the costs of the war against terrorism -- beyond Mr. Bush's control.

Nonetheless, it was Mr. Bush's recklessly unaffordable tax cuts and his insistence on maintaining and extending them even as the costs of the war in Iraq escalated that helped drive the deficit. It was Mr. Bush -- the same Mr. Bush who now calls for an end to the "dead of the night" process of inserting earmarks into spending bills -- who signed every spending bill put before him, even as they were stuffed by a Congress controlled by his party with record numbers and amounts of earmarked projects.

Even as he asserts that his budget submission next month will show a path to balance by 2012, Mr. Bush insists that the tax cuts cannot be touched. That presages yet another budget that will be hard to take seriously -- one that doesn't account adequately for expected spending in Iraq and Afghanistan and that doesn't factor in the enormous costs of adjusting the alternative minimum tax so that it doesn't sweep in increasing numbers of middle-class taxpayers.

As a political matter, it's impossible to imagine that balance could be achieved through spending cuts alone. Just consider the difficulty that the Republican-controlled Congress had trying to craft a budget based on Mr. Bush's unrealistic discretionary spending or in making even modest inroads on entitlement spending. Nor, politics aside, is it clear that spending discipline alone is the better way. Why, to put it in the starkest terms, should tax cuts for the wealthy take precedence over health care for children?

A real path to balance will not be easy. It will require a recognition from Mr. Bush and his fellow Republicans that all their tax cuts cannot stand and a willingness by Democrats to forgo spending that their constituencies demand. It's not clear that either side has accepted that reality.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Dems Prepare Slew Of Oversight Hearings (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113584

In this new era of divided government, the congressional hearing room is where the executive and legislative branches will clash.

Over the next few weeks, Senate Democrats plan to hold at least 11 hearings just on Iraq. In the House, one of the Democrats' most dogged investigators is waiting to spring his committee on a different mission — suspected government fraud.

From the war to environmental policy and secret surveillance, the Democrats who now control both the House and Senate are armed with subpoena power and ready to summon panels of witnesses.

These newly empowered Democrats plan to put the Bush administration under scrutiny like never before.

"One of the clearest messages of the last election was that the Republican leadership was just AWOL when it came to holding the Bush administration accountable," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

The congressional hearing room is a Washington set piece: A lonely witness at a table covered in red velvet, klieg lights glaring, a determined inquisitor across the floor. Congressional power in its rawest form.

Iraq is the focal point of Democratic efforts.

Beginning this week, when Bush is expected to disclose his new war strategy, three Senate and at least two House committees plan to call Cabinet members to testify about the president's policy.

"We will use these hearings to ask tough questions, demand real solutions and keep working to bring this war to a close," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Saturday in his party's weekly radio address.

The hearings are one way for Democrats to respond to the party's anti-war wing. Last week, as Democrats prepared to assume power in the new Congress, anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan and a group of protesters interrupted a Democratic press conference, chanting "De-escalate. Investigate. Troops home now!"

The outburst highlighted the limited options Democrats have on redirecting policy in Iraq. Short of cutting off money for the war — a step Democratic leaders say they will not take — Congress has little recourse but to agitate publicly against Bush's strategy.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Reid wrote Bush last week to express their opposition to a potential temporary increase in the number of troops in Iraq — an idea Bush is said to be considering.

Some Democrats, so far a minority, want Congress to take a stand against an emergency spending bill that Bush is expected to send to Congress to pay for military and reconstruction operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

That bill "is a vehicle for continuing the war through the end of Bush's term" in early 2009, said Democratic Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, who is running for president in 2008. "You cannot say you oppose the war and continue to fund it."

Reid on Friday reiterated that Democrats would not use spending legislation to try to change the course of the war. In fact, Democratic strategists say it is far better for the party to keep the war focus on Bush than it is to devise a detailed exit plan for Iraq.

"We are not at a point at this moment where I can say we have a specific strategy, but we have several options," said Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democratic leader.

One idea under consideration would cap the number of troops Bush could send to Iraq.

"It could be legislation that requires the president to come for congressional approval for troops over a certain level," Durbin said, quickly adding there was no Democratic agreement on such an option. "I'm giving you speculation. This is not strategy."

Besides the focus on Iraq, Democratic committee chairmen are planning their own policy oversight sessions with Bush officials.

"We need to be the watchdog," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif.

From his perch as chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, Waxman said he intends to tackle instances of "waste, fraud and abuse." He did not specify his first target, but previously has expressed interest in investigating federal contracts in Iraq and in the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina struck.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has said he will examine the administration's policies on torture and other human rights issues. His request for data exposed one of the first rifts between the new Congress and the administration when the Justice Department refused to provide the committee with two secret documents that describe CIA detention and interrogation policies for suspected terrorists.

Leahy, D-Vt., stopped short of threatening the use of a subpoena to get the documents. But he told Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that he "would pursue this matter further" when the committee holds its first oversight hearing.

Now that Bush had accepted the resignation of Harriet Miers as his top in-house lawyer, the White House is preparing to revamp its counsel's office in anticipation of a more aggressive and demanding Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0113585

Miers was one of Reid's favorite White House officials and the senator applauded Bush for nominating her to the Supreme Court in 2005 — though she eventually withdrew from consideration. Her replacement probably will not elicit the same warm response.

Medicare Drug Program Costing Less Than Estimates, U.S. Says (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6 — The Bush administration lowered its estimate of the cost of Medicare's new prescription drug benefit Saturday, saying the price tag had come down about 10 percent in the last six months.

Administration officials said they hoped the numbers would undercut support in Congress for a Democratic proposal requiring the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical makers to secure lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries.

The 2003 Medicare law prohibits such direct negotiations, relying instead on private insurers and their agents to seek discounts on prescription drugs. Legislation to repeal that ban is a top priority for the new Democratic majority in Congress.

Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, said the new numbers showed that such legislation was unnecessary because competition among private plans had effectively held down costs.

"Our new estimates provide clear evidence that consumer choice is working," Mr. Leavitt said in an interview. "Government interference will result in fewer choices and less consumer satisfaction."

Such arguments are unlikely to sway House Democrats, who say older Americans are still paying far too much for medications. But the numbers provide new ammunition for Republicans.

In July, the Bush administration estimated that payments to private plans offering the Medicare drug benefit would total $1.077 trillion from 2007 to 2016. Officials now estimate they will be $964 billion.

The federal government subsidizes premiums and pays a variety of subsidies to insurers to draw them into the Medicare market.

Leslie V. Norwalk, acting administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said drug costs in general had been increasing more slowly than expected. In addition, Ms. Norwalk said, enrollment in the new Medicare program is lower than expected, because some beneficiaries found they had equivalent drug coverage from other sources.

Critics Warn Of Pitfalls In Democrats' Drug Plan (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6 — Democrats want the government to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, but insist that the government should not decide which drugs are covered.

Many economists and health policy experts see this as a paradox. The only way to get big savings and discounts, they say, is to steer patients to certain preferred drugs.

The debate on this issue, bubbling for several years, will come to a boil in Congress next week as the House votes on a Democratic proposal to require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate with drug manufacturers on behalf of Medicare beneficiaries.

On the one hand, the bill says the secretary "shall negotiate" lower prices. On the other hand, the drug benefit would still be delivered by private insurers. Each plan would establish its own list of covered drugs, known as a formulary, and the secretary could not "establish or require a particular formulary."

Under the 2003 Medicare law, passed by a Republican Congress, insurers and their agents negotiate prices with drug manufacturers. The law prohibits the secretary from interfering in those negotiations.

Democrats describe their proposal as a way to overcome the power of special interests — specifically, they say, the pharmaceutical and biotechnology industries, which would rather deal with dozens of private insurers than with one big federal agency.

"Direct negotiation for lower prescription drug prices is directly related to our lobbying and ethics reform legislation," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus.

The purpose of both proposals, Mr. Emanuel said, is "to make sure that special interests do not control what happens in Congress."

Democrats often point to the Department of Veterans Affairs as a model, saying it negotiates much lower prices than Medicare gets. But the programs differ in significant ways.

Under federal law, the V.A. is guaranteed a substantial discount — about 24 percent off the average price paid to the manufacturer of a brand-name drug by commercial customers. Starting with this guarantee, officials negotiate deeper discounts.

DOJ_NMG_0113586

The veterans agency, which filled more than 120 million prescriptions last year, has a national formulary. The agency decides which drugs or classes of drugs it needs to treat its patients.

After those decisions are made, drug companies compete for the business, and the V.A. often encourages doctors to switch patients to the drugs that are selected, if it is medically appropriate to do so.

Dr. Alan M. Garber, director of the Center for Health Policy at Stanford University, said he did not see how Medicare officials could obtain big discounts unless they were able to establish a restrictive formulary.

"To obtain drugs at low prices, a purchaser must be able to say no to covering a particular drug," said Dr. Garber, who is an economist and a physician. "If you cannot walk away from a deal, there's no way you can be sure of obtaining a low price. That's true whether you are buying a car, a house or medications."

President Bush and the pharmaceutical industry adamantly oppose a requirement for Medicare to negotiate prices. But Congressional Democrats say it is worth a try.

"Republicans had their shot at making the drug bill work, and seniors are still not getting the prices they deserve," said Representative John D. Dingell of Michigan, the chief sponsor of the Democratic proposal.

"Republicans chose to take care of their friends in the drug industry," Mr. Dingell said. "It's our turn to prove that the bill can work for seniors."

AARP, the lobby for older Americans, supports the proposal. In a new advertising campaign, the group says: "Medicare has 43 million members. And zero bargaining power when it comes to prescription drug prices."

William D. Novelli, the chief executive of AARP, said that Medicare drug plans "currently have little choice but to accept the high prices set by manufacturers" for brand-name drugs if no competing products are available.

Under the Democrats' proposal, the secretary would negotiate the prices that could be charged to sponsors of Medicare drug plans, and those plans could try to obtain still lower prices on their own.

In a report this week, the Congressional Budget Office said that private purchasers had leverage in negotiating prices when they could "systematically favor one brand-name drug over another," thus increasing its share of the market. Nothing in the Democratic proposal allows the secretary to choose one drug over another, or to influence the choices made by Medicare drug plans.

James R. Lang, former president of Anthem Prescription Management, a drug benefit manager, said: "For this proposal to work, the government would have to take over price negotiations. It would have to take over formularies. You cannot do one without the other. There's no leverage. Manufacturers won't give up something for nothing."

Democrats Face Hurdles In Bid To Close Medicare Gap (WP)

By Christopher Lee, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Eliminating Hole in Drug Coverage Would Require Tax Increases or Spending Cuts to Avoid Expanding Budget Deficit

Democrats face a difficult time delivering on their pledge to eliminate the "doughnut hole" in Medicare's drug benefit, despite having used the unpopular coverage gap as a rhetorical club against Republicans in regaining control of Congress in the fall elections.

Requiring Medicare to negotiate lower drug prices from pharmaceutical companies -- a popular idea that nevertheless faces significant political hurdles -- will not produce enough savings to fill the doughnut hole, experts say. And making up the difference would require big tax increases or spending cuts elsewhere if Democrats are to keep another campaign promise, to be fiscally responsible and avoid increasing the federal budget deficit.

"I think the Democrats are going to shy away from it because it's very costly," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), who was chairman of the Senate Finance Committee when it crafted the Medicare drug benefit in 2003. "I think you'll find out that closing the doughnut hole would have just about doubled what we were going to put into the whole program. So you're talking about hundreds of billions of dollars."

Democrats are still determined to eliminate the gap, said Brendan Daly, spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). The House is expected to vote this week on a bill Democrats introduced Friday that would require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate the prices of drugs covered by what is formally known as Medicare Part D.

"We're hoping to get some savings, obviously, from the price negotiation, and then we can try to use some of that to start to close the doughnut hole," Daly said. "I don't think we're going to have enough to close it entirely. It's a difficult task. . . . We are committed to doing it, though."

The doughnut hole refers to a coverage gap in which Medicare beneficiaries must pay for 100 percent of their drug purchases, even as they continue to pay monthly premiums. An estimated 3 million to 4 million people fell into the gap last year.

DOJ_NMG_0113587

In 2007, under the standard plan, the gap opens when a senior's total drug costs reach $2,400 and closes when out-of-pocket expenses total $3,850. Medicare then picks up most additional costs.

The Congressional Budget Office has informally estimated that filling the hole would cost $450 billion over 10 years, but the agency has no estimate of how much government price negotiations might save. A study released in October by Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the new chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, estimated that the savings would range from $61 billion to $96 billion.

Even before the elections, Democrats began to acknowledge that they would not be able to eliminate the coverage gap right away. But in months of campaigning, party leaders and candidates fanned public anger over the doughnut hole and accused Republicans of selling out to the pharmaceutical industry.

At a senior center in Sunrise, Fla., on Oct. 3, Pelosi touted government drug-price negotiations as a solution and pledged to make them happen as part of the Democrats' agenda for the first 100 hours of the new Congress.

"We will use that money to fill the doughnut hole so that seniors will have affordability, they will have reliability, and will not be caught in this trap of the doughnut hole," Pelosi said. " . . . You pay [premiums] in, they get the money, you get no benefits back. How could that be a good idea unless you're writing the bill for the HMOs and the pharmaceutical companies, and not for America's seniors?"

In July, Rep. Steven R. Rothman (D-N.J.) issued a statement calling the program "broken" and the doughnut hole one of its "most glaring failures."

"The Republican majority created a terrible mess with Medicare Part D," Rothman said. "We can fix Medicare Part D by providing a prescription-drug benefit through Medicare, ending the subsidies for insurance companies, and allowing the government to negotiate lower drug prices. Doing so will eliminate the doughnut hole and provide a benefit worthy of our seniors."

Back in 2003, proponents, mainly Republicans, saw the unusual setup as a way to provide some help to all beneficiaries, and substantial help to those with catastrophic drug costs, and yet not break the bank with the new benefit. Lately, GOP lawmakers have contended that the doughnut hole is not a problem because it does not apply to low-income beneficiaries, and because other seniors can choose more expensive drug plans that offer coverage without the gap.

Filling the hole soon is unlikely, many analysts say. The White House's opposition means that drug-price negotiations are not likely to be enacted even if the idea manages to win approval in the Senate, where the going is likely to be tougher than in the House, they say.

Even if it were to pass and escape a presidential veto, the House bill would not authorize the health and human services secretary to limit Medicare coverage to a list of approved drugs -- called a formulary -- a tool that some experts say would be necessary to win major price concessions. The legislation would also not explicitly require that any savings be applied to filling the doughnut hole.

"There is virtually no chance that we are going to see any change to the doughnut hole in the foreseeable future," said Robert Laszewski, a nonpartisan health policy consultant in Washington. "The doughnut hole is sort of institutionalized now. . . . It's there for a reason. It's there because that's the kind of plan design the Congress could afford. And just because you change the Congress doesn't mean the affordability changes."

John Rother, policy director for AARP, the powerful seniors' lobby, agreed that substantial changes to the doughnut hole are unlikely this year. But he does not think that Democrats would pay a political price for that.

"It's not an overriding, intense concern for most seniors," Rother said. "What we get a lot from our members is concern about overall drug costs, not just the doughnut hole."

House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) said requiring government negotiations is just the "first step."

"I plan to hold hearings early in the new Congress to identify additional changes needed to improve the Medicare drug program, and reviewing the donut hole will be part of that process," he said in a statement.

Leadership Tries To Restrain Fiefs In New Congress (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6 — Less than 24 hours after taking over as speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi summoned the new chairmen of five committees with responsibility for various aspects of Iraq policy to her office to review and coordinate plans for hearings and inquiries.

DOJ_NMG_0113588

The gathering on Friday would have been unthinkable when Democrats last controlled the House. In the days before the 1994 Republican takeover, all-powerful Democratic chairmen ruled their committees with impunity, doing what they wanted, when they wanted, with little regard to the views of the speaker or others in the upper ranks.

Now the new Democratic leaders of the House and Senate want to avoid a return to that era by forging a working relationship with the men and women who will actually write the bills and lead the Congressional investigations. Top lawmakers acknowledge that finding a way to keep the overarching goals of the party from clashing with the objectives of the independent chairmen will be crucial to keeping Democratic control from spiraling out of control.

"The challenge of maintaining a coherent message even though the power in the Senate is so diffuse is probably our major challenge," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the Senate's third-ranking Democrat.

Already there are signs of discord. Senator Max Baucus of Montana, the Finance Committee chairman who has been a headache for past Democratic leaders, says he will plunge ahead with hearings next week on giving the government power to negotiate Medicare drug prices with pharmaceutical companies — a top Democratic priority he has opposed and one the House plans to speed through with no new scrutiny.

"If we want to do legislation, I want to get the facts first," said Mr. Baucus, who broke with colleagues in the past on the Bush administration's tax cuts.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, who won re-election as an independent but kept his seniority within the Democratic Party and will lead the Homeland Security panel, is making his colleagues nervous as they consider his differences with many of them over the war and antiterror issues.

In the House, Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York, who as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee will be the gatekeeper for critical tax and social policy, suggested Friday that he might revisit new Democratic rules forcing lawmakers to disclose their sponsorship of tax breaks for small enterprises. And Representative John D. Dingell of Michigan, the chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, has broken with fellow Democrats over the years on an issue likely to return in this session, imposing tougher mileage standards on automakers.

"I am a member of the team and I am going to be a team player, but it is too early to see how it is going to develop," Mr. Dingell said of the new relationship between leadership and the chairmen.

During four decades of Democratic rule ending in 1994, committee chairmen amassed almost unchallenged authority, often becoming more feared and influential than the elected leadership. They were nearly impossible to budge from their perches, and the concept of term limits was unimaginable. In a move that caught some new Democratic chairmen by surprise, House rules pushed through by the Democrats this week retained the six-year limit on chairmen imposed by Republicans, but the leadership reassured lawmakers they would revisit the restrictions when there was less attention focused on the dawn of the Democratic era.

Mr. Dingell is a holdover from those days of dominant Democratic chairmen, men like Dan Rostenkowski on Ways and Means, Jack Brooks on Judiciary and Jamie Whitten on Appropriations. Those and other lawmakers saw themselves as legislative forces and the leadership as a nuisance to be negotiated on the way to the floor. Mr. Dingell said his contemporaries in the days before Republican rule were descendants of earlier strong-willed chairman like Wilber Mills.

"We simply carried on a tradition which was there, which was accepted, which was proper and which, very frankly, worked," Mr. Dingell said.

But the delegation of such power to the chairmen came with a price. Republicans derided Democrats as arrogant and pushed the image of out-of-touch Democrats as a campaign slogan, riding it and Democratic gaffes to majority status in 1994.

Once installed, the new Republican leadership moved quickly to centralize power in the offices of speaker, majority leader and whip. They stripped chairmen of the power to control their own legislation, enacted term limits and forced prospective chairmen to plead their case with the leadership and bolster it with a record of campaign contributions.

Incoming Democrats said Republicans went too far in diminishing the authority of chairmen and fostered arrogance at the leadership level.

Now Democrats say they hope to strike a more productive balance, giving chairmen some leeway as long as they operate in concert with their fellow committee leaders and with the leadership's approval.

"It is the right mix," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts and chairman of the Financial Services Committee. "We have to work together and we don't want to do things that are discordant, but the leadership should not micromanage."

As an example, Mr. Frank said he informed Mrs. Pelosi that he intended to schedule oversight hearings quickly on administration problems in replacing housing along the Gulf of Mexico after Hurricane Katrina. Mr. Frank said he also planned initiatives to help lower-income Americans buy housing and to give corporate shareholders more say in executive compensation.

DOJ_NMG_0113589

Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, the chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee — renamed to put the emphasis on oversight — said he had no qualms about clearing his agenda with the leadership and believed such cooperation should not impinge on his own goals.

"I don't think it is inconsistent," said Mr. Waxman, who said his panel would most likely begin hearings this month. "We are going to pursue the most important theme we can deal with: whether taxpayers' money is wasted through fraud and abuse."

Through the meeting she convened on Friday and conversations with other lawmakers, Mrs. Pelosi has shown she considers herself firmly in charge of the House and is not going to let the chairmen set the pace.

The initial Democratic legislative program is not being routed through committee — perhaps not even the Rules Committee. But Mr. Frank and others said the new chairmen were comfortable with that approach if it helped to make a quick impression. In general, House leadership aides said they believed they could keep the chairmen and the rank-and-file moving in tandem, though they expected some feuds. Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the majority leader, has scheduled the first weekly meeting with House chairmen for Tuesday.

Tom Daschle, the former Senate majority leader who occasionally found himself at odds with committee leaders during his tenure, said communication was essential in a legislative body where lawmakers could be such independent operators.

"The key is to just try to realize you are going to have low-maintenance and high-maintenance chairs and you have to work with both," Mr. Daschle said. "You have to personalize your relationship with each or you are going to have trouble."

Mr. Daschle, a close ally of Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the new majority leader, said he was confident Mr. Reid had the skills to manage the sometimes delicate relationship. Some incoming chairmen agree.

Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, the chairman of the Banking Committee, said Mr. Reid had already diplomatically sounded him out on his plans. "We are very much in sync on this," said Mr. Dodd, who is considering legislation to protect consumers from credit card marketing fraud and high-risk mortgages. "I am not going to do anything without letting Harry Reid know what we are going to do."

Mr. Baucus said he sees himself in broad agreement with Mr. Reid.

"Nine times out of 10, Harry Reid and I will agree," he said. "But when we disagree, I have to do what is right. I am elected by the people of Montana, and they are my employers."

Bipartisanship As The First Resort? (NYT)

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

The House's new Democratic majority is mounting a legislative blitzkrieg meant to leave the displaced Republicans gasping in the dust. In successive working days, the Democrats plan to enact legislation to bolster homeland security, raise the minimum wage, encourage embryonic stem cell research, require the government to bargain for lower Medicare drug prices, recoup lost royalties on offshore oil and gas leases, and lower interest rates on student loans.

These are all commendable goals. Equally commendable is the pledge by the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, to restore some pay-as-you-go fiscal discipline to a budget process bloated out of control by President Bush's deficit spending. But what is sorely lacking is the oft-invoked, more often abused ideal of bipartisanship — despite the Democrats' campaign pledge to end the practice of relegating minority lawmakers to the legislative wilderness.

The Democrats have the votes to impose their way. But quickly turning any of these measures into law is dicier given the more complicated rules in the Senate and the Democrats' blade-thin majority there. In scoring early political notches, House Democrats had better keep in mind the promise of bipartisanship for securing larger victories.

For years, bipartisanship has been the missing ingredient in the sour stew of Washington. It was lacking during the Democrats' long House reign that ended in 1994. But during the last 12 years, the Republicans virtually eliminated Democratic participation. Chronically invoked by President Bush, this political ideal has been reduced to rhetorical ashes.

Of necessity, perhaps, the new Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, is making a considerable show of promising to reach across the aisle. In the House, Ms. Pelosi promises bipartisanship will be in evidence after the Democrats get past their opening agenda. That is like saying the checks and balances are in the mail. If Democratic candidates were smart enough during the campaign to realize that the voters demand bipartisanship, they should be quick enough to try it from the start.

It's Really About '08, Nancy (WP)

By Victor H. Fazio

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Nancy Pelosi is on the clock. During the 2006 congressional contest that culminated with the California Democrat becoming the first female House speaker, Pelosi initially said she would take the campaign "one day at a time." But her timeframe quickly expanded into an ambitious vision of what the new Democratic Congress would accomplish in its first 100 hours. After the ceremony and celebration on Thursday, Pelosi must not only try to make good on her promises, but she must do so amid the general confusion, power struggles and even the smell of fresh paint that prevail whenever Congress changes hands.

DOJ_NMG_0113590

Pelosi has pledged that the first 100 working hours of the 110th Congress will pass measures such as lobbying and ethics reform; a minimum-wage increase; pay-as-you-go budgeting; expanded federal funding for embryonic stem cell research; lower interest rates on student loans; adoption of the 9/11 commission's recommendations; changes to allow Medicare to directly negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies; and reduced dependence on foreign oil.

But the speaker, the Democratic leadership and new lawmakers will face practical challenges in navigating this list. For a new Congress, January normally is a time for members to be sworn in, work the district or perhaps travel overseas until the president's State of the Union address later in the month.

For freshman members, these first few weeks can be especially chaotic, as they focus on establishing offices and hiring staff in Washington and their home districts. Fresh from their victories, members frequently face the dizzying challenge of finding a home in Washington and possibly relocating their families. This time is a whirlwind of exposure to new committee assignments, delegations and caucuses. Oh, and new members have to learn the administrative and practical skills they'll need as the business of making laws gets underway.

These 100 hours will also include the first time that some members will address the House, a moment every lawmaker recollects. That first address is rarely one's finest performance -- even the most experienced member can be unnerved by the realization that not only the public but also House colleagues will listen to what they have to say. (My first address was on the rice industry -- a key concern of my constituents -- and a subject I knew much more about when I left the House in 1999 than when I first took the floor in 1979.)

Not everyone will be learning anew this week. Pelosi has sought to engender some bipartisan goodwill by authorizing severance pay for newly unemployed Republican staff members. Likewise, she has sought to preserve continuity by retaining existing staff in the parliamentarian's office and other administrative positions, including the sergeant-at-arms, the clerk of the House and the House historian. In 1994, when Newt Gingrich became speaker, the leadership fired everyone except the parliamentarian. In contrast to that off-with-their-heads attitude, Pelosi has more respect for the administrative framework of the House. Perhaps most important, she reached out to John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who was House majority leader, on transition issues, such as the schedule, oversight on intelligence and fixing the Congressional page program.

Pelosi's strategy reflects an understanding that progress depends on bipartisan agreement, though it may also reveal an effort to take advantage of President Bush's declining popularity -- and the potential willingness of some House Republicans to distance themselves from the White House.

Pelosi's First 100 Hours initiative has drawn some comparisons with the Republicans' 1994 "Contract With America," a package that sought to bring about major policy change over 100 days. But for Pelosi, the effort is less about radical policy shifts than about bringing policy in line with what Democrats believe is common wisdom to Americans. Stem cell funding, which has passed once and enjoys bipartisan support, is the quintessential example. However, even pay-as-you-go budgeting garners support on both sides of the aisle, including from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan. Perhaps most significant, there has been bipartisan cosponsorship of proposals for lobbying reform, the minimum-wage increase, the 9/11 commission recommendations and Medicare drug pricing.

Of course, no matter how carefully Pelosi has selected the issues for her first 100 hours, the legislation will not necessarily steamroll through Congress unquestioned. Though lobbying reform and minimum-wage proposals could pass easily, there may be differences between the House and Senate that could lead to conflict in conference committees.

There are early indications that issues such as adopting the 9/11 commission report and the Medicare drug proposal may face some opposition, both within and beyond the Democratic ranks. The Democrats' proposal to require offsetting revenue or savings whenever any tax cuts or spending increases occur will present challenges to the Congress as it attempts even the least expensive initiatives. This pay-as-you-go proposal may be especially problematic for Democrats in dealing with funding the Iraq war, for which less than half of the total anticipated cost has been incurred so far.

Just as elements of the Contract With America failed to pass in the Senate or get signed into law, the long-term prospects of the 100-hours legislation outside the House remain uncertain. However, if the speaker can shepherd her initiatives through Congress, she will have established herself and her Democratic caucus as advocates for the middle class as well as the poor -- and her party as one that keeps its word. This message will be especially important as the 2008 presidential contest unfolds and Democrats seek to campaign in opposition to the political quagmire, foreign and domestic, that has plagued the Bush administration.

Indeed, if Congress passes the bulk of the First 100 Hours proposals, Pelosi will have succeeded in laying these touchstone issues squarely at Bush's feet. After all, it is Bush who may ultimately determine the record of the 110th Congress. It is likely that the president will dust off his once-used veto power, at least again on stem cell funding and on interest rate breaks for college tuition, attempting to repair his fragmented base. On other issues, however, there are hints that the president, perhaps harking back to his days in Austin, may meet Congress in the middle. On immigration and Social Security reform, which will require bipartisan agreement, Democrats should at least be optimistic about the prospect of presidential compromise.

DOJ_NMG_0113591

Once these issues have been placed before Bush, the First 100 Hours package in many ways will have already succeeded. If faced with a small stack of bills, the president will be in the unenviable position of either signing them and making the package an unqualified success, or refusing to sign them and making himself the villain in rejecting fairly popular proposals. Even the latter option would make the First 100 Hours package a success, at least for Democrats, by contrasting the parties and portraying Bush as a slave to inflexible partisan positions. With 2008 in mind, Pelosi's first 100 hours may prove less a personal crusade than a harbinger of greater gains to come.

Victor H. Fazio (D-Calif.), a senior adviser at Akin Gump, served in the House from 1979 to 1999.

A Good Start For Congress (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

Democrats launch solid ethics reform in their first few hours in charge.

AFTER 12 YEARS in the political wilderness, Democrats in the House of Representatives can be excused the hoopla and hokeyness that marked their first day of control. But, to the new leadership's credit, the showmanship was accompanied by something significant: the approval of tough ethics rules that will do a lot to curb the appearance and reality of the "culture of corruption" the Democrats campaigned against.

The new ethics rules approved expeditiously Thursday — "railroaded," if you like — set a high bar for similar self-policing by the Senate. That chamber also came under Democratic control, albeit in a more subdued fashion reflecting the Democrats' one-vote majority and the charisma gap between Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), the first woman to hold that position.

The House essentially enacted the wish list of advocates of reform (including us), burnishing Pelosi's promise to preside over "the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history." Some burnishing was necessary after Pelosi unsuccessfully attempted to install Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a Beltway insider who was investigated but not charged in the Abscam scandal, as majority leader.

Under the rules adopted Thursday, representatives may not accept gifts or travel from lobbyists or agents of foreign governments, and — to prevent a repetition of the Republicans' notorious "K Street Project" — members are prohibited from retaliating against firms that dare to employ lobbyists from the opposite party. On Friday, the House advanced the ethics agenda further by making it easier to monitor special-interest "earmarks" inserted in legislation.

More remains to be done. Reformers inside and outside Congress must continue to press for the creation of a new ethics watchdog in each chamber. House Democrats say they will take up that initiative in the coming weeks, and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who now chairs the Rules Committee, has indicated that she would hold hearings on the idea.

Important as they are, the new ethics rules deal with process, not substance. The public receives regular reminders, most recently from Jack Abramoff, of how the legislative process can be corrupted by narrow special interests. But even in a transparent process unsullied by bribery or self-dealing, policy choices must be made. They include relatively easy ones, such as raising the minimum wage, and harder ones, such as whether to allow Republican tax cuts to expire and how to respond to President Bush's Iraq policy.

On some of those issues, as Pelosi knows, Democrats are not united. All the more reason for them to focus first on something on which they (and their sadder-but-wiser Republican colleagues) agree: the need for an improvement in their own behavior.

Showdown In Washington (SFC)

By Leah Garchik

San Francisco Chronicle, January 7, 2007

Pat Schroeder, the former Democratic congresswoman from Colorado, vowed to wear her silvery "Madame Speaker 2007" pin "until it rusts and falls off." But by the end of last week, new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's oft-repeated teatime remarks to the young ladies of the Convent of the Sacred Heart -- "We're not prisoners of the past; we're shaping the future" -- seemed slogan-like.

On the other hand, the educational wallop that began with what student Tanaya Macheel of the San Francisco school called "being in a political environment and being able to see Nancy in person" went beyond words.

DOJ_NMG_0113592

Friday morning on national TV, Pelosi had been seen shaking her head "no" to a reporter who asked whether she would support sending additional troops to Iraq. Madam Speaker's locomotive had chugged away from the station and was heading down the track. As Americans watched, a question arose: Is the power of office any different when it is wielded by a woman, and -- even today -- do women have a harder time in office?

"The fact that you are a novelty means that you are watched doubly carefully," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., during a phone conversation several weeks ago. "And I've always felt the most important thing is to show you could be effective early on."

Pelosi's 100-hour blitz of legislation began immediately Thursday with the reforming of the House rules. "Once you're effective," said Feinstein, "the whole perception of you changes."

Feinstein, now beginning her 15th year in the Senate, remembered that she passed two early tests: bills to ban assault weapons and a desert protection act, going "toe to toe" with Republican Sen. Malcolm Wallop of Wyoming, "and from that point on, I had a very productive relationship with men."

There were some social problems. "It's very difficult," she said, "to go up to a man and say, 'How about having dinner with me tonight?' It is for me ... and there is still that thing."

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., said by phone in December that when she arrived in the House in 1983, she demanded that a male colleague's comment -- "I want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentlelady from California. As a matter of fact, I'd like to associate with the gentlelady" -- be stricken from the record.

Boxer said she treats men and women the same. But Feinstein allowed that in some cases it might be possible to "use warm femininity to reach a goal ... I think it is a finely honed art form. You have to be very careful."

Now, most male lawmakers are savvier. "There are no different rules for women or men," said Boxer, who served in the House for a decade before her election to the Senate in 1992. "We get the same pay, we get the same rules, we have the right to hold up legislation, we have the right to introduce legislation."

Although Boxer said Pelosi -- her "closest of friends" -- told her years ago "she wanted to be speaker," the feat is "amazing. ... I believed we would have a woman president long before we would have a woman speaker, because it's such a man's world in the House."

Schroeder, who served in the House from 1973 to 1996 and is now executive director of the Association of American Publishers, said she never thought there would be a woman speaker, because in the caucus, "they can vote by secret ballot."

In the '80s, when Schroeder and her House colleagues Shirley Chisholm and Geraldine Ferraro of New York and Ohio's Mary Rose Oakar tried to push through women- and family-friendly legislation, they'd line up male allies, ducks in a row. "We thought we had the votes. And then the votes would come out the other way."

That's still not entirely in the past. Although there are a record 71 female members serving in the 110th Congress, it's "only" 16 percent of the chamber, she said, "and we still don't have an Equal Rights Amendment."

Schroeder and Boxer said there are a variety of reasons it has taken women longer to reach powerful positions in Congress.

"A lot of it in the House had to do with the fact that women came a lot later," Boxer said, "and didn't stay as long. Many had gotten there because their husbands had died. If appointed, they would have less respect ... that was a lot different than fighting for it" in an election.

Schroeder said that while nontraditional families are common in America today, in Congress "only 1 family in 10 doesn't look like the Norman Rockwell family."

The congressional men in those families, Schroeder said she believes, are personally threatened by women in power. Their wives have supported them by hosting receptions, sending holiday cards and smiling at political rallies, and that's the role they see for women.

"We all want wives," Schroeder said, laughing.

Feinstein and Rep. Mary Bono, R-Palm Springs, said that female camaraderie is essentially different from the male variety.

Despite political differences, "Women are more quick to share their personal side, to support each other," said Bono, who has known Pelosi since the early 1990s. Bono said that when they first met, she told Pelosi she was impressed with her "charisma, charm and intelligence" and Pelosi "looked at me, surprised" at the compliment.

She still has warm feelings and says Pelosi's swearing-in speech Thursday was "truly historic," but she is left with a conundrum: "I want her to be successful as a woman in power, but politically, as a Republican, I am on the other side. But I hope when she needs a friend on this side of the aisle, I'll be one of the first she will call."

Bono said expressing anger is a special problem for women in positions of authority.

"There are different ways to be, different sensitivities. ... Guys like to say we're shrill and use the b-word to describe us."

DOJ_NMG_0113593

But Schroeder said in the Republican-controlled House of the past 12 years, all differences of opinion became "very personal." The attitude of GOP leaders such as Newt Gingrich and Tom DeLay was "if you don't agree with me, you must be a Commie simp from San Francisco, and your mother wore combat boots. Instead of getting angry, they tried to trash somebody. And Nancy Pelosi is not going to do that."

The Ebb Of Prejudice (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

It was, superficially, pure coincidence that Nancy Pelosi and Deval Patrick took their precedent-setting oaths of office at almost the same hour on Thursday.

Pelosi became the first female speaker of the House of Representatives, second in line to the presidency. And Patrick became the first African American governor of Massachusetts, only the second black state chief executive elected in the history of the United States.

Impressive as their individual r?sum?s are, what's more significant is what their elevation signals: a growing sense of inclusiveness and opportunity in this society.

The United States has many challenges and shortcomings, but occasionally it is appropriate to take note of the ways in which this country is overcoming prejudices. Thursday was such a day.

It was not really an accident that these breakthroughs occurred simultaneously. The generation that is now producing major leaders is a generation substantially freed of the sexism and racism of its predecessors.

Decades of men and women of different races going to school together, working in the same offices and factories, and serving in the same military have changed attitudes. Gender and racial differences have shrunk to a manageable size.

What is striking is that Pelosi and Patrick were elevated by their opposites. Pelosi leads a House of Representatives in which men outnumber women, 364 to 71. Patrick was elected by a constituency that is nearly 90 percent white.

In neither case was the gender or race of the person competing for power the determinant of the outcome. Those who were deciding were able to look past these obvious characteristics to weigh their skills and leadership potential.

Skeptics will argue that in 21st-century America women and blacks still face barriers that make their climb to the top harder. And that is true. Pelosi worked anonymously for years in Democratic politics before another woman, the dying Rep. Sala Burton, endorsed her as her successor -- an endorsement that helped Pelosi win her first and toughest primary. Once in the House, she showed the canniness and drive that built the alliances that eventually made her the Democratic leader and the majority party's choice for speaker.

Patrick got his break when he was one of the poverty-stricken black youths in Chicago chosen to receive scholarships to the elite Milton Academy in Massachusetts. There he starred academically and went on to Harvard and a law career both in the Justice Department and in two major corporations.

But their success is not unique, and it is part of a pattern that shows the progress this society -- and not just a few exceptional individuals -- has made.

While both Pelosi and Patrick are Democrats, and proudly part of a party that abandoned its racist past to become a champion of civil rights, Republicans have also moved with the times. The two secretaries of state named by President Bush, Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice, are both African American. Powell is a product of the U.S. Army, one of the great egalitarian institutions of the past generation, and Rice rose in an academia that increasingly treated women as equals to men.

Their predecessor in the Clinton administration's State Department was Madeleine Albright, a woman and an immigrant -- a combination that was unimaginable in such a position in any previous time.

The United States has not reached perfection. Discrimination still exists in many forms and in many places. But the progress is real -- and well worth celebrating.

?

Here is a final postscript to the wonderful tributes last week to Gerald R. Ford -- a story told me by Rep. David Obey of Wisconsin.

Two years ago, on a visit to Washington, Ford spent an hour chatting with members on the floor of the House, where he had served for so many years.

Obey, one of the few current members who served with Ford, told the former president that he was finishing a memoir, in which he discussed all the presidents he'd known in Washington, from Richard Nixon to the current President Bush.

"You'll be surprised," said the liberal Democrat, "but I've written that you were the best president of the bunch."

Ford paused for a moment and then replied with a smile, "Pretty slim pickings, wasn't it?"

That was so typical of the man -- modest, honest, realistic and good-natured, all at once.

DOJ_NMG_0113594

Congressional Budget Delay Stymies Scientific Research (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

The failure of Congress to pass new budgets for the current fiscal year has produced a crisis in science financing that threatens to close major facilities, delay new projects and leave thousands of government scientists out of work, federal and private officials say.

"The consequences for American science will be disastrous," said Michael S. Lubell, a senior official of the American Physical Society, the world's largest group of physicists. "The message to young scientists and industry leaders, alike, will be, 'Look outside the U.S. if you want to succeed.' "

Last year, Congress passed just 2 of 11 spending bills — for the military and domestic security — and froze all other federal spending at 2006 levels. Factoring in inflation, the budgets translate into reductions of about 3 percent to 4 percent for most fields of science and engineering.

Representative Rush D. Holt, a New Jersey Democrat and a physicist, said that scientists, in most cases, were likely to see little or no relief. "It's that bad," Mr. Holt said. "For this year, it's going to be belt tightening all around."

Congressional Democrats said last month that they would not try to finish multiple spending bills left hanging by the departed Republican majority and would instead keep most government agencies operating under their current budgets until next fall. Except for the Pentagon and the Department of Homeland Security, the government is being financed under a stopgap resolution. It expires Feb. 15, and Democrats said they planned to extend a similar resolution through Sept. 30.

Some Republicans favored not finishing the bills because of automatic savings achieved by forgoing expected spending increases. Democrats and Republicans alike say that operating under current budgets, in some cases with less money, can strap federal agencies and lead to major disruptions in service.

Scientists say that is especially true for the physical sciences, which include physics, chemistry and astronomy. When it comes to federal financing, such fields in recent years have fared poorly compared with biology. The National Institutes of Health, for instance, spend more than $28 billion annually on biomedical programs, five times more than all federal spending for physical sciences.

For 2007, Congress and the Bush administration agreed that the federal budget for the physical sciences should get a major increase. A year ago, in his American Competitiveness Initiative, President Bush called for doubling the money for science over a decade. That prompted schools and federal laboratories to prepare for long-deferred repairs and expansions, plans that appear now to be in jeopardy.

Among the projects at risk is the Relativistic Heavy Ion Collider at the Brookhaven National Laboratory in New York, on Long Island. The $600 million machine — 2.4 miles in circumference — slams together subatomic particles to recreate conditions at the beginning of time, some 14 billion years ago, so scientists can study the Big Bang theory. It was already operating partly on charitable contributions, officials say, and now could shut down entirely, throwing its 1,069 specialists into limbo.

"For us, it's quite serious," said Sam Aronson, the Brookhaven director. For the nation, Dr. Aronson added, the timing is especially bad because the collider has given the United States a head start on European rivals, who hope to build a more powerful machine.

"Things are pretty miserable for a year in which people talked a lot about regaining our competitive edge," Dr. Aronson said. "I think all that's stalled."

Another potential victim is the Fermi National Accelerator Laboratory in Illinois, where a four-mile-long collider investigates the building blocks of matter. Its director, Piermaria Oddone, said the laboratory would close for a month as most of the staff of 4,200 are sent home.

Congress and the Bush administration could restore much of the science financing in the 2008 budget. Scientists say it would help enormously, but add that senior staff members by that point may have already abandoned major projects for other jobs that were more stable.

Other projects affected by the budget freeze include:

¶A $1.4 billion particle accelerator at the Oak Ridge National Laboratory in Tennessee meant to probe the fine structure of materials and aid in cutting-edge technologies. Its opening might be delayed a year.

¶A $30 million contribution to a global team designing an experimental reactor to fuse atoms rather than break them apart. Controlled fusion, if successful, would offer a nearly inexhaustible source of energy.

¶A $440 million X-ray machine some two miles long at the Stanford Linear Accelerator Center in California that would act like a microscope to peer inside materials, aiding science and industry. Construction, begun last year, would slow.

DOJ_NMG_0113595

"It's pretty bad," said Burton Richter, a Nobel laureate in physics. "There's going to be another year of stagnation. That hurts a lot."

The National Science Foundation, which supports basic research at universities, had expected a $400 million increase over the $5.7 billion budget it received in 2006. Now, the freeze is prompting program cuts, delays and slowdowns.

"It's rather devastating," said Jeff Nesbit, the foundation's head of legislative and public affairs. "While $400 million in the grand scheme of things might seem like decimal dust, it's hugely important for universities that rely on N.S.F. funding."

The threatened programs include a $50 million plan to build a supercomputer that universities would use to push back frontiers in science and engineering; a $310 million observatory meant to study the ocean environment from the seabed to the surface; a $62 million contribution to a global program of polar research involving 10 other nations; and a $98 million ship to explore the Arctic, including the thinning of its sheath of floating sea ice.

Missions at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration are also threatened, with $100 million in cuts. Paul Hertz, the chief scientist at NASA's science mission directorate, said potential victims included programs to explore Mars, astrophysics and space weather.

Physicists said a partial solution to the crisis would let the Energy Department do what it wanted to do all along for 2007: move $500 million left over from environmental cleanup accounts into the physical sciences. That would require Congressional approval but no budget increase.

Raymond L. Orbach, the department's under secretary for science, in a recent statement seemed to call for such legislative relief.

"A yearlong continuing resolution takes away many of the opportunities for advancing science," Dr. Orbach said. "We urge Congress to continue critical investments in America's scientific leadership."

U.S. Selecting Hybrid Design For Warheads (NYT)

By William J. Broad, David E. Sanger, Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6 — The Bush administration is expected to announce next week a major step forward in the building of the country's first new nuclear warhead in nearly two decades. It will propose combining elements of competing designs from two weapons laboratories in an approach that some experts argue is untested and risky.

The new weapon would not add to but replace the nation's existing arsenal of aging warheads, with a new generation meant to be sturdier, more reliable, safer from accidental detonation and more secure from theft by terrorists.

The announcement, to be made by the interagency Nuclear Weapons Council, avoids making a choice between the two designs for a new weapon, called the Reliable Replacement Warhead, which at first would be mounted on submarine-launched missiles.

The effort, if approved by President Bush and financed by Congress, would require a huge refurbishment of the nation's complex for nuclear design and manufacturing, with the overall bill estimated at more than $100 billion.

But the council's decision to seek a hybrid design, combining well-tested elements from an older design with new safety and security elements from a more novel approach, could delay the weapon's production. It also raises the question of whether the United States will ultimately be forced to end its moratorium on underground nuclear testing to make sure the new design works.

On Friday, Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the National Nuclear Security Administration of the Energy Department, said the government would not proceed with the Reliable Replacement Warhead "if it is determined that testing is needed." But other officials in the administration, including Robert Joseph, the under secretary of state for arms control and international security, have said that the White House should make no commitment on testing.

Congress authorized exploratory research for the weapon three years ago, and has financed it at relatively low levels since. But now the costs will begin to increase.

If Mr. Bush decides to deploy the new design, he could touch off a debate in a Democrat-controlled Congress and among allies and adversaries abroad, who have opposed efforts to modernize the arsenal in the past. While proponents of the new weapon said that it would replace older weapons that could deteriorate over time, and reduce the chances of a detonation if weapons fell into the wrong hands, critics have long argued that this is the wrong moment for Washington to produce a new nuclear warhead of any kind.

At a time when the administration is trying to convince the world to put sanctions on North Korea and Iran to halt their nuclear programs, those critics argue, any move to improve the American arsenal will be seen as hypocritical, an effort by the United States to extend its nuclear lead over other countries. Should the United States decide to conduct a test, officials said, China and Russia — which have their own nuclear modernization programs under way — would feel free to do the same. North

DOJ_NMG_0113596

Korea was sanctioned by the United Nations Security Council for conducting its first test on Oct. 9, and it may be preparing for more, experts said.

Both administration officials and military officers like Gen. James E. Cartwright, head of the Strategic Command, which controls the nation's nuclear arsenal, argue that because the United States provides a nuclear umbrella for so many allies, it is critical that its stockpile be as reliable as possible.

"We will not 'un-invent' nuclear weapons, and we will not walk away from the world," General Cartwright said in a recent interview. "Right now, it is not the nation's position that zero is the answer to the size of our inventory."

"So, if you are going to have these weapons, they should be safe, they should be able to be secured, and they should be reliable if used," General Cartwright said in the interview, conducted before the Department of Energy's decision was announced.

The current schedule, which is subject to change, would call for the president to make a decision in a year or two and, if approved, to begin engineering development by fiscal year 2010 and production by 2012.

The two teams competing to design the weapon, one at Los Alamos in New Mexico, the other at the Livermore National Laboratory in California, approached the problem with very different philosophies, nuclear officials and experts said. Livermore drew on a single, robust design that, before the testing moratorium, was detonated in the 1980s under a desolate patch of Nevada desert. The weapon, however, never entered the nation's nuclear stockpile.

The Los Alamos team drew on aspects of many weapons from the stockpile and pulled them together in a novel design that has never undergone testing.

A winner of the competition was to have been announced in November. But federal officials said they had a hard time choosing between the two designs, calling both excellent.

The question now, arms experts said, is whether a mix-and-match approach combining the two will produce a clever hybrid or an unworkable dud. They said the nuclear laboratories, bitter rivals for decades, have never before shared responsibility for designing a weapon.

"There has not been what I would consider a real partnership," said Philip E. Coyle III, a former director of weapons testing at the Pentagon and former director of nuclear testing for Livermore. "In some respects, it's unprecedented."

Ray E. Kidder, a senior Livermore scientist who pioneered early arms designs, said the hybrid approach appeared to be based more on the politics of survival for the laboratories than on technical merit.

"It's spreading the wealth," he said. Federal officials, Dr. Kidder added, "tend to do that fairly rigorously so as to keep the labs alive. To foreclose the possibility of closure, they try to divide the work load."

General Cartwright cast that problem differently, saying that it is critical to keep America's "intellectual capital" in producing weapons alive. "We are starting to get to the point where the people who actually have experience designing a weapon are reaching that point at which they will start to leave the industry," he said. "And are we able to attract the minds that we will need to sustain this activity?"

Nonetheless, several nuclear experts expressed doubts about the wisdom of using a design that has never undergone testing, saying future presidents might lose confidence in the arsenal's potency and be tempted to conduct test explosions.

"It's one thing to have all the components working and another to have them all working together," said Raymond Jeanloz, a geophysicist at the University of California, Berkeley, who advises the government on nuclear arms. "To me, that's the key technical issue that has yet to be resolved."

In the few years since its debut, the reliability program has grown from a fringe effort at the nation's nuclear arms laboratories into a centerpiece of the Bush administration's nuclear policy.

Advocates say a generation of more reliable arms would give military commanders the confidence to abandon the current philosophy of holding onto huge inventories of old weapons, and could speed a shrinkage of the American arsenal from some 6,000 warheads to perhaps 2,000 or less.

Critics say a main justification for the program vanished in November when a secretive federal panel known as Jason found that the plutonium "pits" at the heart of many nuclear warheads aged far better than expected, with most able to work reliability for a century or more.

"This research eliminates a major rationale," Lisbeth Gronlund, a nuclear arms specialist at the Union of Concerned Scientists, a private group based in Cambridge, Mass., said in a November statement.

Since that study was revealed, the administration has emphasized other reasons to build a new warhead, especially new, highly classified technologies to make the weapons virtually impossible to use if they fall into unfriendly hands. Other objectives are to simplify manufacturing, reduce toxic byproducts and improve safety of triggering devices.

As a signatory to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, the United States and other nuclear weapons states have committed, at least on paper, to the ultimate goal of "the liquidation of all their existing stockpiles" of weapons. But General Cartwright cautioned that much of the criticism of the program was cast in terms of achieving that disarmament, and he said the government's policy, and that of the new warhead program, was to maintain a nuclear stockpile "that would be the smallest practical to maintain its credibility."

DOJ_NMG_0113597

He described the nation's nuclear weapons stockpile as "an artifact of the cold war — cold war both in its delivery systems and its characteristics and certainly in its technology."

"We stopped testing a while back. So, from the testing standpoint, we have not been fielding new weapons," General Cartwright said. "From the standpoint of engineering and design, there has been only marginal activity, mostly reacting to the age of components."

Justices Continue Trend Of Hearing Fewer Cases (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Only a handful of decisions each year define the Supreme Court for the American public, and that might be especially appropriate this year.

After decades of decline in its caseload, the court is once again on track to take its fewest number of cases in modern history. The justices went on a relative shopping spree when they returned from their holiday break, on Friday, agreeing to hear seven additional cases before this year's term ends. Before that they had accepted only 60 petitions, as opposed to 80 at this point last year.

Even a caseload in the 80s would have been considered extraordinarily skimpy 20 years ago. In William H. Rehnquist's first term as chief justice in 1986, the court disposed of 175 cases. That had dwindled to 82 cases last year after Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. took over.

Roberts himself said during his 2005 confirmation hearings that the court should be doing more.

"They hear about half the number of cases they did 25 years ago," Roberts testified. "There may be good reasons for that that I'll learn if I am confirmed. But just looking at it from the outside, I think they could contribute more to the clarity and uniformity of the law by taking more cases."

What Roberts has discovered is unclear. The process by which the nine justices decide which of the thousands of appeals they receive each year will be given the justices' full consideration -- granted certiorari, in the court's terminology -- is among the court's most closely guarded procedures. But the chief justice's role is limited.

"When it comes to certiorari, the chief justice only has one vote like everyone else," said University of Minnesota law professor David Stras, who has conducted extensive research into the process. It takes four votes of the nine to accept a case.

There is one reason for the decline from the heavy workloads of the 1980s that everyone agrees on: A 1988 congressional decision made at the court's behest eliminated a number of mandatory appeals, leaving the justices to pretty much set their own agenda.

Beyond that, theories abound. Stras said he thinks it is as simple as a change in personnel. His research shows former Justices Byron R. White and Harry A. Blackmun, who left the court in 1993 and 1994, respectively, were much more likely to grant certiorari -- or "cert" -- than their contemporaries.

He said his studies of Blackmun's papers, which detail cert grants, suggest that the downward trend could continue if Justice John Paul Stevens, 86, is the next to leave. Stevens also was above average in voting to take cases, he said.

Others say that an increasingly homogenous appellate judiciary appointed by Republican administrations is producing fewer conflicting opinions among circuits, a chief characteristic of the kinds of cases the justices like to take. Or that the federal government, usually the most persuasive in convincing the court that an issue is ripe for review, is losing less often at the lower levels and not appealing as many cases.

Some blame the so-called "cert pool," the practice by which eight justices -- Stevens is the exception -- combine their clerks to review the thousands of petitions. One clerk then makes an initial recommendation on a case, with the justices having the final say. No one really knows what the recommendations are, but the theory is that it might be safer for a relatively inexperienced clerk to recommend denial rather than a grant.

Others wonder whether the new -- with the addition of Roberts and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. -- and philosophically divided court is overly cautious. That theory is that justices would withhold their vote to take a case unless they could be sure their "side" would prevail.

All those theories for the falling number of cases have detractors, especially the last one. While the court's 5 to 4 decisions in controversial cases get all the attention, the vast majority of the court's work is more mundane -- tomorrow's oral arguments consist of a tax case from Guam and a trash-hauling dispute -- and more likely to be decided in unanimous or near-unanimous decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0113598

Those most familiar with the court say the docket is always part happenstance, based on the cases made available. For the most part, "they're not working as a unit" deciding what areas of the law need attention, said Margaret M. Cordray, who teaches a seminar on the court at Capital University Law School in Ohio. "They operate very independently on the question of cert."

Cordray and her husband, Richard Cordray, who clerked for White and Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, wrote an op-ed piece last summer in The Washington Post criticizing the court for being so stingy in granting petitions. "The justices need to engage in a more self-conscious reflection and discussion about whether the shape of their docket is what it should be to govern the complex legal affairs of this large and diverse nation," they wrote.

Cordray said she believes the court could take on 100 to 130 cases, although she agrees there is no magic number on what the court should accept.

Thomas C. Goldstein, a Supreme Court practitioner at Akin Gump Hauer & Feld who instigated a lively debate in legal circles when he wrote about the issue on Scotusblog.com, acknowledged that the shrinking docket has been evolving for years.

"But this is different," he said. "They were sliding down a hill, and this year they fell off the cliff."

Five days of oral arguments are customarily set aside in February, and justices this year filled them only by scheduling just one case on three of those days. The court usually hears two per day and in the past has heard as many as four. Justices canceled one day set aside for hearings in December and are expediting some cases to fill their March calendar.

Margaret Cordray, Goldstein and others do not buy the argument that there are not enough conflicts out there for the court to resolve. Goldstein said there are still plenty of splits among the lower courts that the high court could accept, and Cordray wants the court to take on more cases that would give guidance to the lower courts on matters that are not necessarily high in profile.

While the declining caseload at the nation's most visible court could create a small public-relations problem -- Roberts and other justices are actively advocating a major pay increase for the judiciary -- the court in the end will still be judged by the controversial cases it decides, rather than the number.

The court will make major decisions this term on abortion, the use of race in school admissions, and employment discrimination. Also, it has an emerging number of environmental cases, including the justices' first consideration of the issue of global warming.

Don't Pay Supes Like Members Of Congress (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

Chief Justice John Roberts rightly argues that judges need higher pay, but he exaggerates.

WHEN JOHN G. Roberts Jr. was seeking confirmation as chief justice of the United States, he told the Senate that judges should be guided by "institutional and personal modesty and humility." Alas, Roberts has ignored his own advice. In his annual report on the judicial branch, he calls inadequate pay for federal judges a "constitutional crisis that threatens to undermine the strength and independence of the federal judiciary."

Watergate was a constitutional crisis. "Massive resistance" by Southern states to the Supreme Court's desegregation rulings was a constitutional crisis. Al Gore's refusal to accept the Supreme Court's decision in Bush vs. Gore would have been a constitutional crisis. Less-than-ideal pay for federal judges is a political problem.

In asking for higher pay for judges, Roberts is echoing not just his mentor, the late William H. Rehnquist, but blue-ribbon commissions and the organized bar. Like them, he argues that pay for federal judges has not kept up with inflation, that financial anxieties have caused some judges to resign from the bench early and that the quality of the federal bench has suffered as a result.

Maybe so. But Roberts, known for his caution in crafting judicial opinions, overreaches, especially when he suggests that once "judicial appointment ceases to be the capstone of a distinguished career and instead becomes a stepping stone to a lucrative position in private practice, the framers' goal of a truly independent judiciary will be placed in serious jeopardy."

But it is life tenure, not annual salary, that ensures judicial independence. Federal judges — first-rate or mediocre — can't be forced off the bench because of unpopular decisions. A judge's decision to quit early to improve his or her standard of living is a different issue.

Roberts' frustration is understandable. Pay raises for judges — and other public officials, for that matter — will always seem exorbitant to citizens who earn less. Yet as Roberts points out, since 1969 the average U.S. worker's wages have risen 17.8%, and judicial pay has declined 23.9%. But he shouldn't expect those numbers to inspire pity parties once it's pointed out that federal district judges were paid $165,200 in 2006.

That said, federal judges have been ill-treated by a 1989 law that links their cost-of-living raises to those of members of Congress. Fearful of being criticized for raising their own salaries, members of Congress voted not to accept several pay raises in the 1990s — meaning that the judges also went without raises. That connection would be broken under legislation that would also include a "catch-up" raise for judges.

DOJ_NMG_0113599

Roberts is free to describe the problem and press for its solution. But please, Mr. Chief Justice, no more talk of a constitutional crisis.

OTHER NEWS:

Upward Bound, Just Not As Fast (WP)

By Nell Henderson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Modest Growth Predicted for 2007

The coming year will be a tough one for anybody looking for jobs or profits in home building, but it holds out modest promise for most other American workers, consumers and investors.

The housing market stays in the dumps. Unemployment edges up a bit, but stays relatively low. Inflation ebbs, interest rates remain moderate and stock prices climb, though not as exuberantly as in recent years.

Or at least that's the general consensus of the experts on Wall Street and in Corporate America, who churned out their annual blizzard of forecasts last month.

Sure, they may be wrong: Oil prices remain a wild card. The housing slump might hammer the economy harder than widely expected. And it's becoming tougher to predict the course of a U.S economy that is increasingly affected by financial decisions made overseas.

Even with such caveats, the forecasts are useful for everyone making financial plans for the new year. Families want to know what is likely to happen to prices and interest rates as they make spending decisions. Stock pickers and bond buyers want guidance on how to adjust their portfolios. Executives want a sense of the economy's health so they make decisions about hiring and expanding.

What follows is the outlook on several key economic issues. It is based on interviews with several analysts and a survey of dozens of economists conducted by Blue Chip Economic Indicators, a monthly publication.

No one has a crystal ball, and there is plenty of debate about the details. But overall, the economy is likely to grow a moderate 2.4 percent this year, according to the average forecast of the 54 top business and university economists surveyed last month by Blue Chip Economic Indicators.

That's a slowdown after three years of rapid growth of more than 3 percent, but many economists, including those at the Federal Reserve, think that's just fine. The economy needs to cool a bit to prevent inflation from worsening. And they expect the weakness in housing and auto production to be offset by growth in the services sector, which includes health care, education, law, finance, entertainment, retailing and tourism, accounting for 85 percent of the nation's economic output and more than four of every five jobs.

"I think it's going to be a very good year," said Richard Yamarone, director of research at Argus Research, among the most upbeat of the economists surveyed. The economy "is growing at a pace that is very desirable."

The key to his sunny outlook, Yamarone said, is strong job and wage growth, which fuels consumer spending. "The consumer is riding on a full tank of gas."

Some economists surveyed had a slightly gloomier view, though none predicted a recession. David A. Rosenberg, the chief North American economist for Merrill Lynch produced the most pessimistic forecast for Blue Chip Economic Indicators, predicting sluggish economic activity this year and a significant increase in unemployment.

Rosenberg argues that much of the economic growth of recent years flowed from rising home values, which made consumers feel wealthier, spurring them to borrow and spend more than their incomes. He expects that process to reverse as the housing downturn deepens this year.

"I know I sound like the boy who cried wolf, but remember the wolf did show up at the end of the story," Rosenberg said.

The Dollar Could Slip Some More (WP)

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

The dollar fell more than 11 percent last year compared with the euro and rose slightly against the yen. A lower dollar helps boost U.S. exports, by making them relatively cheaper in overseas markets, and attracts more foreign tourists to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0113600

Many economists think the dollar will slip a bit lower this year for the same reasons it slid last year: the huge U.S. trade deficit, slower U.S. economic growth and robust growth abroad. Many analysts think the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates by midyear, while other governments are raising borrowing costs, which tends to diminish the demand for dollars.

Other analysts, however, forecast that the dollar will stabilize this year. They generally bet that the Fed will hold interest rates steady because of moderate U.S. economic growth as economies overseas lose momentum. The Blue Chip consensus also predicts that the U.S. trade deficit will shrink slightly, as Americans import less and export more.

Also, one major prop under the dollar has not shifted significantly. The Chinese government, and many others, are running big trade surpluses with the United States and plowing their profits into U.S. investments, such as Treasury securities, stocks and other assets. That keeps demand for the dollar solid.

Setting The Bar On Earnings (NYT)

By Conrad De Aenlle

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

THE flow of earnings reports will pick up this week, but the earnings themselves are expected to show a dip in growth from past quarters. Any impact on share prices may depend on investors' expectations about those expectations.

Standard & Poor's estimates that earnings for companies in its 500-stock index rose by 9 percent, year over year, in the fourth quarter. That would be a healthy gain, but also the worst one in nearly five years, said Sam Stovall, S.& P.'s chief investment strategist.

"This would be the first quarter in 19 where we've had a single-digit advance," he said.

But it has not been 19 quarters, or even two, since analysts last forecast single-digit growth.

Earnings estimates started off low for just about every quarter during the four-year bull market and then nudged up continually as fresh numbers came in. S.& P.'s forecast is close to those of other research firms, Mr. Stovall noted, but investors may still be disappointed if results meet expectations and nothing more.

"Earnings are not going to grow at double digits forever," he said. "The real question is: Is Wall Street prepared for the first single-digit advance in 19 quarters?"

One of the first big-name companies to report is Alcoa, which Mr. Stovall likened to a corporate Iowa for its status as a periodic bellwether.

S.& P. projects 150 percent earnings growth for aluminum producers, of which Alcoa is the biggest, and a result in that neighborhood on Tuesday would augur well for fourth-quarter earnings generally, and for 2007 economic activity, he said.

No triple-digit, or even double-digit, gain is foreseen for smaller companies. After increasing earnings at an annual rate of 17 percent or more in each quarter of last year, the S.& P. 600 index of smaller companies is expected to show growth of just 5 percent for the last quarter.

The gap in earnings growth is just one reason that Mr. Stovall expects investors to find larger companies more appealing than smaller ones this year. Smaller companies' run of outperformance is looking long in the tooth after seven years, he said, and indications of softening economic conditions could steer investors toward the comparative safety that blue chips are thought to offer.

"It's getting later in the stock market and economic cycle," he said. "When sailing into an impending storm, sailors prefer a larger ship."

DATA WATCH The highlight of a thin post-holiday economic calendar may be the report on Wednesday of the nation's trade balance for November.

A Bloomberg News poll of economists forecasts a widening deficit, to $60 billion from $58.9 billion in October.

Retail sales for December, to be reported on Friday, are expected to rise by 0.6 percent after a 1.0 percent increase in November.

A Phantom Rebound In The Housing Market (NYT)

By Daniel Gross

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

HOUSING bulls took heart on Dec. 27, when the Commerce Department reported that sales of new one-family homes rose 3.4 percent in November from October. While the figure was still well below the rate of November 2005, it represented a recovery from the sharp declines of the summer.

"Sales of new and existing homes showed tentative signs of stabilizing, although at levels well below their mid-2005 peaks," the Federal Reserve's Open Market Committee said at its December meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0113601

But those who think that the worst may be over for the housing market should take another look at the data, economists say. For the figures on new-home sales have a strange wrinkle that, in the current environment, may lead the government to overstate sales (and to understate inventory) by up to 20 percent. "The market is weaker than the data say," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's/Economy.com.

New-home sales are tallied by the Census Bureau, based on a sampling of contracts signed by home buyers. Running at a pace of more than one million a year for the last four years, new-home sales have been a significant contributor to the housing boom — and to the economy. (Existing-home sales, reported monthly by the National Association of Realtors, count actual closings.)

But here's the rub: If a contract to buy a home, signed in November, is canceled in December, the Census Bureau does not subtract the failed transaction from the number of sales, or add the house back to its inventory total. In the last year, as the housing market has cooled, the volume of cancellations has risen to epidemic proportions.

Speculators who signed contracts to buy homes in new communities in hot markets like Florida simply walked away from their deposits when they realized they couldn't flip the houses for a quick profit. And as prices and interest rates rose, noted Joseph Carson, chief economist at AllianceBernstein, "people who committed to making new home purchases found they were having difficulty selling their own houses."

And so, in the quarter ended on Oct. 31, Toll Brothers, the high-end home builder, noted that cancellations totaled 37 percent of contracts signed in the quarter, up from 18 percent in the same quarter the previous year. Pulte Homes, the builder based in Bloomfield Hills, Mich., reported a 36 percent cancellation rate in its third quarter, up from 17 percent in the 2005 third quarter.

"Cancellations have really affected big, publicly held builders the most, because they are relatively heavily concentrated in what had been the hottest markets," said Dave Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders. Basing his findings on a survey of 30 large builders, Mr. Seiders concluded that in November 2006, cancellations constituted 38 percent of gross sales, compared with 26 percent in November 2005 and about 18 percent in the first half of 2005.

Of course, the large publicly held builders comprise a minority of the home-building industry. Lawrence Yun, senior economist at the National Association of Realtors, noted that "smaller home builders aren't affected as much by cancellations because they generally try to sign up clients before they start construction."

On its Web site, the Census Bureau acknowledges: "As a result of our methodology, if conditions are worsening in the marketplace and cancellations are high, sales would be temporarily overestimated." By how much? Mr. Carson of AllianceBernstein estimates that the government is overestimating the pace of annual sales by 100,000 to 150,000. Mr. Zandi of Economy.com estimates that the differential is even greater. "Given the rise in cancellation rates, it suggests that between 150,000 and 200,000 home sales are being counted that actually did not occur."

Just as the rising tide of cancellations leads the Census Bureau to overreport sales in the short term, it leads the government to underreport inventories. New homes on which contracts are not consummated are not added back into the inventory figure. The most recent report found that the seasonally adjusted estimate of new houses for sale at the end of November was 545,000, or 6.3 months of supply. Given the high rate of cancellations, it's likely that inventory is substantially higher.

This much is clear: Given the failure of the reports to account for cancellations, demand isn't as strong as it appears, and supply is greater than it seems.

The large builders are clearly taking action to remedy the situation. In recent months, they have thrown in extras and cut prices as part of an effort to reduce inventory. These moves may have stemmed the tide of cancellations. "In our survey of big builders, the absolute volume of sales cancellations did seem to top out in the third quarter," Mr. Seiders said.

That's good news. But it may also mean that the housing market's recovery and stabilization may turn out to be like ski trips planned in the Northeast for the week between Christmas and New Year's. Given the climate, both have been postponed until 2007.

Investors Start The New Year Indecisively (NYT)

By Jeff Sommer

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

The year got off to an uneven start on Wall Street last week, with the Dow Jones industrial average and the broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index both dropping modestly. But the Nasdaq composite index, in which technology stocks dominate, eked out a small gain.

DOJ_NMG_0113602

Many analysts expect technology earnings to be strong this year. On Thursday, after Banc of America Securities issued a bullish earnings projection for Intel, the chip maker, tech shares rose sharply. But on Friday, the sector's shares dropped on a disappointing earnings report by Motorola, the cellphone maker, whose stock had a one-day loss of 7.8 percent.

For the week, Intel had the best performance in the Dow, with a gain of 4.2 percent. Goodyear Tire's gain of 10.9 percent led the S.& P. 500. The company said it had reached an agreement with striking workers that would enable it to cut costs.

For the week, the Dow lost 65.14 points, or 0.5 percent, to close at 12,398.01. The S.& P. 500 lost 8.59 points, or 0.6 percent, to close at 1,409.71. The Nasdaq composite index rose 18.96 points, or 0.8 percent, to close at 2,434.25.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note slipped to 4.64 percent from 4.70 percent the previous week.

Gore Leaves Door Ajar For 2008 (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Will he or won't he?

As the Democratic field for 2008 takes shape, one big remaining question is whether former vice president Al Gore -- winner of the popular vote in 2000, an almost-candidate in 2004 and now the public face of the movement to address global warming -- will be in it.

Over the past six years, Gore has become a heroic figure for the party's liberal left, thanks in large part to his early and steady opposition to the war in Iraq. And it's not just liberals who have taken to Gore. "An Inconvenient Truth," the film detailing Gore's lonely quest to raise awareness of climate change, is one of the most successful documentaries of all time and, as important, has transformed Gore's public image from cold to cool.

That renewed popularity has stoked speculation that Gore just may have another national race up his sleeve. "He's the Rocky Balboa of 2008," said Chris Lehane, a former Gore adviser.

But is Gore ready to enter the ring one more time? Don't count on it, say his closest advisers. "There are no secret meetings going on to plan the Gore campaign," said Carter Eskew, a longtime confidant of the former vice president.

But neither Eskew nor any of the small cadre of Gore's closest advisers would entirely rule out such a bid, leaving the same small but substantial amount of wiggle room that Gore himself has left in his public pronouncements.

And there are small signs here and there that could be read as the stirrings of his renewed interest in a campaign. Early last month, Gore addressed more than three dozen labor leaders in Washington, a wide-ranging talk about the Democratic congressional gains and the media, said one attendee, who demanded anonymity. Asked about 2008, Gore said that he has taken a number of calls from people encouraging him to consider running but he "didn't know whether he was going to or not," the source said. "Everybody felt he left a small door open."

For the moment, however, Gore seems more interested in his role as global-warming warrior. He couldn't make time for an interview for the Sunday Fix because he was training 600 people on the slide-show presentation featured in "An Inconvenient Truth," according to his spokeswoman.Rove's Progeny

As we suspected, Karl Rove really is the progenitor of all modern political operatives.

Need evidence? Look no further than John Weaver and Beth Myers, the lead political strategists for 2008 Republican aspirants John McCain and Mitt Romney, respectively.

The two met more than two decades ago in Texas while working on the gubernatorial campaign of Bill Clements. Both Weaver and Myers were deputy campaign managers in Clements's victory over Democratic Gov. Mark Wells White. Their boss? Karl Rove.

Back in 1986, Myers and Weaver started off as rivals. Myers was working for Clements, Weaver for Rep. Tom Loeffler. Clements, who had served a term as governor from 1978 to 1982, drubbed Loeffler in the primary, but Rove must have liked what he saw of Weaver as he offered the young operative a spot on Clements's general election campaign.

Myers recalled her time alongside Weaver -- and under the tutelage of Rove -- fondly.

"John and I were in our 20s working 18-hour days fueled by pizza and chocolate, and Karl provided the adult supervision," said Myers. Ah, those halcyon days!

Although the two principals are sure to be at daggers drawn many times between now and 2008, each said their experiences in Texas would preserve their bond. "She and I developed a fast and lasting friendship then, and I'm sure it will last through this next chapter," Weaver said.

Rangel Says Encouraging Obama On '08 Is No Big Deal (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113603

Are Charles B. Rangel's loyalties mixed?

Mr. Rangel, the longtime Harlem congressman, has let it be known he encouraged Barack Obama to run for president, which could complicate the presidential ambitions of Mr. Rangel's fellow New York Democrat, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"I told him if he didn't run, he'd regret it, and that he's a young man and he ought to test the waters," Mr. Rangel said in an interview yesterday, echoing comments he made on MSNBC and that will appear in the coming issue of New York magazine.

He said he also told Mr. Obama that he was following Mrs. Clinton's moves "and that as dean of the New York delegation, I had obligations, and he would have to understand that," Mr. Rangel said.

Asked if that meant he would support Mrs. Clinton, he said it was too early to say. And he added, "I got a call recently from my good friend Wes Clark who said he's still contemplating entering the race."

Though neither has announced a candidacy, Mr. Obama is seen as Mrs. Clinton's biggest obstacle as she prepares for a 2008 run. Her advance work has included an effort to build a united front among New York Democrats, including Mr. Rangel. The two met in late November to discuss her plans, about the same time he spoke with Mr. Obama, he said.

Mr. Rangel called the importance of having a united state delegation "relative."

"It's not the end of the world if we split," he said, though it is better to be united.

On MSNBC last week, Mr. Rangel said of Mr. Obama: "He's brilliant, he's talented. He's not tested, but who could be with the limited political experience?" He said that Democrats "should have as many exciting candidates up front as we can get, so we can find out who's electable and who can best lead our country."

Herman D. Farrell Jr., chairman of the state Democratic Party, was unfazed by Mr. Rangel's advice to Mr. Obama. "With two years to go before the next presidential election, it's an acceptable position," he said. "A year from now, we'll talk."

Players (WP)

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's reelection was one of the few bright spots for the GOP in November, so it's not surprising that Republican presidential aspirants are raiding his team.

Sen. John McCain of Arizona has turned his presidential exploratory committee into Arnold East, hiring not only campaign manager Steve Schmidt as a senior adviser but also Schmidt's deputy, Reed Galen, to serve as a deputy campaign manager and even Schmidt's assistant, Jake Suski, to be assistant to campaign manager-in-waiting Terry Nelson.

Robert Terra, who ran the Schwarzenegger war room, will do the same for McCain. Matt David, who served as director of response on the Schwarzenegger reelection drive will be the -- you guessed it! -- director of response for McCain.

McCain didn't get them all. Katie Levinson, Schwarzenegger's communications director, will oversee construction of Rudy Giuliani's communications operation. Schwarzenegger deputy political director Josh Ginsberg has inked a deal with Mitt Romney.

'08 Candidacy Could Shake Up Giuliani's Firm (NYT)

By Patrick Healy, Russ Buettner

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

In the time since Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani left office in 2001, he has told friends and political allies that he would consider running for the presidency in 2008, and that he wanted to use the interim to create a consulting business that would both burnish and broaden his image as a leader and security expert.

And in the first months of that new firm, Giuliani Partners, there seemed no end to its ambitions: Mr. Giuliani saw safety and security, law, crime-fighting, and real estate as lucrative areas of expertise, his aides say. They quickly announced ventures with Ernst & Young, Nextel and Mexico; discussed trading services for equity; and envisioned finding such success that the business could, without doubt, survive his departure one day.

Now, as Mr. Giuliani contemplates that bid for the presidency, the firm — about which little has been publicly known — says it is dependably profitable and attractively positioned. But, at the same time, its aspirations have been modestly realized: a collection of boutiques more than an empire, and one whose long-term survival if Mr. Giuliani departs is very much a matter of debate both in-house and out.

The partnership comprises three distinct businesses that have had varying degrees of success in maintaining the steep trajectory of the early days.

The largest unit, in terms of employees and possibly revenue, is Giuliani Capital Advisors, an investment bank with 100 employees that Mr. Giuliani did not create, but rather was bought by Giuliani Partners from Ernst & Young for $9.8 million in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0113604

The investment firm's revenues were down in 2005, the first year Mr. Giuliani owned it, though its chief executive said the downturn began in the months prior to the sale and has since been reversed. Last year, eight of its original 22 managing directors left for other jobs. Despite its name, Mr. Giuliani is minimally involved.

Giuliani Partners, the 60-person consulting arm, is Mr. Giuliani's main focus, and it has had to scale back its reach somewhat in recent years to accommodate his political travel and lucrative speaking offers. It had a base of 20 major clients in early 2004, while now it has 12 to 15: a deliberate limit, firm partners say, because all of the clients seek and receive personal time with Mr. Giuliani.

The third and smallest unit is Giuliani Security and Safety, another consultancy that former Police Commissioner Bernard B. Kerik once ran (as Giuliani-Kerik L.L.C.) until he resigned at the end of 2004 amid personal problems that caused him to withdraw his name from consideration to be President Bush's secretary of homeland security. The Kerik debacle forced an overhaul of the unit, which Giuliani aides now hail as a small but fast-growing practice, with 10 employees led by a respected former F.B.I. official.

Change is a constant in all sorts of businesses, and Giuliani Partners acknowledges its own set of evolutions. Though it once announced new clients with celebratory press releases, the last such announcement was in November 2004.

Partners say their newer clients — they will not give a number — have not sought the same level of public exposure for their relationship with Mr. Giuliani.

But the largest potential change, a Giuliani candidacy, looms larger than all the rest, and the company says it is now deeply engaged with questions about its future. If he does run, executives say, at least some shakeout at the firm is certain.

"Obviously as things accelerate, there are going to have to be changes, and we're looking at that," said Michael D. Hess, senior managing director of Giuliani Partners.

Mr. Hess acknowledged that his view had shifted since 2004, when an interviewer asked if the business could survive without Mr. Giuliani. "Absolutely," he said at the time.

Would he answer the same today? "I think so," he said last week. While Mr. Giuliani is an irreplaceable figure, he said, other executives are also attracting business. "He is, of course, a draw, people do want to work with him," Mr. Hess said of the ex-mayor, "but on the other side of the coin, we have a very deep bench."

Yet Mr. Hess acknowledged in an interview that other top executives at the firm, like him and Dennison Young Jr., a partner who was a top mayoral aide to Mr. Giuliani, would most likely join a Giuliani campaign.

"I think the answer is yes," Mr. Hess said in evaluating that possibility. At that point Mr. Giuliani's spokeswoman, Sunny Mindel, interjected, "We don't know all these things," and Mr. Hess picked up her line of thought.

"But no one knows — that's the study and continuing exploration we have to do," Mr. Hess said. "The substantive people are less likely to be involved in the campaign. We're not terribly political."

By "substantive people," he was referring to firm executives who work with clients in areas of expertise; during the interview he included in that group Pasquale J. D'Amuro, the head of Giuliani Security and Safety; Richard J. Sheirer, a senior vice president and the commissioner of emergency management under the former mayor; and Thomas Von Essen, another senior vice president and former city fire commissioner. (At the same time, Mr. Hess did not rule out any of these three or others as possible campaign members.)

Giuliani Partners is a private company, which makes it difficult to assess its financial health and assets. By one measure of accomplishment, client satisfaction, Giuliani advisers say the company has been an unqualified success, and there is no record of lawsuits or notable public complaints from those who have received services.

Jim Steets, a spokesman for Entergy, long a client of Giuliani Partners, said the firm helped revamp its security and emergency response plans and strengthened its relationships with emergency agencies around its five nuclear plants in the Northeast.

How much Mr. Giuliani and other principals of the firm are earning from the businesses is not public record. But much of Mr. Giuliani's income comes from his outside business interests and includes millions of dollars he earns from speaking appearances around the world and as a partner in a Houston-based law firm, Bracewell & Giuliani.

Mr. Hess said Mr. Giuliani's speaking fees are individual earnings and do not represent income for the firm.

But several Giuliani Partner ventures have not borne all the anticipated fruit.

In 2003, Bear Stearns Merchant Banking set up a $300 million private equity fund to invest in security-related companies, with advice and profit sharing by Giuliani Partners. But only one investment was made: the $210 million purchase of CamelBak, a Petaluma, Calif., company that makes canteens worn like backpacks. The equity fund put up $100 million of the price, according to The Deal and Forbes.

Two other relationships were ended after questions emerged in news accounts about the backgrounds and operations of the client.

DOJ_NMG_0113605

Mr. Giuliani's experience as a businessman could be a factor in a presidential race, political analysts say. "Voters like supporting a businessman who has to meet a payroll, who built a business from scratch and can demonstrate an understanding of the economy," said Frank Luntz, a Republican pollster who has worked for Mr. Giuliani in the past.

Mr. Giuliani has said he will decide about a presidential bid early this year, but advisers now say the decision may be up in the air for months.

Were he to leave, could Rudy Inc. survive without Rudy?

Eric Abrahamson, a professor at Columbia Business School, said survival for a business that loses a key leader can depend on many factors, including the nature of its business and its maturity. He said the departure of a rainmaker could be hardest to survive.

"When you bring in those people, you are bringing them in for their social network," said Mr. Abrahamson, who studies the creation and growth of management techniques.

Giuliani Partners is five years old and operates from the Times Square offices of Ernst & Young, the accounting firm. As a private business, Giuliani Partners is not required to release its clients' names, but some have been announced, and others, Mr. Hess said, wish to remain private. Active clients, Mr. Hess said, include Entergy, Purdue Pharma, and TransCanada Corp. and Shell.

Neither Mr. Giuliani nor other executives have registered to represent foreign governments in the United States, nor are they lobbyists. Mr. Giuliani also does not hold the type of licenses that are held by the directors of Giuliani Capital Advisors, of which Giuliani Partners is the majority owner.

The capital firm specializes in bankruptcy consulting, and mergers and acquisitions.

The partnership's security division, which Mr. D'Amuro took over in 2005, may be the unit most poised for growth. Mr. D'Amuro has traveled to meet with executives in Japan, Qatar, and other nations, often focusing on clients who seek the firm out for advice on how to protect against a terrorist attack.

Giuliani Partners recently launched two international offshoots: Giuliani Security and Safety Asia, and Giuliani Compliance Japan, where Mr. Giuliani and other executives speak to businesses there about complying with new conflict-of-interest rules.

Mr. Hess said he was not concerned that foreign work would somehow tarnish Mr. Giuliani politically.

"We bend over backwards and are very careful about who we do business with, for the most obvious reasons — from the beginning, Rudy's brand of integrity and ethics always had to be preserved," Mr. Hess said.

Revenues for Giuliani Partners' main consulting or security wings are not available because it is a private company.

But the third wing of the business, Giuliani Capital Advisors, is required to file annual financial statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

For calendar 2005, Capital Advisors reported revenues of $48 million, a drop from what the firm had brought in under Ernst & Young. For example, in the 2004 fiscal year, the last full year Ernst & Young owned it, the firm reported revenues of $85 million.

Steven D. Oesterle, a partner in Giuliani Partners and chairman of the investment bank, said a fairer comparison is to measure the Capital Advisors' performance in the final five months before the sale in December 2004, where it averaged about $3.3 million a month in revenue, versus the $4 million a month it took in the following year.

He said the firm was more modest in scale than during its Ernst & Young years, in part because there are fewer bankruptcies today and there had been very little backlog of business when the company changed hands. The firm still ranks high on lists comparing financial advisers based on the number of cases handled.

Mr. Oesterle said most of the eight managing directors who departed last year had been replaced.

The chief compliance officer and other top executives also left, but Mr. Oesterle said the departures did not reflect poorly on the business or signal unhappiness with Mr. Giuliani.

"It's a competitive marketplace," he said, "but that creates opportunity for us to hire people. I'm very comfortable with where we are in terms of the talent level within the organization."

Of Mr. Giuliani, he said, "He plays a very limited role with this business — you can think of this as more of an investment of Giuliani Partners in many ways."

One executive who left Capital Advisors last year, and spoke on the condition of anonymity because those who left had signed confidentiality agreements, said Mr. Giuliani's limited role had not helped. He said the firm needed a rainmaker to bring in business and to raise capital for the merger and acquisition portion of the business.

"When you put all that together, it's just not a winning formula," the former executive said.

Mr. Hess, however, described Mr. Giuliani as a hands-on manager in the main consulting part of the business, an executive whose busy schedule very much sets the agenda for the company, at least for now.

DOJ_NMG_0113606

"We work with his schedule: When he's off speaking or when he was writing his book, we would find what days worked and what days don't work," Mr. Hess said. "He's remarkable. He doesn't sleep very much."

Bloggers Unleash A Virtual Campaign (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

Former Gen. Wesley K. Clark boasts 35,000 more friends than ex-Sen. John Edwards, and there are more flattering photos of Sen. Barack Obama than Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

In an attempt to reach the MySpace generation, politicians are turning to the virtual campaign trail. Dedicated political junkies are setting up their own sites devoted to encouraging presidential runs from their favorite candidates -- former Vice President Al Gore, Sen. John McCain and the two Democratic superstars currently topping polls, Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton.

"Happy New Year to the future president of the United States of America," Leapin Larry told Mr. Obama Sunday on one of the fan sites, which has more than 21,000 friends.

Michele, a 28-year-old from Orange Beach, Ala., tells the former first lady: "Hillary, you fixed ny. I'd love to see you as president. Go for it, you would fix this country."

Some of the candidate MySpace pages are official, such as the sites run by 2004 vice presidential candidate Mr. Edwards and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack -- both Democrats seeking the 2008 nomination. Others, such as the nearly 100 sites created in Mrs. Clinton's name, are run by anonymous Web surfers.

If popularity were gauged by MySpace, Mr. Clark, a Democrat with an official "Securing America" page, is winning with more than 45,000 friends, and Mrs. Clinton, New York Democrat, is the best-known.

At least 40 MySpace accounts have been set up as belonging to Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat, but none seem to be official. A close look at MySpace fan sites reveal passionate Web surfers.

"Hi Hillary with your brains and beauty you should have no problem!!!!!!!!" yells a man with the screen name HuckFinny, doing so entirely in capital letters.

"I have never been into politics actively, but if big Al would run again, oh, I would do anything," writes Josh Paskowitz on a Gore site. "I would march. I would rally. I would DIE to make him win." Patrick agrees, telling the former vice president: "Can't wait to see you out there again in 2008. ... Keep up the fight."

Mr. Gore does not have an official site, but he does have a page promoting his film on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth."

There's also a site called "President Gore," which calls the 2000 Democratic nominee, who won the popular vote but lost the Electoral College to George Bush, the "Rightful president."

Mr. Edwards, a former U.S. senator from North Carolina, has one of the most active official pages as he works to build a grass-roots campaign. It includes all the details of his presidential-announcement tour and Web video links and his snazzy 2008 logo.

"Our country needs a president who sees the serious problems and honestly wants to fix them," Kristin of California tells Mr. Edwards.

Jen, a 23-year-old Pennsylvania resident, tells the candidate, "I am so happy that you decided to run again! You have my vote!!!" emphasizing her happiness and voting intentions with the screaming all-capitals style common on such sites.

The comments would be an ego boost for any politician.

"Iowa is Hillary country," Howie, a 27-year-old from Des Moines, Iowa, says. "Time to announce, so I can get to work helping you win here in the caucuses in January 2008!"

MySpace user Beth tells Mr. Obama on one site: "You're the solution in 2008."

"Please run for president," one person begs Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican. "We need a real patriot in the office!"

Several efforts to draft candidates enjoy popularity on MySpace. One site has even worked up a merchandising plan, selling "Barack the Vote" T-shirts superimposed on an altered "Rock the Vote" logo.

There are several sites devoted to Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who made a failed bid to unseat Mr. Bush in 2004. Many of the sites seem to have been designed to promote his candidacy then, but a few are more current.

One is a good try at an official site, complete with the song "America the Beautiful" and a waving U.S. flag indicating Mr. Kerry is "online now."

Among his top friends are his wife, Teresa Heinz Kerry, and former Democratic Presidents Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton. Mr. McCain is his only Republican friend.

Beth, a 44-year-old resident of Skokie, Ill., wishes Mr. Kerry "best of luck in the new year," and tells him "I voted for you!! I love you!! I'll vote for you again!!"

DOJ_NMG_0113607

Plenty of the lesser-known politicians have sites as well.

Democratic Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich's official site promotes an end to the war in Iraq, complete with a Democratic presidential primary poll showing him in the lead.

"You are an inspiration," Colleen, a 31-year-old Denver resident tells the Ohio representative.

"Glad to hear that you have decided to run in 2008!" Chris Ho tells Democratic Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr.

Another fan of the Delaware politician says, "Go for it senator. Get the troops out."

On what seems to be New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson's official site, Jess tells the Democrat he should pursue a presidential bid. Of the most likely Democratic candidates, only Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut has no MySpace presence, official or fan-based.

The Invasion Of The Alpha Male Democrat (NYT)

By Ryan Lizza

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

NANCY PELOSI'S carefully crafted introduction to the American people last week seemed to reinforce some stereotypes of the so-called mommy party. On the day she made history as the first woman to be elected speaker, she appeared on the House floor, surrounded by children and bedecked in pearls.

But even as this nurturing image dominated the news, the swearing-in ceremony on Thursday was notable for another milestone in gender politics: the return of the Alpha Male Democrat.

The members of this new faction, which helped the Democrats expand into majority status, stand out not for their ideology or racial background but for their carefully cultivated masculinity.

"As much as the policy positions is the background and character of these Democrats," says John Lapp, the former executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee who helped recruit this new breed of candidate. "So we went to C.I.A. agents, F.B.I. agents, N.F.L. quarterbacks, sheriffs, Iraq war vets. These are red-blooded Americans who are tough."

Mr. Lapp even coined a term to describe these manly — and they are all men — pols: "the Macho Dems."

The return of Democratic manliness was no accident; it was a carefully planned strategy. But now that the Macho Dems are walking the halls of Congress, it remains to be seen whether they will create as many problems for Democrats as they solved. After all, these new Democrats have heterodox political views that could complicate Democratic caucus politics, and their success may raise uncomfortable questions for those Democrats who don't pass the new macho test.

The architects of this strategy, Representative Rahm Emanuel, Mr. Lapp's boss, as well as Senator Charles Schumer, are well-known political pit bulls. Mr. Emanuel won his Congressional seat by navigating the ward politics of Chicago's old-fashioned political machine.

He is missing half of one finger — his aides refer to him as "nine point five" — and swears enough to make a Soprano blush. Senator Schumer is so aggressive and demanding that he has a reputation as one of the most difficult people in the Senate to work for. Both men, who have been elevated to leadership positions in the new Congress, are throwbacks to the era when tough-guy Democrats were urban ethnic politicians, like Dan Rostenkowski and Tip O'Neill.

When Mr. Emanuel and Mr. Schumer set out to find candidates to run in the red states and districts of the 2006 electoral battleground they sought their own rural and exurban doppelgängers.

The fruits of those efforts arrived in Washington last week. Take, for example, three House freshman from Pennsylvania. Patrick Murphy, the son of a Philadelphia police officer, was a West Point professor, a prosecutor and an Iraq war veteran before he ran for Congress. Chris Carney was a lieutenant commander in the Navy Reserves. Joe Sestak is a former Navy vice admiral whose last job was commanding 15,000 sailors and dozens of ships and aircraft for operations in Afghanistan.

"Joe Sestak — that guy's muscular!" says Mr. Lapp. "He's a vice admiral. I've told him to spend a lot of time going on the national talk shows. He can really do a service changing the mold and the way the Democratic Party is viewed."

Other House members include Minnesota's Tim Walz, an Army national guardsman; Brad Ellsworth, an Indiana sheriff; and Heath Shuler, a former N.F.L. quarterback from North Carolina.

Biography, it can be argued, counts more than substance. For example, Mr. Shuler's Web site includes more information about his high-school football career (106 touchdowns) than his post-football career (selling real estate).

In the Senate, Mr. Schumer's tough-guy caucus includes Jon Tester, a husky Montana farmer with a buzz-cut, and Jim Webb, the former marine from Virginia who turned his son's combat boots into an effective electoral prop. Upon arriving in Washington, he promptly picked a fight with President Bush at a White House reception.

The roots of the Macho Dem strategy can be found in the party's 2004 losses when Democrats decided that their post-9/11 candidates needed to exude strength above all else.

DOJ_NMG_0113608

"Presidential politics, but also the rest of national political leadership, has a lot to do with the understandable desire of voters for leadership, strength, clarity and sureness," says Jim Jordan, John Kerry's first presidential campaign manager. "Frankly, in the post-Vietnam era, Democrats have come up short by those measures too frequently."

Adds the Democratic strategist James Carville, "The fact that the party has come across as less — I don't want to say less masculine — but certainly less aggressive than Republicans, is true."

But there may be serious risks for the Democrats' embrace of an electoral philosophy based less on bold ideas than on bold biography. For one, the Macho Dem strategy is inherently pro-male. And Democrats have historically relied on a gender gap advantage — with women. If they tilt in the other direction, does that gap disappear?

As Tom Edsall recently pointed out in a guest column on The New York Times Op-Ed page, despite Ms. Pelosi's historic ascension, 2006 was a bad year for Democratic women. Nine of the party's top 11 male House candidates won, while only 1 of the organization's top 11 female candidates prevailed.

It's a paradoxical conclusion to an election that was followed by Ms. Pelosi's ascension to speaker and Hillary Clinton's dominance of presidential political predictions. Just as these female faces are solidifying the perception of the Democrats as the party of women — the gender gap still exists — the Macho Dems are adding a dash of testosterone, which could add some cultural frisson to the party.

Sure, some Macho Dems express support for, say, abortion rights but one gets the sense that ensuring Roe's preservation may not be one of their highest priorities in coming to the Senate. It's hard to imagine them at the next Emily's List fund-raiser.

Ideologically, many Macho Dems are culturally conservative and economically liberal — making them odd ducks in a party that since the Clinton years has been defined by cultural liberalism and Rubinomics.

"You can argue it will cause more problems because there will be more cross currents," says Mr. Carville. "A lot of these guys are economically pretty populist — Webb and Tester — more so than the Clintonites like myself."

Then again, President Bush and the Iraq war serve as unifying force for Democrats that may militate against these cross currents.

More interesting may be the implications of the Macho Dem theory for the 2008 presidential campaign. If a party measures its candidates by whether they wear a uniform, carry a gun or simply look tough — does it invite the public and press to apply that standard to all the party's leaders?

The leading presidential candidates — Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton — may not score that high on the Alpha meter. And in the past, when Democrats believed their candidate was a true hero — well, just remember how the Republican Party was able to portray John Kerry. It could be a warning sign for Democrats: live by the Macho Dem creed, die by it.

The Jeb Bush Era Ends In Florida (WP)

By Linda Kleindienst

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Outgoing Governor Did Things His Way

TALLAHASSEE -- On a bright January day in 1998 marked by bone-numbing 33-degree cold, Jeb Bush took office as Florida's 43rd governor with a pledge to safeguard the interests of the people, not the bureaucrats.

In the ensuing eight years, Bush sent shivers through Florida's status quo as he gathered more power than any previous governor and reshaped state government to fit his vision.

Nicknamed "King Jeb," the Republican transformed what he saw as a tangle of red tape and squanderer of public money into a smaller, business-friendly administration needing fewer tax dollars to run.

Bush, who passed the mantle to Charlie Crist (R) last Tuesday, leaves a legacy of a leader adamant about doing things his way, who fearlessly championed such controversial causes as school vouchers, faith-based prisons and prolonging the life of Terri Schiavo, a brain-damaged woman who became the centerpiece of a national right-to-die battle.

Yet, while his tenure coincided with a sizzling economy and an overflowing treasury, Bush's back-to-back terms were marred by frequent ethics scandals, official bungling and the inability of the government he downsized to meet growing demands for state services, including education and aid for the infirm and the elderly.

A policy wonk, Bush pursued an agenda so frenetic that even his efficiency czar resigned in protest.

"I've always felt, if you can do something today, why wait? It's just my nature," said Bush, 53, who grew grayer and slightly stouter in Tallahassee but never slackened his pace, even during his final days.

He championed tax cuts that chiefly benefited business and the wealthy, trimmed the state's payroll, stripped job protection from thousands of mid-level civil servants, gained more power over the judiciary, exploited his Washington connections to prevent the closing of military bases and launched the nation's first statewide private-school voucher program.

DOJ_NMG_0113609

While older brother George's administration in Washington badly fumbled its initial response to Hurricane Katrina, Jeb Bush was praised for his actions before, during and after the eight hurricanes that raked Florida in 2004 and 2005. Seemingly everywhere, he warned residents in English and Spanish to gird themselves for the storms' fury, then oversaw relief efforts when the winds died down.

But his administration -- the Department of Children and Families, in particular -- was vilified for losing track of 500 youngsters under state care and for failing to prevent the deaths of several others. A smiling Rilya Wilson became the poster child for all that was wrong with the agency and, by extension, the Bush administration's failure to serve Floridians in need. Although her body was never found, it is believed the 5-year-old Miami girl was killed in December 2000, 15 months before the state realized she was missing.

Despite the controversy that swirled around the botched 2000 presidential election, which saw his brother win Florida and thus the White House by 537 votes, Bush failed to fully restore confidence in an electoral system that is still mired in controversy and lawsuits. He did little to counteract soaring property insurance rates or shorten waiting lists for citizens needing services.

"He led the enactment of tax cuts that will drain the state of needed revenue for health care and children and senior citizens -- and we already rank at the bottom of the nation in those services," said Karen Woodall, a lobbyist for migrant workers and the poor.

Few people have so dominated Florida's political landscape. When Bush moved into the governor's mansion, Florida Republicans reached their zenith of power. Buoyed by a GOP-controlled legislature awed by his personality, clout and family name, Bush enjoyed superstar status and high job performance ratings from voters -- and believed he had the political capital to shake things up.

"Most governors have been committed to the public sector. They grew up knowing and supporting government," said Dominic Calabro, president of Florida TaxWatch, a private watchdog of government spending. "He grew up with a disdain and believed in limited government."

While seeking reelection in 2002, Bush defined "real leadership" as making tough choices. For those who disagreed with him, he said, "You know where I stand."

Bush battled against government intrusion in private lives but commandeered the state's executive and legislative branches to prolong the life of Schiavo, Florida's legislature and Congress. Ignoring the repeated verdicts of judges, Bush, a convert to Roman Catholicism who approached this battle with moral zeal, rammed through a special law to restore Schiavo's feeding tube in what many saw as an attempt to pander to the religious right. But the courts had the final word and on March 31, 2005, the 41-year-old Schiavo died.

"I'm deeply disappointed that a woman was starved to death," said Bush, calling it the most disheartening event during his time in office. "I can respect other people's opinions but, at the end of the day, that's what happened."

Under Bush, Florida earned Wall Street's highest possible bond rating. He led a drive to make Florida a biotechnology center by luring the Scripps Research Institute to Palm Beach County with $369 million in state money as bait. But while Florida led the nation in job creation, much of that was in low-paid service industry jobs that left many Floridians without health insurance and scrambling for affordable housing amid a real estate boom that helped fuel business-friendly tax breaks.

A fiscal conservative, Bush slashed the number of state workers by giving their jobs to private companies. Many public services -- including the state's foster-care system -- were spun off without official oversight, and some ran up cost overruns in the millions. The state budget ballooned by 52 percent, from $48.6 billion in 1999 to $73.9 billion in 2006, though much of the growth was attributable to the hot real estate market and post-hurricane rebuilding.

Though he proclaimed himself the "education governor," Bush's legacy in this field was mixed at best. Test results showed learning gains among fourth-graders, whose scores were easier to improve than those of older children, as well as minorities across all grade levels. But Florida's high school dropout rate and per-pupil spending continued to rank among the nation's worst. While Bush sought spending increases for public schools, they barely offset steadily growing demands on school districts, including the soaring cost of health and property insurance.

During his first year in office, the Legislature approved Bush's A-Plus education reform package, including the nation's first statewide private school voucher program for students in failing schools. But it was struck down as unconstitutional by the Florida Supreme Court early this year.

Perhaps Bush's most grievous blunder came with the enactment of One Florida, a plan to end affirmative-action preferences for minorities in university admissions and state contracting. It sparked a sit-in by two black legislators in the governor's executive suite -- and hundreds of black college students in the hallway outside his office -- and the largest ever protest-march, led by the Rev. Jesse L. Jackson, on the state Capitol in 2000.

One Florida was a prime example of Bush's shoot-first, take-no-advice method of governing. It tarnished his image in the black community and alienated voters he and the Republican Party had been working hard to woo.

DOJ_NMG_0113610

Yet, Bush voiced no regrets. He left behind an office he worked hard to overhaul, in a way he thinks better meets the needs of a fast-changing Florida. Summing up his legacy, he said: "This office has more authority to create the agenda and implement it. . . . My gift is that we've shown that governors can be activists, they can be reformers, if they want to."

Katie O'Malley Makes A Case For Keeping Her Job (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Maryland's soon-to-be first lady, Catherine Curran O'Malley, is sticking with her plan to stay on the bench once her husband is sworn in as governor.

O'Malley, a district court judge in Baltimore, spoke publicly about her intentions during the summer as her husband, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley (D), was campaigning to unseat Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R).

But Katie O'Malley's desire to keep her job has been complicated by a residency requirement and other family considerations regarding an anticipated move to Annapolis. The O'Malleys have four children, including two daughters in high school.

On Friday, a lawyer for the governor-elect wrote to Ben C. Clyburn, the chief judge for the District Court of Maryland, citing case law that suggests a temporary move to Annapolis would not preclude Katie O'Malley from maintaining her "domicile" in Baltimore, provided she intends to return there at the end of her husband's term.

"When this temporary position of Martin's is over, we both intend to reside in Baltimore," Katie O'Malley said yesterday.

The O'Malley family plans to move into the 54-room governor's mansion, known as Government House, sometime after Martin O'Malley's Jan. 17 swearing-in. But the timing remains unclear, aides said. The family has yet to make a decision as to whether to sell their home in Baltimore.

Katie O'Malley's decision to stay on the bench is hardly without precedent.

Marjorie Rendell, the wife of Pennsylvania Gov. Edward G. Rendell (D), sits on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals; Mary Pawlenty, the wife of Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty (R), is a district judge in the state; and Gary Sebelius, the husband of Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius (D), who refers to himself as the state's "first dude," is a federal magistrate judge.

Anne Holton, first lady of Virginia, had been a judge but decided to step down after her husband, Timothy M. Kaine (D), won the governorship.O'Malley Continues to Fill Out His Staff

Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley has added a few more familiar faces to his incoming State House staff, including two former campaign managers.

O'Malley made one of his picks public last week at a gathering of Maryland county officials, announcing that Josh White would serve as his director of intergovernmental affairs.

The seemingly unflappable White served as O'Malley's campaign manager during his recent win over Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) and is a former executive director of the Maryland Democratic Party. He has been serving in a key staff role in O'Malley's transition in recent months.

Also on board, according to transition sources, is Sean R. Malone, who ran O'Malley's 1995 campaign for reelection to the Baltimore City Council. Since O'Malley's election as mayor, Malone has most recently served as labor commissioner.

In Annapolis, Malone will serve as a deputy to Joseph C. Bryce, whom O'Malley recently named as his senior policy and legislative adviser.

Malone and O'Malley have been friends for more than 12 years, dating back to Malone's time as a bartender at a Charles Street pub in Baltimore where O'Malley regularly played Irish music.Political Staffs Play Musical Chairs

While Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley works to fill his new administration, people with close ties to the outgoing Baltimore mayor are also popping up in some interesting places in county and state governments.

Peter O'Malley, a brother of the governor-elect and former senior campaign aide, is now chief of staff to Baltimore County Executive Jim Smith (D).

Kevin Enright, brother of the governor-elect's chief of staff, Michael Enright, and a former spokesman for the Baltimore police department, has taken a job as communications director for new Howard County Executive Ken Ulman (D). Enright most recently served as spokesman for Maryland Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. (D), O'Malley's father-in-law.

Aaron Greenfield, a former assistant city solicitor for O'Malley's administration, is also working for Ulman, as his chief of staff.

Raquel Guillory, O'Malley's City Hall press secretary, will become communications director later this month for the newly installed Maryland Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler (D).

DOJ_NMG_0113611

And Alexandra M. Hughes, a former economic and neighborhood development aide at City Hall, recently landed in the office of House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) as his communications and policy adviser. Hughes more recently worked for the Baltimore schools as a top aide to then-Chief Executive Bonnie S. Copeland.

Breakfast Of Champions (NYT)

By Charles Baxter

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

THE Senate has been seated, and we have a new senator, Amy Klobuchar. But we're still talking about the aftermath of the midterm elections.

Two friends from high school, guys I've known for 40 years, and I are at breakfast at a greasy spoon on Lyndale Avenue, watching the Minneapolis traffic. I ask for their analysis. My friend the estate planner speaks up first.

"I have it all figured out. Bill Clinton defeated Karl Rove," he says. "The centrist Democrats, Bill Clinton types, beat out the Karl Rove types, the base voters. The base strategy isn't going to work for a while. If it had worked, Mark Kennedy would have won the race for the Senate, and we'd have a scowling movement-conservative accountant as Minnesota's senator. Instead, we have a brainy upbeat soccer-mom progressive. She won in a landslide. She was the antidote to despair. That's what's important."

My other friend looks up from cutting his waffle and joins in. "Bill O'Reilly said national voter turnout would be low. He said that the election was a matter of life and death but that everyone — or 'the folks,' as he calls them — would be watching 'Dancing with the Stars.' " He chews thoughtfully. "That's pretty cynical of him. Who are these 'folks' he's always talking about? Anyway, he was wrong. There was a huge turnout in Minnesota."

"George Bush hit the trifecta," I say. "Iraq, corruption and incompetence." I dig into my huevos. "Failure follows failure. The Republic Party will take years to recover from this. Al Franken thinks George Bush won't even be invited to the 2008 convention. It doesn't matter. No one has anything new to say about the current administration. It's all been said."

"Why do you call it 'the Republic Party'?" my friend asks.

"Because they say 'the Democrat Party.' So we should follow their example and say, 'the Republic Party,' and see what happens."

"The Republic Party convention is going to be here," the estate planner says. "Think about that."

There is a long silence.

"Let them come," my other friend, a sculptor and furniture-maker, proclaims with a smile. "This Congressional district is now represented by an African-American Muslim, a follower of Paul Wellstone." He means Keith Ellison.

"Here's a guy who doesn't run a single TV ad and beats his opponent in a landslide. He gets on TV after the election and is asked by a conservative commentator to prove that he's not sympathetic to terrorism. Then a representative from Virginia wonders if he's going to take the oath of office on the Koran. This district is the object of national attention. It's so progressive, it goes beyond blue into deep purple. We're not just a bunch of Lutherans anymore: Somalis and Latinos and everybody lives here. The party of George Bush wants to have its convention in St. Paul? Fine."

We watch the traffic.

"It's safer to drive now," the estate planner says. "After the last elections, people were so angry that they were driving 80 or 90 miles an hour on I-35. They've calmed down a little."

I speak up. "Well, there's no winter here; the roads are clear. You can't ski because there's no snow, and the hockey rinks haven't opened because the ice is unsafe — when there is ice. In Minnesota! It's creepy. You'd think someone would pay attention."

Another pause. "Why did they lie to us, those guys?" the sculptor asks, reaching for his coffee. "Why do they keep lying about Iraq and global warming?" I am always quoting from somewhere, so I quote my Minneapolis neighbor, the poet Robert Bly: "These lies mean that the country wants to die."

"Not anymore," the sculptor says, sipping his coffee. "We're in a new, positive era, starting now. The Democrats will make some difference."

"You think so?" I reply. Minnesotans cherish their political optimism. But when I think of Iraq and of our intentions there, another line of poetry comes to me, by Louis Simpson, so I say it: "Grave by grave we civilize the ground."

They Came From Montana (NYT)

By Deirdre McNamer

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113612

IT seemed a good idea, during the holidays, to get a dose of Capra corn. So I rented "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington" (one of the screenwriters based it on a novel he'd written called "The Gentleman From Montana") to watch Jimmy Stewart play the consummate rube who can scarcely stop gawking long enough to get sworn in as a newly appointed senator. Nefarious powers think his naïveté makes him the perfectly malleable replacement for his predecessor, who keeled over unexpectedly. But, boy, are they in for a surprise.

During Senator Smith's excited sightseeing ("I don't think I've ever been so thrilled in my whole life, and that Lincoln Memorial! Gee-whiz!"), I thought about Montana's new senator, Jon Tester, gazing up at the Capitol dome for the first time, shortly after the general election. "It hasn't soaked in yet," he told reporters. "Maybe it will never soak in."

Mr. Tester and his wife, Sharla, had traveled to Washington from their farm in north-central Montana, a patch of ground in a county with 1.5 people per square mile, about 1,800 miles from the nation's capital as the crow flies. They were there because Mr. Tester, campaigning for government honesty and attention to the concerns of "regular folks," had unseated the Republican incumbent, Conrad Burns, in a cliffhanger that helped deliver the Senate to the Democratic Party.

And now what?

Undoubtedly, Mr. Tester's rhetoric and style — he might always look a little wrong in a business suit — will tempt continuing comparisons to the barmy screen version of the gentleman from Montana. But only if one forgets that Mr. Tester is 50 years old, he's seasoned in state politics, he ran a canny, gloves-off campaign, and he's the kind of charismatic, hard-to-peg, Western neopopulist (like his friend, Gov. Brian Schweitzer of Montana) who might be, even now, redefining in certain far-reaching ways what it means to be a Democrat.

Or not.

The 110th Congress is just four days into what it will become. It is still on the brink. On the verge. The verge, says my dictionary, is "the point beyond which an action, state or condition is likely to begin or occur." It's also, interestingly, "a rod, wand or staff carried as an emblem of authority or office."

Montana, like any state, has sent to Congress its share of those who strode forth, verges in hand, to become forgettable in the long run. But I think we can be forgiven for anticipating the exceptional. After all, we sent lean and plain-spoken Mike Mansfield, the Senate's longest-serving majority leader and a pivotal force behind civil rights legislation, the Watergate investigation and opposition to the Vietnam War. Decades earlier, we sent Congress its first female member, Republican Jeannette Rankin, the only person to vote against United States entry into not one, but two, world wars. We sent Thomas J. Walsh, who became a national hero for exposing Interior Department corruption in the Teapot Dome oil scandal of the 1920s. And Senator Burton K. Wheeler, a Democrat, who became the most vocal foe of F.D.R.'s attempt to "pack" the Supreme Court.

"Always try to see life around you as if you just came out of a tunnel," Senator Smith advises his hard-boiled assistant, Miss Saunders, in the Capra parable.

Campaigns are tunnels in a sense, filled as they are with obfuscation, noise and narrowly defined progress. Out of the tunnel, out in the lit-up day, it's different. What the members of the 110th Congress see now, and what they choose to do about what they see, might well decide who among them — among both the Testers and the old hands — will outlast their day.

Paint My Sidewalk Blue (NYT)

By Dan Chaon

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

"Congratulations!" cries Dolly, our Republican neighbor, a few days after the election, and my wife and I pause warily on the sidewalk outside her house. Our street is noted for its calm bipartisanship, and Dolly in particular is well-known for her good nature and graciousness. But still, we hesitate for a moment. "Oh," my wife says. "Um ...thanks!" And we exchange glances. Congratulations?

I guess we're still trying to get used to the concept of "winning." As Democrats in Ohio, victory is a sensation we've been unfamiliar with for quite some time, and I have to admit that it makes me a little suspicious. "Oh, snap out of it," my wife says, and I put my hands in my pockets as we continue on down the street.

Of course, it's not easy to be jubilant given the state of affairs in Ohio, or in the country, or in the world. December comes on drizzly and warmish in a kind of eerie, global-warming way, and that first blush of excitement seems to mute quickly. Mike DeWine, the defeated incumbent senator, spends his final days in Congress delivering eulogies for service members killed in Iraq and Afghanistan. Meanwhile, Bob Taft, the departing governor, rounds out his unpopular, scandal-ridden tenure with one last humiliation — on Dec. 27, the Ohio Supreme Court formally reprimands him for his failure to report nearly $6,000 worth of gifts. Around the same time, newspapers begin to report that a Cleveland-size ice shelf had broken clear of the coast of Ellesmere Island in the Canadian Arctic, though apparently Mr. Taft had nothing to do with this.

DOJ_NMG_0113613

Our neighbor Susan is usually reliably cynical this time of year, but she says that she's been feeling pretty happy since the election. "I would actually characterize myself as giddy," Susan says, and she tells me that she's even begun to warm to our new senator, Sherrod Brown, who now seems admirably enthusiastic and energetic, especially since he doesn't have to continue to repeat the phrase "fight for the middle class" in every sentence. He seems more solidly progressive than she thought at first.

Sue is one of several people I know who believes that the 2004 election was stolen, and that voting irregularities in Ohio were primarily at fault. She had been very pessimistic about 2006 as well. "And there were plenty of problems," she says.

In Cleveland, voting machine breakdowns led to delays and long lines at many polling places. There also continued to be questions about the reliability of the electronic voting systems. Major discrepancies were reported in several counties, including Cuyahoga, where there was a disparity of almost 17 percent between the unofficial vote tally reported immediately after the election (562,498 votes) and the official tally reported in December (468,056 votes).

It is troubling and worrisome, Susan agrees — but this time, it seemed, the inconsistencies hadn't been enough to counteract the number of Democratic voters who went to the polls. "I felt like there was a real surge of energy," Susan tells me. "Almost like a grass-roots movement."

My friend Peggy disagrees. " 'Movement' is strong word," she says. Peggy is a retired law school dean, a little past 60, more than a bit skeptical, and she looks at me wryly. "What are they going to pull off, really?" she asks. "Where's the leadership? Seriously. Nancy Pelosi? Harry Reid?"

The two of us are shopping at the West Side Market on yet another warm late December day, walking through the busy aisles and selecting produce from various stands, pausing to look at a case full of beautiful breads or interesting sausages.

"I guess I've become apolitical," Peggy says, and shrugs. "I just don't think that a meaningful discussion of what's important in life is going to reside in politics. I don't suppose that's really going to help your article."

"No," I say. "Not really." The two of us sit down in the balcony above the market, sharing a piece of strudel, and we look down onto a throng of people, buying up food for their New Year's Eve parties.

"I don't mean to be discouraging," she says. "I mean, I do keep voting every year — just like I keep on washing the dishes and lighting the candles — I guess partially it's just a ritual that we go through."

"But not all of it," I say.

"No, of course not," Peggy says, looking at me sidelong. "You can always hope that things are going to change."

We sit there for a moment longer, and she cuts off a piece of pastry with her plastic fork, scrutinizes it, then takes a bite. Christmas music is still playing from some loudspeaker somewhere.

"Anyway," Peggy says. "It's a new year, isn't it?"

An Election With No Losers (NYT)

By Robert Hicks

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

FORMER Mayor Bob Corker of Chattanooga is now Senator Bob Corker in Washington and, while I didn't vote for him, I think that if he proves true to his own past he will do well. That is, he'll be a centrist Republican, guided by his own common sense and maybe a bit by the example of Tennessee's moderate senior senator, Lamar Alexander, rather than by the right-wing rhetoric that has become de rigueur in so much of the South.

As for former Representative Harold Ford, the Democrat Mr. Corker defeated, things aren't all that grim. Despite his loss, he was quickly nominated by James Carville to challenge Howard Dean for the chairmanship of the Democratic National Committee. He declined, but sooner or later there is going to be a fight for the leadership of the party, and Mr. Ford has likely earned himself a pivotal role in any effort to move Democrats away from reflexive Deaniac liberalism.

Ironic as it may sound, what Mr. Ford did prove in his defeat was that he is electable. As it turned out, race didn't seem to hold the Memphis congressman back — the exit polls made it pretty clear that he probably did as well as any white Democrat could have done, given the growing conservative bent of Tennessee.

In talking with my Republican friends and neighbors, I too have concluded that his color was far less important than his family's long record of graft and political strong-arming. Of course, my fellow Tennesseans had their reservations, but, as it turned out, their concerns were not based on the fact that Mr. Ford is a black man or on his voting record, but on the baggage he bears with his lineage.

As one of my neighbors said to me, "I just kept wanting him to say something more than 'You can't choose your family.' " The neighbor's big disappointment was that Mr. Ford wouldn't actively support Steve Cohen, the Democratic nominee for the Congressional seat he vacated, over Mr. Ford's brother Jake, who ran a write-in campaign after losing the Democratic primary.

DOJ_NMG_0113614

And the other night I was having dinner with Welling LaGrone, one of Nashville's civic leaders and a Republican if there ever was one, and even he said he had to admit that Mr. Ford was impressive on all fronts, other than that he was raised in a den of thieves.

I say all this to make the point that despite not being able to choose — or cut loose from — his family, his race or his party, Harold Ford has emerged as a serious politician, a gracious loser, a gentleman worthy of respect and with a solid foundation to build a future on, not only for himself but, I hope, for those remaining yellow dog Democrats like myself.

So what does the future look like? Gov. Phil Bredesen, a Democrat, will begin a well-deserved second term. Senators Alexander and Corker seem set to infuse Washington's newly minority party with the spirit of moderation. And Harold Ford looks likely to find the door that will lead him to best serve his party and the nation.

In an era when elections leave so many Americans of both parties frustrated and bitter, I think Tennessee voters across the spectrum are feeling they can congratulate themselves on a job well done.

For Veterans, Alaska's An Attraction (WP/AP)

By Jeannette J. Lee, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Ex-Military Personnel Have Flocked to State

ANCHORAGE -- As a boy in Upstate New York, Bill McCue spent many hours poring over articles in Field and Stream magazine about moose and grizzlies and dreaming about adventures in the Alaska wilderness.

Later, as a military man, he was stationed in Alaska, and "it was like a dream come true," said McCue, a Vietnam veteran who served at the Navy base on Kodiak Island in the early 1960s. "It's like no other place I'd ever been to."

McCue is one of nearly 70,000 veterans who have chosen to make their home in Alaska, which, according to the Census Bureau, has the country's highest concentration of former military personnel.

The high number reflects, in part, that veterans tend to cluster near military bases. Alaska's two biggest cities, Anchorage and Fairbanks, have one Army and one Air Force base apiece.

"There are real advantages to staying near a military post once you've retired. You can use the PX, you can go on post for medical care, and you've got a social network," said Catherine Lutz, a professor of anthropology at Brown University in Providence, R.I.

But why cold and snowy Alaska and not, say, a warm military town in the Sunbelt? Many veterans, as with many non-military residents, are drawn by the untrammeled wilderness, the world-class hunting and fishing, and secure jobs with good pay.

Moreover, the libertarian frontier spirit and the extreme solitude in this sparsely settled state of 650,000 have a certain appeal to veterans who led highly regimented professional lives or saw too much of the horrors of war.

"There's a lot of open space," said state Veterans Affairs Administrator Jerry Beale. "You can be an individual. You can move out into the bush as far as you want and not have to see anybody for a year if don't want to."

McCue said that for years he suffered from night sweats after serving on an aircraft carrier in the South China Sea during the Vietnam War.

"You come to get away from everything, especially if you've seen stuff you don't want to remember," he said.

McCue has since realized many of his boyhood imaginings. He has been a commercial fisherman, helped guide bear hunts on Kodiak Island and once filled the bed of a pickup truck with pink salmon after fishing for 11 hours with a rod and reel. Now, at 63, he drives a taxi in Anchorage.

Dave Landacre, who is a chaplain at the Veterans of Foreign Wars in Fairbanks, said the veterans he knows "don't like to be told what to do."

"Fairbanks veterans are the people that had 20 to 30 years in military service. They're very loyal, but now that they're done, they want to do things on their own," Landacre said.

Veterans make up nearly 17 percent of the state's adult population, the Census Bureau reported in 2005. Nationally, the proportion is 11 percent.

Beale said most veterans in Alaska are originally from the lower 48 states and get their first glimpse of the state while on duty.

John Kelley, who served in the Air Force and Army, stopped in Alaska in 1968 on his way to Vietnam. He remembers the plane had to circle to scare a moose off the runway before landing.

"I said, 'All righty, I'm coming back,' " he said. "I made it back in 1986 and haven't lived anywhere else since."

Many of Alaska's veterans work for state or federal agencies, with a high percentage in law enforcement as police officers, state troopers or prison guards.

DOJ_NMG_0113615

But it takes a hardy sort to live independently in Alaska, and as many veterans grow old, they leave for retirement communities in Arizona, Florida or California. "The cold, snow and ice gets to a lot of people," Beale said.

But Landacre said he and his fellow veterans made an educated choice, having sampled cities around the world while in the service. Landacre, for example, was stationed in balmy places such as Hawaii, California, Cuba and Guam before settling on Fairbanks, where temperatures can sink to 60 below.

"The Fairbanks crew is not going anywhere. They're up here, and they're staying," Landacre said. "I guarantee not one of us is planning to move to Florida."

Oh, Now The Right Wants To Talk Nice (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

After raining fire on Clinton for years, conservatives are becoming obsessed with tone now that Democrats are in power.

IN THE 1990S, prominent conservatives suggested that President Clinton was a murderer, a conservative senator warned that the president might be shot if he visited that senator's state, and a Republican majority leader told Democrats, "Your president is just not that important to us." And there were many other nasty episodes. But ever since a Republican has held the White House, certain conservatives have decided that political anger is now the main problem of American life and that it resides primarily on the left.

The latest such conservative is Peter Woods, who has written an article in National Review holding me up as the apotheosis of this trend. Woods refers to my "anger" and "nastiness" and writes that I represent "a kind of political theater — a special kind of theater in which the performer enacts rage and attempts symbolically to annihilate his opponent."

Because he is obviously very sensitive, I will try to explain myself as delicately as possible, in the civil and respectful tone that he finds appropriate.

Let me begin by saying Woods is obviously a brilliant and discerning man. I'm sure he writes in good faith and is a caring father or son or cousin to somebody. If I were to run into him, I would greet him warmly, offer him a drink and start gently washing his feet.

Yet I must ever so gently point out that his logic falls just a wee bit short. In 2003, I wrote an essay for the New Republic defending hatred of George W. Bush, an essay to which Woods attributes many of the ills of modern life. According to Woods, "its essential message is, 'I am to be believed and reckoned with because I am angry.' "

I would meekly suggest that this was the opposite of the point of the essay. I wrote that I personally find Bush to be a quite distasteful person, but you must separate your view of the man from your view of his policies. That is the reason why I forcefully (and, in retrospect, mistakenly) supported the Iraq war and upbraided my fellow liberals for allowing their disdain for Bush to color their view of the enterprise. The point of the essay was that personal anger can exist, but it ought to be put aside, and there were sound and natural reasons why liberals loathe Bush.

Woods further claims that I have exposed myself again with another article in the New Republic. Let me explain this one. Recently, a libertarian named Brink Lindsey wrote an article for the New Republic arguing that liberals needed to form an alliance with libertarians. I found his argument interesting (and I encouraged its publication) but ultimately unconvincing. So I wrote a reply, arguing that it would be ideologically and politically counterproductive for liberals to follow Lindsey's advice.

This is the article Woods seizes on as verification that I and other liberals are driven by blind rage. "It is the proof that the American Left's anger is ultimately not about Bush," he writes. My article, in his description, exuded "withering disdain." Most horrible of all, it ended by quoting Michael Corleone — from "The Godfather, Part 2" — saying, "My offer is this: Nothing." My use of this quote, Woods writes, was an effort to "adopt the persona of a gravely insulted Michael Corleone."

Well. As for the "withering disdain," I do confess that I found Lindsey's argument unconvincing. But in my reply, I did write that Lindsey's offer was "written in a friendly spirit" and I called it "quite thought-provoking." If my politesse was not up to Woods' standards, I humbly apologize and plead the constraints of space, without which I would have gone on in my praise of Lindsey in greater detail.

Moreover, by quoting a movie, I was not attempting to adopt the persona of a mafia don. Nor, for that matter, was I threatening to have Lindsey killed. I was simply trying to make a little joke. I am deeply sorry that in so doing I tore asunder the fragile threads of our civil society.

Some would suggest that the right's newfound obsession with tone is not only hypocritical but an attempt to stifle criticism through arbitrary criteria, much like campus PC-niks. But I would not suggest that because that would be an angry thing to say, and I do not want to do any more damage to civil discourse than I already have.

Saudis, France Urge Compliance From Iran (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0113616

AP, January 7, 2007

Saudi Arabia and France called Saturday on Iran to accept international demands to halt uranium enrichment, saying the Mideast should be free of weapons of mass destruction.

Visiting French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy and his Saudi counterpart Prince Saud al-Faisal stressed diplomacy must be the way to solve Iran's ongoing standoff with the West over its nuclear program.

"We agreed on the necessity that the region should be void of weapons of mass destruction and that achieving this target will be by dialogue and diplomacy," al-Faisal said during a joint news conference.

"Israel should not be excluded from the international efforts and procedures," he added, reflecting regional demands that the Jewish state also be scrutinized for its nuclear program.

Iran recently stated it would continue to defy international sanctions aimed at rolling back its uranium enrichment program. Enriched uranium can be used both for nuclear power and nuclear weapons.

Tehran says its nuclear program is peaceful, but the United States and Europe fear Iran is trying to develop an atomic bomb.

"Iran has to respond to international demands regarding this issue, and should have a positive stance," Douste-Blazy was quoted as saying by the state-run Saudi Press Agency.

Arab states near Iran are concerned nuclear accidents could endanger their citizens or environment, and fear a possible military confrontation between the Islamic regime and the United States or its Israeli ally. Gulf nations hosting U.S. military bases — Kuwait, Bahrain and Qatar — also fear Iran could retaliate against them.

U.S. Puts Squeeze On Iran's Oil Fields (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

A campaign to dry up financing for projects poses a threat to Tehran's ability to maintain exports, analysts say.

LONDON — As Washington wages a very public battle against Iran's quest for nuclear power, it is quietly gaining ground on another energy front: the oil fields that are the Islamic Republic's lifeblood.

Iran's oil industry has raked in record amounts of cash during three years of high oil prices. But a new U.S. campaign to dry up financing for oil and natural gas development poses a threat to the republic's ability to continue exporting oil over the next two decades, many analysts say.

The campaign comes at a moment of unique vulnerability for Iran's oil industry, which also faces challenges from rising domestic energy consumption, international isolation, a populist spending spree by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and trouble closing contracts with foreign oil companies — a recipe for potential disaster in a nation with one of the world's largest reservoirs of oil.

"If the government does not control the consumption of oil products in Iran … and at the same time, if the projects for increasing the capacity of the oil and protection of the oil wells will not happen, within 10 years, there will not be any oil for export," Mohammed Hadi Nejad-Hosseinian, Iran's deputy oil minister for international affairs, said in a telephone interview.

If Iran were to suddenly stop exporting its 2.6 million barrels of oil a day, such as in the event of a military strike, world oil prices probably would skyrocket. But a gradual decline might be offset by other OPEC members, analysts say, particularly as Iraq increases its oil production and Saudi Arabia carries out plans for significant increases in its production capacity.

The efforts by the United States and its allies over the last few months to persuade international banks and oil companies to pull out of Iran threaten dozens of projects, including development of Iran's two massive new oil fields that could expand output by 800,000 barrels a day over the next four years.

"Many European banks which had accepted financing some oil industries projects have recently canceled them," Nejad-Hosseinian said.

In addition, banks are no longer granting letters of credit for delivery of some supplies, ministry officials say. And as nations such as Japan begin to back out of Iran oil development under U.S. pressure, the government in Tehran is being forced to dig into its own reserve funds to get crucial new projects off the ground.

But Nejad-Hosseinian said Iran had recognized the gravity of the threat and launched steps to head it off, including new "smart" rationing cards, scheduled for distribution in March to check skyrocketing sales of cheap gasoline, and an overhaul of Iran's historically stingy contract terms in an attempt to lure big oil companies into skirting the U.S. roadblocks.

Iran also is hoping to turn to China and Russia for help. But U.S. officials already have warned that they will seek to hold China accountable under Washington's unilateral sanctions laws if it proceeds with a $16-billion project to develop Iran's North Pars gas field. China also has signed a memorandum of understanding under which it may take on development of the Yadavaran field in southwestern Iran, expected to boost production by 300,000 barrels a day.

DOJ_NMG_0113617

Domestic problems

Iran's oil and natural-gas dilemma has no direct connection with the sanctions adopted last month by the United Nations Security Council, which are narrowly aimed at assistance to Iran's nuclear program. Although Tehran insists it has strictly peaceful intentions, the U.S. and others believe the program is linked to development of nuclear weapons.

Rather, the looming crisis stems from a series of domestic problems that have converged at a time when Iran is susceptible to U.S. attempts to capitalize on them to coerce Tehran's compliance on the nuclear issue.

First is the condition of Iran's aging oil fields, which have never fully recovered from damage inflicted during the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s.

To maintain sufficient pressure to keep them pumping, Iran has to divert large amounts of natural gas that might otherwise be sold.

"You need billions of dollars invested in order to stand still — to avoid a decline," said Manouchehr Takin, a former Iranian petroleum geologist who is a senior analyst for the Center for Global Energy Studies in London.

Likewise, increased output from refinery construction is being outpaced by the swelling number of young Iranians with a fondness for gas-guzzling cars. Heavily subsidized gasoline is just 35 cents a gallon, a price that invites smuggling, and talk about raising the price has, until recently, gone nowhere.

Moreover, the country has one of the most extensive residential heating infrastructures in the world, with homes in the most remote villages warmed toastily with cheap natural gas.

Total domestic energy subsidies total $20 billion to $30 billion a year, Takin said.

"These subsidies are now costing the government roughly 15% of Iran's GDP. That should knock you over. That's a mind-boggling number," said Hossein Askari, professor of international business at George Washington University. "And the nub of the problem is that if you were to cut the subsidies, I think there would be riots in the streets."

Iran could be reinvesting in the oil and gas infrastructure, and it is to a degree, but Ahmadinejad also has diverted billions of dollars in oil revenue to social welfare programs, major infrastructure building programs in neighboring countries such as Afghanistan and importation of consumer products — to the consternation of many of those in his government.

Foreign investment

The heavy lifting in recent years has been left to foreign oil companies, which in the 1990s began working in Iran in substantial numbers for the first time since the Islamic Revolution.

U.S. sanctions in place since the seizure of the American Embassy in Tehran in 1979 have prevented U.S.-based oil companies from operating in Iran, but companies such as Royal Dutch Shell, France's Total and Italy's Eni have invested, some heavily, despite on-again, off-again threats by Washington to pursue sanctions against foreign companies under U.S. laws.

To a great degree, though, Iran has created its own woes by dragging out contract negotiations and offering only skimpy paybacks to foreign oil companies interested in building new production, industry analysts say.

"People have said that even with sanctions and all the rest, if Iranians want investment in their oil industry, what they need to do is offer decent terms, and whatever the sanctions, they would have companies flooding in," said one Western oil company official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"But the issue for us at this point is both political and commercial. The state of the country is such that it's just not the right time to be there."

That is the message Washington is trying to reinforce. For years, U.S. sanctions prohibited investments of more than $20 million in Iran's oil industry, but in practice, they were applied only to U.S.-based oil companies. But as the nuclear showdown has unfolded, and as it became clear the U.N. sanctions would not impose serious economic penalties on Iran, Bush administration officials decided on a different tack.

Envoys from the Treasury Department have approached international banks and companies, reminding them of Iran's record of financing militant Islamic organizations such as Hamas, in the Palestinian territories, and Hezbollah, in Lebanon, through the banking system and its defiance of U.N. resolutions on nonproliferation, and warning that investing in such a country may not be a good business risk.

Simultaneously, the Justice Department reportedly has opened investigations of several banks to determine whether investments in Iran violated U.S. sanctions laws. In late 2005, Dutch bank ABN Amro agreed to pay $80 million in fines stemming in part from improper transactions with Iran through its subsidiary in Dubai, United Arab Emirates.

UBS Bank and Credit Suisse of Switzerland recently announced they were suspending most new business with Iran, and British-based HSBC said it would no longer accept dollar transactions from within Iran.

"Banks are constantly doing risk assessments about what kind of business they want to be involved in," Stuart Levey, Treasury undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, said in a telephone interview.

DOJ_NMG_0113618

"There's a lot out there suggesting that there's an element of coercion involved. But I think that for a lot of these executives, the main thing driving them is they really don't want to be involved in facilitating terrorism or proliferation or any other crime."

More than two decades of U.S. sanctions have had little effect on Iran's oil industry — U.S.-based companies have been replaced, largely by Europeans. But this new attack on financing has rapidly started to dry up potential loans on dozens of projects, according to oil industry insiders in Tehran and the West.

One of them is reportedly the giant Azadegan oil field in southwestern Iran near the Iraqi border. Japan's INPEX Holdings Inc. in October pulled out of all but a 10% stake in the $2-billion project under U.S. pressure, and alternative financing from foreign banks has failed to materialize, said one source with close connections to the Iranian Oil Ministry.

"It has been very effective. Nobody is prepared to loan Iran anything on anything," said Fereidun Fesharaki, an energy advisor to the Iranian prime minister in the 1970s who now heads the FACTS Inc. petroleum consulting firm in Honolulu.

In a report published this month by the National Academy of Sciences, Johns Hopkins University geography professor Roger Stern argued that the confluence of high domestic demand, a delay in adding production capacity, the diversion of natural gas to keep wells producing and other factors could lead to a decline of 33% to 46% in Iran's exports by 2011 and a halt to exports by 2015 or so.

Other analysts have said those forecasts are too dismal, and output is more likely to remain flat at about 4 million barrels a day. Iranian officials say they have signed $28.4 billion worth of new oil and gas development contracts over the last 15 months, and hope to increase production to 7 million barrels a day by 2014 — a goal that the International Energy Agency says will require $80 billion in investments.

The nuclear issue

Whether that will be realized could depend, in large part, on what happens on the nuclear issue.

In fact, Iran's oil and gas dilemma appears to point up a "genuine" need for civilian nuclear power, Stern said.

"When I first started hearing this claim that Iran needed these nuclear plans to substitute for oil and gas, I thought, 'That's ridiculous,' " he said. "So it has really been a surprise to me," he added, to see evidence that Tehran's stated purpose for the nuclear reactor is not "simply a weapons deception."

"I don't think they're nice guys," he said. "This is a regime that funds terrorism and is making outrageous claims that Israel should disappear. But it just happens to be a convenient truth for them that they do need nuclear power."

Revealed: Israel Plans Nuclear Strike On Iran (LONT)

By Uzi Mahnaimi, Sarah Baxter

Times of London, January 7, 2007

ISRAEL has drawn up secret plans to destroy Iran's uranium enrichment facilities with tactical nuclear weapons.

Two Israeli air force squadrons are training to blow up an Iranian facility using low-yield nuclear "bunker-busters", according to several Israeli military sources.

The attack would be the first with nuclear weapons since 1945, when the United States dropped atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The Israeli weapons would each have a force equivalent to one-fifteenth of the Hiroshima bomb.

Under the plans, conventional laser-guided bombs would open "tunnels" into the targets. "Mini-nukes" would then immediately be fired into a plant at Natanz, exploding deep underground to reduce the risk of radioactive fallout.

"As soon as the green light is given, it will be one mission, one strike and the Iranian nuclear project will be demolished," said one of the sources.

The plans, disclosed to The Sunday Times last week, have been prompted in part by the Israeli intelligence service Mossad's assessment that Iran is on the verge of producing enough enriched uranium to make nuclear weapons within two years.

Israeli military commanders believe conventional strikes may no longer be enough to annihilate increasingly well-defended enrichment facilities. Several have been built beneath at least 70ft of concrete and rock. However, the nuclear-tipped bunker-busters would be used only if a conventional attack was ruled out and if the United States declined to intervene, senior sources said.

Israeli and American officials have met several times to consider military action. Military analysts said the disclosure of the plans could be intended to put pressure on Tehran to halt enrichment, cajole America into action or soften up world opinion in advance of an Israeli attack.

Some analysts warned that Iranian retaliation for such a strike could range from disruption of oil supplies to the West to terrorist attacks against Jewish targets around the world.

Israel has identified three prime targets south of Tehran which are believed to be involved in Iran's nuclear programme:

Natanz, where thousands of centrifuges are being installed for uranium enrichment

DOJ_NMG_0113619

A uranium conversion facility near Isfahan where, according to a statement by an Iranian vice-president last week, 250 tons of gas for the enrichment process have been stored in tunnels

A heavy water reactor at Arak, which may in future produce enough plutonium for a bomb

Israeli officials believe that destroying all three sites would delay Iran's nuclear programme indefinitely and prevent them from having to live in fear of a "second Holocaust".

The Israeli government has warned repeatedly that it will never allow nuclear weapons to be made in Iran, whose president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has declared that "Israel must be wiped off the map".

Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary, has described military action against Iran as a "last resort", leading Israeli officials to conclude that it will be left to them to strike.

Israeli pilots have flown to Gibraltar in recent weeks to train for the 2,000-mile round trip to the Iranian targets. Three possible routes have been mapped out, including one over Turkey.

Air force squadrons based at Hatzerim in the Negev desert and Tel Nof, south of Tel Aviv, have trained to use Israel's tactical nuclear weapons on the mission. The preparations have been overseen by Major General Eliezer Shkedi, commander of the Israeli air force.

Sources close to the Pentagon said the United States was highly unlikely to give approval for tactical nuclear weapons to be used. One source said Israel would have to seek approval "after the event", as it did when it crippled Iraq's nuclear reactor at Osirak with airstrikes in 1981.

Scientists have calculated that although contamination from the bunker-busters could be limited, tons of radioactive uranium compounds would be released.

The Israelis believe that Iran's retaliation would be constrained by fear of a second strike if it were to launch its Shehab-3 ballistic missiles at Israel.

However, American experts warned of repercussions, including widespread protests that could destabilise parts of the Islamic world friendly to the West.

Colonel Sam Gardiner, a Pentagon adviser, said Iran could try to close the Strait of Hormuz, the route for 20% of the world's oil.

Some sources in Washington said they doubted if Israel would have the nerve to attack Iran. However, Dr Ephraim Sneh, the deputy Israeli defence minister, said last month: "The time is approaching when Israel and the international community will have to decide whether to take military action against Iran."

Hamas Pledges To Boost Forces In Gaza (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 7, 2007

Hamas defied President Mahmoud Abbas' decree Saturday that its paramilitary unit is illegal, saying it will fight any attempt to disband the force in an increasingly bloody faceoff between the Islamic militant group and Abbas' Fatah party.

Three more Hamas supporters were killed in the factional fighting that is threatening to plunge the Palestinian territories into civil war.

The two groups have been wrangling over power since Hamas defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections a year ago and gained control over most Palestinian government functions. However, Fatah continued to dominate security forces and last spring, Hamas formed its own security unit known as the Executive Force, recruiting many former members of its military wing.

Tensions between the rival security forces erupted into large-scale fighting last month. Since then, more than two dozen people have been killed.

Abbas outlawed the Executive Force on Saturday, two days after Hamas gunmen stormed the home of a top pro-Fatah security commander and killed him and seven bodyguards. It was the deadliest battle yet during the recent wave of infighting.

Abbas' office said the decision was made "in light of continued security chaos and assassinations of a number of our fighters ... and in light of the failure of existing agencies and security apparatuses in imposing law and order and protecting the security of the citizens."

The statement did not explicitly threaten force, saying only that the Hamas militia "will be dealt with accordingly as long as it is not immediately folded into legal security forces."

Abbas also confirmed the U.S. was sending aid to boost Palestinian security forces loyal to him. President Bush is asking Congress to provide $83 million for those forces, U.S. officials said Friday.

Abbas' office said late Saturday he spoke to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on the current situation ahead of her upcoming visit. The U.S. views Abbas, a moderate who seeks peace talks with Israel, as a legitimate negotiating partner. But

DOJ_NMG_0113620

Washington, along with Israel and the European Union consider Hamas, which is committed to Israel's destruction, a terrorist group.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak called on the Palestinians to halt their fighting. Egypt frequently mediates between opposing Palestinian factions.

Abbas claims authority over most Palestinian security forces, but Hamas controls the Interior Ministry, which also has security responsibilities. The various forces were formed more than a decade ago by the late Yasser Arafat, who created rivalries to keep potential challengers weak.

After years of corruption and fighting with Israel, the forces have become largely ineffective, resulting in widespread lawlessness, particularly in the Gaza Strip.

In the Hamas stronghold of Gaza, leaders of the group defiantly rejected Abbas' decree.

Interior Ministry spokesman Khaled Abu Hilal said Abbas was giving the green light for attacks on Hamas security men and that the unit would "deal firmly" with anyone who attacks it. He also announced plans to double the size of the Executive Force, which now has 6,000 men, compared with some 18,000 security men aligned with Fatah.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas accused Abbas of trying to deepen the rift between the two camps.

"I'm completely convinced that there are those who don't want the Palestinian scene to enjoy calm and stability or to create the appropriate atmosphere for starting serious and deep dialogue aimed at reaching a national unity government," he said.

Abbas has been urging Hamas to join Fatah in a coalition in an effort to end international sanctions against the Hamas-led government that have crippled the Palestinian economy. But months of negotiations broke down in late November, sparking the latest wave of violence.

Previous attempts by Abbas to disband the Hamas militia or integrate it into existing security units have failed.

Late Saturday, three members of a pro-Hamas family were slain by gunmen from a rival clan considered to be Fatah supporters, witnesses and family members said. The same Fatah family has kidnapped about 10 Hamas supporters in recent days, Hamas officials said.

Hamas' radio station in Gaza said one of the dead was a member of the Executive Force.

Also Saturday, gunmen in the West Bank stopped the car of Nablus' deputy mayor, Mahdi al-Khamdali of Hamas, and took him away in another car, security officials said. There was no immediate claim of responsibility, but the officials said they believed the kidnappers were Fatah supporters.

A pro-Hamas university professor in Nablus was shot and seriously wounded by gunmen who fired at his home late Saturday, security officials said.

Abbas Bans Hamas Militia (WT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas yesterday declared Hamas' militia in the Gaza Strip illegal, and the Islamic movement responded by defiantly announcing plans to double the size of the paramilitary unit.

Three more Hamas supporters were killed in the factional fighting that is threatening to plunge the Palestinian territories into civil war.

Mr. Abbas outlawed the Executive Force, issuing the decree two days after Hamas gunmen stormed the home of a top pro-Fatah security commander in northern Gaza and killed the man and seven bodyguards. It was the deadliest battle yet during the recent wave of infighting.

Mr. Abbas' office said the decision was made "in light of continued security chaos and assassinations of a number of our fighters ... and in light of the failure of existing agencies and security apparatuses in imposing law and order and protecting the security of the citizens."

In Gaza, Hamas' stronghold, leaders of the group defiantly rejected Mr. Abbas' decree and announced plans to double the size of its Executive Force to 12,000. Interior Ministry spokesman Khaled Abu Hilal of Hamas said that Mr. Abbas was giving the green light for attacks on Hamas security men and that the unit would "deal firmly" with anyone who attacks it.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas accused Mr. Abbas of trying to deepen the rift between the two camps.

"I'm completely convinced that there are those who don't want the Palestinian scene to enjoy calm and stability or to create the appropriate atmosphere for starting serious and deep dialogue aimed at reaching a national-unity government," he said.

Late yesterday, three members of a pro-Hamas family were slain by gunmen from a rival clan considered to be Fatah supporters, witnesses and family members said. The same Fatah family has kidnapped about 10 Hamas supporters in recent days, Hamas officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0113621

The Palestinian infighting initially was largely confined to Gaza, but in recent days, it spread to the West Bank with a series of kidnappings and shootings.

Gunmen in the West Bank yesterday stopped the car of Nablus' deputy mayor, Mahdi al-Khamdali of Hamas, pulled him out and took him away in another car, security officials said. There was no immediate claim of responsibility, but the officials said they believed the kidnappers were Fatah supporters.

In Ramallah, gunmen stormed the offices of the Hamas-controlled Interior Ministry, shot the office manager in the legs and took him away, security officials said. The man, also a Hamas supporter, was released in a nearby town and hospitalized, the officials said.

Shopkeepers in the West Bank city of Hebron closed their stores in a protest action ordered by the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, a violent group affiliated with Fatah.

Fatah and Hamas have been wrangling over power since the Islamic group defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections a year ago and gained control over most Palestinian government functions. Mr. Abbas, who was elected in a separate election, retained his post as president, and Fatah continued to dominate security forces.

Challenging that position, Hamas formed its own security unit, the Executive Force, last spring, recruiting many former members of the Hamas military wing.

Tensions between the rival security forces kept building in the streets until large-scale fighting erupted last month. Since then, more than two dozen people have been killed.

Mr. Abbas claims authority over most Palestinian security forces, but Hamas controls the Interior Ministry, which also has security responsibilities. The various forces were formed more than a decade ago by the now-deceased Yasser Arafat as part of his autocratic style of rule, in which he created rivalries to keep potential challengers weak.

After years of corruption and fighting with Israel, the Fatah forces -- which number about 18,000 -- have become largely ineffective, fueling widespread lawlessness.

Abbas Asks Dissolution Of Hamas Military Police (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 6 — After two days of intense fighting between Hamas and his Fatah faction, the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, demanded Saturday that Hamas-run paramilitary police be integrated into Fatah-dominated security forces.

Hamas warned Mr. Abbas that he was making a mistake and that it would resist any effort to disband the group, known as the Executive Force. The Hamas Interior Ministry immediately announced that it had plans to double the size of the Executive Force to 12,000 men and called on Palestinians to join it.

Mr. Abbas made his demand after the deaths of many Fatah men in clashes with the Executive Force over the last two days. In his statement on Saturday, Mr. Abbas called the force illegal and said it “will be treated as such if it is not immediately integrated into legal security services as stipulated by basic law.”

It is not clear whether Mr. Abbas’s statement is simply declaratory or whether he would order his security forces to take action against the paramilitary group if Hamas did not meet his demands.

A Hamas government spokesman, Ghazi Hamad, said that “to take such a decision under pressure and the current tense conditions is a mistake that will not contribute to peace and to resolving existing problems.” The spokesman for the Hamas Interior Ministry, Khaled Abu Hillal, took a sharper tone, saying, “We warn against making any move, which will be met with force.”

Mr. Abbas tried unsuccessfully to ban the Executive Force once last year, finally agreeing with Hamas Prime Minister Ismail Haniya to integrate it into the Palestinian Authority.

But Hamas and Interior Minister Said Siam have kept effective control of the force, which is dominant in Gaza, arguing that the Fatah-dominated security services were lax, corrupt, badly trained and failed to keep order in the territory.

The Hamas force currently consists of more than 5,000 well-armed and well-trained fighters.

Mr. Abbas is the commander-in-chief of all armed men in the Palestinian Authority, but where the authority of the Prime Minister and Interior Minister fit into the equation has been a confusion ever since the job of prime minister was invented as a way of reducing the power of the late Yasir Arafat.

Mr. Abbas was the first prime minister and complained, when he quit after four months, that Mr. Arafat would not relinquish control over the security services. That struggle over the security forces is more complicated now because both the prime minister and interior minister are from Hamas.

DOJ_NMG_0113622

Hamas is also making efforts to expand the force to the occupied West Bank, where it is much weaker, given the regular presence of Israeli troops.

The Bush administration is asking Congress for $86 million to improve the equipment and training of Mr. Abbas's Presidential Guard and to expand the group, which has 3,700 members. American officials describe the effort as a way to balance Hamas and deter it, but say they are not trying to finance a civil war.

Mr. Abbas, in principle, controls the 45,000 security forces on the Palestinian Authority payroll, but it is unclear how many of them come to work, let alone obey his commands.

Separately, the Dagmoush clan in Gaza kidnapped several Hamas members Saturday. The clan, which is believed by Gazans close to Hamas to have captured an Agence France-Press photographer this week, is said to be insisting that it will not release the man, Jaime Razuri of Peru, until Hamas hands over fighters who the Dagmoush say were responsible for killing clan members.

Late Saturday, three members of a pro-Hamas family, the Diri, were killed by gunmen from the Dagmoush clan and five were wounded, witnesses and family members said.

Two Hamas officials were also seized in the West Bank, including the deputy mayor of Nablus, Mehdi Hambali. In Ramallah, masked gunmen abducted an Interior Ministry official, Ihad Suleiman Ghidhan. He was found alive an hour later with three bullets fired into his legs.

Fatah gunmen from the Aksa Martyrs Brigades forced a strike in the West Bank city of Hebron, preventing stores from opening to protest Hamas's attacks in Gaza.

Abbas Bans Hamas Police Force (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Maher Abukhater, Special To The Times

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

Palestinian leader acts amid factional fighting. A defiant Interior Ministry says it will double the militia's size.

RAMALLAH, WEST BANK — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas on Saturday outlawed the Hamas-led Interior Ministry's police force, the most powerful armed unit outside his control in factional fighting that has left 33 people dead in the last month.

The ministry responded with defiance. It announced plans to double the size of the black-uniformed paramilitary force and vowed to resist Abbas' order that its 6,000 members be incorporated into the security apparatus loyal to the president's Fatah movement.

The dueling announcements raised the prospect of an intensified armed standoff. Abbas' only means of enforcing the order appeared to be coercive action by police and security units under his command, but they are relatively weak in the Gaza Strip, Hamas' stronghold.

In an effort to strengthen Abbas, U.S. officials have said they expect to ask Congress for nearly $100 million in aid to help train and supply his expanding Presidential Guard. The Bush administration and Israel have recently coordinated arms shipments to Abbas' forces from Egypt.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is scheduled to meet with Abbas here this month to discuss efforts to weaken and isolate Hamas, the Iranian-backed Islamic movement that leads the Palestinian government. Hamas resists Abbas' efforts to start peace talks with Israel, and refuses to recognize the Jewish state.

Saturday's statement by Abbas came two days after a unit of the Interior Ministry police, known as the Executive Force, besieged the Gaza home of a Fatah commander, Col. Mohammed Ghayeb, killing him and his bodyguards and seriously wounding his wife and brother.

Hamas officials said Ghayeb had been responsible for the deaths of two of their fighters.

Abbas ordered the Executive Force disbanded "in light of continued lawlessness and assassinations," the statement said. It said its members would be treated as outlaws unless they were incorporated into forces commanded by the president.

Interior Ministry spokesman Khaled abu Hilal called Abbas' announcement "a green light to those who seek to shed the blood of the Executive Force members" and said the force would "deal firmly" with anyone who attacked it.

Intermittent fighting among the Palestinians erupted after elections a year ago created a division of power between the president and Hamas, which won control of parliament and formed a government in March. The split paralyzed most governing institutions, and the rival movements began conducting politics through armed force.

Abbas claims authority over the various armed Palestinian forces created in the 1990s by Yasser Arafat, the late Fatah and Palestinian Authority leader. Today they include two police agencies with 15,000 members each in addition to the elite Presidential Guard, which is being enlarged from 4,000 to 6,000 members.

Hamas formed the Executive Force in March, saying the Fatah-led forces had become corrupt and ineffective.

DOJ_NMG_0113623

Shortly afterward, Abbas tried to disband the Executive Force but failed. Hamas officials have said they are open to the idea of incorporating the force into the president's security apparatus, but only if Abbas overhauls its command structure to make it less partisan.

The announcement Saturday said Abbas planned a reshuffle of commanders but gave no details. On Thursday, he appointed Brig. Gen. Jamal Kayed, a Fatah loyalist who is believed to have good relations with Hamas, to head one of his police agencies in Gaza.

Many Palestinians on both sides of the divide say the only way Abbas can end the violence is through a power-sharing agreement with Hamas. The two sides discussed such a pact for much of last year, until Abbas broke off talks with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh in November.

The two men met early Friday for the first time since then and seemed to be working together to restore calm after the killings Thursday.

Haniyeh said Saturday that Abbas' outlawing of the Executive Force "contradicted the positive atmosphere" of their meeting. He said the Executive Force is legal. Abu Hilal said the Interior Ministry was taking applications to expand the force to 12,000 members.

Factional fighting continued Saturday.

In the West Bank, gunmen abducted the Hamas deputy mayor of Nablus from his car and stormed the Interior Ministry offices in Ramallah, where they wounded the office manager in the legs.

In Gaza City, three members of a pro-Hamas family were killed by gunmen from a rival clan considered to be Fatah supporters.

The Hamas radio station said one of the dead was an Executive Force member.

Jews, Arabs And Jimmy Carter (NYT)

By Ethan Bronner

The New York Times Book Review, January 7, 2007

PALESTINE PEACE NOT APARTHEID

By Jimmy Carter.

264 pp. Simon and Schuster. $27.

This is a strange little book about the Arab-Israeli conflict from a major public figure. It is premised on the notion that Americans too often get only one side of the story, one uncritically sympathetic to Israel, so someone with authority and knowledge needs to offer a fuller picture. Fine idea. The problem is that in this book Jimmy Carter does not do so. Instead, he simply offers a narrative that is largely unsympathetic to Israel. Israeli bad faith fills the pages. Hollow statements by Israel's enemies are presented without comment. Broader regional developments go largely unexamined. In other words, whether or not Carter is right that most Americans have a distorted view of the conflict, his contribution is to offer a distortion of his own.

Yasir Arafat is portrayed as someone who disavowed terrorism. Hafez al-Assad, who was president of Syria until 2000 when he died and his son took over, is quoted for an entire section, offering harsh impressions of Israel, including the opinion that it "initiated the 1967 war in order to take even more Arab land." Carter does not contradict him. The separation barrier that Israel is building along and inside parts of the West Bank is not to stop suicide bombers and other violent attacks. Its "driving purpose," Carter says, is "the acquisition of land."

Such misrepresentations — and there are others — are a shame because most of what Carter focuses on is well worth reading about. The barrier (which he calls a "wall" even though a very small percentage is wall) does indeed take land from the Palestinians. His chapter on the endless humiliation of daily life for the Palestinians under Israeli occupation paints a devastating and largely accurate picture of confiscated farm produce, unfair competition from Israeli goods, withheld foreign donations, leveled houses and legal dead ends. Carter is right that insufficient attention is being paid, but perhaps that is because his picture feels like yesterday's story, especially since Israel's departures from southern Lebanon and Gaza have not stopped anti-Israel violence from those areas.

This book has something of a Rip van Winkle feel to it, as if little had changed since Carter diagnosed the problem in the 1970s. All would be well today, he suggests, if his advice then had been followed. Forget Al Qaeda (the name does not appear in this book), the nuclear ambitions of Iran and the rise of the Taliban in Afghanistan. If Israel had "refrained from colonizing the West Bank," he asserts, there would have been "a comprehensive and lasting peace." The debate about the Israeli occupation "will shape the future of Israel; it may also determine the prospects for peace in the Middle East — and perhaps the world."

This is an awfully narrow perspective. The Middle East could well be the source of the next major war and the chances of avoiding it would be increased if the Israeli question were settled. Moreover, if Israel had not built settlements throughout Gaza and the West Bank, solving its dispute with the Palestinians would probably have been — and would be — a lot easier.

DOJ_NMG_0113624

But there are other factors to consider, including that for the most radical leaders of the Muslim world — and their numbers are not dwindling — settling the Israel question does not mean an equitable division of land between Israel and Palestine. It means eliminating Israel.

To see the narrowness of Carter's perspective, it is worth returning to 1979, the year of the Egypt-Israel peace treaty that resulted from Carter's Camp David mediation as president, a hugely significant accomplishment. Carter rightly accuses Menachem Begin, then Israel's prime minister, of deception regarding the expansion of West Bank settlements. Begin promised to freeze the settlements. Not only did he not do so; he had no intention of doing so. Carter lost re-election in 1980 to Ronald Reagan and suggests that Reagan's nod-and-wink tolerance of Israeli actions — its bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor, annexation of the Golan Heights, settlement building and 1982 invasion of Lebanon — were the beginning of the end of the process he had set in motion.

Yet the trouble that was brewing even before these events suggests they may not have been the central issue Carter sees them as. Egypt was instantly ostracized from the Arab world because of its agreement with Israel. Moreover, 1979 was the year of the Iranian revolution, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and Saddam Hussein's consolidation of power in Iraq. As much as Israeli policies fueled Arab rage — and they certainly did — these other forces contributed heavily to the state of affairs today.

This does not mean that the problems on the ground have no impact. Israel's friends will increasingly tell you that the dispute is not about land or occupation at all but about the growing radicalism of the Muslim world and its refusal to countenance a Jewish state in its midst. The confiscation of land, the roadblocks and border closings, the preference given to Israeli products within the occupied areas over locally made ones do not amount to much, they say. And those who focus on them are engaging not only in anti-Israel propaganda but in a kind of anti-Semitism.

Which is what some are hinting unfairly of Carter. The Anti-Defamation League has run large advertisements in major newspapers, including this one, attacking the book for Carter's propagation of "myths like Jewish control of the government and media." Across the land, Jewish leaders and their friends are asking each other what exactly Carter's problem is with the Jews.

Their biggest complaint against the book — a legitimate one — is the word "apartheid" in the title, with its false echo of the racist policies of the old South Africa. But overstatement hardly adds up to anti-Semitism.

There is, however, another subtler issue and it has to do with Carter's religious focus. There is a weird scene toward the start of the book in which Carter, a born-again Christian, goes to see Prime Minister Golda Meir on his first visit to Israel in 1973. She asks his impressions. "I said that I had long taught lessons from the Hebrew Scriptures and that a common historical pattern was that Israel was punished whenever the leaders turned away from devout worship of God. I asked if she was concerned about the secular nature of her Labor government."

Meir, a secular chain smoker, could only shrug. Carter seems impressed with his own temerity, as he calls it. But the episode hints at his tone deafness about Israel and Jews. Today, those most opposed to Israel's withdrawal from the West Bank are not the secular Labor Party leaders that Carter worried about. They are the leaders of the religious Zionist parties who consider the West Bank not a Palestinian area where Jews once lived, but their God-given birthright that must not be yielded. Carter never tells us how he squares his notions of God's punishment of secular Jews with the policies of such devout politicians.

In A Divided Israel, Angry Words Or No Words At All (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 6 — Two of Israel's most important relationships in the world are with the United States and Egypt. In the past 10 days, the Israeli government of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has managed to embarrass both of them.

First, Defense Minister Amir Peretz approved building a new settlement in the occupied West Bank, in the Jordan Valley, far beyond the current separation barrier, and then seemed astonished when the United States called the action a violation of commitments made under the 2003 peace plan, known as the road map.

Then, on Thursday, only hours before Mr. Olmert was to sit down at a summit meeting with the Egyptian president, Hosni Mubarak, the Israeli Army conducted a botched arrest raid in daylight in the center of Ramallah, the capital of the West Bank. In the ensuing mayhem, four Palestinians died, 20 were wounded, the target got away and Mr. Olmert had to sit through a humiliating tongue-lashing on live television from Mr. Mubarak.

Neither incident was of fundamental importance, and neither, it seems, was intended to create the ensuing ruckus. And neither action, Mr. Olmert's aides insisted, had been approved by the prime minister.

But together, Israeli politicians and analysts suggest, the moves reflect a malfunctioning Israeli government, deeply split over personalities, politics and policies. It has lost the confidence of most Israelis, according to the opinion polls, which makes Israeli leaders even less likely to take bold political steps domestically or internationally.

DOJ_NMG_0113625

It is a government weak on security experience, as well, meaning that Mr. Olmert of Kadima and Defense Minister Peretz of Labor are unlikely to challenge the views and actions of the Israeli military. The rivalry between the men — a political competition between party leaders that has veered into mutual contempt — means that they and their staffs barely speak to one another.

This picture does not include the bitter rivalries within the Labor Party, as Mr. Peretz appears fatally weakened, or between Mr. Olmert and his Kadima party colleague, Tzipi Livni, the deputy prime minister and foreign minister, who Mr. Olmert thinks is angling for his job.

"There's a mess, but it's part of a more general mess," said, a senior Labor legislator on the Foreign and Defense Committee. "There's a breakdown in communications between the prime minister and the minister of defense. It's enough to look at them together. When they sit down, they don't say a word."

On Friday, Mr. Olmert denied a report that he would fire Mr. Peretz, but there is little doubt that he may do so if the Labor Party itself does not convince its current leader to change portfolios.

Adding to the tension is a traditional attitude by the Israeli military that it should be the prime judge of security issues. When Yitzhak Rabin was prime minister in the 1990s, he used to say that Israel would fight terrorism as if there were no peace negotiations and negotiate peace as if there were no terrorism, meaning that decision making for each track was separate. That sometimes led to politically awkward moments comparable to the two recent ones.

"Over the years, the army and intelligence have called the shots, no matter the political impact," Ms. Avital said. "There's a decision made in principle in a given scenario, but when and how to do a raid is left to their discretion and they don't give a hoot about the political timing. No one coordinates with the political level and there's little civilian control over operational decisions."

The situation becomes worse, however, when the military has little respect for its political masters, Ms. Avital concedes, suggesting that Mr. Peretz's time as defense minister is limited.

Shlomo Avineri, a former Israeli official who teaches at Hebrew University, says that the events of the last few weeks are accidental, but inevitable. "This is a government where the prime minister and defense minister don't really control their own people in the security services and don't feel strong enough to challenge them," he said, and are unable to read the military mind the way that former generals like Mr. Rabin and Ariel Sharon could. Both Olmert and Peretz are on the defensive," Mr. Avineri said. "It's a bad scene, and it doesn't make for strong government."

Mark Heller, of the Institute for National Security Studies at Tel Aviv University, said the problem "goes beyond the prime minister and defense minister not respecting one another." Worse, "neither one is respected by the public after the Lebanon war, especially in security matters," he said. "So neither of them is prepared to put his judgment up against that of a high-ranking military officer."

"A House Not in Order" was the headline on a stinging analysis in Haaretz by the political reporter Aluf Benn. Mr. Olmert, he wrote, "is looking more and more like a tragic hero, unable to recover from the disaster that befell him in the form of the second Lebanon war."

Mr. Olmert and his cabinet decided to go to war in southern Lebanon against Hezbollah in the course of an hour on July 12, after Hezbollah made another raid into Israel and succeeded in capturing two Israeli soldiers. That raid followed the capture of another Israeli soldier during a raid from Gaza carried out by Hamas on June 25.

The government, in office only four months after an election campaign that saw Ariel Sharon collapse into a coma, decided that a strong riposte was necessary to restore Israel's military deterrence.

But the cabinet was not set up for war. Mr. Olmert, though an experienced politician, had little security experience; his unlikely defense minister, Mr. Peretz, a trade union leader, had even less. And the chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, was an air force man.

The war was neither quick nor clean, ending in a United Nations mandated cease-fire after 34 days and no clear victory. Mr. Olmert, Mr. Peretz and General Halutz have kept their posts, but their credibility, both individually and as a team, was badly damaged.

Ms. Livni, though relatively silent during the fighting, later made no secret of her belief that the war could have ended much sooner with the same results; Mr. Olmert, prideful and prickly, has not appreciated her effort to emphasize her disagreements. Only last week, Ms. Livni announced that she was prepared to become prime minister and would run for the job if Mr. Olmert continued to ignore her opinions.

Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Mr. Olmert, said she had never seen "Olmert so angry" as he was about the Thursday raid while he was about to meet Mr. Mubarak. The military "had the authority to carry out a raid, but this goes beyond authority to common sense," she said. "No one in the army was thinking about the timing and relevance."

DOJ_NMG_0113626

After the fuss over the new settlement, Maskiot, Mr. Peretz insisted that his predecessor had really approved it, and then the government argued that it had been set up as a settlement in the early 1980s, even though it had fallen into disuse and was only being used for training.

"These are lame excuses, and anyone can see through them," Mr. Heller said. "Notwithstanding the rhetoric, it's clear that the government doesn't have the political courage to enter into a confrontation with settlers."

Violence In Somalia Over Disarmament (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

KISMAYO, Somalia, Jan. 6 — Hundreds of Somalis stormed Saturday into the streets of Mogadishu, Somalia's already unsteady capital, to hurl rocks at Ethiopian troops allied with the government and to protest a disarmament program that Somali leaders ended up scrapping.

Meanwhile, near Kismayo, along Somalia's southern coast, Ethiopian-led forces continued to hunt down the last remnants of the once powerful Islamist forces, who ruled much of the country until Ethiopia and its powerful army intervened last month.

According to Abdul Rashid Hidig, a government official in Kismayo, the Ethiopian-led forces blew up several of the Islamists' armed pickup trucks, leaving hundreds of fighters cornered in a remote jungle with their backs to the Indian Ocean and no way to escape. "I think it will be over very soon," Mr. Hidig said.

Still, a pack of gunmen attacked a government patrol near Kismayo's market on Saturday night, and the cracks and whistles of their high-powered rifles echoed across what had been a rather quiet town. It was unclear if anyone was hurt.

Despite much tactical success in recent weeks, Somalia's transitional government appears to have failed its first leadership test: disarmament. After 16 years of anarchy, the streets of Mogadishu are awash with military-grade weaponry, much of it in the hands of illiterate teenagers. Scooping up these guns was one of the first goals of the transitional government, which had struggled for the past two years to assert control and then, nearly overnight, found itself in charge of a needy, violent country.

On Monday, Ali Mohammed Gedi, a veterinarian turned transitional prime minister, demanded that all Somalis surrender their weapons in three days. Only a handful of Mr. Gedi's allies complied, so the prime minister extended the deadline, but still, most Somalis did not give up their guns.

Even former military officers disagreed with Mr. Gedi's approach, saying it would take months, not days, to disarm the populace and that the government should negotiate with militiamen and clan elders.

With the new deadline set to expire Saturday morning and with Mr. Gedi threatening house-to-house searches, riots exploded.

No matter that officials in the government had decided at the last minute to abandon the disarmament program, at least temporarily. By the time the government got the word out Saturday, hundreds of people had already flooded into Mogadishu's streets. Residents quickly erected roadblocks out of chunks of concrete and flaming tires, and some witnesses said men with rocket-propelled grenades lurked in doorways, prepared to attack government troops.

According to several protesters, the demonstrations were organized by the defeated Islamist movement, which still has thousands of supporters, many armed, in the capital. The supporters had melted back into the population late last month after the Islamists abandoned Mogadishu, ceding it to Ethiopian and Somali forces without a fight.

On Saturday, women in a kaleidoscope of colored shawls shook Korans in their hands and shouted "Down, down, Ethiopia!" and "The infidels must die!" Ethiopia is a country with a long Christian history, though it is about half Muslim. Somalia's Islamist leaders have repeatedly tried to stir up support by casting the Ethiopian troops as infidel invaders.

The demonstrators surged through downtown Mogadishu lighting fires with plastic jugs of gasoline, throwing rocks at cars and punching fists through windows.

"Unless we do this, the Ethiopians will never leave," said Nuro Ibraheim, a 28-year-old woman. The protesters surrounded a military camp used by Ethiopian and government troops and began to pelt it with stones. According to witnesses, Ethiopian troops first fired in the air. When that did not work, the witnesses said, the soldiers aimed into the crowd and several people were hurt. Hospital officials said one teenage boy was killed.

By midday, the violence had flared out, and the demonstrators had gone home.

"We have postponed the disarmament until an unspecified time," said Salad Ali Jelle, the deputy defense minister. "We are now talking with clan elders about how to proceed."

The transitional government, a mix of clan elders, foreign-educated professionals and former warlords, was formed in 2004 with the help of United Nations officials and has a mandate to rule until proposed elections in 2009. The transitional government concedes that it needs outside muscle to maintain order once the Ethiopians go home.

DOJ_NMG_0113627

Americans officials have been heavily lobbying African allies, especially Uganda, Nigeria and South Africa, to contribute troops to a peacekeeping force. On Sunday, Jendayi E. Frazer, the United States assistant secretary of state for Africa, is scheduled to visit Mogadishu for four hours to meet with Somali leaders and intellectuals.

The trip is still tentative because of the continuing turmoil. If Ms. Frazer does arrive, she will be the highest ranking American official to set foot in Somalia since American forces pulled out of the country in 1994, the year after 18 Americans were killed during an attempt to capture a warlord in Mogadishu.

Somalis Rail At Ethiopian Forces (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Two Killed as Protesters Smash Cars, Throw Stones in Mogadishu

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 6 -- Hundreds of angry and fed-up Somalis demanded that Ethiopian troops leave the city Saturday, smashing cars, burning tires, and hurling stones and threats as a prevailing sense of insecurity deepened in the patched-together neighborhoods of Mogadishu.

A volatile mix of grievances fueled the clashes between demonstrators and Ethiopian troops, leaving at least two people dead.

Tensions are rising over the presence of the Ethiopian troops, who are perceived here as having U.S. backing and last week pushed out an Islamic movement widely credited with bringing security to the capital. Almost immediately after taking control, the ascendant prime minister, Ali Mohamed Gedi, announced that he would begin forcibly disarming Somalia's matrix of clans, whose members are accustomed to relying on their own stashes of AK-47 assault rifles for protection in a country that has been without a central government since 1991.

Following the protests, Gedi said the disarmament would be postponed indefinitely. A planned visit to Mogadishu on Sunday by the U.S. assistant secretary of state for African affairs, Jendayi E. Frazer, appeared in doubt amid security concerns.

"They are saying disarmament when you can't safely sleep at home without people guarding you," said Ugas Abulaihi Farah, leader of the Suleiyman sub-sub-clan, clutching a gold-handled cane. "My people are angry about this. . . . Before disarming, there should be security."

But at the moment in Mogadishu, there is little of that.

As Gedi's internationally recognized government scrambles to establish ministries, police and other services from scratch, the city is reverting to its old forms of self-governance. Clan and sub-clan leaders who trace their lineage back to Adam and control thousands of people and weapons say that Gedi has not consulted with them. The city's old collection of warlords and freelance militias seems to be reemerging, as groups rebuild roadblocks and checkpoints that for years rendered the city impassable.

Fighters who were loyal to the ousted Islamic movement remain hidden in the city's Byzantine neighborhoods of corrugated steel and graceful arches, barbed-wire coils and donkey carts. According to one fighter, young militiamen are awaiting instructions from their leaders, who reportedly are on the run along the Indian Ocean coast near the Kenyan border, where U.S. warships are on patrol.

The Islamic Courts movement, which took power in June, included moderate leaders as well as some suspected of having ties to al-Qaeda and of sheltering three suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. The Islamic Courts leaders have denied those charges, and analysts say the connection between the movement and al-Qaeda has been exaggerated.

The Islamic movement's fundamentalist brand of Islam was foreign to most Somalis, who adhere to a more moderate interpretation but seemed willing, at least at first, to tolerate the social restrictions in exchange for security.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi grew increasingly uncomfortable with the prospect of an Islamic government on his border, and in late December, Ethiopian troops backing Gedi's government swept the Islamic movement from power.

Within days, Mogadishu shifted from a period of unusual calm, during which people could freely drive across the capital from corner to corner, to the current sense of uncertainty, with the occupation of Ethiopian troops and the return of militias.

"People have no clear idea what's going on in the city," said Mohamud Uluso, a former banker who had attempted to mediate between the Islamic Courts and the nascent Somali government. "There are roadblocks everywhere and large numbers of unemployed youths not going to school. . . . People are charged internally. People are charged to explode."

The protests began in the dark hours of Saturday morning and spilled into the early afternoon, with Ethiopian troops firing into the air from among the crowds in a neighborhood that had been a stronghold of the ousted Islamic movement. Women and children were among those flooding the streets and wielding sticks in the air. By afternoon, Gedi had rescinded the disarmament deadline and the city seemed to snap back into its old rhythms.

DOJ_NMG_0113628

On sandy, lumpy Adde Road, about three miles from where the protests broke out, people hauled wood to a building under construction and loaded bags of pasta onto donkey carts.

Somali Fighters: We'll Heed Al Qaeda's Call (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia (AP) -- Somalia's interim government on Saturday indefinitely postponed plans to forcibly disarm Mogadishu, as hundreds of people burned tires, looted vehicles and said they wouldn't give up their guns. Two people were reported killed and at least 17 people were wounded.

The protest came a day after al Qaeda's deputy leader called on Muslim militants to attack Ethiopian troops, who helped government forces chase Somalia's Islamic militia from the capital last week. Some Islamic fighters hiding in Mogadishu said they would heed the call.

About 400 protesters gathered at Tribunka Square in a southern neighborhood, shouting, "Down, down with Ethiopia," and demanding an end to the disarmament plan.

"We don't want disarmament only in Mogadishu. We want all the people [of Somalia] and all the clans to be disarmed simultaneously," said Dahil Abukar, one of the protesters.

Gunfire broke out during the demonstration, but it was not immediately clear what set off the violence.

A nurse at Medina Hospital said a government soldier was killed when his own hand grenade exploded accidentally. Dr. Dahir Mohamud at the same hospital said a 13-year-old boy was killed by bullets and the hospital was treating 17 other people wounded by gunshots.

Abdirahman Dinari, spokesman for the 2-year-old U.N.-backed transitional government, told The Associated Press that plans to forcibly disarm the city this week had been delayed.

"The prime minister has decided to postpone disarming people by force until an unspecified time," Dinari said. He did not say why Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi reversed his stand.

The ease with which Somalis can get weapons is a major problem in this chaotic African nation. It has not had an effective government since clan-based warlords toppled a military dictatorship in 1991 and plunged the country into anarchy.

The Council of Islamic Courts militia had brought a semblance of stability to Mogadishu after seizing control six months ago, but it terrified residents with a version of Quranic rule that included public executions and floggings of criminals.

Government troops, backed by the Ethiopian military, routed the Islamic militia from much of southern Somalia last week. Many of the militiamen are now besieged at the southernmost tip of Somalia with their backs to the sea, but the government estimates 3,500 fighters are hiding out in Mogadishu. (Map)Al Qaeda's call gains supporters

Some of the fighters in hiding told The Associated Press on Thursday that they would heed a call from Ayman al-Zawahiri, al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden's deputy, for guerrilla attacks and suicide bombings against the troops from Ethiopia, which has a large Christian population.

"I am committed to die for the sake of my religion, and the al Qaeda deputy's speech only encourages me to go ahead with my holy war," 18-year-old Sahal Abdi in Mogadishu said in a phone interview.

Leaders of the Islamic movement previously vowed to launch an Iraq-style guerrilla war.

Ethiopian soldiers, tanks and warplanes intervened December 24 in support of the interim Somali government, which at the time controlled only the western town of Baidoa. But Ethiopia's government wants to pull out in a few weeks, saying it cannot afford to keep its troops in Somalia.

The government is trying to train and expand its own military and police while an international diplomatic effort seeks to put a foreign peacekeeping force in place.

A meeting of U.S., European Union, African and Arab diplomats ended in Kenya on Friday. The U.S. pledged to provide $40 million to Somalia in political, humanitarian and peacekeeping assistance. Uganda has pledged at least 1,000 peacekeepers.

The EU said it also would help pay for a peacekeeping force envisioned at 8,000 soldiers.

On Friday, U.S. warships patrolled offshore to prevent militiamen from escaping by sea.

The U.S. 5th Fleet said vessels were being boarded to look for militants, including three al Qaeda suspects wanted for the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa. The Islamic council has denied U.S. allegations that the three were leaders in the Somali movement. (Watch who is being hunted)

Ethiopia's Intervention May Destabilize Region (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113629

Unless it is followed by diplomacy and aid, the battle against Somalia's Islamists may radicalize moderate Muslims.

MOGADISHU, SOMALIA — By launching a war against Somalia's Islamists, Ethiopia says it was drawing a line in the sand against religious extremism in East Africa. But without quick diplomacy and international aid, analysts caution that the war could radicalize the region's traditionally moderate Muslims.

"This could bode ill for both Somalia and eastern Ethiopia, but perhaps even northern Kenya," said John Prendergast, Africa analyst at International Crisis Group, a conflict-resolution think tank based in Washington.

Signs of a budding insurgency already are emerging in Mogadishu. Gunshots and riots rocked Somalia's capital on Saturday as Ethiopian troops clashed with Somalian protesters. A 13-year-old Somalian boy was killed. Anonymous pamphlets distributed in some neighborhoods warned locals to steer clear of Ethiopian and allied soldiers from Somalia's transitional government. The pamphlets pledged guerrilla tactics and suicide attacks.

At least one Ethiopian soldier was killed by Somalian gunmen last week near the town of Kismayo. On Thursday, a group of Ethiopian soldiers in Mogadishu was attacked with a hand grenade tossed from a truck; no one was injured.

"They will never take our country!" anti-Ethiopian demonstrators chanted Saturday as they marched through Mogadishu. "We will fight for our religion."

The protests came as Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Jendayi E. Frazer prepared to make a brief visit to Mogadishu to support efforts to deploy Africa Union peacekeepers in Somalia. The visit would be the first in years to Somalia by a senior U.S. official.

American officials supported Ethiopia's intervention, accusing Somalia's Islamic Courts Union of having links to terrorism. The U.S. has earmarked $40 million for Somalia's recovery.

Although Ethiopia is about half Muslim and half Christian, extremists in Somalia and elsewhere are characterizing Ethiopia's presence here as a Christian occupation. On Friday, a deputy leader of the Al Qaeda terrorist network posted a website message calling for attacks on Ethiopian troops in Somalia.

Many believe the U.S. encouraged Ethiopia to lead the assault last month to put an African face on the war, though Ethiopian officials say the U.S. opposed a direct military attack in Somalia. For better or worse, analysts say, America is now linked to Somalia's recovery.

"The U.S. is tethered to this intervention," said Ken Menkhaus, a Somalia expert and political science professor at Davidson College in North Carolina. "Because of the impression that we subcontracted the war out to Ethiopia, we're going to be held responsible."

Winning support from the Hawiye subclans that previously opposed the transitional government is crucial, experts said. In the beginning, these clans praised the Islamic Courts Union for restoring security to the capital. But when the tough talk of courts leaders brought Ethiopian soldiers to Mogadishu's doorstep, clan leaders withdrew their support.

"The courts overreached," Prendergast said. "As soon as it appeared that the stability that the courts once offered would be replaced by open warfare with Ethiopia, the clan leaders took back their weapons."

Sought-after foothold

In the past, efforts by radicals to establish a beachhead in the Horn of Africa met with limited success in Somalia. Intelligence officials said Al Qaeda's efforts to penetrate Somalia after the 1991 collapse of the dictatorship encountered stiff resistance from clan leaders.

But the sight of Ethiopian jets bombing targets in Mogadishu and driving out Islamists may unite the region's Muslims. Prendergast warned against declaring victory too soon.

"To believe that the Islamists are defeated now would be the same as believing that the Sunnis were defeated when the U.S. marched into Baghdad," Prendergast said.

For now, the war appears to have cemented Ethiopia's standing as a dominant force in the Horn.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi secured a friendly Somalian government that isn't likely to push hot-button issues such as control of the contested Ogaden region in eastern Ethiopia. He also strengthened ties with the United States by establishing Ethiopia as America's leading regional partner in the U.S.-declared war on terrorism.

Ethiopians say the U.S. and rest of the world should thank them for holding the line against the spread of Islamic fundamentalism.

"We have to make sure that religious extremism doesn't take hold in Africa," said Bereket Simon, a minister of state in Ethiopia. He said his nation, home to sub-Saharan Africa's second-largest Muslim population after Nigeria, acted in self-defense.

But Menkhaus said that success could be measured only in the coming months. "A lot depends on what kind of insurgency emerges," he said.

If Somalia's problems bleed across its borders, the ripple effects could include a destabilization of Ethiopia's Muslim community and reduced tourism for Kenya, Menkhaus said.

DOJ_NMG_0113630

Ethiopia's victory also draws Somalia a step closer to its African neighbors. Historically, Somalis have been divided over whether to consider themselves part of Africa or orient themselves toward the Arab world. Former dictator Mohamed Siad Barre, who was ousted in 1991, straddled the fence.

Islamic courts leaders were working to forge closer ties with Arab-led countries, such as Yemen and Sudan.

Mohammed Abduallahi Afra, director of parliament in the transitional government that collapsed in 2003, worries that the regional balance of power could be upset.

Recent events could stir up animosity between Ethiopia and Eritrea, which never settled a border dispute that led to war in 1998. Kenya and Djibouti have been improving ties in recent years, but they were divided over how to handle Somalia, Afra said.

A history of conflict

This isn't the first time Somalia has found itself caught in an international tug of war. In the 1970s, Somalia and Ethiopia were Cold War pawns, heavily armed by the Soviet Union and United States, respectively. Then communists seized control of Ethiopia, and the superpowers simply swapped allies. A 1977 war between Ethiopia and Somalia was fueled largely by the U.S. and Soviet Union.

Analysts say U.S. policymakers now have a short window of time to bring change. Ethiopian troops plan to leave Somalia in a matter of weeks and the transitional government needs substantial assistance to survive on its own.

Since withdrawing U.S. troops in 1994 after 18 American servicemen were killed in Mogadishu in October 1993, U.S. engagement in Somalia has been limited. About 1,500 U.S. troops are based in Djibouti to fight terrorism, train African security forces and improve infrastructure in the region. But the base has no representation or activity in Somalia, a representative said.

Last year, Mogadishu warlords, with support and funding from the CIA, formed an anti-terrorism alliance that began pursuing and kidnapping Islamists sought by the U.S., including three suspects in the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania.

The move not only undermined Somalia's transitional government but also built public support for the Islamic fighters.

Ted Dagne, Africa specialist for the Congressional Research Service, said U.S. policymakers must pressure the transitional government to reach out to moderate Islamic leaders and the Mogadishu clans who feel excluded.

Somalia's underlying problems remain unresolved, he warned. They include a weak transitional government, clan rivalries and warlords seeking to reassert their power.

"Unless there is sustained and careful support for the process, Somalia will go back to where it was before," Dagne said.

Richardson Heads To Sudan With 3 Goals (AP)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 7, 2007

Heading on a diplomatic mission to Sudan, Gov. Bill Richardson said Saturday he hopes to persuade the country's president to accept more U.N. peacekeepers in war-ravaged Darfur, a goal that has eluded world leaders.

The New Mexico Democrat, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, said in an Associated Press interview that he does not expect to settle President Omar al-Bashir's dispute with the U.N. over troop levels during the trip beginning this weekend.

He planned to meet with rebel leaders in Darfur on Tuesday and al-Bashir in Khartoum, the capital, on Monday. Sudan's state news agency confirmed Saturday that Richardson would meet the president; several Western officials were unable to get a meeting with the Sudanese leader during their recent visits.

Richardson, who was U.N. ambassador under President Clinton, said he has three goals for his visit to the African nation: increasing the U.N. force in Darfur, improving the humanitarian situation and helping encourage a cease-fire.

"I'll consider it a success if we accelerate movement in those areas," Richardson said over breakfast at the governor's mansion before departing. "But I don't want to raise expectations. I don't think we'll settle the U.N. issue."

The dispute is over a three-stage plan to send some 20,000 peacekeepers and police to Darfur to provide protection to the 2.5 million people uprooted since early 2003 as a result of sectarian conflict. More than 200,000 people have died, victims of violence as well as malnutrition and disease.

Al-Bashir indicated in late December that he would go along with a plan that would create a hybrid U.N.-African Union force. But al-Bashir's U.N. ambassador quickly ruled out any U.N. peacekeeping operation in Darfur.

President Bush's special envoy to Sudan, Andrew Natsios, met with al-Bashir last month. Natsios said he insisted al-Bashir allow 60 U.N. troops and civilians into Darfur by the end of the year, but the State Department says only 20 civilians have been deployed.

Natsios, who is scheduled to visit China this week to ask for help in bringing peace to Darfur, has not responded to a request for comment about Richardson's trip.

DOJ_NMG_0113631

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Friday the U.S. was urging all parties in the conflict to refrain from violence "that prevents a durable cease-fire."

Richardson said he is visiting Sudan in cooperation with Natsios and he said Bush has "done the right thing" in Darfur, sending in humanitarian aide and speaking out at the U.N.

"The thought is that if we go in with a bipartisan appeal, we might be able to make progress with Bashir," Richardson said.

The governor, who left Saturday afternoon by private jet for Khartoum, said he hoped to depart Sudan on Wednesday night or Thursday morning.

The Sudanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs "expressed hope that the visit would contribute to correcting the image of the situations in Darfur (in the) US Congress," the official news agency said Saturday.

Richardson is making the trip at the request of the Save Darfur Coalition, which is paying for the travel bills. The group asked Richardson's help because he has a good relationship with al-Bashir and has successfully negotiated with him in the past.

Associated Press writer Alfred de Montesquiou in Cairo, Egypt, contributed to this report.

Bomb Attack On Bus In Sri Lanka Kills 11 (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Jan. 6 — A powerful bomb blew up a passenger bus on Saturday, killing 11 people and wounding more than 40 others on the southern coast of Sri Lanka.

The bombing was the second in less than 24 hours. The authorities are investigating the first blast, which killed six people and wounded 50 on Friday northeast of the capital, Colombo.

A government statement blamed the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam for the explosions.

“The government believes that the L.T.T.E. is attempting to divert attention from the continuous defeats they have been suffering at the hands of the security forces during the recent past,” the statement said. “The government reiterates that terror attacks will not deter its efforts to find a peaceful solution to the national problem or its counterterrorism measures to defeat terrorism.”

The rebels had no immediate comment. They routinely deny involvement in attacks. The Tigers have been fighting for more than two decades to carve out a separate state for the island’s Tamil minority.

The bombing on Saturday took place near the busy town of Hikkaduwa, in an area that is popular with tourists.

The body of a woman who was believed to have planted the parcel bomb was found near the bus, said Jayantha Gamage, the senior police official in the area. He said most of the damage and casualties were to the rear section of the bus, which bore a gaping hole.

The Personal Politics Of Bangladesh (WP/AP)

By Matthew Rosenberg, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Feuding Women Lead Top Parties

DHAKA, Bangladesh -- For 15 years Bangladesh has been dominated by the revolving-door premiership of two women whose rivalry is among the most ferocious in the democratic world.

Former president Jimmy Carter tried to get Khaleda Zia and Sheikh Hasina to shake hands in 2004, but couldn't even persuade them to look at each other. At a party in November, the two held court in different corners of the room.

It's the stuff of political slapstick, except that this feud is rooted in the assassination of one woman's father and the other's husband, and the result today is anything but funny.

"We have floods, cyclones, many people die. But Zia and Hasina are worse," said Abul Islam, a 51-year-old Dhaka shop owner. "The two ladies are our worst disaster."

Many Bangladeshis -- illiterate men pedaling rickshaws through Dhaka's squalid streets, or educated women sipping tea in stately homes -- will say the rivalry is the cause of all the country's problems of poverty and corruption.

That's an overstatement, perhaps; those problems existed before 1971, the year Bangladesh became independent and the two women were at home raising their children, and have continued since. It was political instability, wholly male-generated, that led to the assassinations that brought Zia and Hasina to prominence.

But their rivalry has done nothing to improve things. Bangladesh is deeply corrupt and, in many parts, barely governed, raising concerns about instability in this strategic Muslim country already contending with Islamic militancy. Now, with an election set for Jan. 22, tempers are rising again.

Zia was elected in 1991, Hasina in 1996, and Zia again in 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0113632

Zia's latest term ended in October, and the race between her Bangladesh Nationalist Party and Hasina's Awami League had already been bloody, with dozens killed in street clashes, before Hasina announced Wednesday that the 17-party alliance she leads would boycott the election. She alleged bias by the interim government.

Bangladesh is roughly the size of New York state with four times the population -- 147 million at last count -- and grindingly poor. Yet nationwide strikes repeatedly bring it to a standstill, shutting factories that churn out J. Crew sweaters and Banana Republic shirts and earn more than 75 percent of the country's hard currency.

"Foreigners think we are a moderate Muslim country because we have two women in charge," said Obaidul Kader, a 42-year-old businessman.

"But that's only thinking in religious terms," he said. "Maybe our ladies are not Islamic extremists, but they are not moderate people. Their hate is not moderate."

At a glance, they don't look all that different. They are close in age -- Zia, 61, and Hasina, 59. Both appear in public wearing flowing saris and shawls. Both go by grand feudal titles -- Begum Zia and Sheikh Hasina.

Some might see them as evidence of women's liberation in Bangladesh. But patriarchal traditions run deep here.

"They can't sit down and discuss their problems like men," Kader said, as if Bangladesh had not had coups and assassinations before the women took over.

Both women became heads of parties that had lost their male leaders to killers. Hasina's father was Prime Minister Mujibur Rahman, assassinated along with most of his family by army officers in 1975. Hasina was out of the country at the time.

In the killing's aftermath, Zia's husband, Gen. Ziaur Rahman, became president, a post he held until 1981, when he too was assassinated by soldiers. Zia then took over his party.

Zia suspects that Hasina's Awami League was behind her husband's slaying, while Hasina believes Zia's husband knew about the plot against her father.

Despite their suspicions, the two put aside their differences to fight the decade-long dictatorship of Lt. Gen. Hussein Mohammed Ershad, and both spent much of the 1980s in and out of prison.

When democracy was restored in 1991, Zia led her husband's Bangladesh Nationalist Party to victory and was elected prime minister.

The party had picked her as leader because she "was a symbol that could unify party workers," said Nazim Kamran Chowdhury, a former BNP lawmaker.

"We thought she believed in the ideals we had," he said. But "the moment she became prime minister she was more interested in the trappings of power rather than the exercise of power. There was no discussion, no policy initiatives."

He and others describe Zia as having lived a cloistered life until her husband's assassination.

"She was a person who never had to go to a market, has never been to a bank to open a bank account -- doesn't know everyday life," Chowdhury said.

Hasina, who has been married to nuclear scientist Wajed Miah since 1968, was active in student politics at Dhaka University but shares the same reputation for being removed from the many who live on less than a dollar a day.

No one has seen the two women speak to each other-- not a "Hello," "How are you?" or "Goodbye" -- in years.

"In true democracies, you have political parties running on different platforms but working together to govern," said Chowdhury, the former lawmaker.

But both parties led by the women are relatively centrist, with few issues separating Zia and Hasina. "They have no conception of what democracy is -- they just want to rule," Chowdhury said. "The state, running it -- they get to decide who gets government jobs, give business to supporters."

So why not elect someone else? Analysts blame social conservatism -- a reluctance of the poor and illiterate to question those perceived as their betters -- and thuggish political tactics to ensure that people who do not support either party nonetheless turn out to vote for one of them.

As for the small middle and upper classes, most are tied to one party or the other -- and the rest are simply afraid to gamble on something new.

"I've got major property holdings, I import electronics," said a middle-aged businessman who maintains ties with both camps and spoke on condition of anonymity. "I can't take foolish risks. They could shut me down."

Police Ignore Serial Killings In Delhi Slum, Exposing Unequal Justice For India's Poor (NYT)

By Amelia Gentleman

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113633

NEW DELHI, Jan. 6 — When Vandana Sarkar, an impoverished migrant worker, went to the police in October to report that her 20-year-old daughter was missing, she recalled Friday, officers laughed and said, "Why do you people have so many children if you can't look after them?"

Their casual response should not have come as a surprise. At least 30 other sets of parents had reported children missing from the same slum area in Noida, an affluent suburb of Delhi, over recent months. Some say they were dismissed as "drunken trouble-makers." Others claim officers refused even to register their complaints.

It was only when 17 chopped-up bodies, most of them belonging to children, were found in the sewers behind the home of a wealthy local resident on Dec. 29 that the Noida police were finally stirred into action.

What seems clearly a case of serial killing on the fringes of the capital has become a national scandal, with public horror at the brutal details interwoven with outrage at the police department's failure to investigate.

That India has a two-tier justice system is nothing new. Only widespread protest drove the courts to order a retrial for a rich young man acquitted in February of fatally shooting a model at a party in 1999. In December, the accused, Manu Sharma, was found guilty and sentenced to life in prison.

And when the 3-year-old son of an Indian executive disappeared near his Noida home in November, it was instantly national news. The police immediately began a huge hunt, found the abductors and returned the child to his distraught parents.

But the case of the dead and missing slum children has provided a brutally stark example of how the law does not work for the marginalized, shocking even the most jaundiced observers of the nation's legal processes.

The bags full of dismembered body parts found on Dec. 29 were pulled one by one from an open sewer behind a whitewashed two-story house belonging to Moninder Singh Pandher, a businessman. He and his servant, Surender Kohli, were arrested and charged with kidnapping, raping and killing the victims, some reported to be as young as three.

A police spokesman told the news media the next day that Mr. Kohli, when confronted with photographs of some of the victims, confessed to having killed 10 women and 5 children. Mr. Kohli said that he and Mr. Pandher had lured some of the victims into the house with toffees and chocolates, the police said. The Noida police chief, R.K.S. Rathore, said that other victims were young women who were offered jobs at the house.

The officials said that according to Mr. Kohli's confession, the two men sexually abused their victims, then strangled them and chopped up their bodies, concealing the remains in the drains. An autopsy report said the bodies were sliced with "butcher-like" precision, Agence France-Presse reported.

Neither suspect has spoken publicly but Mr. Pandher's son, Karan Pandher, warned against prejudging his father. "He is just a suspect," Karan Pandher told reporters on Saturday, Agence France-Presse reported. "He is not a monster."

The police said the body parts included 12 skulls belonging to children and 5 belonging to adults. Thirteen of the dead were quickly identified. Mrs. Sarkar's daughter was one.

The sluggish police response to the disappearance of dozens of children has horrified the nation as much as the crime itself. Residents said as many as 38 children have been reported missing over the last two years from the slum, Nithari, but that the police recorded only 19 cases, according to Indian news media. Many parents, the reports said, were told their children must have run away.

Groups like India's National Commission for Women were disturbed by reports of women disappearing from the Noida slums as early as August 2005. Nirmala Venkatesh, a commission member, was working with six families missing daughters, none of whom had managed to persuade the police to investigate.

"The police system failed," she said. "They were ignorant, they were careless."

On Wednesday, the national government opened an inquiry into the police failures. The next day, six policemen were dismissed for failure to investigate reports of the missing children, accused by the state government "of dereliction of duty and gross negligence in responding to complaints made by parents of missing children." Four other officers were suspended, and widespread condemnation is growing.

"There was shocking inaction," Ved Marwah, the former Delhi police chief, said in a television interview.

The Asian Age, an English language daily newspaper, condemned the police for turning away the missing children's parents "with contemptuous disdain for two long years only because they were poor villagers with no influence of any kind, political or otherwise."

Hundreds of angry Nithari residents have been protesting all week in the street where the bodies were found. On Monday, they stormed past the officers guarding the house and broke into the premises, pelting neighboring houses with stones.

Now, barricades have been erected near the house, and relatives of the dead wait alongside protesters for more news. Parents with missing children also come, trying to establish whether any of the unidentified victims might be their child.

DOJ_NMG_0113634

A woman named Dayawati, also from a nearby slum, came holding a black-and-white passport photo of her son, Vipin, 16, who has been missing for four months. “When I told the police he had disappeared, they told me to look for him myself,” she said. “Things would have been different if I’d been rich. Then I could have bribed them to make them investigate.”

For Mrs. Sarkar, as for so many bereft parents, the furor comes too late. She said she had described to police officers the yellow suit her daughter Rupa was wearing when she went out to work early on Oct. 5, 2006. The clothes, she said in an interview, were found in the sewer, in a bag alongside body parts.

Brandishing a state government check for 500,000 rupees — roughly $11,300 — in compensation, she said: “My child’s life is worth more than this. It’s as if they want us to keep quiet — but I’m not going to remain silent.”

The money, she said, could help look after Rupa’s 18-month-old son, Amit. But, she said, as a migrant worker from East Bengal with no identity papers, opening a bank account is nearly impossible and she does not know how to go about cashing the check.

Before her daughter disappeared, Mrs. Sarkar said, she walked with her every morning past the house where the two men charged with the murders lived. The two women worked as maids at nearby houses.

It is just a 30-second walk, but it crosses the divide between the India of the excluded and destitute, and the India of the privileged elite. The extended Sarkar family shares one large wooden bed, which takes up most of a tiny rooftop room in the heart of Nithari. Neighbors live less well: in mud huts, straw houses and shacks made of plastic sheeting and corrugated tin, breathing in the stench from a vast rubbish dump where cows and pigs forage.

Beyond the open sewer, across a makeshift bridge made of discarded metal pipe, is the tree-lined street where Mr. Pandher and Mr. Kohli lived. Here a dozen new houses flaunt their owners’ recent wealth, acquired in India’s booming economy, with displays of extravagant architectural fancy: large, arched windows; verandas with elaborate wrought-iron railings; and marble-fronted buildings. The entrances are blocked from public gaze with high gates, and guarded by watchmen.

“I never saw anyone in that house,” Mrs. Sarkar said. “I only know that rich people live on that street.”

It was only when she watched police removing body parts on her way home from that day in December, and heard about the killings, that she understood what had happened to her daughter.

“Where was the help when I needed it?” she said. “No one would listen to me. The police officers looked at the photograph of my daughter and said: ‘She looks so beautiful. She probably eloped.’ No one ever bothered to come to my house to follow up on the case.”

In Mexico, "People Do Really Want To Stay" (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

Chicken Farmers Fear U.S. Exports Will Send More Workers North for Jobs

PEGUEROS, Mexico -- Even as his village emptied, Pedro Martin stayed behind. His schoolmates abandoned the scrub-covered hills of central Mexico for the land they called El Norte-- the North. They mopped floors in Fresno, poured concrete in Tempe and tended other people's children in Galveston, measuring their lives in dollars.

Martin worked at a poultry farm. His wages rose to 2,000 pesos per week, about $185. Meager by the standards of the north, it was enough to build a brick house with white tile floors. Enough to buy a car, and to stay in the village and watch his three boys grow, resisting the gravitational pull the United States exerts on much of rural Mexico.

"Up north, even though they pay more, you're not necessarily living as well," Martin said, as church bells echoed down lanes of pastel-painted houses. "You feel out of place. Here, you can walk around the whole town and it's comfortable. Life is easier."

But now, Martin worries that life in the central Mexican state of Jalisco is about to be shaken by globalization. Already much of Mexico's farm country has been overwhelmed by an influx of crops from the United States in the years following the North American Free Trade Agreement. Over the next two years, the final provisions of the trade pact kick in, opening Mexico to unlimited imports of poultry from its northern neighbor. Mexican farms will compete directly with an American agribusiness nurtured by subsidies on the corn that feeds the birds.

"If a lot of chicken comes in from the United States, we're not going to be able to maintain our farms," said Martin, 39. "What's going to happen? People are going to get fired. People are going to go north."

NAFTA, as the landmark trade agreement is known, was supposed to work the other way around. In the early 1990s, as politicians in the three countries of North America sold the pact, they promised it would spur enough development in Mexico to create millions of jobs, raise wages and diminish the lure of the north.

DOJ_NMG_0113635

But since 1994, the year NAFTA took effect, Mexico's economy has grown sluggishly. Not enough jobs have materialized, while Mexico's working-age population has swelled. Meanwhile, the United States has been a magnet for Mexican laborers willing to take on low-paying, unpleasant work.

More than 6.2 million Mexicans now live in the United States illegally, according to Mexico's National Council of Population. Two-thirds arrived after NAFTA.

For Mexico, as for most developing countries, free trade was a gamble. It opened the world's most lucrative market, the United States, to wares produced in Mexico's factories, and to produce grown on Mexican soil. But it also lifted protections on Mexico's manufacturers and farmers, bringing an influx of products from the north.

As NAFTA's final provisions take effect next year, tying Mexico's fortunes more tightly to world markets, how will its economy adjust? And how will the latest wave of trade liberalization alter the calculations for millions of Mexicans wanting to stay home, but constantly feeling the tug of the north?Baby Boom Fuels Emigration

The demographic wave that has carried unprecedented numbers of Mexicans to the United States is the consequence of a baby boom that began in Mexico four decades ago, when improvements in rural health care allowed more infants to survive.

From 1993 to 2006, as those born during the boom reached adulthood, Mexicans of working age swelled from 34 million to 44 million, according to Agustin Escobar, a sociologist at the Center for Higher Research in Social Anthropology in Guadalajara. Over the same period, Mexico's businesses added only 8 million jobs that pay decent wages and benefits, exacerbating a backlog of about 15 million Mexicans needing work, Escobar said.

Population pressure, combined with the lifting of subsidies on the farm, sent rural Mexicans in search of higher wages. They moved within Mexico in vast numbers. Many crossed the border. By 2002, 14 percent of all people born in Mexican villages were living in the United States, according to J. Edward Taylor, an agricultural economist at the University of California at Davis. Mexicans in the United States sent home nearly $17 billion in 2004, according to the Bank of Mexico.

"If you want to buy a house, you have to go to the States," Escobar said. "People go to America to make their Mexican dream come true."

NAFTA, as the politicians sold it, was supposed to make Mexican dreams attainable at home.

Mexico's government promised that the pact would add 1 million jobs a year. But jobs have been created at roughly half that rate. Mexico's economy has grown less than 3 percent a year since NAFTA. Not even a sustained expansion of 5 percent a year would have been enough to stem the surge of immigrants headed north, given the numbers of Mexicans entering the workforce, declared the 1997 Mexico-U.S. Binational Migration Study.

NAFTA did bring Mexico foreign investment. Jobs at its maquiladoras -- export factories set up in the 1960s, mostly near the border -- more than doubled from 540,000 to 1.13 million between 1993 and 2004. But in other factories, employment has slipped and average wages have dropped by 5 percent.

Economists emphasize that any assessment of NAFTA must include the financial crisis that savaged Mexico in 1994 and 1995, sowing unemployment. Some assert that without NAFTA and the exports it fueled, Mexico's recovery would have been slower. Many also say that Mexico's government squandered opportunities for growth by failing to improve highways and ports, and by leaving unchecked the monopoly power of the national telephone company, which has kept rates for Internet access and other telecommunication services high, discouraging new ventures. While Mexico has stagnated, China has exploded, capturing factory jobs.

Oddly, border enforcement may have stifled some of Mexico's gains. In a paper presented to the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, Raymond Robertson, an economist at Macalester College, found that Mexico's increased foreign trade has been a factor pushing wages up at home, but that has been countered by the intensification of U.S. border security, which has kept people in Mexico, leaving more workers competing for jobs and pushing wages down.

The clearest reason why Mexico has not prospered under NAFTA is found on the farm, the workplace for about one-fourth of the population.

From 1993 to 2003, exports of American agriculture to Mexico more than doubled, climbing from $3.6 billion to $7.9 billion, according to Gary C. Hufbauer and Jeffrey J. Schott in their book, "NAFTA Revisited." Over a similar period, Mexico lost nearly 2 million agricultural jobs, according to Mexico's National Employment Survey.

Mexico's agricultural exports to the United States also surged, climbing from $2.7 billion in 1993 to $6.3 billion in 2003. Huge farms have been developed to grow artichokes, tomatoes and other produce for the U.S. market. But those farms, many launched with American investment, typically pay about $13 a day. That's not enough to keep workers from leaving: They can make three to four times as much in even the lowliest U.S. jobs.

"I'm only here because someone had to stay home and take care of our mother," said Luz Maria Vazquez, 36, as she picked tomatoes in Jalisco, sporting a T-shirt from a tavern in McLean, Va. Six of her brothers and sisters were in the United States, most of them without papers, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0113636

And the growth of Mexico's export farms, though good for the owners, has had a paradoxical effect on the country's markets. Produce not good enough for American stores is trucked instead to Mexican cities, sending local prices down. On a recent morning in Guadalajara, men unloaded crates of wrinkled bell peppers arriving from the northern province of Sinaloa -- rejects from the American market. Bell peppers had been selling locally for about $13 per crate. These were $10.

Two hours south, in the village of Ejido Modelo Emiliano Zapata, Ruben Rivera sat on a bench in a forlorn plaza, rather than working on his seven-acre farm. He used to grow tomatoes and onions, hiring 150 workers to help at harvest. Now he doesn't even bother to plant. He can buy onions in the supermarket more cheaply than he can grow them. A crop of tomatoes yields less than the taxes. He lives off the $800 sent home monthly by his three sons, who run a yardwork business in Macon, Ga.

"For people who can grow huge scale for export, NAFTA has been good," he said. "For people like us, it's been a bloodbath."

In the nearby town of Tizapan el Alto, where traditionally 90 percent of local people have farmed, one-third of all agricultural jobs have been wiped out in the last five years, said Mayor Ramon Martinez.

About 200 have gained jobs assembling electronics in maquiladoras on the edges of Guadalajara, earning as much as $23 a day, nearly double farm pay. Martinez is courting investment for a factory in his town. But roads and other facilities are in rough shape, and global investment is flowing to China.

"People do really want to stay," the mayor said, but with the pull of the north, almost half his town's official population of 19,000 has decamped for the United States. "We're basically exporters of people."In the Heart of Chicken Country

Jalisco has long been one of the primary sources of Mexican immigrants to the United States. And its farms produce more than 10 percent of Mexico's poultry. What happens next year, when the tariffs come off chicken imported from the United States, could test how continued globalization is altering life on both sides of the border.

In the town Atotonilco el Alto, Sergio Garcia's chicken houses are scattered among lemon orchards and rows of blue-green agave cactus, the source of tequila. Garcia is betting that Fresko Pollo, the chicken business his father started from the back of a truck in 1950, can survive the expected American onslaught by catering to local tastes. His workers weigh chickens and slaughter only those of ideal size. He runs a chain of retail shops, where he sells marinated breasts, chicken sausages and smoked chicken prepared at his processing plant.

"I'm not so worried, because we're not just producers," Garcia said. "Despite free trade, niches remain."

But he knows he faces a formidable foe. An archetype of efficiency, the American poultry industry is dominated by enormous brands that control all aspects of production -- employing computerized feed mills that mix grains, mechanized slaughterhouses, and hatcheries that use genetic science to breed disease-resistant chicks.

At Garcia's feed mill, workers shovel grain by hand. At his slaughterhouse, a man slices throats with a wood-handled blade.

Feed amounts to nearly 60 percent of the cost of raising a chicken. For the American poultry industry, the cost has been held down, historically, by subsidies for corn production. In 2005, American cropland for corn received a range of subsidies worth more than $10 billion, according to a Washington Post analysis of data from the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Labor, where Mexico has an advantage, makes up only about 5 percent of production costs.

Already, Garcia is feeling the pressure. Americans prefer breast meat, while Mexicans opt for dark. So U.S. poultry producers can sell leg quarters -- dark meat -- in Mexico at low prices and still make money. From January 2005 to January 2006, even though a 59 percent tariff applied to some chicken imports, the wholesale price of chicken leg quarters sold in Mexico City plunged by nearly one-fourth, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture. Next year, as NAFTA's final provisions kick in, the door opens to unlimited imports.

"The price will fall," Garcia said. "It could drop by half."

In the village of Pegueros, a center of poultry, NAFTA is a word laden with anxiety. Corn farmers saw prices fall due to American imports, though demand for ethanol in the United States, made from corn, is now sending prices up. Dairy farmers have been decimated, a trend expected to intensify next year as protections on powdered milk expire.

The forces of trade have laid waste to the Mexican dream of Trino Franco, who came home three years ago to launch a dairy business with his three brothers after more than a decade in the north. He poured $40,000 into the venture -- everything he saved in Los Angeles, where he parked cars at a 24-hour gym from six in the morning until two in the afternoon, then worked security at a hotel until 11 at night.

But the price of milk has dropped by nearly one-fifth in the last year. The farm has lost money, forcing Franco, 38, to take a job as general manager at a larger dairy operation. He earns $200 a week, enough to keep him home with his wife and baby. For now.

"You can't see a good future in this area," he said. "That's why so many people cross the border."

DOJ_NMG_0113637

Pedro Martin, still at home while so many friends and relatives make their lives in another country, is intent that his three boys -- 13, 8 and eight months -- stay in Mexico. On a recent morning, as firecrackers boomed in salute to Mexico's patron saint, Guadalupe, a procession of shiny SUVs pulled into Pegueros, their license plates advertising the riches of Texas, Virginia and California. People were returning for Christmas.

Martin professed no envy. His sister and her two boys are crammed into an $1,100-a-month apartment in San Francisco. The boys have to work to help pay the rent. "They're thinking of returning," Martin said. His own boys are growing up with the fresh air and broad vistas of Jalisco.

But in the adjacent town of Tepatitlan, the people in control of the poultry farms are fretting. They are organizing into cooperatives to improve their bargaining position as they brace for a flood of imports next year. The well-trod path to El Norte is never far from their minds.

"If there are corn subsidies in the United States and none here, we're dead," said Lorenzo Martin, president of the Tepatitlan Poultry Farmers Association and the head of one large producer. "If the U.S. starts selling things extra cheap outside the U.S., then it won't just be small farmers and individuals who will be leaving. It will be people like me."

Mexico's New President Sends Thousands Of Federal Officers To Fight Drug Cartels (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

TIJUANA, Mexico, Jan. 6 — President Felipe Calderón ran last summer on a promise to create jobs, but in his first five weeks as chief executive he has made it clear his first priority is to turn his government into the scourge of organized crime.

The president has sent thousands of federal police and troops into the drug-plagued states of Michoacán and Baja California to break up criminal organizations and stop the brutal violence they perpetuate. The federal forces have burned marijuana crops, arrested suspected drug gang members and disarmed local police forces the authorities say are crippled by corruption.

"We will continue with the operations that let us re-establish the minimum conditions of security in some parts of the republic, so that little by little we can take back our streets, our parks, our schools," Mr. Calderón said in a New Year's message to the nation.

But some opposition politicians and experts on the drug trade wonder if the federal interventions are not more flash than substance, and question if they will have a lasting impact on the drug trade and police corruption, whose roots run deep.

Mr. Calderón's predecessor, Vicente Fox, created an elite force to combat narcotics dealers and arrested dozens of drug cartel leaders during his six-year term. Rather than stanch the violence, however, the arrests led to a brutal war between the remaining traffickers for the smuggling routes and territory.

In the southwestern state of Michoacán, where more than 500 people were killed last year, the violence has persisted despite the president's decision to send in more than 7,000 officers and soldiers last month. Drug dealers killed about 21 people during the last three weeks of December, according to local news reports. This week, a mass grave was found with seven bodies bearing signs of gangland executions, and a 12-year-old boy was executed in what appeared to be a drug dispute.

Still, Mr. Calderón made a rare appearance dressed in military fatigues on Wednesday to congratulate troops in Michoacán and to tout their successes. Four top members of the Valencia drug gang were arrested and hundreds of acres of marijuana were burned, the authorities said.

In Tijuana on Tuesday, Mr. Calderón ordered 2,600 soldiers and 110 federal police officers to begin an operation aimed at ending the grip of mobsters on the local police department, slowing the flow of drugs and ending kidnappings and killings related to the trade.

The officers began patrolling the streets with caravans of pickups filled with heavily armed officers in black combat outfits. The army set up roadblocks, while navy boats prowled the coast and helicopters buzzed overhead. Soldiers in camouflage uniforms pulled over cars at random and searched them. Federal and state police manned checkpoints in the town.

The federal government also stripped all 2,320 city police officers of their weapons on Wednesday night. The move prompted fears that anarchy would break out in the city streets, where drunken brawls, car thefts, muggings and drug-induced mayhem are a daily fact of life.

The city secretary of public security, Luis Javier Algorri, said Friday morning there were too few federal officers to keep order, much less ferret out drug gangs at the same time.

"We think they don't have the experience to deal with these sorts of problems," Mr. Algorri said. "And without firearms this kind of work will be hard to carry out."

DOJ_NMG_0113638

The decision to disarm the local police reflects the belief among federal officials that many local officers are on the payroll of drug cartels as assassins, enforcers and, in some cases, kidnappers. Federal prosecutors say the lack of help from the local police in border towns, either because they are corrupt or afraid, makes it nearly impossible to dismantle drug cartels.

The mayor of Tijuana, Jorge Hank Rhon, said he welcomed the intervention. He did not dispute that a significant number of police officers were corrupt, saying their salaries are so low that drug lords can easily bribe them. “It’s not the police,” he said. “It’s some policemen.”

Many residents said they were tired of finding victims of mob executions in the streets in the mornings, as well as the wave of kidnappings that has rocked this border town over the last 12 months. Last year there were more than 300 killings in the city, most of them linked to drug gangs, including 25 police officers, authorities said.

In interviews, most residents said they welcomed the crackdown, even as some expressed skepticism the caravan-style patrols and roadblocks would do much to hurt drug traffickers.

David López, a 28-year-old importer, watched Wednesday night as about 25 federal policemen in full combat uniforms and carrying machine guns pulled over an expensive pickup truck outside a downtown nightclub. It seemed to him a showy waste to use a small army of officers to make a traffic stop.

Tijuana has always been a major corridor for drug smugglers because it is one of the busiest border crossings in the country. Since the 1990s, the infamous Arellano Félix family has controlled the traffic of cocaine, heroin, marijuana and synthetic drugs, but in recent years the organization has been weakened significantly, law enforcement authorities say.

Federal police commanders acknowledged their job would be difficult in a city of 1.5 million where most of them do not even know the street names, much less the workings of the criminal underworld.

Still, several expressed confidence they would prevail.

“It’s a big city and there are a lot of people here who are crooked,” said Inspector Alejandro Zapata. “But this is not going to end until we put a end to the Arellano Félix organization.”

Armenian Genocide Question Hits Home (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

The former U.S. ambassador's use of the term leaves Congress poised for a battle between pragmatism and principle.

WASHINGTON — Nearly two years ago, John Evans did something no U.S. ambassador to Armenia before him had done: He used the word "genocide" — in public — to describe the deaths of about 1.2 million Armenians at the hands of Ottoman Turks.

It has long been a sore point with Armenian Americans that the U.S. government does not refer to the killings that began in 1915 as genocide, and Evans' use of the word did not signal a change in that policy. It did set off a slow-boiling controversy that eventually cost him his job.

Now, the issue is preparing to boil over again, setting up a clash between the Democratic-controlled Congress and the Republican White House. The dispute has stalled the confirmation of Evans' successor and strained U.S. relations with Turkey, a key U.S. ally in the Middle East.

"Based on what I've seen, this is headed to a confrontation," said a senior Democratic congressional aide. "It's an issue that's a flashpoint of controversy for both parties."

It started at UC Berkeley, in February 2005, soon after Evans took up his ambassadorship.

"I will today call it the Armenian genocide," Evans said, according to a transcript by one of the groups attending the gathering hosted by the university's Armenian studies program.

Evans' comments floored — and pleased — his audience, even though he made it clear that he was articulating a personal view, not U.S. policy.

"I recall being surprised at that moment," said Stephan Astourian, executive director of Berkeley's Armenian Studies program, who organized the session.

Though Armenian Americans and others consider Evans' statement an act of courage for which he has been unfairly punished, policymakers call it a misjudgment that could fuel anti-Western sentiment in Turkey.

Historians have long used the term "genocide" to describe the murderous campaign against the Armenians in Turkey. Nearly the entire population of Armenians was executed, starved or forced into exile on the orders of the ruling Young Turk Party. Outside Turkey, there is little debate over the facts or the use of the word "genocide."

In Turkey, however, official history has long disputed the use of that term. As a result, American officials have used all sorts of others — "mass killing," "massacres," "atrocities," "annihilation" — but have stopped short of "genocide."

DOJ_NMG_0113639

"We have never said it wasn't genocide," explained a senior State Department official, who agreed to discuss formation of U.S. policy in detail on condition he not be further identified. "We just haven't used that word."

State Department officials believe that Turks will come to their own acceptance of the term from internal debate.

"That debate needs to happen, but it needs to be a Turkish debate," the official said. "It has been our view that our position of encouraging that debate — and not allowing Turks an easy out to say, 'This is foreign pressure' — is more effective."

Most Armenian Americans and many members of Congress disagree, arguing that the U.S. government should call the killings "genocide."

In a short interview, his first since leaving the State Department, Evans declined to discuss his motives in making the genocide statement, but said that "it wasn't a slip of the tongue."

"I knew it was not the policy of the United States" to use the word "genocide," Evans said.

"Ninety years is a long time," Evans added, referring to the decades since the genocide began. "At some point you have to call a spade a spade."

In the months after Evans' remark, the State Department made clear its displeasure. By July 2005, "it was absolutely crystal clear" that he would be forced out, he said. Still, it took more than a year more for him to leave.

"Evans was a career foreign service officer, and you do not go after a career foreign service officer lightly," said a second State Department official.

Evans left Armenia in September and formally retired from the State Department last month.

Meanwhile, the American Foreign Service Assn., the organization that represents U.S. foreign service officers, granted Evans its 2005 award for "constructive dissent" by a senior diplomat. But weeks later, the group rescinded the prize, arousing suspicion that the State Department had intervened.

Foreign Service Assn. officials who agreed to discuss the matter said they took back the award after learning that Evans apparently did not first go through internal channels of dissent before publicly stating his views.

"Ambassador Evans' action — admirable as it was — did not fit the category of 'constructive dissent,' " the group said in a statement.

State Department officials said they felt blindsided by Evans' genocide remarks.

The unanswered questions about Evans' departure have stalled the nomination of a successor.

In May, President Bush nominated Ambassador Richard Hoagland, who most recently served as ambassador to Tajikistan. But in September, Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) put a parliamentary hold on Hoagland's nomination, blocking it until the end of the congressional session, when the nomination expired.

Some Armenian Americans took issue with Hoagland, complaining that in written responses to questions from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he was dismissive of the Armenian genocide. Last month, Menendez and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) demanded the administration send over a new nominee.

Bush will have to decide whether to renominate Hoagland. The administration appears to be standing behind him, and complains that he has been turned into a scapegoat over Evans' dismissal.

"Senators can say that our policy on the Armenian massacres is wrong, but it's wrong to punish the president's nominee for adhering to the president's policy," said the senior State Department official, adding that some of Hoagland's opponents had "twisted" his responses on the genocide.

"He's being tarred as a [genocide] denier," said the senior State Department official. "And the only reason it's being done is that they are angry about Evans for the wrong reasons."

Not all Armenian Americans oppose Hoagland's nomination. The Armenian Assembly of America has said that although it opposes administration policy, it would support Hoagland. And the Armenian government has said that policy on the genocide issue should take second place to more immediate problems, including diplomatic relations with Turkey.

The Republic of Armenia became an independent state after the breakup of the Soviet Union in 1991, and today has a population of about 3 million.

To both Democrats and Republicans, support from Armenian Americans is important. There are an estimated 1.4 million Armenian Americans, with the largest population center in Glendale.

In the end, Democrats now in control of Congress may need to decide between pragmatism and principle.

"To the extent that Armenia goes without a U.S. ambassador, that's a bad thing by anyone's standard," said a Democratic staffer involved in the confirmation process. "We're 1,000% supportive of the Armenian community on the genocide issue. But in this case, the [State Department] policy is going to be very tough to change, and I don't think holding up an ambassador is going to get them to change their policy."

Warsaw Archbishop Resigns Amid Scandal (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0113640

AP, January 7, 2007

Warsaw's new archbishop resigned amid a scandal about his cooperation with the communist-era secret police, Poland's Roman Catholic Church said Sunday.

Archbishop Stanislaw Wielgus, who took the office on Friday, has submitted his resignation, Poland's Episcopate said in a statement.

The church said Pope Benedict XVI asked the outgoing archbishop, Cardinal Jozef Glemp, to administer the archdiocese until a replacement is found.

A furor had grown around Wielgus since the allegations were first raised Dec. 20 by a Polish weekly, with demands that he step down from his post.

The church in Poland, a heavily Roman Catholic country, enjoys high esteem for its opposition to the former Communist government. Catholics here revere the late Polish-born Pope John Paul II — credited by some with hastening the regime's fall.

The scandal gained intensity after church officials said Friday that documents at a historical institute indicated Wielgus had willingly collaborated.

Newspapers Friday devoted their front pages to the revelations, even as Wielgus took canonical vows as required by church law ahead of his installation.

"Stop the installation," the daily Dziennik wrote in large bold print on its front page, arguing that to allow a "former agent" to hold a top church post would amount to a "moral scandal."

Wielgus acknowledged Friday that he did have contact with the secret service, but he said that documents indicating he collaborated were written by the secret police and reflected their account of events, not the truth.

The allegations first surfaced in the right-wing Gazeta Polska weekly, two weeks after the Vatican appointed him archbishop of Warsaw. Wielgus initially denied any collaboration.

Wielgus, who had been bishop of Plock since 1999, said Friday that he was leaving his fate in the hands of the pope: "With full humility, I declare to the Holy Father that I will submit to each of his decisions."

The Vatican had named Wielgus to replace Cardinal Jozef Glemp, who stepped down after more than 25 years as archbishop of Warsaw.

DOJ_NMG_0113641

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, January 8, 2007 8:44 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, January 06, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070106.pdf; agnb070106.doc

This morning's Attorney General's News Briefing is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNews' express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Judge Grants Delay In Padilla Mental Exam 4

Homeland Response:

McConnell Seen As Likely To Be Weaker DNI Than Negroponte 4

DHS Boosts Funding For Six Major Metropolitan Areas 4

Hoyer Admits Not All 9/11 Commission Recommendations Will Be Enacted 5

FBI Investigating Death Threat Against California CAIR Leader 5

Hatfill Plans To Use Internal Memos In Suit Against NYTimes 6

Modular Houses Speed Redevelopment Of Gulf Region 6

War News:

In Blunt Letter To Bush, Pelosi And Reid Express Opposition To Iraq Troop Surge 6

Khalilzad's Departure Pleases Shiites, Worries Sunnis 8

Petraeus Selection Seen As "Important Turn" In US Strategy 9

Pace's Future In Doubt 9

Hanging Video Makes Saddam "Martyr" To Many Sunnis 9

Iraqi Forces To Begin Neighborhood-By-Neighborhood Baghdad Mission 10

American, Two Interpreters Abducted Near Basra 10

Insurgents Dodge US Forces In Diyala 10

Eyewitnesses Say Marines Gunned Down "Five Unarmed Iraqis" In Haditha 10

Wilson Claims US Practicing "Catch And Release" Of Al Qaeda In Iraq 10

Biden Says Cheney, Rumsfeld "Had To Know How Bad Things Were." 10

Contractors Allegedly Defraud US Government In Iraq 11

Army To Apologize To Families Of Dead Recipients Of Summonses 11

Marine Survivor Remembers Comrade's Sacrifice 11

Growing Field Of Flags In New York Town Commemorates Fallen Troops 11

Chirac Says France Proven Right On Iraq War 11

Corporate Scandals:

10th Circuit Reverses Convictions Of Two Westar Executives 12

Former Merrill Lynch Analyst Sentenced For Insider Trading Scheme 12

ACS Chair Benefited From Misdated Option 12

More Effective Corporate Governance Urged 13

Criminal Law:

Media Seeks Daily Audio Tapes Of Libby Trial 13

Fraudulent Currency Sales On The Rise 13

Convicted Man Challenges CA Law On Police Killings 13

Documents Provide New Details Of Ney Bribe 14

DOJ "Pushing" FBI To Speed Data Sharing Via OneDOJ Database 14

Judge Imposes Light Sentences In Alabama Corruption Case 14

Judge Reluctantly Grants Pellicano Request To Represent Himself 15

New DC Mayor, Police Chief To Focus On Community Input, Foot Patrols 15

Denver Archdiocese Settles Sex Abuse Suits 15

New Orleans Terrorized By Wave Of Homicides 15

Civil Law:

High Court To Rule On Whistleblower's Suit 16

Former Texas Acute-Care Service Settles Medicare Fraud Suit For $7.5 Million 16

Bankruptcy Judge Approves Delphi Debt Refinancing Plan 16

Civil Rights:

EEOC Says DOJ Wrongly Fired Alabama Prosecutor 17

Indiana Jailers Suspended As FBI Launches Probe Of Inmate Beating 17

Federal Suit Alleges Racial Bias In Falls Church Police Department 17
Man Accused Of Fatal Mississippi Jail Assault Given Videotape 17
North Carolina Man Dies After Police Use Taser To Restrain Him 18
SCOTUS To Hear Coca-Cola's Appeal Of Racial Discrimination Case 18
WPost Troubled By Christian Embassy Pentagon Video 18

Antitrust:

DOJ Asks For More Information On Brooks Automation's Sale Of Software Division 19
Buyout Pair Sees Bargain In McClatchy Purchase 19
Iowa Hospital Declines Merger Offer 19

Environment:

DOJ Drops Probe Of Florida Waste-Water Dumping 19
Ohio Cities Sue Lead Paint Manufacturers 20
ANWR Drilling Ban Introduced In House 20
DuPont Drops Plan To Dump Nerve Gas Wastewaster 20
Reports Identify Five New Mercury Contamination Sites In North America 21
NYTimes Encouraged By Boxer's Pledge To Curb Carbon Dioxide Emissions 21
Navy Urged Not To Harm Whales 21

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Appoints Brink Mississippi SAC 21
Former El Paso SAC Sentenced To Six Months In Prison 21
IG Report Finds DEA Agents Mishandled Seized Cash 22
Federal Agencies Team To Fight Florida Gang Violence 22
FBI Investigating Bomb Left At Louisiana Church, Offers $5000 Reward 22

Immigration:

Gunmen Force National Guard Troops Along Mexican Border To Retreat 22

Congress-Administration:

House Passes Earmark Reform, "Pay-Go" Rules By Wide Margin 23
Democrats Expected To Oppose Making Bush Tax Cuts Permanent 25
Democratic Medicare Bill Lacks Formulary To Pressure Drug Firms 25
Boxer Will Lead Senate Ethics Panel In Johnson's Absence 25
Records Of White House Visitors Not Open To Public 25
Roberts Credited With Making SCOTUS More Accessible To Media 26
White House Seeks "Proven Combatant" For Counsel 26
NYTimes Blasts FDA Over Decision On Cloned Animals 27

Other News:

Jobs Were Created At 2006's Highest Rate In December 27
Biden Expects To Create Exploratory Committee This Month 28
Brownback To Enter Presidential Race On January 20 28
Owens Joins Romney's Senior Advisory Team 28
Giuliani Playbook Offers Self-Assessment Of Potential Liabilities 28
Obama To Address Virginia Democrats Next Month 29
McAuliffe Blasts Kerry In Memoir 29
Candidate For New Hampshire Democratic Chair Withdraws 29
Schwarzenegger Begins Second Term By Claiming Centrist Mantle 29
O'Malley To Tour Maryland In Week Before Inaugural 30
NYTimes Says Spitzer Has Big Ambitions For New York 30
"Embryo Brokerage" Stirs Bioethics Debate 30
Former President Bush Recovering Well From Surgery 30
California Legislators Approve Reagan Bust For Capitol Rotunda 30
Ex-Commerce Secretary Verity Dies At 89 30
WSJournal Says Sheehan Is Democrats' "Problem Now." 30
Ford Remembered On NYTimes Op-Ed Page 31
Rice, South Korea's Song Laud Resumption Of Nuclear Talks, Discount Likelihood Of Test 31
Beijing Asks Tehran To Consider Sanctions, Talks 31
US Diplomat To Be First To Visit Mogadishu In Over A Decade 31
Hamas-Fatah Violence Continues Ahead Of Rice Visit 32
Tanzanian Foreign Minister Will Be Number Two At UN 32
Chinese Fed Raises Reserve Requirements 33
Zimbabwe Offers Long-Term Land Leases To Some White Farmers 33
Warsaw Archbishop Collaborated With Soviet Secret Police 33
Chavez Will Not Renew License Of Venezuela's Largest Television Network 34
Candidates Target Incumbent In Argentine Presidential Race 34
Nuclear Power Said To Enjoy Renaissance Worldwide 34
EU Enlargement Said To Force Retooling Of Attitudes Towards Roma 34
Writer Pans Anti-Islamic European Sentiment 34

DOJ_NMG_0113644

The Big Picture
Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 35

Washington's Schedule
Today's Events In Washington..... 35

DOJ_NMG_0113645

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Grants Delay In Padilla Mental Exam.

The AP (1/6, Anderson) reports from Miami, "A federal judge on Friday gave prison officials another week to complete mental examinations to determine if alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla is competent to stand trial." The AP continues, "Bureau of Prisons officials sought an even longer delay until Jan. 30. They said in court papers that Padilla is not "compliant with psychological testing" and must be observed by staff members to complete the evaluation. The documents provided no further details. … The tests were originally supposed to be completed by Friday." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke insisted that the examinations be finished before the scheduled Jan. 22 trial date so she can rule on a number of other outstanding issues, including Padilla's claim that the case should be dismissed because he was tortured during 3½ years in military custody as an 'enemy combatant.' … 'This court cannot proceed to trial until these motions are adequately resolved,' Cooke said in a two-page order Friday. … Justice Department and Pentagon officials have repeatedly denied the torture allegations." The AP notes, "Cooke gave prisons officials until next Friday to finish the evaluation of Padilla and until Jan. 16 to deliver a competency report to her. Two mental experts hired by defense lawyers have concluded that Padilla suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder and is unable to adequately assist his attorneys. … Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen, is charged along with two others in the U.S. with being part of a support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to violent Islamic extremists around the world. All three have pleaded not guilty. Two others charged in the case are in custody overseas."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

McConnell Seen As Likely To Be Weaker DNI Than Negroponte.

The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Miller, 850K) reports, "The main question surrounding J. Michael McConnell's nomination to be the next intelligence chief is whether he is forceful enough to keep an already ill-defined job from sliding into irrelevancy. When the position of national intelligence director was created two years ago, even lawmakers who drafted legislation that created the job acknowledged that its actual authority is not clear." John Negroponte "spent much of his tenure trying to consolidate his control over the intelligence community. … In turning to McConnell, the White House 'went from Negroponte, who was a pretty significant figure, to a less significant one,' said a senior government official involved in creating the director's post. If McConnell is not able to impose his will on the 16 intelligence agencies that fall under his responsibility, 'it could be the beginning of the end of the DNI's office,' the official said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly." AFP (1/5, Knox) reports President Bush "named a new spy chief and filled a critical diplomatic vacancy as he put the last touches on a retooled Iraq strategy that critics charge may escalate the war." BBC.com (1/5) profiles McConnell.

Roemer Critical Of Negroponte Departure. Ex-Rep. Tim Roemer, who served on the 9/11 Commission, said on Fox News (1/5), "Certainly change can be good and it is needed in Iraq. We need better policy there and we need to make some switches and changes. But musical chairs at this new director of national intelligence is the last thing we need. We have had a vacant number two position when General Mike Hayden left to go to the CIA. And now, with Ambassador Negroponte leaving, we've lost the quarterback who manages and coordinates the intelligence for 16 different agencies. So this kind of destabilizing impact at DNI is the last thing we need."

DHS Boosts Funding For Six Major Metropolitan Areas.

NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 5, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A big change to report tonight in the Department of Homeland Security's formula for giving out millions of dollars in federal money to help this nation's cities defend themselves against future terrorist attacks. That formula has now changed. Many of those cities are saying it is about time." NBC (P. Williams): "In a big change, homeland security says it will commitment in advance over half its urban security -- this picture is worrying about how to protect the most people from the greatest risks most of the time. Six areas, New York, New Jersey, Washington, D.C., Chicago, Houston and L.A. and San Francisco will get 55% of urban area grants."

DOJ_NMG_0113646

The Washington Post (1/6, A6, Hsu, 690K) reports, "Chastened by complaints about poor federal cooperation and by controversy over its slashing of aid to New York and Washington last year, the Department of Homeland Security will reserve about $100 million of the $747 million it will dole out to U.S. cities this year to pay for police counterterrorism operations in six metropolitan areas, officials said yesterday. In announcing changes in style and substance to the Urban Area Security Initiative (UASI) program, Secretary Michael Chertoff cited a 'secretary's prerogative to sometimes inject common sense' to grant calculations based on the risk of terrorism and a subjective rating of the effectiveness of local anti-terrorism programs. … For the first time, DHS designated six high-risk urban areas -- New York and northern New Jersey; the Washington region; Los Angeles-Long Beach; Chicago; the San Francisco Bay area; and Houston." Chertoff "cited the threat of 'homegrown terrorism' in encouraging the funding of law-enforcement-led domestic intelligence 'fusion centers.'" However, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, "said DHS also made 'ill-advised' changes to a $509 million state grant program, down $19 million from last year, by eliminating population density as a factor and changing the minimum amount each state can receive."

Newsday (1/6, Eisenberg) reports Chertoff announced that New York and northern New Jersey "would be considered a single area for homeland security planning" and "denied that linking two states and 15 counties (including Nassau and Suffolk) would mean less money for New York. 'There is nothing about this to suggest New York is going to get a grant cut,' he said. … But not everyone was convinced the process had been sufficiently improved. 'Based on last year's ridiculous allocations, and DHS's indication that once again it will use the peer review process, New Yorkers have every reason to be skeptical,'" said Sen. Charles Schumer. Rep. Peter King, ranking member of the House Homeland Security Committee "and a leading critic of last year's cuts, was…cautiously optimistic." The New York Times (1/6, B2, Lipton, 1.16M) reports New York City "will be able for the first time to use federal grant dollars to pay basic salaries of police officers assigned to counterterrorism tasks, like guarding city bridges and subway tunnels. … New York City officials welcomed the rule change, for which they had lobbied over several years. Previously, while some use of grant dollars was allowed for overtime, federal officials pushed cities to use the money to buy antiterrorism equipment like gas masks or surveillance systems rather than for salaries."

The Houston Chronicle (1/6, A1, Hedges, 530K) reports, "Houston's energy industry and port system are considered prime potential targets for terrorists, officials said, and the area's population size as well as its location relatively close to an international border were also considered by federal officials."

Hoyer Admits Not All 9/11 Commission Recommendations Will Be Enacted. The Washington Times (1/6, A1, Debose, 88K) reports House Democrats "campaigned on a promise to implement the recommendations of the September 11 commission, but now say they will not enact all of them. The recommendation to place all intelligence agencies under the Defense Department 'is not on the table,'" said Majority Leader Steny Hoyer. The Times goes on to report that "another obstacle to enacting all the commission reforms as promised is the formula by which federal anti-terrorism money is distributed across the country. House Democrats are confident they can pass a bill in which funds would be distributed based on risk. … But such a plan almost certainly will be killed in the Democratic-controlled Senate."

FBI Investigating Death Threat Against California CAIR Leader. The AP (1/6, Lawrence) reported, "The FBI said Friday it is investigating a death threat sent to the leader of a local Muslim group after U.S. Sen. Barbara Boxer rescinded a certificate her office had awarded to him. Special Agent Karen Ernst said the bureau launched an investigation after Basim Elkarra reported receiving a threatening e-mail." The AP notes, "Nihad Awad, CAIR's national executive director, thanked the FBI for investigating and urged Boxer to 'examine the agendas of those who seek to marginalize and disenfranchise American Muslims.' Elkarra said the death threat was sent Dec. 30, the day after an article about Boxer rescinding the certificate appeared on Newsweek magazine's Web site. He said he also received another e-mail he described as hate mail when CAIR announced the award."

The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Khalil) reported on Boxer's decision to rescind the certificate, noting that CAIR "has a complicated relationship with federal law enforcement agencies. Former FBI counterterrorism chief Steven Pomerantz once said the council's activities 'effectively give aid to international terrorist groups.' But council representatives say they frequently meet with senior FBI officials, and the group has helped train FBI agents in how to interact with the American Muslim community." The Times added, "The council has responded to Boxer's snub by demanding a meeting with the senator — an option Boxer said she would welcome — and rallying supporters of various faiths."

DOJ_NMG_0113647

Hatfill Plans To Use Internal Memos In Suit Against NYTimes. The New York Times (1/6, A12, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "A lawyer for a former government scientist who is suing The New York Times for defamation over a series of columns about the deadly anthrax mailings of 2001 said Friday in court that he was prepared to introduce an internal e-mail message from a senior Times editor that raised questions about one of the columns. The lawyer, Mark A. Grannis, said the columns written by Nicholas D. Kristof about the federal investigation of the mailings unfairly damaged the reputation of his client, Dr. Stephen A. Hatfill, a former germ warfare scientist. … Mr. Grannis told Judge Claude M. Hilton of Federal District Court here that if the trial proceeded he would introduce evidence including a May 23, 2002, message from Philip Taubman, then deputy editor of the editorial page, raising questions about a draft of a column by Mr. Kristof." The Washington Post (1/6, A6, Markon, 690K) reports, "In the 2002 columns, Kristof criticized the FBI, saying it had failed to aggressively pursue a scientist he first identified as 'Mr. Z.' He wrote that the biodefense community had called Mr. Z a 'likely culprit,' partly because the scientist was familiar with anthrax."

The AP (1/6) reports, "U.S. District Judge Claude Hilton said he will rule on the newspaper's motion soon. The trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 29. … Hilton previously ordered Kristof to disclose his confidential FBI sources so Hatfill could pursue his claim. Kristof refused, and in response Hilton barred Kristof from relying on any information provided by those sources in his defense." The AP notes, "Hatfill's lawsuit was dismissed by Hilton in 2004 but reinstated by a federal appeals court. Hatfill is also suing former Attorney General John Ashcroft, the Justice Department and others in U.S. District Court in Washington claiming they violated Hatfill's civil rights."

Modular Houses Speed Redevelopment Of Gulf Region. The New York Times (1/6, A1, Eaton, 1.16M) reports that before Hurrican katrina modular houses "were almost unknown in Mississippi, where houses tended to be the traditional 'stick built' on site or mobile homes. … But since the storm, modular houses…are starting to appear across the Gulf Coast, as public officials and private citizens search for ways to speed the slow pace of recovery and begin experimenting with new forms of shelter."

WAR NEWS:

In Blunt Letter To Bush, Pelosi And Reid Express Opposition To Iraq Troop Surge. News coverage again focuses on the new Democratic rulers on Capitol Hill, this time focusing on the joint letter from House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid to President Bush stating their opposition to a troop surge in Iraq. ABC World News (1/5, lead story, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "No one knows for sure exactly what the President is going to propose next week, as a new strategy for Iraq. But it would seem a lot of the leaders of Congress don't like what they think he'll say. ... A number of Congressional leaders newly back in Washington are objecting to the idea of a surge, an increase of troops in Iraq." ABC (Raddatz): "Before he has even uttered a word, Democrats are strongly criticizing the plan. In a letter to the President today, top Democratic leaders wrote that 'adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point.'"

NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 4, 2:15, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Democrats wasted little time challenging the President over Iraq, objecting to the expected call for a surge of troops and saying that would be a serious mistake. ... today with the details of a troop surge already public, Democratic leaders shot it down, insisting they should come home in four to six months." The CBS Evening News (1/5, lead story, 3:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) said Pelosi and Reid "wrote that adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point. The President heard the same message when he met with Senators ... But it does not appear the President will take their advice when he outlines his new Iraq strategy next week."

On ABC World News (1/5, story 2, 1:20, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said of Democrats and the surge, "If they can't stop it, they have to make clear where they stand. They're taking aim at the reconstruction and jobs money.

DOJ_NMG_0113648

They're going to take direct aim at that. And they do believe they can cut that back a bit."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/5, Bash) reported, "What Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi are arguing for is something that we have heard also for quite a while, is that troops should not be going into Iraq, rather, they should be coming out. And that they should start a withdrawal at the White House, at the Pentagon, in about four to six months. Now, again, we have heard that message before. But it is something that has a new kind of importance, if you will, given the fact that it's clear now that Congress is going to add some heightened scrutiny to the White House when it comes to Iraq. And it's not just coming from Democrats. Republicans are being a lot more vocal about what they want to see in Iraq, too."

The Washington Post (1/6, A1, Baker, Wright, 690K) reports that Pelosi and Reid "warned President Bush that sending more U.S. troops to Iraq would be unacceptable to the Democratic majorities that have just taken over Congress." While the two top Democrats "sent a signal that the new congressional leadership intends to be aggressive in voicing opposition to Bush's handling of the war," they have "eschewed using the main legislative mechanism to change policy, namely cutting off funding for the war." The New York Times (1/6, A7, Sanger, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports the possibility of "a major confrontation over a new war strategy." Although "not all Democrats" agree with Pelosi and Reid, "the release of the letter suggests that a major political battle may be brewing."

The AP (1/6, Flaherty) reports Republicans are "joining Democrats in raising eyebrows before the president even has a chance to make his case." Sen. Susan Collins and Rep. Heather Wilson are quoted expressing skepticism, and the AP adds that "even Sen. John McCain, a Republican who advocates sending more troops in Iraq, said he wouldn't support sending in the additional forces unless the number was adequate enough to finally tamp down the violence." Wilson appeared on MSNBC (1/5, O'Donnell) to discuss her opposition to a surge, saying, "I don't think we're focusing on America's vital interests. And the soaring rhetoric about making Iraq a point of democracy, a model for others, is far beyond our vital interests."

The Washington Times (1/6, A1, Dinan, 88K) reports that the Pelosi-Reid letter "puts them out in front of Mr. Bush's speech next week, filling the vacuum created as the president works out his new strategy and earning them part of the discussion on the Sunday political talk shows." In other shows of Democrats' "newfound muscle," Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden "announced a schedule of four weeks of hearings to look at U.S. strategy in Iraq, while Sen. Edward M. Kennedy," who heads the "Judiciary Committee's immigration and refugees subcommittee, will hold a hearing on Iraqi refugees."

RollCall.com (1/5, Stanton) reports that in the "sharply worded" letter, Pelosi and Reid "called the plan little more than a retread" of earlier, failed strategies. On its web site, The Hill (1/5, Schor) reports that Reid "said he heeded the words from U.S. commanders in Iraq who also rejected the surge." BBC.com (1/5) calls the Pelosi-Reid letter "an aggressive move from the Democrats, setting the stage for a huge political battle."

Democrats Fear Inability To Stop Surge. The Boston Globe (1/6, Bender, 413K) reports, "Despite taking both houses of Congress on an antiwar platform, party leaders worry they can't do much to stop the president -- short of the politically unpalatable move of ending funding for the war. ... Some congressional aides raised the prospect that lawmakers could place conditions on war funding, such as refusing to pay for additional military brigades. But they doubted such measures would have any effect: As a wartime commander in chief, Bush can simply ignore them." Skepticism of the surge plan "has come from a variety of quarters, including the top military brass."

Gates Reportedly Recommends Surge To Bush. The CBS Evening News (1/5, lead story, 3:15, Martin, 7.66M) reported Defense Secretary Robert Gates "has recommended that President ordered an immediate buildup of 10,000 US troops in Iraq plus an option of doubling that to 20,000 by next spring. The plan is known as 'Five Plus Two' -- five Army brigades into Baghdad, plus two Marine battalions into western Iraq. Two of the Army brigades would go into Baghdad starting in January, with the other three on call. ... It would need to last a year and a half." The CBS Evening News (1/5, story 2, 2:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) additionally reported, "No Americans are more eager to hear the President's new strategy next week then members of the armed forces and their families."

McConnell Says "The President Believes That We Can Win In Iraq." Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/5, Blitzer), "The President is in charge of tactics in the war. I think he knows that the Democrats basically would like to withdraw as rapidly as possible. There are many of the rest of us who think that the strategy ought to be to prevail. … I think our goals still ought to be to prevail there, and to have a stable country that's an ally on the war on terror. And it's also important, Wolf, to remember that we haven't been attacked again here at home for five years. It's not an accident. Being on offense in Afghanistan and Iraq has made a positive difference in protecting America here at home. … I just came from a meeting with the President this afternoon on this subject. I think the President believes that we can win in Iraq. I think he believes the strategy that he's going to be announcing next week is an essential component part of success there. And I think the majority of Republicans in the House and Senate are likely to stick with the President on this very important decision."

DOJ_NMG_0113649

McCain, Lieberman Back Surge. The Financial Times (1/6, Luce) reports Sen. John McCain, "the leading Republican presidential hopeful," endorsed a report by the American Enterprise Institute "neo-conservative think-tank…that many see as the basis for the 'new way forward in Iraq' strategy that George W. Bush will unveil next week. Mr McCain, who shared a platform with Joe Lieberman, the independent Democratic senator and former vice-presidential candidate, said Mr Bush's expected 'surge' of US forces to Iraq should persist until the job of stabilising the security situation has been achieved. ... The two senators strongly rejected the Democratic leadership's call for a timeline for the phased withdrawal of US troops from Iraq, which they said would play into the hands of the insurgent groups and militias which would simply await the expiry of the deadline."

Surge Supporters Urge Avoidance Of Preconditions. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, A1, Spiegel, Reynolds, 850K) reports, "The leading advocates of an increase in U.S. forces in Iraq warned President Bush on Friday that any buildup lasting less than 18 months was doomed to fail, and urged the White House to avoid compromises that would scale back the plan." Senator McCain called a "short, small surge" the "worst of all worlds." However, "Bush faces growing unease about an extended buildup among some congressional Republicans, who are concerned that it could stretch into the 2008 election season and doom their reelection chances. In the Senate, there are about five to 10 such Republicans, according to GOP aides, who are expected to push for time limits or firm conditions in return for backing the increase."

ABC Says Senate Would Oppose War Resolution Today. ABC World News (1/5, story 3, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "ABC's Jake Tapper and our Congressional team wanted to know Senators who voted for the war think now, in hindsight. In October 2002, the vote was 77-23 to authorize war. Now, Jake's tally indicates the vote would flip to 43 in favor and 57 opposed."

Television Commentary On Surge Debate. On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/5), host Dobbs commented on a recent statement by a State Department official that "instead of a surge, it is a bump." Dobbs said, "These are silly word games at a time when we have men and women in uniform being wounded and killed. Is it fair to say, if we may extricate ourselves from the games that are often played there, no matter how serious the issues around the world facing our men and women in uniform, is it fair to say that it's a time for honesty and straightforward discussion of these issues and less of this nonsense and artificial language?"

On MSNBC's Tucker (1/5, Carlson), A.B. Stoddard, associate editor of The Hill, said, "I really think that there's going to be sort of a unified attack from the Democratic side against the surge. I think that these words from Carl Levin, the Armed Services chairman on the Senate side, about being open to a surge with certain conditions, conditions we know Bush is not going to agree to, is just kind of happy talk at this point. I think generally speaking, the Democrats are opposed to surge. And there's opposition building in the Republican Party as well."

The New Republic's Michael Crowley said on MSNBC's Tucker (1/5, Carlson), "I don't really understand what happened with Reid, because I think he had actually previously kind of taken back that statement that he made on a Sunday show a couple of weeks ago. I actually don't think this is a brand-new position for him. He's kind of hinted that he didn't mean that he supported the surge. And I honestly don't know what he meant to say in the first place."

Khalilzad's Departure Pleases Shiites, Worries Sunnis. The Washington Post (1/6, A12, Partlow, 690K) reports, "The news of the expected departure of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad split Iraqi politicians along sectarian lines, with members of the ruling Shiite alliance voicing eagerness for him to leave and minority Sunnis expressing concern at the loss of an ally. Members of the U.S.-backed government in Iraq have grown increasingly frustrated with what they see as Khalilzad's efforts to reach out to Sunni groups, and many argue that the U.S. military confronts Shiite militias more aggressively than it does Sunni insurgents." On the other hand, "Sunni lawmakers said Khalilzad's deep knowledge of Iraq's complex political landscape and his openness to Sunni concerns will be missed. Khalilzad is a Sunni Muslim of Afghan descent."

DOJ_NMG_0113650

The New York Times (1/6, A8, Cooper, 1.16M) says Khalilzad "earned a reputation as a high-flying, independent, smooth operator — an Afghan-born problem solver who worked with two fragile countries recently invaded by the United States to try to cobble together stability." Reviewing his performance in Afghanistan and Iraq, the Times says that in Afghanistan he "became known for his ability to weave through warring tribal factions and his ability to quickly get senior Afghan officials on the phone or to summon them to his office, including President Hamid Karzai." In Iraq, "he failed the task of bringing stability, but succeeded in helping Iraqis to agree on a Constitution. Arriving in Baghdad, he quickly recognized that his marching instructions from Washington -- that Iraq's Constitution should reflect a strong central government with strong control over the country's oil resources -- were not achievable."

Ambassador-Designate Crocker Profiled. The New York Times (1/6, A8, Shane, 1.16M) reports admiringly on US Ambassador to Iraq-designate Ryan Crocker that when he "was trying to improve his Arabic in the late 1970s, he traveled to Jordan, made contact with a desert tribe and settled in for some hands-on training a little different from the standard State Department regimen. 'He wound up being a shepherd for a week or two, chasing down stray sheep and living with the Bedouin,'" said an associate. Crocker has amassed "a record of Middle East and South Asia experience possibly unrivaled in the United States Foreign Service. He has served as ambassador to Lebanon, Kuwait, Syria and, since 2004, Pakistan. He reopened the American Embassy in Afghanistan after the fall of the Taliban. And he knows Iraq well; he worked there in the 1970s, led the State Department's Iraq-Kuwait task force during the Persian Gulf war in 1991 and returned to Baghdad for four months after the 2003 invasion as director of governance for the Coalition Provisional Authority.

Petraeus Selection Seen As "Important Turn" In US Strategy. The New York Times (1/6, A1, Gordon, 1.16M) reports, "The selection of Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus to serve as the senior American commander in Iraq signals an important turn in United States strategy. As a supporter of increased forces in Iraq," Petraeus "is expected to back a rapid five-brigade expansion, in sharp contrast to his predecessor, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who has been openly skeptical that additional troops would help stabilize the country." Petraeus, overseer of the new counterinsurgency manual, "is also likely to change the American military operation in Baghdad. American forces can be expected to take up positions in neighborhoods throughout the capital instead of limiting themselves to conducting patrols from large, fortified bases in and around the city." Under Casey, "the principal focus has been on transferring security responsibilities to the Iraqi security forces, so American troops could gradually withdraw. Now, the emphasis will shift to protecting the Iraqi population from sectarian strife and insurgent attacks."

On the CBS Evening News (1/5, lead story, 3:15, 7.66M), David Martin reported more critically of Petraeus, "The new commander in Iraq" is "perhaps the most controversial officer in the Army because of his type A personality and what many view as his too-cozy relationship with the media."

Pace's Future In Doubt. The Washington Times (1/6, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "With President Bush replacing his two top field generals for Iraq, speculation has arisen in the Pentagon about the long-term future of his principal military adviser, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace." A White House spokesman "said yesterday he does not know the president's plans regarding Gen. Pace."

Hanging Video Makes Saddam "Martyr" To Many Sunnis. The New York Times (1/6, Fattah, 1.16M) reports on its front page, "In the week since Saddam Hussein was hanged in an execution steeped in sectarian overtones, his public image in the Arab world, formerly that of a convicted dictator, has undergone a resurgence of admiration and awe. On the streets, in newspapers and over the Internet, Mr. Hussein has emerged as a Sunni Arab hero who stood calm and composed as his Shiite executioners tormented and abused him. ... By standing up to the United States and its client government in Baghdad and dying with seeming dignity, Mr. Hussein appears to have been virtually cleansed of his past. … Many across the region began looking at him as a martyr."

DOJ_NMG_0113651

Iraqi Forces To Begin Neighborhood-By-Neighborhood Baghdad Mission. The AP (1/6, Hurst, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "Iraqi forces backed by U.S. troops will begin a neighborhood-by-neighborhood assault on militants in the capital this weekend as a first step in the new White House strategy to contain Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads," according to key advisers to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

American, Two Interpreters Abducted Near Basra. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Moore, 850K) reports, "A U.S. civilian contractor and two Iraqi interpreters were kidnapped Friday near the southern city of Basra, Iraqi police officials said. Police Col. Kareem Azaidi in Basra said witnesses saw gunmen in a civilian car, a pickup and two police vehicles cut off the captives' car and take them hostage." A US Embassy spokesman did not identify the victims; "the fate of the American contractor was unknown, but the two Iraqis were later found dead, the Associated Press reported."

Insurgents Dodge US Forces In Diyala. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Zavis, 850K) reports, "Time and again, U.S. forces in Iraq have staged major assaults on known insurgent hide-outs only to have key individuals melt away. As with other operations, the military is attempting to dislodge insurgents from their hiding places in Diyala province, then sweep them into known escape routes where they can be intercepted. But the area's sunken irrigation canals, vast agricultural fields, seldom-traveled back roads and widely scattered hamlets have given guerrillas innumerable ways to avoid capture." Officials say the rebels "use spotters, infiltrators in Iraqi security forces and contacts on or near U.S. bases to stay abreast of American troop movements." Insurgents rarely stage "platoon-sized attacks," preferring to "hit and run. ... After the U.S. eventually withdraws, the insurgents often return."

Eyewitnesses Say Marines Gunned Down "Five Unarmed Iraqis" In Haditha. The Washington Post (1/6, A1, White, 690K) reports, "U.S. Marines gunned down five unarmed Iraqis who stumbled onto the scene of a 2005 roadside bombing in Haditha, Iraq, according to eyewitness accounts that are part of a lengthy investigative report obtained by The Washington Post. Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, the squad's leader, shot the men one by one after Marines ordered them out of a white taxi in the moments following the explosion, which killed one Marine and injured two others, witnesses told investigators. Another Marine fired rounds into their bodies as they lay on the ground. ... The report, which relied on hundreds of interviews with Marines, Iraqi soldiers and civilian survivors conducted months after the incident, presents a fragmented and sometimes conflicting chronicle of the violence that day. But taken together, the accounts provide evidence that as the Marines came under attack, they responded in ways that are difficult to reconcile with their rules of engagement."

Wilson Claims US Practicing "Catch And Release" Of Al Qaeda In Iraq. CNN.com (1/5) reports, "The U.S. military already knows what half of its most-wanted terrorist targets look like because they have been apprehended and photographed in the past, a Republican congresswoman said Friday." Rep. Heather Wilson said a "senior official told her that the U.S. military already has photographs of 'fully half of the high-value al Qaeda targets in Iraq' presently being hunted. 'They're wearing orange jumpsuits in the mugshots we took of them when we captured them the first time,' Wilson recalled the official telling her. 'We are operating a catch and release program for al Qaeda in Iraq. This is inexcusable and frustrating ... for the young men and women in the military who are in the fight,' she added."

Biden Says Cheney, Rumsfeld "Had To Know How Bad Things Were." Sen. Joseph Biden said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/5, Blitzer), "I start with the premise that Vice President Cheney and Secretary Rumsfeld are very smart guys. I've known them and worked around them and with them for the last 30 years. They're very bright. I could not believe…that the last three years they actually thought we were making progress. I could not believe the assertions about them saying we've trained up Iraqis and we're doing so well, that they actually believed. And so I've reached the conclusion that they had to know how bad things were, but they had to have reached one of two conclusions: either the radical change necessary in order to get this back on the right path was something they weren't willing to recommend, or two, they concluded that the best thing to do is keep this stitched together and hand it off to the next president."

DOJ_NMG_0113652

Contractors Allegedly Defraud US Government In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (1/5, story 5, 3:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The US government has spent a fortune in Iraq. At least $437 billion so far, according to Congress, and up to $100 billion more will be spent this year. Much of it goes to 60,000 civilian contractors involved in reconstruction and providing services to our troops. But the Pentagon recently admitted it has a hard time accounting for how that money is being spent and the billions that may be lost to waste and fraud." CBS (Keteyian): "This document, part of a whistle- blower lawsuit obtained by CBS News, alleges a blueprint of contractor abuse in Iraq, detailing how the government was billed ten times more than it should have been when US troops used a recreation facility in Iraq. ... The contractor in question, Kellogg, Brown and Root, denies any wrongdoing." Sen. Patrick Leahy: "We're talking about huge amounts of money. And eventually, we're going to have a bill for about $1 trillion over there, and people aren't going to be able to account for very, very large amounts of it."

Army To Apologize To Families Of Dead Recipients Of Summonses. The AP (1/5) reports, "The Army said Friday it would apologize to the families of about 275 officers killed or wounded in action who were mistakenly sent letters urging them to return to active duty. The letters were sent a few days after Christmas to more than 5,100 Army officers who had recently left the service. Included were letters to about 75 officers killed in action and about 200 wounded in action. ... The Army did not say how or when the mistake was discovered. It said the database normally used for such correspondence with former officers had been 'thoroughly reviewed' to remove the names of wounded or dead soldiers."

Marine Survivor Remembers Comrade's Sacrifice. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, Phillips, 2.04M) has a front-page feature on former USMC Cpl. Kelly Miller, who lived because the late Cpl. Jason Dunham "intentionally took the brunt of a live grenade and gave his own life to save Cpl. Miller's." Miller's survivor's guilt is described. The Journal adds, "At the White House on Thursday, President Bush will present Cpl. Dunham's parents with the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest award for military valor, the first such award for a Marine since Vietnam. ... In the audience will sit Cpl. Miller, a 23-year-old still struggling with what it means to receive that much love."

Growing Field Of Flags In New York Town Commemorates Fallen Troops. The New York Times (1/6, B1, Santos, 1.16M) reports from Middle Grove, New York., "From afar, the flags look like clumsily painted dots, an amateur installation of elusive meaning. A closer look yields a clue: a laminated sign with bold black numbers that match the number of flags on the field, numbers that climb almost by the day. On Sunday, there were 3,000 yellow flags on the ground. By Thursday, five more." Caren Crootof "makes the flags, cutting the plastic with scissors at her kitchen table. ... The field of flags is at once poignant and terrifying, plain yet powerful for those who have taken notice in this out-of-the-way town of 2,300 in northeastern New York State."

Many Fallen Troops Came From Small Towns. The Financial Times (1/6, Luce) writes, "Every night at the end of Jim Lehrer's NewsHour on America's PBS channel, there is a roll call of American soldiers who died in Iraq that day. ... Obscure towns such as Hollidaysburg, Pennsylvania, Wolfeboro Falls, New Hampshire and Thermopolis, Wyoming, dominate the listings rather than the big cities." A "breakdown of their ethnicity and states of origins shows they are overwhelmingly white and from small towns in the interior states of mid-America and the south."

Chirac Says France Proven Right On Iraq War. The New York Times (1/6, A7, Sciolino, 1.16M) reports, "In a scathing attack of the American-led war in Iraq, President Jacques Chirac said Friday that his predictions that the war would spread chaos and more terrorism had come true. 'As France had foreseen and feared, the war in Iraq has sparked upheavals that have yet to show their full effects,' Mr. Chirac said ... The single paragraph on Iraq in a speech that addressed many crises and problems around the world was one of Mr. Chirac's most pointed justifications for France's decision to oppose the invasion of Iraq in 2003." The message was "surprising" because "the 74-year-old French president tended to avoid reminding the United States of its failures there." However, "as Mr. Chirac seems unlikely to run for a third term in presidential elections this spring, he may feel he has little to lose in being blunt in defending what some French political analysts call the high point of his foreign policy in his 12-year presidency."

DOJ_NMG_0113653

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

10th Circuit Reverses Convictions Of Two Westar Executives. The AP (1/6, Press) reports from Kansas City, MO, "An appeals court on Friday overturned convictions against two former executives of Westar Energy who were accused of 'looting' the Kansas utility and said the most serious charges cannot be retried." The AP continues, "The United States Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit said the case against the former chief executive, David Wittig, and the former chief strategy officer, Douglas Lake, 'hung by a thin legal thread,' based on claims that the men tried to hide their personal use of corporate aircraft from securities officials. … Those claims led jurors in September 2005 to convict Mr. Wittig on 39 counts of conspiracy, wire fraud, money laundering and circumventing of internal controls, and to convict Mr. Lake on 30 counts. Mr. Wittig was sentenced in April 2006 to 18 years; Mr. Lake received 15 years. … But the three-judge panel said prosecutors did not provide evidence that the two men failed to comply with federal regulations." The AP adds, "Without that evidence, the court said, Mr. Wittig and Mr. Lake are not guilty of wire fraud and cannot be retried on those counts. In addition, the panel threw out the money laundering counts, which were based on the wire fraud, and said those cannot be retried. The court sent back the remaining conspiracy and circumvention counts for trial. … The decision was a blow to federal prosecutors, who have now failed twice to convict the two men. Their first trial ended in a mistrial."

Former Merrill Lynch Analyst Sentenced For Insider Trading Scheme. The AP (1/6, Neumeister) reports, "A former analyst at Merrill Lynch & Co. Inc. who pleaded guilty to insider trading was sentenced Friday to 37 months in prison for his part in a sprawling scheme that used chatty investment bankers and leaked copies of a market-moving magazine." The AP continues, "Stanislav Shpigelman, 24, had admitted tipping other participants who made more than $6.7 million from October 2004 to August 2005. At the time, he worked in Merrill Lynch's mergers and acquisitions division." The AP adds, "In a plea deal he signed with prosecutors, Shpigelman admitted to a single count of conspiracy to commit insider trading in return for a recommendation that he serve between three and four years in prison. .. His lawyer, Mary Mulligan, and family members asked U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Karas to sentence Shpigelman to less than three years in prison." The AP notes, "Karas, though, called Shpigelman the 'critical component' in a scheme that could make others millions of dollars, though Shpigelman conceded receiving only $10,000 for providing tips to several mergers and acquisitions."

The New York Post (1/6, Whitman) reported, "Judge Karas said he imposed the jail term with a 'heavy heart' because Shpigelman had one of the most supportive families he had ever come across. But the judge added that the stiff sentence was necessary to send a strong signal to other young bankers on Wall Street." The Post noted, "Investigators were tipped off to the trading ring in late 2005, when the FBI got word of a suspicious trade ahead of news that Reebok was being acquired." The New York Daily News (1/6, Zambito) and Bloomberg (1/6, Glovin) also reported on Shpigelman's sentencing.

ACS Chair Benefited From Misdated Option. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A2, Bandler) reports, "Affiliated Computer Services Inc. for the first time said its chairman, Darwin Deason, benefited from a wrongly dated stock option, adding that a portion of the 2002 award would be repriced to cut its potential value by $655,000. … But the company said the repricing is being done for tax reasons, and repeated its earlier insistence that an internal probe didn't find evidence that Mr. Deason's 2002 option grant had been improperly backdated." The Journal continues, "The Dallas-based technology outsourcing concern forced its chief executive and top finance official to resign their posts in November, after the internal investigation uncovered rampant backdating. … In a filing late Friday, the company detailed a series of past option grants to Mr. Deason and other top officials that it is repricing to avoid having individual executives suffer tax penalties associated with mispriced option grants. Except for the 2002 grant received by Mr. Deason and several others, the company didn't say whether the particular grants being repriced were backdated, or merely carried incorrect dates because final approval hadn't yet occurred." The Journal adds, "In Mr. Deason's case, the fortunately timed 2002 grant came at the bottom of a steep trough, on a late July date when the stock hit a quarterly low. The company said yesterday its internal probe found 'evidence, though inconclusive' that there had been an 'informal' selection of that date for Mr. Deason's grant. But formal approval, it said, didn't occur until five days later, when the stock had risen 5%.

DOJ_NMG_0113654

… Repricing the entire grant of 600,000 shares would have wiped $1.1 million from its potential value. ACS repriced only a portion of the award to the higher exercise price, because there is no tax penalty associated with already vested options. The company has already repriced all options for individuals found to have engaged in misconduct."

More Effective Corporate Governance Urged. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/6, A6), Lucien Bebchuk, director of Harvard Law School's Program on Corporate Governance, writes, "Apple Computer announced a week ago the conclusions of a special board committee that examined the 'improper dating' of over 6,000 option grants during 1997-2002. The committee found no basis for having less than 'complete confidence in [CEO] Steve Jobs and the senior management team,' placing full responsibility for past problems on the company's former CFO and general counsel. But the company's report fails to dispel concerns about Apple's governance. … In reviewing past grant awards, the report discusses separately grants awarded to directors and to Mr. Jobs, but it lumps grants to senior managers other than Jobs together with all other grants. The company is surprisingly silent on whether any of these senior managers received 'improperly dated' grants." Bebchuk continues, "Steve Jobs's great accomplishments have well earned him a place in the pantheon of high-tech leaders and visionaries. And Apple's senior management has undoubtedly done very well for shareholders during the past several years. All of this, however, clearly does not compel the conclusion that Apple's governance has performed adequately with respect to option grants. And the company's report falls far short of providing a basis for accepting such a conclusion." Bebchuk adds, "CEO lucky grants were more common when the board lacked a majority of independent directors. In contrast to claims that gains from backdated grants served as an efficient substitute for other forms of compensation, CEOs getting lucky grants received more, not less, total reported compensation. Lucky grants to outside directors were more common in firms with entrenching arrangements that protect incumbents from removal. And outside directors' luck was correlated with CEO luck. … For corporate America to improve its governance going forward, boards should face up to -- and fully share with shareholders -- past governance problems in their companies."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Media Seeks Daily Audio Tapes Of Libby Trial. The AP (1/5) reports, "Fifteen news organizations and five other groups are asking a federal judge to release audio recordings each day" in the upcoming trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff. The request states, "Most of the key witnesses are public figures who regularly appear in the media. … Knowledge that their testimony might be released on audiotapes will not make them feel awkward or uncomfortable, and certainly no more so than testifying in front of a courtroom filled with reporters."

Fraudulent Currency Sales On The Rise. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, B1, Slater) reports, "Cashing in on the volatile world of buying and selling currencies just became riskier. … Scam artists are increasingly using currency-trading schemes to ensnare even experienced investors, regulators say. The scams take many forms, soliciting individuals over the telephone or wooing them at hotel presentations." The Journal continues, "One widespread scheme promises investors fat profits if they jump in on a time-sensitive opportunity to trade currencies. The money then disappears or gets eaten up in unprofitable trades. … Such frauds exploit a growing awareness among the investing public that the global foreign-exchange market -- worth roughly $2 trillion a day -- is an important financial arena. They also benefit from a legal loophole: Not all of the people who solicit investors to trade currencies are regulated, making them difficult to monitor." The Journal adds, "Over the past five years, more than 25,000 investors have been burned by these frauds, which employ a variety of tactics to lure individuals. Some firms set up booths at investor fairs or rely on printed brochures or pitches over the telephone. Other schemes target particular ethnic groups or spread by word of mouth. … The scams tap into an increasing curiosity among individuals about the world of currencies, long the domain of banks, companies, and other institutions."

Convicted Man Challenges CA Law On Police Killings. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/6, B-1, Egelko) reports, "The lawyer for the man convicted of second-degree murder for killing San Francisco police Officer Isaac Espinoza said Friday he will ask the sentencing judge to declare unconstitutional a state law requiring his 23-year-old client to spend the rest of his life in prison." The Chronicle continues, "The law may violate the right to equal protection because it punishes second-degree murder of a police officer more severely than first-degree murder of someone who isn't an officer, said Martin Sabelli, attorney for defendant David Hill. … District Attorney Kamala Harris disagreed, saying it was both legal and just that 'this defendant should die in prison.'" The Chronicle adds, "A San Francisco jury convicted Hill on Thursday of shooting Espinoza to death in April 2004. The 29-year-old officer, an eight-year police veteran, and his partner, Barry Parker, both in plainclothes, stepped out of their unmarked car on Newhall Street in the Bayview district and ordered Hill to stop because they thought he might be concealing a weapon, according to Parker's testimony. … The defense argued that Hill thought he was being threatened by rival gang members when he opened fire, killing Espinoza and wounding Parker. But jurors found that Hill had known both men were officers, though they acquitted him of premeditated first-degree murder. … Second-degree murder, a killing that is deliberate but not premeditated or planned in advance, is normally punishable by 15 years to life in prison, or 20 to life if a gun is used. But the sentence is longer if the defendant knew, or should have known, that the victim was an on-duty law enforcement officer."

DOJ_NMG_0113655

Documents Provide New Details Of Ney Bribe. The Miami Herald (1/6, Weaver) reports, "One-time powerful lobbyist Jack Abramoff gave a $10,000 campaign bribe to an Ohio congressman for his public words of praise for Abramoff's business partner in the purchase of a South Florida fleet of gambling ships more than six years ago." The Herald continues, "Specific details of the political bribe linked to the SunCruz Casinos sale were disclosed for the first time this week in court papers filed by Justice Department lawyers for the upcoming sentencing of convicted former Republican Congressman Bob Ney." The Herald adds, "Ney, 52, pleaded guilty to corruption charges in October and faces sentencing in Washington on Jan. 19. He's trying to downplay the scope of the corruption conspiracy in hopes of receiving a two-year prison sentence. Prosecutors counter that he should be imprisoned for at least two years and three months. … Abramoff, who is at the center of the ongoing corruption investigation in Washington, turned himself in last November to serve about six years in prison for lying to lenders to obtain a $60 million bank loan to buy the SunCruz fleet, based in Dania Beach. … Abramoff and his SunCruz business partner, Adam Kidan of New York, who is serving the same prison sentence, used that money to buy the gambling fleet for $147 million from Fort Lauderdale tycoon Konstantinos 'Gus' Boulis in fall 2000. … Boulis would be slain months later, but Abramoff and Kidan have not been implicated in any way in that case. .. .The SunCruz case against Abramoff and Kidan gave Justice Department officials the leverage to pressure Abramoff to turn on other colleagues, congressional aides and politicians last year."

DOJ "Pushing" FBI To Speed Data Sharing Via OneDOJ Database. Computerworld (1/6, Weiss) reported, "The U.S. Department of Justice is pushing the FBI and its other operating units to speed up and expand their efforts to share a wide array of information with outside law enforcement agencies via a centralized database called OneDOJ." Computerworld noted, "The plan to expand the use of OneDOJ…has raised the hackles of some privacy and civil rights advocates, who said last week that the DOJ will need to work hard to ensure that the increased information sharing doesn't infringe on the rights of law-abiding Americans. … OneDOJ is 'far more than just bringing together all the information they have,' said Barry Steinhardt, director of the technology and liberty program at the American Civil Liberties Union. … One problem, Steinhardt added, is that the DOJ, and the FBI in particular, have been 'notoriously inept at managing [their] computing resources.'"

Judge Imposes Light Sentences In Alabama Corruption Case. The Mobile Press-Register (1/6, Kirby) reported real estate investor Ken Wall "escaped a lengthy prison sentence Friday for his role in a wide-ranging corruption case in Orange Beach," and former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo's wife "avoided prison altogether." US District Judge Kristi DuBose "sentenced Wall to a year and a day in prison -- less than the minimum recommended by advisory guidelines -- and fined him $250,000. DuBose sentenced Russo's wife, Crystal Russo, to 180 days of home confinement and two years' probation for obstruction of justice. As part of a plea bargain in September, she admitted that she helped her husband try to hide money that prosecutors had targeted for forfeiture. Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Butler objected to the 'insufficiency' of Wall's sentence and indicated prosecutors might appeal."

Former City Councilman Pleads Guilty To Ethics Law Violations. The AP (1/6) reportedm, "Former Orange

DOJ_NMG_0113656

Beach City Councilman Joseph F. McCarron Jr. pleaded guilty Friday to 15 misdemeanor ethics law violations related to his votes on construction projects in the Alabama Gulf Coast resort. McCarron has agreed to testify in the state prosecution of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo and former city attorney Larry Sutley, Attorney General Troy King said in a statement announcing the guilty plea. As part of McCarron's plea agreement, he has committed to pay fines of $2,000 for each of the 15 counts, King said." The AP noted, "Russo is charged in two state indictments with accepting bribes while in office in exchange for supporting construction projects."

Judge Reluctantly Grants Pellicano Request To Represent Himself. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Spano) reports, "Tossing a legal hand grenade into an already-contentious case, celebrity sleuth Anthony Pellicano on Friday demanded and won the right to act as his own lawyer in his upcoming trial on wiretapping and racketeering charges. U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer tried to talk Pellicano out of his plan, but he would not relent. … The specter of an untrained self-advocate in a complex, high-profile case raised sharp concerns among some court observers." The Times noted, "Half a dozen defendants have pleaded guilty in the broad Pellicano investigation, including a Hollywood filmmaker and a former record executive, both of whom admitted lying to the FBI about hiring Pellicano to wire-tap rivals."

New DC Mayor, Police Chief To Focus On Community Input, Foot Patrols. The Washington Post (1/6, B1, Klein) reports, "D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty and Acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier yesterday outlined a new crime-fighting strategy that calls for customized actions to address safety needs in each region of the city." The Post continues, "Officers in each of the city's 46 police service areas will meet with residents and elected officials in coming weeks and create initiatives that will be launched in March, Lanier said. At her urging, patrol commanders have started programs, including one that has officers adopting specific neighborhood blocks or parks where they will personally keep track of any emerging concerns. … 'Our overriding goal is to reduce crime and the fear of crime in every neighborhood,' said Lanier, who last week succeeded Charles H. Ramsey as chief. She has the job on an acting basis pending confirmation from the D.C. Council." The Post adds, "Fenty and Lanier have emphasized increased officer visibility and foot patrols. The city plans to add 100 officers to the 3,800-member department, and Lanier has said patrols will be her priority. She envisions a force that goes beyond reacting to crimes by building and sustaining safe neighborhoods. … The new mayor and chief outlined their plans at a news conference yesterday -- the second day in a row that Fenty has promoted his early agenda."

Denver Archdiocese Settles Sex Abuse Suits. The Denver Post (1/6, Gorski) reports, "The Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Denver has settled clergy abuse lawsuits with 15 plaintiffs for a total of $1.58 million, the law firm representing the litigants said today. … 'We are pleased with the settlements,' said Adam Horowitz, an attorney in the Miami law firm Herman and Mermelstein. 'Any time can give a client an opportunity to resolve something at an early stage, that's a good thing for the client.'" The Post continues, "In a statement, Archbishop Charles Chaput said he was grateful to those who had worked to achieve the settlement. 'I sincerely hope that each of the..individuals who participated begin to truly heal,' he said." The Post adds, "Last year, Chaput announced the 24-county northern Colorado diocese had hired mediator Richard Dana, a former federal judge, in an effort to reach settlements with plaintiffs who had sued the archdiocese for clergy sex abuse. … The settlements announced today do not mean the clergy abuse scandal that hit the Denver archdiocese starting in 2004 is resolved, however. At least 20 lawsuits are still pending in Denver District Court. … Today Chaput appealed to those who have yet to settle, asking that they continue to work with the mediation outreach panel, and making himself available to talk with them personally."

New Orleans Terrorized By Wave Of Homicides. NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 8, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The front page headline this morning in the New Orleans paper may tell the whole sad story best: 'Killings Bring The City To Its Bloody Knees.' It is about a new wave of killings that the newspaper describes as unusual even by New Orleans standards." The New York Times (1/6, A11, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports, "A surge in murders since the new year has residents on edge and has raised new fears that officials here remain helpless to contain a lethal combination of guns, drugs and jobless young men. … Eight people have been found dead since Jan. 1, seven of them shooting victims." The Washington Post/AP (1/6, A2, McConnaughey) reports police spokeswoman Bambi Hall "said that, after 19 killings in October and another 19 in November, December's total was 15. There were 161 homicides in the city in 2006. New Orleans's murder rate was seven to 10 times the national average for cities of its size in 2005, the latest period for which complete data are available."

DOJ_NMG_0113657

CIVIL LAW:

High Court To Rule On Whistleblower's Suit. The AP (1/6, Press) reports, "After 17 years, James Stone has perhaps a few more months to wait before he learns whether he will collect up to $1 million for exposing fraud by a government contractor at a now-closed nuclear weapons plant." The AP continues, "A court ordered Rockwell International, now part of aerospace giant Boeing Co., to pay the government nearly $4.2 million for fraud connected with environmental cleanup at the Rocky Flats plant northwest of Denver. Stone, a former employee at the facility, could be entitled to as much as one-quarter of the payment under the federal False Claims Act." The AP adds, "The 81-year-old retired engineer filed his whistle-blower lawsuit in 1989, the year Rocky Flats shut its operations after nearly 40 years of production. He has survived legal challenges by Rockwell to dismiss the claim or deprive him of his share. The government joined the suit as Stone's partner 10 years ago. … The Supreme Court now has the case. The ruling could affect an anticipated crush of fraud suits if the high court makes it harder for whistle-blowers to share in the proceeds." The AP notes, "The Bush administration is on Stone's side even though the government collects more money if Rockwell wins. … 'It might be natural for the court to wonder why would it be in the government's interest to advocate that a share of the money damages in this case should be given to a private party,' Justice Department lawyer Malcolm Stewart told the justices during the oral argument in early December. 'In our view, Stone is precisely the type of relator that Congress intended to encourage.' A relator is an individual who sues under the False Claims Act."

Former Texas Acute-Care Service Settles Medicare Fraud Suit For $7.5 Million. The Houston Chronicle (1/6, Villafranca) reports, "A former long-term acute-care service based in Dallas has paid the federal government $7.5 million to settle allegations of fraudulent Medicare claims, the U.S. Department of Justice announced on Friday." The Chronicle continues, "The settlement resolves a civil lawsuit filed in 1999 by four former employees and an independent contractor who worked for SCCI Houston, a 40-bed long-term acute-care hospital. … SCCI Houston was part of SCCI Health Services Corp., which operated six acute-care facilities in Texas and others outside the state." The Chronicle adds, "The lawsuit was filed under whistleblower provisions of the False Claims Act, which authorizes private individuals to file lawsuits on behalf of the United States. … The government filed its own complaint in March 2003. … The allegations claim that from 1996 to 1999, SCCI entered into illegal financial relationships with three physicians and paid the doctors in violation of self-referral statutes, and submitted or caused false claims to be submitted to the Medicare program. … SCCI Corp. was acquired by Triumph HealthCare in 2005. None of the whistleblowers nor any SCCI employees involved in the fraud were part of the acquisition, said Tanya Snodgrass, vice president of professional relations for Triumph HealthCare. … Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said the whistleblowers, Daryl Kaczymarczyk, Patricia Rocha, Michelle Pate, Michael Brigle and Theresa Taylor, shared $1.7 million of the settlement."

Bankruptcy Judge Approves Delphi Debt Refinancing Plan. The AP (1/6, Tong) reports, "A federal bankruptcy judge on Friday approved a plan by auto parts maker Delphi Corp. to borrow $4.5 billion to refinance debt and lower its monthly interest expenses." The AP continues, "Lawyers for Troy, Mich.-based Delphi said the refinancing, expected to close next week, would save the company $8 million a month. … The debt refinancing proposal was announced on Dec. 18, along with a plan by private equity investors to buy shares worth up to $3.4 billion in a reorganized Delphi." The AP adds, "Delphi lawyers say that the debt and share purchase plans represent 'significant milestones in the debtor's reorganization and another major step forward towards emergence.' … Judge Robert Drain, who approved the debt refinancing proposal on Friday, will consider the equity purchase plan next Thursday. … The company said it will also seek an extension of the deadline for filing its reorganization plan at a hearing next Friday. If approved, the company would have until July 31 to file its plan and Sept. 30 to solicit acceptances."

DOJ_NMG_0113658

CIVIL RIGHTS:

EEOC Says DOJ Wrongly Fired Alabama Prosecutor. The Birmingham News (AL) (1/6, Walton) reports, "The federal government has ruled that U.S. Attorney Alice Martin wrongly fired a former assistant prosecutor in 2002." The News continues, "Martin fired Assistant U.S. Attorney Deirdra Brown-Fleming on grounds that she was 'not a team player.' The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission found the reason was 'simply unworthy of credence.' Instead, the EEOC found that Brown-Fleming's firing was retaliatory." The News adds, "The EEOC said it is unclear whether Martin harbored a racist or sexist attitude toward Brown-Fleming, but found that Martin's assessment of Brown-Fleming's relationship with co-workers was tainted with the racist and sexist prejudices of Brown-Fleming's co-workers. … Brown-Fleming was described as rude and condescending, documents show." The News notes, "The EEOC is requiring that the Department of Justice reinstate Brown-Fleming to her former job, with full back pay and other benefits. The amount of back pay was not announced. The commission also ordered the reinstatement of Brown-Fleming's former supervisor, Victor Conrad, who took steps to correct acts of racial hostility against Brown-Fleming and filed his own discrimination claim against the agency. He also is to be reinstated with back pay. … Brown-Fleming worked in the U.S. attorney's Huntsville office from 1998 until her May 2002 firing. Martin serves as U.S. attorney for the 31 northern counties and has offices in Birmingham and Huntsville."

Indiana Jailers Suspended As FBI Launches Probe Of Inmate Beating. The Chicago Tribune (1/6, Fitzsimmons) reported, "Six guards at the Lake County Jail in Indiana were suspended Friday while local and federal officials investigate allegations that an inmate was beaten, officials said. Lake County Sheriff Roy Dominguez said he believes a cover-up took place over the incident, which occurred Dec. 26. … The inmate, Tommy Ford, 40, lashed out verbally and physically at guards who were escorting him to see a visitor, according to an incident report filed later that day. In their report, the guards said Ford 'was taken to the ground' and restrained after he struck one officer in the forehead and spit on another." The Tribune noted, "The FBI is conducting a civil rights investigation of the alleged beating, said FBI spokesman Drew Northern. It is being handled as a 'color of law' case, which looks into abuses of authority, he said."

The Northwest Times (1/6, Guinane) reported Dominguez "said the officers will remain suspended pending investigations by the sheriff's department and possibly the FBI. 'The allegations are very serious, and I intend to pursue them in an objective, timely and professional manner,' Dominguez said. 'The victim was assaulted and was taken to the hospital, treated and days later released.'" Ford "is contemplating a civil lawsuit against the county, the sheriff's department and the individual officers, said Joann Price, an attorney with the Gary firm of Freeman-Wilson & Lewis-Shannon LLC." The AP (1/6) noted Dominguez "said he personally requested that the FBI investigate the attack. 'They will conduct an independent investigation,' he said. 'I want to assure members of the public that no stone will go unturned.'"

Federal Suit Alleges Racial Bias In Falls Church Police Department. The Washington Post (1/6, B5, Jackman) reports, "Three black officers and one black civilian employee of the Falls Church Police Department have filed a federal civil rights suit against the city, claiming racial discrimination in the department's pay and promotion practices and a hostile work environment for black employees." The Post continues, "One officer alleged that a captain told her last year, 'Do you know why the boundaries of Falls Church are 2.2 square miles? To keep the black people out.' And the civilian employee, who heads the police dispatch center, said that white commanders 'purposefully ignore calls from minority officers for help when on patrol' but do respond when requested by white officers." The Post adds, "The suit, filed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, adds another layer to the turmoil that has roiled the department since its officers union began complaining about internal problems in 2004. The union said that officers were evaluated on how many traffic tickets they wrote and that their weapons were faulty. … Over the summer, then-Chief Robert T. Murray fired the union president, Scott Rhodes. Last month, after the city was forced to rehire Rhodes, pay him a settlement and allow him to retire with full benefits, Murray retired. The city is searching for a new chief."

Man Accused Of Fatal Mississippi Jail Assault Given Videotape. The Biloxi Sun Herald (1/6, Fitzgerald) reports from Gulfport, MS, "Attorneys for Ryan Teel have received a copy of videotaped images of the Feb.

DOJ_NMG_0113659

4, 2006, assault on Harrison County jail inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr." The Herald continues, "The tape, however, may not be enough for defense attorneys to persuade a federal review panel against seeking the death penalty when the former deputy stands trial on May 28, attorney Jim Davis said Friday." The Herald adds, "Davis wanted prosecutors to hand over copies of witness statements, expert reports and other types of evidence so he can prepare to defend Teel in a 'mini-trial' before a Justice Department panel in Washington. The government has a deadline of Feb. 16 to decide whether Teel's alleged involvement in Williams' fatal beating merits a possible death penalty. … On Friday, U.S. Chief Magistrate Judge John M. Roper ruled against Davis' request, citing a federal rule known as the Jencks Act. The rule, considered by some to be unconstitutional, restricts a defendant's access to witness statements until the witness has testified in court against him. … 'They're going to eat my lunch,' said Davis, referring to the review panel and federal trial attorney John Richmond. 'This is going to hinder my ability to give (Teel) the best defense possible.'" The Herald notes, "Roper said he does not agree with the Jencks Act, but said he will not circumvent it. … Federal death-penalty cases are rare in Mississippi. They're even rarer nationwide when the defendant is a former law enforcement officer."

North Carolina Man Dies After Police Use Taser To Restrain Him. The Charlotte Observer/AP (1/6) reports, "A 42-year-old man died early Friday after police officers used a Taser when he wouldn't cooperate during his arrest." The AP continues, "Calvin Thompson, of Gastonia, was found nude running on a city street, according to Gaston County Police Department. He disobeyed officers' commands and resisted arrest, police said. … Officers used a Taser to arrest Thompson, but he became unconscious when being placed in custody, police said." The AP adds, "Tasers are stun guns used by law enforcement officials as a non-lethal alternative to bullet-firing weapons. The U.S. Justice Department last year announced it would study a number of cases in which people died after being stunned by the weapons. … Officers said they provided Thompson with medical attention and found what appeared to be crack cocaine in his mouth. He was taken to Gaston Memorial Hospital, where he was pronounced dead. … The North Carolina Highway Patrol believes the vehicle Thompson was driving was involved in at least four separate collisions in a Gastonia subdivision before his arrest. A substance that appeared to be crack cocaine was found in the vehicle, police said."

SCOTUS To Hear Coca-Cola's Appeal Of Racial Discrimination Case. The AP (1/6) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court on Friday agreed to consider a discrimination case in which a Coca-Cola bottling company fired a black employee." The AP continues, "Coca-Cola asked the Supreme Court to hear the lawsuit, which involves allegations that a supervisor of employee Stephen Peters was motivated by racial bias and influenced a manager to fire the worker. … Such circumstances are sometimes referred to as 'cat's paw' or 'rubber stamp' liability. Coca-Cola fired Peters for insubordination after he refused a request to work on a weekend during his scheduled days off. … The case was one of seven appeals the court accepted Friday." The AP adds, "A federal appeals court reinstated a lawsuit brought on Peters' behalf by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The appeals court said a federal judge placed too much emphasis on the fact that Peters' immediate supervisor made no express recommendation to fire him. … In asking the court to hear the case, the company asked the justices to consider when an employer may be held liable for intentional discrimination when the person who fired an employee harbored no discriminatory bias."

WPost Troubled By Christian Embassy Pentagon Video. The Washington Post (1/6, 690K) editorializes, "'There are over 25,000 Department of Defense leaders working in the rings and corridors of the Pentagon. Through Bible study, discipleship, prayer breakfasts, and outreach events, Christian Embassy is mustering these men and women into an intentional relationship with Jesus Christ,' a narrator explains toward the start of a promotional video for Christian Embassy, an offshoot of Campus Crusade for Christ that focuses on diplomats, government leaders and military officers. … Free exercise of religion doesn't stop at the entrance to the Pentagon or other government buildings." But it is "important that both uniformed and civilian military leaders, whatever their religious views, take care that others who don't share their beliefs don't feel coerced or excluded as a result. The Christian Embassy video suggests that such sensitivity has not always been present."

DOJ_NMG_0113660

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Asks For More Information On Brooks Automation's Sale Of Software Division. The Boston Globe/AP (1/6) reports, "Brooks Automation Inc., which supplies hardware and software to the semiconductor industry, said Friday federal antitrust regulators asked for additional information about the pending sale of its software division to chip equipment maker Applied Materials Inc. … This is the DOJ's second request for both companies." The AP continues, "Brooks Automation and Applied Materials both plan to respond quickly to the request from the Department of Justice's antitrust division, which extends the waiting period until 30 days after the companies have complied. Brooks said it still hopes the $125 million deal can close in the first quarter."

Buyout Pair Sees Bargain In McClatchy Purchase. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, B1, Zuckerman) reports, "Leveraged-buyout firms such as Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and Blackstone Group have been making news for their ambitious takeover deals. … But few of the headline-grabbing buyouts have been as gutsy as the $530 million planned purchase by Avista Capital Partners of McClatchy Co.'s Star Tribune newspaper, announced in late December1." The Journal continues, "The deal for the nation's 15th-largest newspaper by circulation comes amid a slump in the business. The Star Tribune is especially challenged. It has been the worst-performing paper in terms of revenue for McClatchy, which paid $1.2 billion for the Minneapolis paper in 1998. The Star Tribune's ad revenue dropped about 6% last year on a circulation decline of about 4%." The Journal adds, "Despite the ugly writing on the wall for the industry, the prospective purchase is the third-largest for New York-based Avista, a previously little-known private-equity firm that still is raising its first buyout fund and whose executives have never bought any newspaper properties. … Avista mightn't be a household name, but its founders, Thompson Dean and Steven Webster, have been well known in the buyout community for more than a decade. They ran a group that generated returns of about 50% from buyout investments for Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette, which was acquired by Credit Suisse in 2000. The pair left Credit Suisse 18 months ago to start Avista, which they hope will manage $1.5 billion. … The 48-year-old Mr. Dean, who is the son of a career foreign-service officer, was born in Taiwan and grew up in Asia, says they already have spent $850 million to make 11 buyout purchases, focusing on energy, media and health care. Mr. Webster, 55, is an energy specialist who had founded Falcon Drilling. .. .So what do they see with the Star Tribune deal that others in the buyout world missed? A very cheap price -- 6.5 times the paper's cash flow -- a respected brand and an industry that may be bottoming out and poised for a rebound. Avista passed on bidding for the Philadelphia Inquirer, which Mr. Dean says doesn't have comparable cash flow as the Star Tribune."

Iowa Hospital Declines Merger Offer. The Des Moines Register (1/6, Leys) reports, "One of Des Moines' two dominant hospital companies offered Friday to work with its rival to jointly build a single suburban hospital, but the rival declined." The Register continues, "The offer from Iowa Health-Des Moines comes as both that company and Mercy Medical Center move forward with plans to build hospitals next door to each other in West Des Moines. … The companies explored the possibility of a jointly owned suburban facility in 2002. Hospital leaders said they dropped the idea after federal regulators told them informally that it could run afoul of antitrust laws." The Register adds, "Wellmark Blue Cross/Blue Shield, Iowa's largest health insurer, suggested recently that the two companies attempt again to cooperate on a suburban hospital. Iowa Health agreed to try, but Mercy said no. … Wellmark Vice President Cliff Gold said his company believes a joint venture might be acceptable to federal regulators. 'We're saying it's four or five years later, and a lot has changed,' he said. … Gold said the Justice Department has been friendlier to such ideas lately. He also said his company, which is the largest private payer to both hospital companies, would help the hospitals make their case." The Register notes, "Wellmark fears that if two similar hospitals are built side-by-side in West Des Moines, health-care costs would be needlessly inflated. A joint venture would be a more economical option, Gold said. … Iowa Health Chief Executive Officer Eric Crowell wrote a letter to Wellmark Friday saying that his company would agree to a renewed attempt at a joint project, with several conditions."

ENVIRONMENT:

DOJ Drops Probe Of Florida Waste-Water Dumping. The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida) (1/6, Quinlan) reports from Venice, FL, "The Department of Justice will not file charges against any individuals involved in the city utilities department's 2001 waste-water dumping into Curry Creek, officials said Friday." The Tribune continues, "The announcement answers the question that lingered after the city pleaded guilty in December 2005 to a three-count felony violation of the Clean Water Act: Would those responsible for the dumping or the falsification of records during the subsequent cover-up go to jail?" The Tribune adds, "Speculation centered on what court papers called the 'Executive Group,' a reference to the 'high-level executives, managers, supervisors' who oversaw 'the day-to-day operations' of the Eastside Wastewater Treatment Facility at the time of the dumping. … But the Department of Justice has closed its inquiry, leading the Environmental Protection Agency to drop its investigation. … A Department of Justice spokeswoman would not comment on why the department closed the case." The Tribune notes, "The Justice Department pulled the EPA off the case in a letter to EPA special agent Dan Green, who had handled the investigation. … 'Their recommendation was not to pursue any individual defendants in this case, and the local U.S. Attorney's office went along with this,' Green said. … When the city pleaded guilty in 2005, a judge imposed the minimum fine allowable, $110,000, or $5,000 for each of the 22 days that plant employees discharged waste water into the creek and sprayed it onto a field at Knights Trail. … As part of a deal with prosecutors, the city pledged its full cooperation in any further investigation of any current or past city employees."

DOJ_NMG_0113661

Ohio Cities Sue Lead Paint Manufacturers. The New York Times (1/6, Driehaus) reports, "Racing against a proposed state law that would limit paint manufacturers' liability for lead poisoning in aging neighborhoods, Cincinnati has joined five other Ohio cities in filing suits that seek millions of dollars from the companies to clean up lead paint." The Times continues, "Ohio is the latest front in a battle that pits paint companies against cities and states struggling to overcome problems associated with lead poisoning. … The problems include learning impairment in children, high blood pressure in adults and, at high levels of exposure, seizures, comas and deaths." The Times adds, "Municipal and county governments in California, Mississippi, Missouri, New Jersey and Texas have also sued major manufacturers seeking what would amount to billions of dollars in damages. … Whether responsibility rests primarily with paint companies, landlords who let paint deteriorate or cities that fail to enforce housing codes remains an open question." The Times notes, "Rhode Island broke new ground in February by winning a jury trial that found that three paint companies had created a public nuisance and had to clean up lead-paint contamination throughout the state at an estimated cost of $1.37 billion to $3.74 billion. … The companies are seeking a new trial there and trying to fend off litigation throughout the country. They are Sherwin-Williams, based in Cleveland; NL Industries, part of Valhi of Dallas and whose predecessor National Lead made Dutch Boy paint; and Millennium Holdings of Hunt Valley, Md., a successor to a company that owned Glidden Paint, originally based in Cleveland."

ANWR Drilling Ban Introduced In House. The AP (1/5) reports, "Opponents of oil drilling in an Alaskan wildlife refuge are going on the offense after playing defense for a quarter of a century. They want the new Democratic Congress to make an oft-challenged drilling ban permanent. Legislation introduced in the House on Friday would make ANWR "a permanently protected wilderness and end repeated efforts to open the area east of the Prudhoe oil field to energy companies. 'The consensus is that there should not be drilling in the refuge, so the logical next step is to pass legislation which turns it into a wilderness,' Rep. Edward Markey, chief sponsor of the legislation, said in an interview. … A co-sponsor of the bill is Rep. Jim Ramstad, a Minnesota Republican." BBC.com (1/6, Willis) reports ANWR "has been compared to the Serengeti nature reserve in Africa because of its abundance of wildlife."

DuPont Drops Plan To Dump Nerve Gas Wastewaster. The New York Times (1/6, B3, Jones, 1.16M) reports, "Bringing an abrupt end to a three-year fight between environmentalists and federal officials, the DuPont Company announced on Friday that it would not participate in an Army plan to dispose of wastewater from neutralized VX nerve gas by dumping it into the Delaware River. The decision was a victory for environmentalists who questioned how placing wastewater from the neutralized form of the deadly nerve agent would affect the river. ... The decision was hailed by elected officials and environmentalists on both sides of the Delaware, including Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey." VX "is considered one of the world's most toxic chemicals. Exposure to its active form can kill within minutes."

DOJ_NMG_0113662

Reports Identify Five New Mercury Contamination Sites In North America. The Washington Post (1/6, A7, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "Two newly published scientific reports suggest that mercury contamination has created at least five 'hot spots' in New England and Canada, places where the neurotoxin has accumulated in fish and wildlife to such an extent that it could harm human health and local ecosystems. The 11 scientists, who work at institutions including Syracuse University and Vermont's Department of Environmental Conservation, analyzed how mercury has accumulated in two indicator species in the northern United States and southern Canada. … Taken together, the two papers, published in this month's edition of the peer-reviewed journal BioScience, represent the most comprehensive ecological analysis of mercury accumulation ever conducted in the United States."

NYTimes Encouraged By Boxer's Pledge To Curb Carbon Dioxide Emissions. The New York Times (1/6, A14, 1.16M), in an editorial, notes Sen. Barbara Boxer is the new chairwoman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, replacing Sen. James Inhofe, "who regards global warming as an elaborate hoax drummed up by environmentalists and scientists in search of money. Ms. Boxer has already scheduled hearings, and there will be no shortage of legislative remedies to consider. All share one objective, which is to attach a cost to carbon dioxide through a cap on emissions. The underlying logic is that if people and industries are made to pay for the privilege of pumping these gases into the atmosphere, they will inevitably be driven to developer cleaner fuels, cleaner cars and cleaner factories."

Navy Urged Not To Harm Whales. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (1/6, 850K), environmentalists Jean-Michel Cousteau and Michael Jasny write that last July, "the Navy was allowed to proceed with its exercises only when it agreed to take significant, common-sense measures to protect whales and other marine species, such as staying away from the newly designated Northwestern Hawaiian Islands Marine National Monument. ... Yet now, in training exercises planned for California's coastal waters, the Navy is proposing to abandon its commitment to safeguard whales and their habitat from high-intensity sonar. ... The Navy should not be permitted to conduct, and the [California Coastal] Commission must not approve, dangerous sonar training without assurances that the Navy will take meaningful steps to protect whales and other marine life."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Appoints Brink Mississippi SAC. The AP (1/6) reported, "Frederick T. Brink has been appointed the special agent in charge of the FBI in Mississippi, the federal law enforcement agency announced Friday. FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said Brink replaces John G. Raucci, who left Friday for a position at the agency's headquarters in Washington." The AP added, "Brink has also served at the FBI's Operational Technology Division, located at Quantico, Va., and overseas at the U.S Embassy in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. In June 2005, Brink was promoted by Mueller to special agent in charge of the FBI's Special Operations Division in New York." The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (1/6, Kanengiser) noted that Raucci has been named "assistant director of the agency's human resources division. There are 34,500 FBI employees and 'we still turn away thousands every year,' Raucci said. In his first assignment in the South, Raucci said there was excellent cooperation between the FBI and state and local law enforcement agencies throughout Mississippi."

Former El Paso SAC Sentenced To Six Months In Prison. The El Paso Times (1/6, Gilot) reported, "Former FBI special agent in charge Hardrick Crawford was sentenced Friday to six months in prison, making him probably the first person of his rank to do hard time. At the sentencing hearing, U.S. District Judge Philip Martinez said that he liked Crawford, and that seeing the government man in court had been 'painful.' … Crawford was convicted in August of making false statements regarding gifts he received in an Office of Government Ethics Public Financial Disclosure Report submitted to the FBI. Crawford was also found guilty of concealing material facts from the FBI about his friendship with Jose Maria Guardia, a Juárez racetrack owner." The Times noted, "The El Paso FBI office reacted to the sentencing of a popular boss with sadness and resignation Friday. 'We respect the federal justice system, which we in the FBI have sworn to uphold,' spokeswoman Andrea Simmons said. 'While we are saddened by this entire situation, we believe that justice was served.'" The AP (1/6) also briefly reported on Crawford's sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0113663

IG Report Finds DEA Agents Mishandled Seized Cash. The DC Examiner (1/6, Myers) reports, "Drug Enforcement Administration agents routinely disregarded agency rules on the handling of seized cash, jeopardizing hundreds of millions of dollars taken in drug raids, a Justice Department review found." The Examiner continues, "In an audit published Friday, Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine examined thousands of seizures between October 2003 and November 2005. … Fine's report states that drug agents rarely counted the cash they took, often didn't provide receipts for seized money, rarely recorded the seizures in agency ledgers and often didn't ask their colleagues to witness their counting and handling of the money." The Examiner adds, "DEA agents recorded more than 16,000 seizures for nearly $616 million in the period surveyed, the report states. … 'Cash seized by the DEA is at risk because of the DEA's failure to consistently implement and document controls over the seized cash,' Fine's spokeswoman, Cynthia Schnedar, said in an e-mail to The Examiner. … The lack of internal controls over the seized cash leads to accusations of theft by the agents, the report states."

Federal Agencies Team To Fight Florida Gang Violence. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (1/6, Burdi) reports, "The upsurge in gang violence in Palm Beach County is like a nightmare from 15 years ago when drive-by shootings were commonplace, officials said. … So the county Violent Crimes Task Force has turned to the same remedy it did in the 1990s: Federal prosecution, Sheriff Ric Bradshaw said Friday." The Sun-Sentinel continues, "Local law enforcement and federal agencies -- including the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the Drug Enforcement Administration -- have joined forces because criminals are more likely to do time and more of it under federal guidelines, Bradshaw said. … 'You always try to bring state and federal law enforcement together and use whatever advantages are available,' said Dale Armstrong, ATF resident agent in charge in West Palm Beach." The Sun-Sentinel adds, "Working with federal agencies is nothing new for local departments, but since the county task force was re-formed in April, its focus has been on gangs, Bradshaw said. … 'We're confident we're going to make an impact,' he said."

FBI Investigating Bomb Left At Louisiana Church, Offers $5000 Reward. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/6) reported, "The FBI is offering a reward of up to $5,000 for information leading to the arrest and indictment of those responsible for placing an explosive device at Erwinville Baptist Church" on New Year's Eve. "Debris from the detonated device, described as a pipe bomb, was sent to the FBI Crime Lab at Quantico, Va. Jim Bernazzani, special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans Division, asked that anyone with information about the incident call the Baton Rouge office of the FBI at (225) 291-5159."

IMMIGRATION:

Gunmen Force National Guard Troops Along Mexican Border To Retreat. The Washington Times (1/6, A1, Seper, 88K) reports, "Armed men overran a National Guard observation post along the U.S.-Mexico border in Arizona this week, forcing the soldiers to retreat and prompting an investigation by the U.S. Border Patrol that has focused on the intruders' identity. No shots were exchanged and no one was injured in the incident, which occurred shortly after 11 p.m. on Wednesday." National Guard Sgt. Edward Balaban "said the troops did not know how many men were involved in the attack 'because obviously it took place in the dark.' … Several Border Patrol agents in the area told The Washington Times yesterday the armed men might have been trying to find out what the Guard troops would do if they were confronted by drug or alien smugglers. They said the increased presence of troops and additional Border Patrol agents in recent months had frustrated many of the area's drug and alien smugglers."

WSJournal Argues H-1B Visas Create Additional Jobs. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A6, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "Nearly one-third of science and engineering Ph.D.s working in places like Silicon Valley are the top minds from foreign nations, according to a study from the National Bureau of Economic Research. Many are also here on H1-B visas. Companies are required to spend tens of thousands of dollars in legal fees, advertising expenses and long delays to secure visas for the talented people they need. And the demand for these specialty visas is two to three times higher than the 65,000 per year allotted by Congress. This is all supposed to protect jobs for Americans, but these immigrants are job creators."

DOJ_NMG_0113664

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Passes Earmark Reform, "Pay-Go" Rules By Wide Margin. The New York Times (1/6, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports on its front page that the new Democratic House voted 280-152 Friday "to pull the shadowy tradition of Congressional earmarking into the daylight, requiring lawmakers to attach their names to the pet items they slip into spending or tax bills and certify that they have no financial interest in the provisions." Forty-eight Republicans joined all 232 Democrats in supporting the measure. The Times says that "more than any of several ethics rules adopted by the House this week, the earmark measure could prevent the kind of corruption that led to several big scandals in recent years." The vote "was linked to a rule known as 'pay as you go' that would prohibit the House from increasing the deficit by passing any new tax cuts or entitlement spending programs without offsetting them with spending cuts or tax increases."

The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Hamburger, Simon, 850K) headlines its report "Everybody Will Know If It's Pork," saying the measure was "championed by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, herself a prodigious author of earmarks." The Chicago Tribune (1/6, Zuckman, 617K) leads its story, "Bye-bye, bridge to nowhere," saying the vote will "curb the middle-of-the-night, backroom deal-making that resulted in approval of embarrassing -- and sometimes illegal -- pork barrel projects."

The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A3, Lueck, 2.04M) focuses on the so-called "pay-go" aspect, saying that the new rule makes efforts to "protect more middle-class Americans from the individual Alternative Minimum Tax" a "whole lot tougher." Pay-go prohibits the House "from considering any tax-cut or entitlement legislation if the cost isn't offset by increased revenue or spending trims. For now, at least, House Democrats say they intend to abide by the rule -- even when it comes to 'fixing' the AMT." The Washington Post (1/6, A4, Montgomery, 690K) also focuses on pay-go, saying the new rules are "aimed at reining in deficit spending and shedding more light on the murky world of special-interest projects known as earmarks." Key Democrats "acknowledged that it will be difficult to abide by" pay-go rules "while keeping their promises to fund health-care, education and homeland-security initiatives." The Post also notes the impact on an AMT fix.

The Washington Times (1/6, Hurt, 88K) says in its front-page report that Republicans "warned that the new majority is paving the way to increase federal taxes." Rep. Mike Pence said, " 'It doesn't reduce current spending levels or require a reduction in current spending levels. It is a means to justifying tax increases on working families, small businesses and family farms. In a very real sense, the American people ought to know that this proposal translates to: You pay as Congress goes on spending.'"

The CBS Evening News (1/5, story 6, 1:45, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The new Democrat-controlled House is not procrastinating. Today, it completed work on ethics reform rules by requiring full disclosure of pet spending earmarks that are often hidden in legislation. And it voted to end perks that members get from lobbyists, such as gifts of any kind, the use of corporate jets, and free meals. The Senate takes up its own ethics package on Monday, but expect some habits to die hard." NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 7, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) ran an "In Depth" report on "congressional ethics, a top priority of the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill in Washington."

The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Levey, 850K) reports that when Democrats "brought their new ethics rules up for a vote, more than a few eyebrows arched over the congressman who cried loudest about the indignities the Democrats were already inflicting on their GOP colleagues. As much as any Republican," then-Rules Chairman David Dreier "had stirred the rage of Democrats while they suffered in the minority. … But there was Dreier this week, lecturing Democrats on the virtue of openness and professing disappointment about being left out of the legislative process." Rep. Jim McGovern said, "I have whiplash. I thought it would take a couple of weeks before the hypocrisy bubbled up."

Sen. Jon Kyl said on CNBC (1/5, Griffeth), "There's an incentive for both sides to work with each other now. When Republicans controlled both branches of government and the White House, Democrats had every incentive to be negative, to stop success in other words, and prevent the president and the Republicans from being able to tout achievements. … Democrats now control both houses of Congress, and they're not going to be able to go to the next election saying 're-elect us' if they're not able to reach achievements. That will require cooperation from Republicans."

House Democrats Rename International Relations Committee. The Washington Times (1/6, Sands, 88K) reports House Democrats, "seeking a new name to go with a new attitude," said the House International Relations Committee "would be reverting to its old, pre-Republican majority moniker: the 'House Committee on Foreign Affairs.'" Chairman Tom Lantos said, "A new sheriff has come to town, taking the reins with a purpose. Americans have demanded change in the way our country conducts itself in the world." The GOP renamed the panel in 1995 "in part to distinguish it from its counterpart in the other wing of the Capitol, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee."

DOJ_NMG_0113665

Pelosi Viewed Favorably By 43%, Unfavorably By 39%, In Rasmussen Poll. A Rasmussen Reports survey of 800 likely voters (+/- 3%) taken January 3-4 finds Speaker Nancy Pelosi is viewed very favorably by 18%, somewhat favorably by 25%, somewhat unfavorably by 14%, and very unfavorably by 25%.

Pelosi Returns To Childhood Neighborhood In Baltimore. The Washington Post (1/6, B3, Morse, 690K) reports Pelosi, "capping off a three-day celebration of her ascension," returned to her hometown of Baltimore Friday, "where a street was renamed for her in front of a stage of dignitaries and a bank of TV cameras." Addressing a crowd near her Little Italy childhood home, she "mentioned her Italian immigrant ancestors, who came to the United States poor, hardworking and religious. Her own upbringing, in the Baltimore rowhouse to her left, she said, was shaped by Italian American pride, devout Catholicism, deep patriotism and staunch Democratic ideals." A street nearby was renamed "Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi." The AP (1/5, Wyatt) also reports on Speaker Pelosi's trip home. The Washington Post (1/6, C1, DuLac, 690K) has a Style section feature on other Democratic celebrations.

New Congress Brings 66 Fresh Faces To Capitol Hill. The New York Times (1/6, A10, Kornblut, 1.16M) takes a look at the "66 new members of the 110th Congress, part of a historic Democratic tide that swept Republicans from power after a dozen years and left President Bush on the defensive." Ohio's Zack Space is said to be typical of the new class. He "campaigned hard on the issue of ethics reform in a race to succeed Representative Bob Ney, who pleaded guilty in a corruption case. Despite his political inexperience -- and the fact that Democratic officials considered him one of their weakest candidates -- Mr. Space beat his Republican rival, in an increasingly Republican district," by 24 points. And "hours after casting his first votes," Space "still beamed with excitement on Thursday, showing off the identification card that doubles as an electronic balloting device. 'I had to ask someone how to use it,' he said."

New Congress Is Most Religiously Diverse. The Washington Post (1/6, B9, Tilove, 690K) says the new Congress, "for the first time, includes a Muslim, two Buddhists, more Jews than Episcopalians and the highest-ranking Mormon in congressional history. Roman Catholics remain the largest single faith group in Congress, accounting for 29 percent of all members of the House and Senate, followed by Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Jews and Episcopalians." While Catholics in Congress "are almost 2-to-1 Democrats, the most lopsidedly Democratic groups are Jews and those not affiliated with a religion. Of the 43 Jewish members of Congress, there is only one Jewish Republican in the House and two in the Senate. The six religiously unaffiliated members of the House are all Democrats."

WSJournal Says "Pay-Go" Creates AMT Dilemma For Democrats. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A6, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "In his op-ed column on these pages this week, President Bush made some news by underscoring his opposition to raising taxes. We were certainly glad to hear it, and to publish it, because by our lights the tax cuts and economic growth that has followed are his most notable domestic achievements (give or take a Supreme Court Justice). … However, those lower tax rates are set to expire at the end of 2010, and the Democrats who now control Congress want them repealed. The 'pay-as-you-go' rules that the House just passed would make their extension all but impossible. What this means is that if Congress merely fails to act, the tax cuts expire and the economy will be hit with one of the largest tax increases in history in 2010." According to the Journal, "this…certainly poses a dilemma for Democrats -- all the more so because they must also cope with the rising burden of the Alternative Minimum Tax. … This week, the new Democratic Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Montana's Max Baucus, called the AMT a 'monster in the tax code' and introduced a bill to repeal it."

Dowd Says Democrats "Should Have Shown Some Class." In her New York Times (1/6, A15, 1.16M), column, Maureen Dowd writes, "There was a touch of parody to the giddy Democrat takeover this week. … The first act of House Democrats who promised to govern with bipartisan comity was imperiously banishing Republicans from participating in the initial round of lawmaking. Even if Republicans were brutes during their reign, Democrats should have shown more class, letting the whiny minority party offer some stupid amendments that would lose. Perhaps the Democrats' power-shift into overdrive is a neurological disorder, or neuropolitical disorder."

DOJ_NMG_0113666

Democrats Expected To Oppose Making Bush Tax Cuts Permanent. The Wall Street Journal's "Hot Topic" feature (1/6, A5, Timiraos) spotlights tax cuts this week, asking, "Can Congress balance the budget if it keeps the tax cuts in place? In the short term, maybe. But it won't be easy. White House forecasts show a $127 billion shortfall in 2011. Making the tax cuts permanent while balancing the budget will require sharp spending cuts, which likely will cause even many congressional Republicans to balk. President Bush's efforts to constrain spending in the past have had little effect. … Now that Democrats are in control, the resistance from Congress is likely to be greater." The Journal notes, "Both parties have expressed support for permanent changes" to the Alternative Minimum Tax, but "passage of 'pay-go' legislation by the House Friday could add an extra hurdle."

WPost Cites Mankiw In Rejecting Bush's Tax Cut Defense. The Washington Post (1/6, A16, 690K) editorializes, "President Bush wrote in a Wall Street Journal op-ed Wednesday that 'it is also a fact that our tax cuts have fueled robust economic growth and record revenues.' The claim about fueling record revenue is flat wrong, and it is shocking that the president should persist in making such errors. … This is not just our opinion. Harvard's N. Gregory Mankiw, an economic conservative who served as chairman of Mr. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, has tested the hypothesis on which Mr. Bush's claim is based: He looked at the extent to which tax cuts stimulate extra growth and the extent to which that growth generates extra tax revenue that offsets the initial loss of revenue from the tax cut. Mr. Mankiw's conclusion: Even over the long term, once you've allowed all of the extra growth to feed through into extra revenue, cuts in capital taxes juice the economy enough to recoup half of the lost revenue, and cuts in income taxes deliver a boost that recoups 17 percent of the lost revenue."

Democratic Medicare Bill Lacks Formulary To Pressure Drug Firms. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports, "The bill that House Democrats unveiled Friday to lower drug prices for the elderly contains a provision that could make it difficult — or maybe even impossible — to achieve its goal, some critics said. The legislation would direct the federal government to use its huge market power to bargain for lower prices with drug manufacturers on behalf of some 23 million seniors enrolled in the Medicare prescription program. But a provision in the bill would explicitly prohibit the government from creating a list of approved drugs, known as a formulary — thus taking away a powerful lever commonly used in such pricing negotiations. Fear of not being included on such a list of approved drugs is one of the principal reasons manufacturers agree to lower prices."

"Health Courts" Proposed As Alternative To Malpractice Jury Trials. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/6, A6, 2.04M) Phillip K. Howard, chair of Common Good, writes, "Skyrocketing health-care costs are a looming national tragedy, but cannot be contained without restoring reliability to the justice system. … Fear of erratic jury decisions in medical malpractice cases has spawned a culture of fear, causing inefficiencies that infect every level of medicine." Howard adds, "A functioning system of justice must aspire to deliberate choices, binding from one case to the next. Reliability is critical. Providers must know what's expected of them and must trust the system to distinguish good care from bad care. What's needed is something entirely new: specialized health-care courts. … A proposal for expert health courts has been developed in a joint venture of Common Good (a nonprofit organization) and the Harvard School of Public Health. It promises to restore reliability and foster confidence."

Boxer Will Lead Senate Ethics Panel In Johnson's Absence. RollCall.com (1/5) reports that with Sen. Tim Johnson recovering from brain surgery, Majority Leader Harry Reid has selected Environment and Public Works Chairwoman Barbara Boxer "to temporarily take the reins of the chamber's Ethics Committee." The move "will allow the committee to convene before Johnson returns to work. Democratic aides said Friday that Reid's decision also is being driven in part by the fact that the Senate will take up its ethics reform package next week."

Records Of White House Visitors Not Open To Public. The AP (1/6, Yost) reports, "The White House and the Secret Service quietly signed an agreement last spring in the midst of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal declaring that records identifying visitors to the White House are not open to the public." The AP continues, "The Bush administration didn't reveal the existence of the memorandum of understanding until last fall. The White House is using it to deal with a legal problem on a separate front, a ruling by a federal judge ordering the production of Secret Service logs identifying visitors to the office of Vice President Dick Cheney." The AP adds, "In a federal appeals court filing three weeks ago, the administration's lawyers used the memo in a legal argument aimed at overturning the judge's ruling. The Washington Post is suing for access to the Secret Service logs. … The five-page document dated May 17 declares that all entry and exit data on White House visitors belongs to the White House as presidential records rather than to the Secret Service as agency records. Therefore, the agreement states, the material is not subject to public disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act. … In the past, Secret Service logs have revealed the comings and goings of various White House visitors, including Monica Lewinsky and Clinton campaign donor Denise Rich, the wife of fugitive financier Marc Rich, who received a pardon in the closing hours of the Clinton administration."

DOJ_NMG_0113667

Roberts Credited With Making SCOTUS More Accessible To Media. The Washington Post (1/6, A3, Barnes, 690K) reports, "Just in the past few months, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg has invited television interrogator Mike Wallace into her chambers for a well-mannered chat. Justice Antonin Scalia has turned up at a sold-out breakfast meeting of the Northern Virginia Technology Council and mixed it up with the American Civil Liberties Union, and he has publicly debated the Constitution with fellow justice…Stephen G. Breyer. Breyer has promoted his book 'Active Liberty' on 'Fox News Sunday'. … And this week…Justice John Paul Stevens said in what was grandly billed as his first network television interview that he considered himself the same 'moderate conservative' that President Gerald R. Ford appointed 31 years ago." According to the Post, "there has…been a change in the way justices, now led by Chief Justice John G. Roberts…see their role both in explaining what they do and in fostering a public conversation about the judiciary, according to those who most carefully monitor the court." Roberts "seems comfortable with reporters."

SCOTUS Adds Cases On Race Discrimination, Environmental Law. The Washington Post/AP (1/6, A3) reports the Supreme Court "added seven cases to its docket, including a discrimination case in which a Coca-Cola bottling company fired a black employee. The lawsuit involves allegations that a supervisor of employee Stephen Peters was motivated by racial bias and influenced a human resources manager to fire the worker. … The court also agreed to consider the interaction of two federal laws, the Endangered Species Act and the Clean Water Act, which set out different standards for federal agencies to protect endangered species." The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Savage, 850K) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed Friday to referee a high school sports dispute over whether coaches have a free-speech right to recruit athletes from other schools. … In Long Island Care at Home vs. Osborne, the court will decide whether certain home-care workers are protected by the federal law that requires a minimum wage and overtime pay. Since the 1970s, the Labor Department has said home-care workers who provide companionship services to the elderly and infirm are generally not covered by the law. … The justices also said they would consider making it harder to sue companies for stock fraud. Tellabs, a maker of telecommunications equipment, was sued by investors who said its executives had knowingly inflated its value."

Death Penalty Appeal Will Also Be Heard. The New York Times (1/6, A12, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports the Supreme Court "agreed…to use the case of a schizophrenic death row inmate in Texas to set the standard for determining when a mental illness is so severe that execution would be constitutionally impermissible. … The American Psychiatric Association has expressed specific concern about the competency standard used by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, which upheld the death sentence for the Texas inmate, Scott L. Panetti, in rejecting his petition for a writ of habeas corpus last May. Mr. Panetti, convicted in 1992 of fatally shooting his in-laws in the presence of his estranged wife and their 3-year-old child, is a 48-year-old Navy veteran who was hospitalized 14 times for schizophrenia and other serious mental disorders in the decade before the crime."

White House Seeks "Proven Combatant" For Counsel. The New York Times (1/6, A10, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports President Bush "is seeking a new chief lawyer with credentials as a proven combatant as he and his staff prepare for a potential raft of investigations from Democrats in Congress who have promised to challenge the White House's conduct of policy and its assertions of executive power. … Republicans said Friday in interviews that the White House was now, in essence, seeking a politically savvy outsider." The Times add, "Several Republicans, including some former administration officials, said the new White House counsel would also need the stature to counterbalance David S. Addington, the powerful chief of staff of Vice President Dick Cheney. Mr. Addington has tended to argue against cooperating with Congressional requests for classified information, a position that may require some softening, or at least more diplomacy, in the 110th Congress." The Times lists as potential contenders: Fred F. Fielding, Charles J. Cooper, Laurence H. Silberman, David Aufhauser and J. Thomas Schieffer.

DOJ_NMG_0113668

NYTimes Blasts FDA Over Decision On Cloned Animals. The New York Times (1/6, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "The Food and Drug Administration's assessment that food from cloned animals is safe to eat is a victory for biotech companies and a loss for everyone else. Like many decisions on the cutting edge of agricultural technology, it was hurried along in a way that is more sensitive to political and economic pressure than to the long-term welfare of animals, humans and the world they inhabit. Asking whether cloned meat and milk are safe is not even the right question. The right question is, why clone at all? … Cloning isn't just a matter for the F.D.A. to decide. It is up to us as a society to decide as well."

LATimes Supports FDA Move. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, 850K), in an editorial, writes, "Even if it's creepy, cloned meat is safe and tasty, says the Food and Drug Administration. … It isn't the FDA's job to rule on the morality of animal husbandry, nor to placate nervous trading partners overseas. Its mandate is to ensure the safety of the nation's food supply, and the verdict is in: Cloned meat is safe. Those who aren't convinced will have other options. Just as 'organic' farms and dairies across the country put special labels on their hormone-free milk or pesticide-free produce, ranches will doubtless spring up to market 'non-cloned' meats. Those who want to pay more for lower-quality food will no doubt be able to do so."

OTHER NEWS:

Jobs Were Created At 2006's Highest Rate In December. ABC World News (1/5, story 6, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There is some surprising news tonight about the strength of the job market. The government says employers added 167,000 jobs last month. That's far more than expected." NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 6, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "160,000 new jobs were added in December, what one economist called a 'rock-solid' reading. And the unemployment rate held steady at 4.5%."

The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A3, Gerena-Morales, lp, 2.04M) reports the Labor Department said Friday that job creation "accelerated at the end of last year and wage gains hovered at their highest level in nearly six years, suggesting that the economy might be performing better than economists anticipated and dashing hopes that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates anytime soon." Payrolls expanded by "a seasonally adjusted 167,000 jobs in December," and unemployment remained unchanged at 4.5%. The Financial Times (1/6, Callan, Guha, Crooks) says the December job gains were "the biggest increase in 2006, defying economists' predictions that the pace of hiring would slow. Wages also picked up, with a 4.2 per cent annual increase in average hourly earnings." The Washington Post (1/6, D1, Henderson, Schneider, 690K) says the report "followed others this week showing that retailers rang up decent holiday sales last month, while factories churned out more goods and businesses spent more on offices, shopping centers and other types of commercial construction." The Washington Times (1/6, A1, Hill, 88K) puts the positive jobs news on its front page, and the New York Times (1/6, C1, Peters, 1.16M) has a business section report.

Jobs Data To Play Key Role In Next Fed Deliberations. The Financial Times (1/6, Guha) says the data will play a "central role" in the Fed's "next deliberations on interest rates." The latest published Fed minutes "show the Fed putting considerable weight on the continued strength of the labour market as an offset to other signs of weakness in the economy, for instance, in manufacturing output."

Bernanke Defends Fed's Banking Role. The Financial Times (1/6) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "stoutly defended" the Fed's role in banking supervision, "pushing back against suggestions that this role should be hived off and given to a single regulator." Addressing the American Economic Association, Bernanke said, "The Fed's ability to deal with diverse and hard-to-predict threats to financial stability depends critically on the information, expertise and powers that it holds by virtue of being both a bank supervisor and a central bank."

Markets Down On Jobs Report. The New York Times/AP (1/6, C6) reports the "surprising surge in new jobs and wages diminished the hopes of investors for an interest rate cut." The Dow "fell 82.68 points, or 0.66 percent, to 12,398.01 -- the biggest one-day drop since Nov. 27. The Dow was down more than 115 points at one time yesterday." The S&P 500 was down "8.63 points, or 0.61 percent, to 1,409.71." and the Nasdaq "dropped 19.18 points, or 0.78 percent, to 2,434.25." The Financial Times (1/6, Scholtes, Davies) reports US bond prices were also down on the jobs news, while the Wall Street Journal (1/6, B2, Molinski, 2.04M) reports the dollar hit a "six-week high against the euro Friday and recovered much of its overnight losses against the yen" on the report. In a related piece, the Wall Street Journal (1/6, B1, McKay, 2.04M) examines whether, "after the Dow's 16% gain last year," a correction is due.

DOJ_NMG_0113669

The New York Times (1/6, C6, DeAenlle, 1.16M) also reports that "Dogs of the Dow" -- the DJIA's 10 stocks "with the highest dividend yields at the end of each year -- have handily outperformed the index itself and other benchmarks of blue-chip stocks" over the past seven years, making them "the sort of stocks that value investors covet. … The Dogs for 2007, in descending order of yield, are Verizon, Altria, AT&T, Pfizer, Citigroup, Merck, General Motors, Dupont, J. P. Morgan and General Electric."

Lower Oil Prices Yet To Reach Consumers. The Washington Post (1/6, D1, Mufson, 690K) reports that while "warm weather was bad news this week" for OPEC, oil and gas companies, and "any traders who had bet on rising energy prices," the "unseasonably warm weather may make it cheaper to fill their gas tanks -- though it hasn't yet." While crude oil is down 7.8% in New York since the start of 2007, "so far, the benefits of falling crude oil prices haven't trickled down to consumers. … According to AAA, the average nationwide price for unleaded regular gasoline was $2.33 a gallon yesterday, essentially unchanged from the day before and up nearly 3 cents from a month ago." On the same page, the Washington Post (1/6, D1, Freeman, 690K) has a feature on how automakers are gauging demand for alternative-fuel vehicles.

Ex-SEC Chairs Back NYSE/NASD Regulatory Merger. In a Wall Street Journal (1/6, A7, 2.04M) op-ed, former SEC chairmen William Donaldson and Harvey Pitt write, "Despite government's increasing role, there remains an important need for securities industry self-regulation. Given some of the lapses we've seen over the last several years, the need for high ethical standards and business practices is more important than ever. And yet, under the current, outmoded system, there are conflicting standards, inefficiencies and waste. … The proposed merger of the NASD and NYSE regulatory regimes put forward last month is in the best traditions of the government-private sector partnership Congress envisioned when it enacted the federal securities laws."

Biden Expects To Create Exploratory Committee This Month. Asked on CNN's The Situation Room (1/5, Blitzer) about whether he has "formally gone through the process of declaring your intention to run" for president, Sen. Joseph Biden said, "I haven't formally done that, but will formally set up that committee, I expect, by the end of this month. It is my intention to run. I've been straightforward about that for the last six or eight months."

Brownback To Enter Presidential Race On January 20. The AP (1/5, Sidoti) reports Sen. Sam Brownback, a "favorite son of the religious right, will officially enter the presidential race later this month in his home state." A spokesman said Brownback will officially enter the race on January 20 in Topeka, and then "will fly to Washington to participate in the anti-abortion march" marking the anniversary of the Roe v. Wade ruling.

Owens Joins Romney's Senior Advisory Team. The Denver Post (1/6, Marshall, 256K) reports exiting Colorado Gov. Bill Owens has joined Mitt Romney's senior advisory team as the ex-Massachusetts governor moves toward a presidential run. During a radio interview, Owens said of Romney, "I think he's one of the brightest people I've ever seen in public office. He's a businessman, he's a manager. He is a conservative, he wants to cut taxes."

Giuliani Playbook Offers Self-Assessment Of Potential Liabilities. The New York Times (1/6, B3, Purnick, 1.16M) writes, "The country sure has been enjoying itself reading about the Rudy Caper, feasting on the inside dish gleaned from Rudolph W. Giuliani's presidential playbook. The purloined or lost document gives outsiders a glimpse behind the curtain." The Rudy "portrayed on JoinRudy2008.com is a dragon slayer with a record of unmitigated success. He is a man with an open smile, replacing the fearsome City Hall scowl that he used so often to great effect." But the playbook, "meant for insider eyes," concedes Giuliani "as a presidential candidate may have to contend with such trouble as questions about his former wife, Donna Hanover, and his former associate, the controversial Bernard B. Kerik. It cites concerns about Mr. Giuliani's relatively liberal positions on social issues -- stances not likely to find favor with the Republican Party's conservative wing."

DOJ_NMG_0113670

Obama To Address Virginia Democrats Next Month. The Washington Post (1/6, B3, Craig, 690K) reports Sen. Barack Obama "will be the featured guest at a major fundraiser for the Virginia Democratic Party next month," addressing about 2,000 donors and activists at the party's annual Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner in Richmond. While Obama could announce his presidential plans "as soon as this month, his speech at the fundraiser at the Richmond Convention Center could prompt a lot of discussion about Virginia's role in the presidential race. Virginia's Democratic presidential primary has been held relatively early in past elections, before any candidate had the nomination locked up."

McAuliffe Blasts Kerry In Memoir. The AP (1/5) reports Terry McAuliffe, the "former Democratic Party boss and Clinton friend," is "lambasting John Kerry's unsuccessful presidential campaign, calling his effort to unseat President Bush 'one of the biggest acts of political malpractice in the history of American politics.'" The AP says McAuliffe "is close to Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton and will support her presidential bid if the New York senator runs in 2008," and his memoir "could serve as the opening salvo against a potential Clinton rival as Kerry weighs another bid. However, McAuliffe has kind words for other possible candidates, such as Sens. Barack Obama and Chris Dodd and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack." The book, "What a Party! My Life Among Democrats: Presidents, Candidates, Donors, Activists, Alligators and Other Wild Animals," goes on sale January 23. The New York Times (1/6, A13, Broder, 1.16M) says there are "any number of humorous anecdotes sprinkled among the chest-deep pile of dropped names in the 406-page volume."

Candidate For New Hampshire Democratic Chair Withdraws. The New Hampshire Union Leader (1/6) reports New Hampshire Democratic Vice Chairman withdrew from the race to lead the state party. Manchester police "began an investigation of Buckley at the request of the Attorney General's office after Gov. John Lynch received a complaint linking him to pornography. Buckley tonight denied any wrongdoing."

Schwarzenegger Begins Second Term By Claiming Centrist Mantle. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/6, Martin, 384K) reports on its front page that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "cast himself Friday as the leader of a 'post-partisan' movement that would give birth to innovative ideas through collaboration, not party warfare, urging leaders in his second inaugural address to govern from a 'dynamic center that is not held captive by either the left or the right or the past.'" In his 15-minute speech, Schwarzenegger "made no policy proposals and instead focused entirely on tone, rejecting the liberal versus conservative battleground in favor of the pragmatic middle. Aides said the message, from a governor who bucked a national anti-GOP trend last fall by cruising to re-election, was aimed beyond the state toward a national audience." Schwarzenegger said, "The American people are instinctively centrist. So should be our government. America's political parties should return to the center. They should return to the center where the people are."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/5, Blitzer) reported, "Schwarzenegger limped to his inaugural on crutches today. But the California governor may be politically stronger than ever, after mining the middle ground." ABC World News (1/5, story 7, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger used crutches to get on stage to his swearing in. It's the first time he's been seen in public since the bad leg break he suffered skiing before Christmas. Schwarzenegger called every day as governor an adventure. And his political escapes are more hair-raising than anything he did in the movies." The Washington Times/AP (1/6) further quotes Schwarzenegger: "Like Paul on the road to Damascus, I had an experience that opened my eyes. And what was it that I saw? I saw that people, not just in California, but across the nation, were hungry for a new kind of politics, a politics that looks beyond the old labels, the old ways, the old arguments."

The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Martelle, Salladay, 850K) says in a front page feature that "the celebrities and the crowds were notably absent, spotlighting the difference between a movie star doing the unusual -- winning a gubernatorial recall election -- and a now-seasoned politician signing in for four more years." The New York Times (1/6, A9, McKinley, 1.16M) says Schwarzenegger was "nursing a broken leg" but came "armed with an electoral mandate." The event "was a chance for Mr. Schwarzenegger to take hold of the political center, something he did effectively during the election year…and in the election itself." The Washington Post (1/6, C1, Booth, Geis, 690K) writes, "It was Arnold's second inauguration -- and unlike the first one (boring), his wife, former TV news star Maria Shriver, was clearly in charge of the sequel. The theme? Make nice. It is apparently the dawn of 'post-partisanship' in California, as Schwarzenegger renounced the 'fringes of left and right' (technically, he's still a Republican) and declared the 'new creative center.'"

DOJ_NMG_0113671

O'Malley To Tour Maryland In Week Before Inaugural. The Washington Post (1/6, B2, Wagner, 690K) reports Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley "announced plans yesterday for a 'One Maryland Inaugural Tour and Celebration' in the week leading up to" his January 17 inauguration, with events across the state.

NYTimes Says Spitzer Has Big Ambitions For New York. The New York Times (1/6, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "Gov. Eliot Spitzer is fond of saying that you can't change the world by whispering. What New Yorkers saw in his first week in office was a governor in full trumpet about how to overhaul their state government. While some veterans of state politics saw Mr. Spitzer's State of the State speech on Wednesday as too ambitious, former Gov. Hugh Carey got it just right. 'It's a very big agenda,' he said, 'but it's not too big for New York.' … Spitzer certainly acts like a man ready to go forward quickly. The goals he has set may be daunting to the old guard in Albany, but anything less from this governor would have been a grave disappointment."

"Embryo Brokerage" Stirs Bioethics Debate. The Washington Post (1/6, A1, Stein, 690K) reports, "A Texas company has started producing batches of ready-made embryos that single women and infertile couples can order after reviewing detailed information about the race, education, appearance, personality and other characteristics of the egg and sperm donors. The Abraham Center of Life LLC of San Antonio, the first commercial dealer making embryos in advance for unspecified recipients, was created to help make it easier and more affordable for clients to have babies that match their preferences, according to its founder. … The embryo brokerage, which calls itself 'the world's first human embryo bank,' raises alarm among some fertility experts and bioethicists, who say the service marks another disturbing step toward commercialization of human reproduction and 'designer babies.'" The Houston Chronicle (1/6, 530K) and the Dallas Morning News (1/6, 500K) both run this Post story today.

Former President Bush Recovering Well From Surgery. NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 9, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We have an update tonight on the condition of President George H.W. Bush. Eleven doctors say he has recovered well ahead of schedule from hip replacement surgery. He is said to be up and around and walking and expects to be sent home tomorrow. The former president, now 82 years old, underwent the surgery at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota on Wednesday, where he had his left hip replaced back in the year 2000."

California Legislators Approve Reagan Bust For Capitol Rotunda. The Washington Times (1/6, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "Nearly twenty years after leaving office, Ronald Reagan is coming back to Washington. California lawmakers have voted to place a bronze bust of the former president in the Capitol Rotunda. … The bust of Mr. Reagan…will replace that of Thomas Starr King, 'the orator who saved the nation.' King is credited with keeping California in the Union during the Civil War."

Ex-Commerce Secretary Verity Dies At 89. The New York Times/AP (1/6, A16, Press) reports Reagan-era Commerce secretary C. William Verity Jr. "died Wednesday in Beaufort, S.C. He was 89. Mr. Verity, who suffered from asthma, died of complications of pneumonia in a Beaufort hospital." He joined the Cabinet "in August 1987 after his predecessor, Malcolm Baldrige, was killed in a rodeo accident."

WSJournal Says Sheehan Is Democrats' "Problem Now." The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A6, 2.04M) editorializes, "When Cindy Sheehan became a celebrity for her 'peace' vigil outside President Bush's Texas ranch in 2005, the antiwar left hailed her as a heroine. ... Well, she's their problem now. On Wednesday members of the new House majority tried to hold a press conference to discuss their legislative priorities, but a group of hecklers, led by Mrs. Sheehan…forced Representative Rahm Emanuel to shut it down. ... We found few comments about her latest antics on the left-wing blogs. It's heartening to realize that her erstwhile backers were motivated by partisanship, not hatred of country."

DOJ_NMG_0113672

Ford Remembered On NYTimes Op-Ed Page. New York Times (1/6, 1.16M) guest columnist Orlando Patterson writes that President Gerald Ford "was a man at peace with himself. Uncomplicated but without a trace of shallowness; calm, dignified and quietly engaging, a person you would like to be your friend." In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/6, A15, 1.16M), comic actor Chevy Chase writes about his "relationship" with Ford.

Rice, South Korea's Song Laud Resumption Of Nuclear Talks, Discount Likelihood Of Test. AFP (1/6, Millikin) reports, "The United States has intensified efforts to resume nuclear disarmament talks with North Korea, while confirming it was working with Japan on an emergency plan for a possible crisis in the Korean peninsula." Secretary of State Rice "told a joint news conference with visiting South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min-Soon that the six-party talks could resume 'fairly soon' if Pyongyang signals it is ready for constructive denuclearization steps." The first round "ended without apparent progress," however, "Rice said Friday that those five days of discussions had laid the groundwork for further negotiations." Song "said it was 'North Korea's turn to come back to us with a positive and realistic response' to proposals made" during that first round of talks. In addition, Rice "played down press reports this week that North Korea was making preparations for a second nuclear test explosion as a way of pressuring its partners for concessions in the next round of talks."

The AP (1/5, Schweid) says Rice "cautioned North Korea on Friday that a second nuclear test 'no doubt would deepen its isolation.'" She and Song "agreed at a State Department news conference that their governments want negotiations on North Korea's nuclear program resumed." Song "said he had no indication that a fresh nuclear test by the North Koreans is imminent." The Washington Post (1/6, A13, Kessler, 690K) keys on the "expected" resumption of the Six-Party Talks, reporting Rice and Song said meetings "are likely to reconvene this month or next, when the United States and its allies hope to get a clearer sense of whether Pyongyang has any interest in giving up its weapons.

Death Of North's Foreign Minister Unlikely To Change Policy. The Washington Times (1/6, Salmon, 88K) reports on the impact of North Korean Foreign Minister Paek Nam-sun's death on Pyongyang's foreign policy, noting most experts believe significant change is "unlikely." Noting Paek's eight-year leadership of the foreign ministry, the Times adds, "In a society as opaque as North Korea's, it is impossible to predict a successor to Mr. Paek, but one analyst expected Mr. Paek's deputy at the foreign ministry," Kang Sok-ju, to take over. "The chances of Mr. Paek's successor having any leeway in moderating the country's nuclear policy are small."

Beijing Asks Tehran To Consider Sanctions, Talks. The Washington Post (1/6, A9, Cody, 690K) reports Beijing "told" Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani "that Tehran should abandon its defiance of U.N. sanctions and work for a swift return to talks to resolve the standoff over its nuclear program." Chinese media indicate that President Hu Jintao "urged" Larijani to offer "a 'serious response' to the U.N. sanctions." The Post calls the "public advice to Iran" one more "instance in which Beijing seemed to be following a course parallel to that of the United States on nuclear nonproliferation. Diplomats from the two countries have worked with increasing closeness over the past three years in Chinese-sponsored negotiations to dismantle North Korea's nuclear weapons program."

The AP (1/5, Ang) adds Beijing "urged Iran to give a 'serious response' to" UNSCR 1737. Larijani "warned that Tehran's commitment to the peaceful use of nuclear technology will change if the country is threatened." Hu reportedly told Larijani that that the "sanctions reflect 'the shared concerns of the international community over the Iranian nuclear issue.'"

US Diplomat To Be First To Visit Mogadishu In Over A Decade. The New York Times (1/6, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi Frazer "plans to visit Mogadishu, the violence-scarred Somali capital," tomorrow. "It would be the first time in more than a decade that a high-ranking United States official has set foot there." While Frazer's schedule "was still tentative," the Times says she plans "to be in Mogadishu for four hours to meet with officials of the transitional government and leading Somali intellectuals." The Times calls the two announcements "part of Somalia's transformation after Ethiopian-led forces ousted the once powerful Islamist movement from the capital last week and helped install a potentially viable government there for the first time in over 16 years." The Financial Times (1/6, England) keys on Zawahiri's call for an "Iraq-style insurgency" across Somalia. The Washington Times/AP (1/6, Kennedy) adds fighters loyal to the Islamic Courts "say they will heed al Qaeda's call for guerrilla attacks and suicide bombings against Ethiopian troops whose intervention was key to the Islamists' defeat."

DOJ_NMG_0113673

The Washington Post (1/6, A13, DeYoung, 690K) focuses its coverage on yesterday's meeting of the Somali Contact Group in Nairobi, saying the diplomats and aid providers "urged the quick deployment of an African peacekeeping force in Somalia, as the United States pledged $40 million to assist the mission and provide humanitarian aid." The Somali Contact Group "called for 'immediate support for the stabilization of Somalia,' noted an imperative to launch a political reconciliation process 'without delay' and cited the need for 'immediate concrete assistance.'" Frazer, the meeting's chair, is quoted saying, "The group clearly felt it was important that there not be a security vacuum." Under the front-page headline, "In Somalia, Confusion Remains In Command," the Washington Post (1/6, A1, McCrummen, 690K) adds, "Ordinary Somalis are not sure who is in charge: the Ethiopians, the government, the warlords or the exiled Islamic Courts leaders and their underground fighters," and "security continues to be the main concern in Mogadishu."

Hamas-Fatah Violence Continues Ahead Of Rice Visit. The New York Times (1/6, A6, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya "called Friday for an end to the internal violence in the Gaza Strip, a day after members of his own Hamas militia surrounded the house" of Fatah Col. Muhammed Gharib, "killed him and his bodyguards and seriously wounded his wife and brother." Fatah responded to Gharib's murder by "suggesting another round of retaliation," and "also said negotiations with Hamas on a unity government were impossible in the present atmosphere." In addition, "a local cleric and frequent critic of Hamas, Adel Nasar, was murdered as he left his mosque" yesterday. The Times adds, "The new tensions have set off a series of battles between Hamas and Fatah forces that show no sign of ending, despite various efforts to restore calm."

The Financial Times (1/6, Morris, Dinmore) keys on Nasar's murder, reporting, "Unidentified gunmen shot dead a Muslim cleric after he delivered a sermon in the Gaza Strip on Friday calling for an end to fierce factional fighting." The "factional violence is worsening just as the US is gearing up for another diplomatic effort in the region," sending Secretary of State Rice to Israel "and the Palestinian territories late next week." Experts on US policy "give no sign of any significant shift away from the current strategy of supporting Mr. Abbas, with money and equipment, while isolating and shunning Hamas."

Tanzanian Foreign Minister Will Be Number Two At UN. The New York Times (1/6, Preston, 1.16M) notes UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon "appointed Asha-Rose Mtengeti-Migiro, the foreign minister of Tanzania, to be deputy secretary general and said he intended to give her responsibility for day-to-day management of the world organization." The Times says Ban "fulfilled a pledge to place a woman from a developing country in the second most powerful post at the United Nations." USUN's Richard Grenell is quoted saying of Migiro, "Her experience indicates she will do a fantastic job." US "officials said [Secretary Rice] was personally acquainted with Ms. Migiro and was pleased when she heard of the appointment on Friday." Migiro was a professor before joining the Cabinet in 2000, and took over the foreign ministry one year ago. BBC.com (1/5) adds Ban "described Ms. Migiro as a highly respected leader who had championed the cause of developing countries over the years."

The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Farley, 850K) notes Ban "said he planned to delegate much of the U.N.'s management and administrative work to" Migiro. "She will also oversee socioeconomic affairs and development issues." A UN statement "said Migiro proved her ability to manage as the chairwoman of the Great Lakes regional conference in Central Africa in December." Ban also appointed former Indian ambassador and undersecretary-general Vijay Nambiar as his chief of staff.

Ban To Publicize His Personal Finances. The Washington Post (1/6, A13, Lynch, 690K) reports Ban "announced Friday that he will release his personal financial records, making him the first U.N. leader to subject his financial dealings to public scrutiny." His "action on his financial records was partly symbolic, because Ban had already been required to file disclosure statements when he served in the South Korean government. It was calculated to prod other senior U.N. officials to voluntarily make their own financial statements public."

NYTimes Calls Ban "A Status Quo Secretary General." The New York Times (1/6, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "The big powers in the United Nations Security Council…wanted a low-key bureaucrat who wouldn't rock the boat. Judging by Mr. Ban's early moves, the world has gotten exactly that. Expect no Kofi Annan-style exhortations to live up to the values of the U.N. charter. ... And expect no serious drive for much-needed administrative reform."

DOJ_NMG_0113674

Chinese Fed Raises Reserve Requirements. The New York Times (1/6, C3, Barboza, 1.16M) notes the Chinese central bank "raised the reserve requirement ratio for banks, the fourth increase in six months, to further tighten the nation's money supply." That "modest move" pushes the reserve ratio to 9.5 percent, and experts believe "it was the government's latest warning that too much money in the financial system could ignite inflation and perhaps fuel a stock market bubble." The Times adds that the hike "comes as China's stock market is booming after several years in the doldrums." Beijing "is determined to keep the economy expanding but is concerned about growing so quickly that the economy might crash before 2008, when Beijing is host to the Olympic Games, viewed as the ultimate coming-out party for China."

Chinese Yuan Reaches Parity With Hong Kong Dollar. The New York Times (1/6, C3, Bradsher, 1.16M) notes the Chinese yuan "is poised to become more valuable than the Hong Kong dollar by the end of the month, and could pass the traditional benchmark for the Hong Kong dollar's value as early as next week. The shift has been the latest in a series of shocks for [Hong Kong] residents' confidence that they or their ancestors had made the right decision to live in Hong Kong instead of anywhere else in China." The Times explains, "People in Hong Kong are used to comparing themselves with the educated middle class on the mainland. And they are finding that a growing class of Chinese businessmen and businesswomen have become more affluent than the average resident of Hong Kong." Some Chinese merchants "have stopped taking Hong Kong dollars or have begun asking a slightly greater number of dollars than the number of yuan on price tags would suggest. Prices are rising here in markets for everything from luxury apartments to dried bugs, and the culprit is the same: the rising value of the Chinese yuan and the falling value of the Hong Kong dollar."

Chinese Newspapers' Intellectual Property Suit Could Prove Pivotal. The New York Times (1/6, A3, French, 1.16M) reports the Beijing News, "one of China's largest newspapers," is suing Tom.com, "one of the country's leading Internet portals, claiming that it violated copyright laws, setting off a media war and highlighting the first signs of a possible shift in policies toward intellectual property rights" in China. The newspaper seeks $400,000 in damages for the republication of "more than 25,000 articles and photos without authorization since 2003." Despite China having a "reputation as a sort of no man's land for intellectual property rights," the Times says the News' suit "is headed to court at a time of accelerating legal change and signs of increased efforts by law enforcement to protect copyrights and intellectual property."

Zimbabwe Offers Long-Term Land Leases To Some White Farmers. The Washington Post (1/6, A9, Timberg, 690K) notes the Zimbabwean government of President Robert Mugabe "has granted long-term leases to 19 white farmers in a step toward allowing as many as 1,000 white-owned commercial farms to resume operating legally after years of land seizures." The Post calls the leases "the latest indication that Zimbabwe is pulling back from the harshest elements of a seven-year-old land reform program that has devastated its once-thriving agricultural sector and helped push the annual inflation rate over 1,000 percent, the highest in the world." However, the Post notes, "many white farmers have rejected the move as a desperate bid to revive the country's economy without restoring their property rights." Calling land "an emotional, politically explosive issue in Zimbabwe," the Post adds, "Among the contentious issues remaining is whether white farmers must surrender the deeds to their land to qualify for new leases."

Warsaw Archbishop Collaborated With Soviet Secret Police. The New York Times (1/6, A3, Smith, 1.16M) notes Warsaw Catholic Archbishop Stanislaw Wielgus, "caught in Eastern Europe's widening witch hunt for former Communist secret police informers, admitted Friday that he had collaborated with the Sluzba Bezpieczenstwa, or Security Service, known as the S.B." While admitted he'd "damaged" the Church, Wielgus said "he had neither spied on anyone nor harmed anyone. He said the only thing he ever did was to inform the secret police of his agenda during foreign academic meetings and to promise not to take part in anti-Communist activities." The Times says "many voices in Poland have called for him to step down," noting the "Warsaw archbishopric is a particularly symbolic institution in the former Soviet bloc." Poland's Catholic Church Historical Commission "said that there was no evidence that Bishop Wielgus's actions harmed anyone, and that [their] documents would be sent to the Vatican for further study."

DOJ_NMG_0113675

The Washington Post/AP (1/6, A9, Gera) adds Wielgus "admitted Friday that he had signed an agreement to cooperate with the secret police during the Communist era and said he was leaving his fate in the hands of Pope Benedict XVI." The AP continues, "The mounting allegations against Wielgus have gripped the heavily Roman Catholic country, where the church is esteemed for its opposition to the former Communist government."

Chavez Will Not Renew License Of Venezuela's Largest Television Network. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Kraul, 850K) notes Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's "decision not to renew the license of his nation's largest and oldest television network, a frequent critic of his policies, drew a rebuke Friday from the Organization of American States." Secretary-General Jose Miguel Insulza "said in a statement that Chavez acted in an arbitrary manner in yanking the license of RCTV." The OAS "objection follows similar condemnations by news media freedom groups, including Reporters Without Borders and the Inter-American Press Association." Chavez has "accused" RCTV "of promoting the coup in April 2002 that briefly knocked him from power, and of committing unspecified ethical lapses." He "said [his] decision was 'irrevocable' and was made because RCTV 'didn't pass the test to receive a renewal of a concession from a state that is serious, responsible, committed and respectful of the people.'"

Candidates Target Incumbent In Argentine Presidential Race. The Financial Times runs profiles today on two candidates for the Argentine presidency. Under the headline, "Menem Preaches His Free Market Gospel," the Financial Times (1/6, Webber) says Carlos Menem "polarises Argentines like few other politicians. His economic policies during a corruption-tainted government in the 1990s are blamed by many for sowing the seeds of the calamitous debt crisis that erupted five years ago, but a quarter of voters were still prepared to have him back in the past elections – and he is betting more will give him another chance now." Labeling him a "Kirchner critic," the Financial Times (1/6, Mander) reports Roberto Lavagna, "the former economy minister who is widely credited with engineering Argentina's rapid economic recovery since its collapse in 2001, has announced that he will run for president in elections due in October." Lavagna "has criticised the government's 'shift to the left' in the past year."

Nuclear Power Said To Enjoy Renaissance Worldwide. A 1,750-word piece on the front page of today's Washington Post (1/6, Struck, 690K) reports, "Faced with evidence that coal- and oil-fired electric plants are overheating the planet, and alarmed by soaring demand for electricity, governments from South America to Asia are turning once again to a power source mostly shunned for two decades as too dangerous and too costly." Noting that 29 plants are under construction worldwide and over 100 more are planned, the Post says officials "are dusting off plans for nuclear plants even though most of the problems that shelved those projects remain." Notably, some experts "contend that the nuclear resurgence is still just talk. In the United States, they note, not a single reactor has been ordered. The high costs and long delays that vexed nuclear construction … soon will diminish the atomic ardor in other countries, they say."

EU Enlargement Said To Force Retooling Of Attitudes Towards Roma. In an op-ed in today's Los Angeles Times (1/6, 850K), author Colum McCann says many Europeans view the EU's three million new Gypsies as "potential problems." He continues, "If a society recognizes itself, and ultimately critiques itself, on how it treats its most downtrodden, then surely the acid test for the EU is its ongoing treatment of the Roma." McCann admits that it is essential "not to turn any culture into a list of sorrows and benedictions," and says the "European call for inclusion is decent and right. The politicians and bureaucrats behind the sound bites mean well. Why not be in the habit of hoping for a better world?" He concludes that "much about Romani history is still wrapped up in a willful forgetfulness," and urges the end of lingering Roma stereotypes.

Writer Pans Anti-Islamic European Sentiment. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/6, A7, 2.04M), Israeli academic Fania Oz-Salzberger says Israelis in Europe "seem to have gained new European friends, and not quite for the right reasons. These new pro-Israel voices base a love of Jews upon the hatred of Muslims." She adds, "Many of these new friends are Muslim-bashers first and Israel-backers second. Their blanket condemnation of Muslim communities on their continent rings eerily familiar. Their sweeping verdict against a whole civilization has that strange déjà-vu feel." Noting that Israel needs "sober, reliable, critical friends" in Europe, Oz-Salzberger concludes, "Israelis probably deserve a better European opinion, warranted by our history, culture, science and freedom. Not for being the targeted foes of Islam. Beware of Islamophobes bearing gifts."

DOJ_NMG_0113676

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"President Urged To Avoid Compromises In Iraq."
"Celebrities Shun Gov.'s Inauguration."
"Tijuana's Police Are Back – Unarmed."
"Sen. Barbara Boxer Rescinds Award."

New York Times:

"House Tightens Disclosure Rules For Pet Projects."
"Images Of Hanging Make Hussein A Martyr To Many."
"A New Commander, In Step With The White House On Iraq."
"Katrina Victims Find A Solution: Modular House."
"Companies Pay Dearly For Technology Trade Show."
"San Franciscans Hurl Their Rage At Parking Patrol."

Washington Post:

"Death In Haditha."
"Pelosi, Reid Urge Bush To Begin Iraq Pullout."
"'Embryo Bank' Stirs Ethics Fears."
"In Somalia, Confusion Remains In Command."
"Something For The Dog That Eats Everything: A Diet Pill."
"In The Global Energy Rush, Nuclear Gets A Resurgence."

Washington Times:

"House OKs Budget Rule Changes."
"Reid, Pelosi Rip Iraq Buildup."
"Democrats Backpedal On 9/11 Commission."
"Jobs, Income Gains Bright Spots In 2006."
"Troops Flee From Border Outpost."
"Fenty, Chief To Put More Cops On Streets."

Detroit Free Press:

"Show-Me Time!"
"Detroit May Shut Up To 52 Schools."
"Behind The Scenes At The Rose Bowl: Part 3."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Arrests Of Call-Girl Clients Expected."
"New Hogzilla Tops 1,000 Pounds."
"Bush Shakes Up War Team."
"More Aquarium Stars."

Dallas Morning News:

"Santeria Leader Fights Euless Ban."
"Plucky 13: Gritty Mavs Top Spurs."
"Family, Friends Gather To Remember Darrent Williams."
"Culbreath Called In To Lead Housing Board."
"Revamp To Take Casa Linda Back To Its Roots."
"'Nice, Little Old Man' Shot, Killed."
"FDA Approves Drug For Obese Dogs."

Houston Chronicle:

"Houston's Terror Risk Draws More Federal Funds."
"Pelosi, Reid Tell Bush 'Bring The War To A Close.'"
"Secret Vote Could Cost Craddick Speaker's Post."
"House Votes To Reveal Pet Projects' Sponsors."
"Harris Seeks Laws To Curb Treasurer, Bad Dogs."
"Houston Panel Targets Convenience Store Crime."
"New U.S. War Chief In Iraq Signals Tactics Change."
"MLK Parade Group Sues Houston Over Event Rules."
"Cool Cats Show Off Their Agility At Houston Show."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: President's Strategy In Iraq; Iraq War Policy Analysis; Congressional View On Iraq/ Spending; Unseasonable Weather; Warm Weather Expected To Continue; Close Call At Denver Airport; Jobs Increase In December; Schwarzeneggar Sworn In; Infant Car Seat Report; Solo Sailor Returning Home; Florida Coastal Trailer Park Windfall.

CBS: Gates Recommends Troop Buildup In Iraq; Military Awaits Troop Buildup Decision; Litvinenko Poisoning Update; Mysterious Weather; Contractor Contract Abuse In Iraq; New Democratic Congress/ Lobbying Reform.

NBC: Warm Winter Weather; Colds Persist In Warm Weather Also; Weather Analysis/ Southern Storms; New Democratic Congress; Homeland Security Spending; US Economy And Jobs; In Depth- Congressional Ethics; Bloody Violence Plagues New Orleans; Update On Former President Bush's Health; Mayfield Retires From National Hurricane Center.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session

US House: Not in session.

DOJ_NMG_0113677

Other: LAW SCHOOLS-CONFERENCE _ Immigration debate, surveillance and security issues are among topics at the Association of American Law Schools Annual Meeting. Over 3,500 law faculty expected to attend. Location: Marriott Wardman Park. Contacts: Elizabeth Patterson, 202-296-5184.

IRAQ DIALOGUE _ 9 a.m. Two days before President Bush will deliver a speech announcing a new course in Iraq, women Nobel Peace Prize Winners Dr. Shirin Ebadi and Professor Jody Williams hold a news conference to call for a constructive US-Iran dialogue and engagement. Location: Old Ebbitt Grill, 675 15th St. NW. Contacts: Carah Ong, 202-378-3334.

BIRTH DEFECTS _ 11 a.m. - 2 p.m. The National Museum of Health and Medicine presents a health fair which will include information on steps women can take to ensure a healthy pregnancy and baby. Information about the most common birth defects will also be available, as well as an exhibition at the museum, "From A Single Cell," which will provide insight into some of the rarest complications that can occur in a pregnancy. Location: National Museum of Health and Medicine, Walter Reed Army Medical Center, 6900 Georgia Ave. and Elder Street NW. Contacts: Jennifer Heilman, 202-782-2671.

AYALON HONORED _ 6 p.m. - 9:30 p.m. A number of Christian groups will honor Israeli Ambassador Daniel Ayalon for the advances made in building bridges of support and understanding for Israel with the American Jewish and Christian communities.The event is sponsored by Love of Israel in cooperation with the Embassy of Israel, with co-sponsors including The International Christian Embassy Jerusalem, Salem Communications, High Adventure Broadcasting, Capital City Church, and the Healing Rooms of DC. Location: Capital Hilton, 1001 16th St. NW. Contacts: Kevin McVicker, 703-739-5920.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Judge Grants Delay In Padilla Mental Exam ... 3

Homeland Response:
McConnell Seen As Likely To Be Weaker DNI Than Negroponte 3
DHS Boosts Funding For Six Major Metropolitan Areas ... 3
Hoyer Admits Not All 9/11 Commission Recommendations Will Be Enacted ... 4
FBI Investigating Death Threat Against California CAIR Leader ... 4
Hatfill Plans To Use Internal Memos In Suit Against NYTimes ... 4
Modular Houses Speed Redevelopment Of Gulf Region ... 5

War News:
In Blunt Letter To Bush, Pelosi And Reid Express Opposition To Iraq Troop Surge ... 5
Khalilzad's Departure Pleases Shiites, Worries Sunnis ... 7
Petraeus Selection Seen As "Important Turn" In US Strategy ... 7
Pace's Future In Doubt ... 8
Hanging Video Makes Saddam "Martyr" To Many Sunnis ... 8
Iraqi Forces To Begin Neighborhood-By-Neighborhood Baghdad Mission ... 8
American, Two Interpreters Abducted Near Basra ... 8
Insurgents Dodge US Forces In Diyala ... 8
Eyewitnesses Say Marines Gunned Down "Five Unarmed Iraqis" In Haditha ... 8
Wilson Claims US Practicing "Catch And Release" Of Al Qaeda In Iraq ... 8
Biden Says Cheney, Rumsfeld "Had To Know How Bad Things Were." ... 8
Contractors Allegedly Defraud US Government In Iraq ... 9
Army To Apologize To Families Of Dead Recipients Of Summonses ... 9
Marine Survivor Remembers Comrade's Sacrifice ... 9
Growing Field Of Flags In New York Town Commemorates Fallen Troops ... 9
Chirac Says France Proven Right On Iraq War ... 9

Corporate Scandals:
10th Circuit Reverses Convictions Of Two Westar Executives ... 10
Former Merrill Lynch Analyst Sentenced For Insider Trading Scheme ... 10
ACS Chair Benefited From Misdated Option ... 10
More Effective Corporate Governance Urged ... 10

Criminal Law:
Media Seeks Daily Audio Tapes Of Libby Trial ... 11
Fraudulent Currency Sales On The Rise ... 11
Convicted Man Challenges CA Law On Police Killings ... 11
Documents Provide New Details Of Ney Bribe ... 11
DOJ "Pushing" FBI To Speed Data Sharing Via OneDOJ Database ... 12
Judge Imposes Light Sentences In Alabama Corruption Case ... 12
Judge Reluctantly Grants Pellicano Request To Represent Himself ... 12
New DC Mayor, Police Chief To Focus On Community Input, Foot Patrols ... 12
Denver Archdiocese Settles Sex Abuse Suits ... 13
New Orleans Terrorized By Wave Of Homicides ... 13

Civil Law:
High Court To Rule On Whistleblower's Suit ... 13
Former Texas Acute-Care Service Settles Medicare Fraud Suit For $7.5 Million ... 13
Bankruptcy Judge Approves Delphi Debt Refinancing Plan ... 14

Civil Rights:
EEOC Says DOJ Wrongly Fired Alabama Prosecutor ... 14
Indiana Jailers Suspended As FBI Launches Probe Of Inmate Beating ... 14
Federal Suit Alleges Racial Bias In Falls Church Police Department ... 15
Man Accused Of Fatal Mississippi Jail Assault Given Videotape 15
North Carolina Man Dies After Police Use Taser To Restrain Him ... 15
SCOTUS To Hear Coca-Cola's Appeal Of Racial Discrimination Case ... 15
WPost Troubled By Christian Embassy Pentagon Video ... 15

Antitrust:
DOJ Asks For More Information On Brooks Automation's Sale Of Software Division ... 16
Buyout Pair Sees Bargain In McClatchy Purchase ... 16
Iowa Hospital Declines Merger Offer ... 16

Environment:
DOJ Drops Probe Of Florida Waste-Water Dumping ... 17
Ohio Cities Sue Lead Paint Manufacturers ... 17

ANWR Drilling Ban Introduced In House 17
DuPont Drops Plan To Dump Nerve Gas Wastewaster..... 17
Reports Identify Five New Mercury Contamination Sites In North America 17
NYTimes Encouraged By Boxer's Pledge To Curb Carbon Dioxide Emissions..... 18
Navy Urged Not To Harm Whales 18

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Appoints Brink Mississippi SAC 18
Former El Paso SAC Sentenced To Six Months In Prison..... 18
IG Report Finds DEA Agents Mishandled Seized Cash..... 18
Federal Agencies Team To Fight Florida Gang Violence..... 19
FBI Investigating Bomb Left At Louisiana Church, Offers $5000 Reward..... 19

Immigration:

Gunmen Force National Guard Troops Along Mexican Border To Retreat..... 19

Congress-Administration:

House Passes Earmark Reform, "Pay-Go" Rules By Wide Margin 19
Democrats Expected To Oppose Making Bush Tax Cuts Permanent 21
Democratic Medicare Bill Lacks Formulary To Pressure Drug Firms 21
Boxer Will Lead Senate Ethics Panel In Johnson's Absence..... 22
Records Of White House Visitors Not Open To Public..... 22
Roberts Credited With Making SCOTUS More Accessible To Media 22
White House Seeks "Proven Combatant" For Counsel..... 23
NYTimes Blasts FDA Over Decision On Cloned Animals..... 23

Other News:

Jobs Were Created At 2006's Highest Rate In December..... 23
Biden Expects To Create Exploratory Committee This Month.... 24
Brownback To Enter Presidential Race On January 20 24
Owens Joins Romney's Senior Advisory Team..... 24
Giuliani Playbook Offers Self-Assessment Of Potential Liabilities24
Obama To Address Virginia Democrats Next Month 25
McAuliffe Blasts Kerry In Memoir..... 25
Candidate For New Hampshire Democratic Chair Withdraws 25
Schwarzenegger Begins Second Term By Claiming Centrist Mantle 25
O'Malley To Tour Maryland In Week Before Inaugural 25
NYTimes Says Spitzer Has Big Ambitions For New York..... 26
"Embryo Brokerage" Stirs Bioethics Debate 26
Former President Bush Recovering Well From Surgery 26
California Legislators Approve Reagan Bust For Capitol Rotunda26
Ex-Commerce Secretary Verity Dies At 89..... 26
WSJournal Says Sheehan Is Democrats' "Problem Now." 26
Ford Remembered On NYTimes Op-Ed Page..... 26
Rice, South Korea's Song Laud Resumption Of Nuclear Talks, Discount Likelihood Of Test..... 26
Beijing Asks Tehran To Consider Sanctions, Talks..... 27
US Diplomat To Be First To Visit Mogadishu In Over A Decade 27
Hamas-Fatah Violence Continues Ahead Of Rice Visit..... 27
Tanzanian Foreign Minister Will Be Number Two At UN..... 28
Chinese Fed Raises Reserve Requirements 28
Zimbabwe Offers Long-Term Land Leases To Some White Farmers..... 29
Warsaw Archbishop Collaborated With Soviet Secret Police..... 29
Chavez Will Not Renew License Of Venezuela's Largest Television Network..... 29
Candidates Target Incumbent In Argentine Presidential Race.... 29
Nuclear Power Said To Enjoy Renaissance Worldwide..... 29
EU Enlargement Said To Force Retooling Of Attitudes Towards Roma 30
Writer Pans Anti-Islamic European Sentiment..... 30

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 30

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 31

DOJ_NMG_0113680

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Grants Delay In Padilla Mental Exam. The AP (1/6, Anderson) reports from Miami, "A federal judge on Friday gave prison officials another week to complete mental examinations to determine if alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla is competent to stand trial." The AP continues, "Bureau of Prisons officials sought an even longer delay until Jan. 30. They said in court papers that Padilla is not "compliant with psychological testing" and must be observed by staff members to complete the evaluation. The documents provided no further details. … The tests were originally supposed to be completed by Friday." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke insisted that the examinations be finished before the scheduled Jan. 22 trial date so she can rule on a number of other outstanding issues, including Padilla's claim that the case should be dismissed because he was tortured during 3½ years in military custody as an 'enemy combatant.' … 'This court cannot proceed to trial until these motions are adequately resolved,' Cooke said in a two-page order Friday. … Justice Department and Pentagon officials have repeatedly denied the torture allegations." The AP notes, "Cooke gave prisons officials until next Friday to finish the evaluation of Padilla and until Jan. 16 to deliver a competency report to her. Two mental experts hired by defense lawyers have concluded that Padilla suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder and is unable to adequately assist his attorneys. … Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen, is charged along with two others in the U.S. with being part of a support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to violent Islamic extremists around the world. All three have pleaded not guilty. Two others charged in the case are in custody overseas."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

McConnell Seen As Likely To Be Weaker DNI Than Negroponte. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Miller, 850K) reports, "The main question surrounding J. Michael McConnell's nomination to be the next intelligence chief is whether he is forceful enough to keep an already ill-defined job from sliding into irrelevancy. When the position of national intelligence director was created two years ago, even lawmakers who drafted legislation that created the job acknowledged that its actual authority is not clear." John Negroponte "spent much of his tenure trying to consolidate his control over the intelligence community. … In turning to McConnell, the White House 'went from Negroponte, who was a pretty significant figure, to a less significant one,' said a senior government official involved in creating the director's post. If McConnell is not able to impose his will on the 16 intelligence agencies that fall under his responsibility, 'it could be the beginning of the end of the DNI's office,' the official said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly." AFP (1/5, Knox) reports President Bush "named a new spy chief and filled a critical diplomatic vacancy as he put the last touches on a retooled Iraq strategy that critics charge may escalate the war." BBC.com (1/5) profiles McConnell.

Roemer Critical Of Negroponte Departure. Ex-Rep. Tim Roemer, who served on the 9/11 Commission, said on Fox News (1/5), "Certainly change can be good and it is needed in Iraq. We need better policy there and we need to make some switches and changes. But musical chairs at this new director of national intelligence is the last thing we need. We have had a vacant number two position when General Mike Hayden left to go to the CIA. And now, with Ambassador Negroponte leaving, we've lost the quarterback who manages and coordinates the intelligence for 16 different agencies. So this kind of destabilizing impact at DNI is the last thing we need."

DHS Boosts Funding For Six Major Metropolitan Areas. NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 5, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A big change to report tonight in the Department of Homeland Security's formula for giving out millions of dollars in federal money to help this nation's cities defend themselves against future terrorist attacks. That formula has now changed. Many of those cities are saying it is about time." NBC (P. Williams): "In a big change, homeland security says it will commitment in advance over half its urban security -- this picture is worrying about how to protect the most people from the greatest risks most of the time. Six areas, New York, New Jersey, Washington, D.C., Chicago, Houston and L.A. and San Francisco will get 55% of urban area grants."

The Washington Post (1/6, A6, Hsu, 690K) reports, "Chastened by complaints about poor federal cooperation and by controversy over its slashing of aid to New York and Washington last year, the Department of Homeland Security will reserve about $100 million of the $747 million it will dole out to U.S. cities this year to pay for police counterterrorism operations in six metropolitan areas, officials said yesterday. In announcing changes in style and substance to the Urban Area Security Initiative (UASI) program, Secretary Michael Chertoff cited a 'secretary's prerogative to sometimes inject common sense' to grant calculations based on the risk of terrorism and a subjective rating of the effectiveness of local anti-terrorism programs. … For the first time, DHS designated six high-risk urban areas -- New York and northern New Jersey; the Washington region; Los Angeles-Long Beach; Chicago; the San Francisco Bay area; and Houston." Chertoff "cited the threat of 'homegrown terrorism' in encouraging the funding of law-enforcement-led domestic intelligence 'fusion centers.'" However, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, "said DHS also made 'ill-advised' changes to a $509 million state grant program, down $19 million from last year, by eliminating population density as a factor and changing the minimum amount each state can receive."

DOJ_NMG_0113681

Newsday (1/6, Eisenberg) reports Chertoff announced that New York and northern New Jersey "would be considered a single area for homeland security planning" and "denied that linking two states and 15 counties (including Nassau and Suffolk) would mean less money for New York. 'There is nothing about this to suggest New York is going to get a grant cut,' he said. … But not everyone was convinced the process had been sufficiently improved. 'Based on last year's ridiculous allocations, and DHS's indication that once again it will use the peer review process, New Yorkers have every reason to be skeptical,'" said Sen. Charles Schumer. Rep. Peter King, ranking member of the House Homeland Security Committee "and a leading critic of last year's cuts, was…cautiously optimistic." The New York Times (1/6, B2, Lipton, 1.16M) reports New York City "will be able for the first time to use federal grant dollars to pay basic salaries of police officers assigned to counterterrorism tasks, like guarding city bridges and subway tunnels. … New York City officials welcomed the rule change, for which they had lobbied over several years. Previously, while some use of grant dollars was allowed for overtime, federal officials pushed cities to use the money to buy antiterrorism equipment like gas masks or surveillance systems rather than for salaries."

The Houston Chronicle (1/6, A1, Hedges, 530K) reports, "Houston's energy industry and port system are considered prime potential targets for terrorists, officials said, and the area's population size as well as its location relatively close to an international border were also considered by federal officials."

Hoyer Admits Not All 9/11 Commission Recommendations Will Be Enacted. The Washington Times (1/6, A1, Debose, 88K) reports House Democrats "campaigned on a promise to implement the recommendations of the September 11 commission, but now say they will not enact all of them. The recommendation to place all intelligence agencies under the Defense Department 'is not on the table,'" said Majority Leader Steny Hoyer. The Times goes on to report that "another obstacle to enacting all the commission reforms as promised is the formula by which federal anti-terrorism money is distributed across the country. House Democrats are confident they can pass a bill in which funds would be distributed based on risk. … But such a plan almost certainly will be killed in the Democratic-controlled Senate."

FBI Investigating Death Threat Against California CAIR Leader. The AP (1/6, Lawrence) reported, "The FBI said Friday it is investigating a death threat sent to the leader of a local Muslim group after U.S. Sen. Barbara Boxer rescinded a certificate her office had awarded to him. Special Agent Karen Ernst said the bureau launched an investigation after Basim Elkarra reported receiving a threatening e-mail." The AP notes, "Nihad Awad, CAIR's national executive director, thanked the FBI for investigating and urged Boxer to 'examine the agendas of those who seek to marginalize and disenfranchise American Muslims.' Elkarra said the death threat was sent Dec. 30, the day after an article about Boxer rescinding the certificate appeared on Newsweek magazine's Web site. He said he also received another e-mail he described as hate mail when CAIR announced the award."

The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Khalil) reported on Boxer's decision to rescind the certificate, noting that CAIR "has a complicated relationship with federal law enforcement agencies. Former FBI counterterrorism chief Steven Pomerantz once said the council's activities 'effectively give aid to international terrorist groups.' But council representatives say they frequently meet with senior FBI officials, and the group has helped train FBI agents in how to interact with the American Muslim community." The Times added, "The council has responded to Boxer's snub by demanding a meeting with the senator — an option Boxer said she would welcome — and rallying supporters of various faiths."

Hatfill Plans To Use Internal Memos In Suit Against NYTimes. The New York Times (1/6, A12, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "A lawyer for a former government scientist who is suing The New York Times for defamation over a series of columns about the deadly anthrax mailings of 2001 said Friday in court that he was prepared to introduce an internal e-mail message from a senior Times editor that raised questions about one of the columns. The lawyer, Mark A. Grannis, said the columns written by Nicholas D. Kristof about the federal investigation of the mailings unfairly damaged the reputation of his client, Dr. Stephen A. Hatfill, a former germ warfare scientist. … Mr. Grannis told Judge Claude M. Hilton of Federal District Court here that if the trial proceeded he would introduce evidence including a May 23, 2002, message from Philip Taubman, then deputy editor of the editorial page, raising questions about a draft of a column by Mr. Kristof." The Washington Post (1/6, A6, Markon, 690K) reports, "In the 2002 columns, Kristof criticized the FBI, saying it had failed to aggressively pursue a scientist he first identified as 'Mr. Z.' He wrote that the biodefense community had called Mr. Z a 'likely culprit,' partly because the scientist was familiar with anthrax."

DOJ_NMG_0113682

The AP (1/6) reports, "U.S. District Judge Claude Hilton said he will rule on the newspaper's motion soon. The trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 29. … Hilton previously ordered Kristof to disclose his confidential FBI sources so Hatfill could pursue his claim. Kristof refused, and in response Hilton barred Kristof from relying on any information provided by those sources in his defense." The AP notes, "Hatfill's lawsuit was dismissed by Hilton in 2004 but reinstated by a federal appeals court. Hatfill is also suing former Attorney General John Ashcroft, the Justice Department and others in U.S. District Court in Washington claiming they violated Hatfill's civil rights."

Modular Houses Speed Redevelopment Of Gulf Region. The New York Times (1/6, A1, Eaton, 1.16M) reports that before Hurrican katrina modular houses "were almost unknown in Mississippi, where houses tended to be the traditional 'stick built' on site or mobile homes. … But since the storm, modular houses…are starting to appear across the Gulf Coast, as public officials and private citizens search for ways to speed the slow pace of recovery and begin experimenting with new forms of shelter."

WAR NEWS:

In Blunt Letter To Bush, Pelosi And Reid Express Opposition To Iraq Troop Surge. News coverage again focuses on the new Democratic rulers on Capitol Hill, this time focusing on the joint letter from House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid to President Bush stating their opposition to a troop surge in Iraq. ABC World News (1/5, lead story, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "No one knows for sure exactly what the President is going to propose next week, as a new strategy for Iraq. But it would seem a lot of the leaders of Congress don't like what they think he'll say. ... A number of Congressional leaders newly back in Washington are objecting to the idea of a surge, an increase of troops in Iraq." ABC (Raddatz): "Before he has even uttered a word, Democrats are strongly criticizing the plan. In a letter to the President today, top Democratic leaders wrote that 'adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point.'"

NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 4, 2:15, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Democrats wasted little time challenging the President over Iraq, objecting to the expected call for a surge of troops and saying that would be a serious mistake. ... today with the details of a troop surge already public, Democratic leaders shot it down, insisting they should come home in four to six months." The CBS Evening News (1/5, lead story, 3:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) said Pelosi and Reid "wrote that adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point. The President heard the same message when he met with Senators ... But it does not appear the President will take their advice when he outlines his new Iraq strategy next week."

On ABC World News (1/5, story 2, 1:20, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said of Democrats and the surge, "If they can't stop it, they have to make clear where they stand. They're taking aim at the reconstruction and jobs money. They're going to take direct aim at that. And they do believe they can cut that back a bit."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/5, Bash) reported, "What Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi are arguing for is something that we have heard also for quite a while, is that troops should not be going into Iraq, rather, they should be coming out. And that they should start a withdrawal at the White House, at the Pentagon, in about four to six months. Now, again, we have heard that message before. But it is something that has a new kind of importance, if you will, given the fact that it's clear now that Congress is going to add some heightened scrutiny to the White House when it comes to Iraq. And it's not just coming from Democrats. Republicans are being a lot more vocal about what they want to see in Iraq, too."

The Washington Post (1/6, A1, Baker, Wright, 690K) reports that Pelosi and Reid "warned President Bush that sending more U.S. troops to Iraq would be unacceptable to the Democratic majorities that have just taken over Congress." While the two top Democrats "sent a signal that the new congressional leadership intends to be aggressive in voicing opposition to Bush's handling of the war," they have "eschewed using the main legislative mechanism to change policy, namely cutting off funding for the war." The New York Times (1/6, A7, Sanger, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports the possibility of "a major confrontation over a new war strategy." Although "not all Democrats" agree with Pelosi and Reid, "the release of the letter suggests that a major political battle may be brewing."

The AP (1/6, Flaherty) reports Republicans are "joining Democrats in raising eyebrows before the president even has a chance to make his case." Sen. Susan Collins and Rep. Heather Wilson are quoted expressing skepticism, and the AP adds that "even Sen. John McCain, a Republican who advocates sending more troops in Iraq, said he wouldn't support sending in the additional forces unless the number was adequate enough to finally tamp down the violence." Wilson appeared on MSNBC (1/5, O'Donnell) to discuss her opposition to a surge, saying, "I don't think we're focusing on America's vital interests. And the soaring rhetoric about making Iraq a point of democracy, a model for others, is far beyond our vital interests."

DOJ_NMG_0113683

The Washington Times (1/6, A1, Dinan, 88K) reports that the Pelosi-Reid letter "puts them out in front of Mr. Bush's speech next week, filling the vacuum created as the president works out his new strategy and earning them part of the discussion on the Sunday political talk shows." In other shows of Democrats' "newfound muscle," Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden "announced a schedule of four weeks of hearings to look at U.S. strategy in Iraq, while Sen. Edward M. Kennedy," who heads the "Judiciary Committee's immigration and refugees subcommittee, will hold a hearing on Iraqi refugees."

RollCall.com (1/5, Stanton) reports that in the "sharply worded" letter, Pelosi and Reid "called the plan little more than a retread" of earlier, failed strategies. On its web site, The Hill (1/5, Schor) reports that Reid "said he heeded the words from U.S. commanders in Iraq who also rejected the surge." BBC.com (1/5) calls the Pelosi-Reid letter "an aggressive move from the Democrats, setting the stage for a huge political battle."

Democrats Fear Inability To Stop Surge. The Boston Globe (1/6, Bender, 413K) reports, "Despite taking both houses of Congress on an antiwar platform, party leaders worry they can't do much to stop the president -- short of the politically unpalatable move of ending funding for the war. ... Some congressional aides raised the prospect that lawmakers could place conditions on war funding, such as refusing to pay for additional military brigades. But they doubted such measures would have any effect: As a wartime commander in chief, Bush can simply ignore them." Skepticism of the surge plan "has come from a variety of quarters, including the top military brass."

Gates Reportedly Recommends Surge To Bush. The CBS Evening News (1/5, lead story, 3:15, Martin, 7.66M) reported Defense Secretary Robert Gates "has recommended that President ordered an immediate buildup of 10,000 US troops in Iraq plus an option of doubling that to 20,000 by next spring. The plan is known as 'Five Plus Two' -- five Army brigades into Baghdad, plus two Marine battalions into western Iraq. Two of the Army brigades would go into Baghdad starting in January, with the other three on call. ... It would need to last a year and a half." The CBS Evening News (1/5, story 2, 2:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) additionally reported, "No Americans are more eager to hear the President's new strategy next week then members of the armed forces and their families."

McConnell Says "The President Believes That We Can Win In Iraq." Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/5, Blitzer), "The President is in charge of tactics in the war. I think he knows that the Democrats basically would like to withdraw as rapidly as possible. There are many of the rest of us who think that the strategy ought to be to prevail. … I think our goals still ought to be to prevail there, and to have a stable country that's an ally on the war on terror. And it's also important, Wolf, to remember that we haven't been attacked again here at home for five years. It's not an accident. Being on offense in Afghanistan and Iraq has made a positive difference in protecting America here at home. … I just came from a meeting with the President this afternoon on this subject. I think the President believes that we can win in Iraq. I think he believes the strategy that he's going to be announcing next week is an essential component part of success there. And I think the majority of Republicans in the House and Senate are likely to stick with the President on this very important decision."

McCain, Lieberman Back Surge. The Financial Times (1/6, Luce) reports Sen. John McCain, "the leading Republican presidential hopeful," endorsed a report by the American Enterprise Institute "neo-conservative think-tank…that many see as the basis for the 'new way forward in Iraq' strategy that George W. Bush will unveil next week. Mr McCain, who shared a platform with Joe Lieberman, the independent Democratic senator and former vice-presidential candidate, said Mr Bush's expected 'surge' of US forces to Iraq should persist until the job of stabilising the security situation has been achieved. ... The two senators strongly rejected the Democratic leadership's call for a timeline for the phased withdrawal of US troops from Iraq, which they said would play into the hands of the insurgent groups and militias which would simply await the expiry of the deadline."

Surge Supporters Urge Avoidance Of Preconditions. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, A1, Spiegel, Reynolds, 850K) reports, "The leading advocates of an increase in U.S. forces in Iraq warned President Bush on Friday that any buildup lasting less than 18 months was doomed to fail, and urged the White House to avoid compromises that would scale back the plan." Senator McCain called a "short, small surge" the "worst of all worlds." However, "Bush faces growing unease about an extended buildup among some congressional Republicans, who are concerned that it could stretch into the 2008 election season and doom their reelection chances. In the Senate, there are about five to 10 such Republicans, according to GOP aides, who are expected to push for time limits or firm conditions in return for backing the increase."

ABC Says Senate Would Oppose War Resolution Today. ABC World News (1/5, story 3, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "ABC's Jake Tapper and our Congressional team wanted to know Senators who voted for the war think now, in hindsight. In October 2002, the vote was 77-23 to authorize war. Now, Jake's tally indicates the vote would flip to 43 in favor and 57 opposed."

DOJ_NMG_0113684

Television Commentary On Surge Debate. On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (1/5), host Dobbs commented on a recent statement by a State Department official that "instead of a surge, it is a bump." Dobbs said, "These are silly word games at a time when we have men and women in uniform being wounded and killed. Is it fair to say, if we may extricate ourselves from the games that are often played there, no matter how serious the issues around the world facing our men and women in uniform, is it fair to say that it's a time for honesty and straightforward discussion of these issues and less of this nonsense and artificial language?"

On MSNBC's Tucker (1/5, Carlson), A.B. Stoddard, associate editor of The Hill, said, "I really think that there's going to be sort of a unified attack from the Democratic side against the surge. I think that these words from Carl Levin, the Armed Services chairman on the Senate side, about being open to a surge with certain conditions, conditions we know Bush is not going to agree to, is just kind of happy talk at this point. I think generally speaking, the Democrats are opposed to surge. And there's opposition building in the Republican Party as well."

The New Republic's Michael Crowley said on MSNBC's Tucker (1/5, Carlson), "I don't really understand what happened with Reid, because I think he had actually previously kind of taken back that statement that he made on a Sunday show a couple of weeks ago. I actually don't think this is a brand-new position for him. He's kind of hinted that he didn't mean that he supported the surge. And I honestly don't know what he meant to say in the first place."

Khalilzad's Departure Pleases Shiites, Worries Sunnis. The Washington Post (1/6, A12, Partlow, 690K) reports, "The news of the expected departure of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad split Iraqi politicians along sectarian lines, with members of the ruling Shiite alliance voicing eagerness for him to leave and minority Sunnis expressing concern at the loss of an ally. Members of the U.S.-backed government in Iraq have grown increasingly frustrated with what they see as Khalilzad's efforts to reach out to Sunni groups, and many argue that the U.S. military confronts Shiite militias more aggressively than it does Sunni insurgents." On the other hand, "Sunni lawmakers said Khalilzad's deep knowledge of Iraq's complex political landscape and his openness to Sunni concerns will be missed. Khalilzad is a Sunni Muslim of Afghan descent."

The New York Times (1/6, A8, Cooper, 1.16M) says Khalilzad "earned a reputation as a high-flying, independent, smooth operator — an Afghan-born problem solver who worked with two fragile countries recently invaded by the United States to try to cobble together stability." Reviewing his performance in Afghanistan and Iraq, the Times says that in Afghanistan he "became known for his ability to weave through warring tribal factions and his ability to quickly get senior Afghan officials on the phone or to summon them to his office, including President Hamid Karzai." In Iraq, "he failed the task of bringing stability, but succeeded in helping Iraqis to agree on a Constitution. Arriving in Baghdad, he quickly recognized that his marching instructions from Washington -- that Iraq's Constitution should reflect a strong central government with strong control over the country's oil resources -- were not achievable."

Ambassador-Designate Crocker Profiled. The New York Times (1/6, A8, Shane, 1.16M) reports admiringly on US Ambassador to Iraq-designate Ryan Crocker that when he "was trying to improve his Arabic in the late 1970s, he traveled to Jordan, made contact with a desert tribe and settled in for some hands-on training a little different from the standard State Department regimen. 'He wound up being a shepherd for a week or two, chasing down stray sheep and living with the Bedouin,'" said an associate. Crocker has amassed "a record of Middle East and South Asia experience possibly unrivaled in the United States Foreign Service. He has served as ambassador to Lebanon, Kuwait, Syria and, since 2004, Pakistan. He reopened the American Embassy in Afghanistan after the fall of the Taliban. And he knows Iraq well; he worked there in the 1970s, led the State Department's Iraq-Kuwait task force during the Persian Gulf war in 1991 and returned to Baghdad for four months after the 2003 invasion as director of governance for the Coalition Provisional Authority.

Petraeus Selection Seen As "Important Turn" In US Strategy. The New York Times (1/6, A1, Gordon, 1.16M) reports, "The selection of Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus to serve as the senior American commander in Iraq signals an important turn in United States strategy. As a supporter of increased forces in Iraq," Petraeus "is expected to back a rapid five-brigade expansion, in sharp contrast to his predecessor, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who has been openly skeptical that additional troops would help stabilize the country." Petraeus, overseer of the new counterinsurgency manual, "is also likely to change the American military operation in Baghdad. American forces can be expected to take up positions in neighborhoods throughout the capital instead of limiting themselves to conducting patrols from large, fortified bases in and around the city." Under Casey, "the principal focus has been on transferring security responsibilities to the Iraqi security forces, so American troops could gradually withdraw. Now, the emphasis will shift to protecting the Iraqi population from sectarian strife and insurgent attacks."

On the CBS Evening News (1/5, lead story, 3:15, 7.66M), David Martin reported more critically of Petraeus, "The new commander in Iraq" is "perhaps the most controversial officer in the Army because of his type A personality and what many view as his too-cozy relationship with the media."

DOJ_NMG_0113685

Pace's Future In Doubt. The Washington Times (1/6, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "With President Bush replacing his two top field generals for Iraq, speculation has arisen in the Pentagon about the long-term future of his principal military adviser, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace." A White House spokesman "said yesterday he does not know the president's plans regarding Gen. Pace."

Hanging Video Makes Saddam "Martyr" To Many Sunnis. The New York Times (1/6, Fattah, 1.16M) reports on its front page, "In the week since Saddam Hussein was hanged in an execution steeped in sectarian overtones, his public image in the Arab world, formerly that of a convicted dictator, has undergone a resurgence of admiration and awe. On the streets, in newspapers and over the Internet, Mr. Hussein has emerged as a Sunni Arab hero who stood calm and composed as his Shiite executioners tormented and abused him. ... By standing up to the United States and its client government in Baghdad and dying with seeming dignity, Mr. Hussein appears to have been virtually cleansed of his past. … Many across the region began looking at him as a martyr."

Iraqi Forces To Begin Neighborhood-By-Neighborhood Baghdad Mission. The AP (1/6, Hurst, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "Iraqi forces backed by U.S. troops will begin a neighborhood-by-neighborhood assault on militants in the capital this weekend as a first step in the new White House strategy to contain Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads," according to key advisers to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

American, Two Interpreters Abducted Near Basra. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Moore, 850K) reports, "A U.S. civilian contractor and two Iraqi interpreters were kidnapped Friday near the southern city of Basra, Iraqi police officials said. Police Col. Kareem Azaidi in Basra said witnesses saw gunmen in a civilian car, a pickup and two police vehicles cut off the captives' car and take them hostage." A US Embassy spokesman did not identify the victims; "the fate of the American contractor was unknown, but the two Iraqis were later found dead, the Associated Press reported."

Insurgents Dodge US Forces In Diyala. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Zavis, 850K) reports, "Time and again, U.S. forces in Iraq have staged major assaults on known insurgent hide-outs only to have key individuals melt away. As with other operations, the military is attempting to dislodge insurgents from their hiding places in Diyala province, then sweep them into known escape routes where they can be intercepted. But the area's sunken irrigation canals, vast agricultural fields, seldom-traveled back roads and widely scattered hamlets have given guerrillas innumerable ways to avoid capture." Officials say the rebels "use spotters, infiltrators in Iraqi security forces and contacts on or near U.S. bases to stay abreast of American troop movements." Insurgents rarely stage "platoon-sized attacks," preferring to "hit and run. ... After the U.S. eventually withdraws, the insurgents often return."

Eyewitnesses Say Marines Gunned Down "Five Unarmed Iraqis" In Haditha. The Washington Post (1/6, A1, White, 690K) reports, "U.S. Marines gunned down five unarmed Iraqis who stumbled onto the scene of a 2005 roadside bombing in Haditha, Iraq, according to eyewitness accounts that are part of a lengthy investigative report obtained by The Washington Post. Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, the squad's leader, shot the men one by one after Marines ordered them out of a white taxi in the moments following the explosion, which killed one Marine and injured two others, witnesses told investigators. Another Marine fired rounds into their bodies as they lay on the ground. ... The report, which relied on hundreds of interviews with Marines, Iraqi soldiers and civilian survivors conducted months after the incident, presents a fragmented and sometimes conflicting chronicle of the violence that day. But taken together, the accounts provide evidence that as the Marines came under attack, they responded in ways that are difficult to reconcile with their rules of engagement."

Wilson Claims US Practicing "Catch And Release" Of Al Qaeda In Iraq. CNN.com (1/5) reports, "The U.S. military already knows what half of its most-wanted terrorist targets look like because they have been apprehended and photographed in the past, a Republican congresswoman said Friday." Rep. Heather Wilson said a "senior official told her that the U.S. military already has photographs of 'fully half of the high-value al Qaeda targets in Iraq' presently being hunted. 'They're wearing orange jumpsuits in the mugshots we took of them when we captured them the first time,' Wilson recalled the official telling her. 'We are operating a catch and release program for al Qaeda in Iraq. This is inexcusable and frustrating ... for the young men and women in the military who are in the fight,' she added."

Biden Says Cheney, Rumsfeld "Had To Know How Bad Things Were." Sen. Joseph Biden said on CNN's The Situation Room (1/5, Blitzer), "I start with the premise that Vice President Cheney and Secretary Rumsfeld are very smart guys. I've known them and worked around them and with them for the last 30 years. They're very bright. I could not believe…that the last three years they actually thought we were making progress. I could not believe the assertions about them saying we've trained up Iraqis and we're doing so well, that they actually believed. And so I've reached the conclusion that they had to know how bad things were, but they had to have reached one of two conclusions: either the radical change necessary in order to get this back on the right path was something they weren't willing to recommend, or two, they concluded that the best thing to do is keep this stitched together and hand it off to the next president."

DOJ_NMG_0113686

Contractors Allegedly Defraud US Government In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (1/5, story 5, 3:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The US government has spent a fortune in Iraq. At least $437 billion so far, according to Congress, and up to $100 billion more will be spent this year. Much of it goes to 60,000 civilian contractors involved in reconstruction and providing services to our troops. But the Pentagon recently admitted it has a hard time accounting for how that money is being spent and the billions that may be lost to waste and fraud." CBS (Keteyian): "This document, part of a whistle- blower lawsuit obtained by CBS News, alleges a blueprint of contractor abuse in Iraq, detailing how the government was billed ten times more than it should have been when US troops used a recreation facility in Iraq. ... The contractor in question, Kellogg, Brown and Root, denies any wrongdoing." Sen. Patrick Leahy: "We're talking about huge amounts of money. And eventually, we're going to have a bill for about $1 trillion over there, and people aren't going to be able to account for very, very large amounts of it."

Army To Apologize To Families Of Dead Recipients Of Summonses. The AP (1/5) reports, "The Army said Friday it would apologize to the families of about 275 officers killed or wounded in action who were mistakenly sent letters urging them to return to active duty. The letters were sent a few days after Christmas to more than 5,100 Army officers who had recently left the service. Included were letters to about 75 officers killed in action and about 200 wounded in action. ... The Army did not say how or when the mistake was discovered. It said the database normally used for such correspondence with former officers had been 'thoroughly reviewed' to remove the names of wounded or dead soldiers."

Marine Survivor Remembers Comrade's Sacrifice. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, Phillips, 2.04M) has a front-page feature on former USMC Cpl. Kelly Miller, who lived because the late Cpl. Jason Dunham "intentionally took the brunt of a live grenade and gave his own life to save Cpl. Miller's." Miller's survivor's guilt is described. The Journal adds, "At the White House on Thursday, President Bush will present Cpl. Dunham's parents with the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest award for military valor, the first such award for a Marine since Vietnam. ... In the audience will sit Cpl. Miller, a 23-year-old still struggling with what it means to receive that much love."

Growing Field Of Flags In New York Town Commemorates Fallen Troops. The New York Times (1/6, B1, Santos, 1.16M) reports from Middle Grove, New York., "From afar, the flags look like clumsily painted dots, an amateur installation of elusive meaning. A closer look yields a clue: a laminated sign with bold black numbers that match the number of flags on the field, numbers that climb almost by the day. On Sunday, there were 3,000 yellow flags on the ground. By Thursday, five more." Caren Crootof "makes the flags, cutting the plastic with scissors at her kitchen table. ... The field of flags is at once poignant and terrifying, plain yet powerful for those who have taken notice in this out-of-the-way town of 2,300 in northeastern New York State."

Many Fallen Troops Came From Small Towns. The Financial Times (1/6, Luce) writes, "Every night at the end of Jim Lehrer's NewsHour on America's PBS channel, there is a roll call of American soldiers who died in Iraq that day. ... Obscure towns such as Hollidaysburg, Pennsylvania, Wolfeboro Falls, New Hampshire and Thermopolis, Wyoming, dominate the listings rather than the big cities." A "breakdown of their ethnicity and states of origins shows they are overwhelmingly white and from small towns in the interior states of mid-America and the south."

Chirac Says France Proven Right On Iraq War. The New York Times (1/6, A7, Sciolino, 1.16M) reports, "In a scathing attack of the American-led war in Iraq, President Jacques Chirac said Friday that his predictions that the war would spread chaos and more terrorism had come true. 'As France had foreseen and feared, the war in Iraq has sparked upheavals that have yet to show their full effects,' Mr. Chirac said ... The single paragraph on Iraq in a speech that addressed many crises and problems around the world was one of Mr. Chirac's most pointed justifications for France's decision to oppose the invasion of Iraq in 2003." The message was "surprising" because "the 74-year-old French president tended to avoid reminding the United States of its failures there." However, "as Mr. Chirac seems unlikely to run for a third term in presidential elections this spring, he may feel he has little to lose in being blunt in defending what some French political analysts call the high point of his foreign policy in his 12-year presidency."

DOJ_NMG_0113687

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

10th Circuit Reverses Convictions Of Two Westar Executives. The AP (1/6, Press) reports from Kansas City, MO, "An appeals court on Friday overturned convictions against two former executives of Westar Energy who were accused of 'looting' the Kansas utility and said the most serious charges cannot be retried." The AP continues, "The United States Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit said the case against the former chief executive, David Wittig, and the former chief strategy officer, Douglas Lake, 'hung by a thin legal thread,' based on claims that the men tried to hide their personal use of corporate aircraft from securities officials. … Those claims led jurors in September 2005 to convict Mr. Wittig on 39 counts of conspiracy, wire fraud, money laundering and circumventing of internal controls, and to convict Mr. Lake on 30 counts. Mr. Wittig was sentenced in April 2006 to 18 years; Mr. Lake received 15 years. … But the three-judge panel said prosecutors did not provide evidence that the two men failed to comply with federal regulations." The AP adds, "Without that evidence, the court said, Mr. Wittig and Mr. Lake are not guilty of wire fraud and cannot be retried on those counts. In addition, the panel threw out the money laundering counts, which were based on the wire fraud, and said those cannot be retried. The court sent back the remaining conspiracy and circumvention counts for trial. … The decision was a blow to federal prosecutors, who have now failed twice to convict the two men. Their first trial ended in a mistrial."

Former Merrill Lynch Analyst Sentenced For Insider Trading Scheme. The AP (1/6, Neumeister) reports, "A former analyst at Merrill Lynch & Co. Inc. who pleaded guilty to insider trading was sentenced Friday to 37 months in prison for his part in a sprawling scheme that used chatty investment bankers and leaked copies of a market-moving magazine." The AP continues, "Stanislav Shpigelman, 24, had admitted tipping other participants who made more than $6.7 million from October 2004 to August 2005. At the time, he worked in Merrill Lynch's mergers and acquisitions division." The AP adds, "In a plea deal he signed with prosecutors, Shpigelman admitted to a single count of conspiracy to commit insider trading in return for a recommendation that he serve between three and four years in prison. .. His lawyer, Mary Mulligan, and family members asked U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Karas to sentence Shpigelman to less than three years in prison." The AP notes, "Karas, though, called Shpigelman the 'critical component' in a scheme that could make others millions of dollars, though Shpigelman conceded receiving only $10,000 for providing tips to several mergers and acquisitions."

The New York Post (1/6, Whitman) reported, "Judge Karas said he imposed the jail term with a 'heavy heart' because Shpigelman had one of the most supportive families he had ever come across. But the judge added that the stiff sentence was necessary to send a strong signal to other young bankers on Wall Street." The Post noted, "Investigators were tipped off to the trading ring in late 2005, when the FBI got word of a suspicious trade ahead of news that Reebok was being acquired." The New York Daily News (1/6, Zambito) and Bloomberg (1/6, Glovin) also reported on Shpigelman's sentencing.

ACS Chair Benefited From Misdated Option. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A2, Bandler) reports, "Affiliated Computer Services Inc. for the first time said its chairman, Darwin Deason, benefited from a wrongly dated stock option, adding that a portion of the 2002 award would be repriced to cut its potential value by $655,000. … But the company said the repricing is being done for tax reasons, and repeated its earlier insistence that an internal probe didn't find evidence that Mr. Deason's 2002 option grant had been improperly backdated." The Journal continues, "The Dallas-based technology outsourcing concern forced its chief executive and top finance official to resign their posts in November, after the internal investigation uncovered rampant backdating. … In a filing late Friday, the company detailed a series of past option grants to Mr. Deason and other top officials that it is repricing to avoid having individual executives suffer tax penalties associated with mispriced option grants. Except for the 2002 grant received by Mr. Deason and several others, the company didn't say whether the particular grants being repriced were backdated, or merely carried incorrect dates because final approval hadn't yet occurred." The Journal adds, "In Mr. Deason's case, the fortunately timed 2002 grant came at the bottom of a steep trough, on a late July date when the stock hit a quarterly low. The company said yesterday its internal probe found 'evidence, though inconclusive' that there had been an 'informal' selection of that date for Mr. Deason's grant. But formal approval, it said, didn't occur until five days later, when the stock had risen 5%. … Repricing the entire grant of 600,000 shares would have wiped $1.1 million from its potential value. ACS repriced only a portion of the award to the higher exercise price, because there is no tax penalty associated with already vested options. The company has already repriced all options for individuals found to have engaged in misconduct."

More Effective Corporate Governance Urged. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/6, A6), Lucien Bebchuk, director of Harvard Law School's Program on Corporate Governance, writes, "Apple Computer announced a week ago the conclusions of a special board committee that examined the 'improper dating' of over 6,000 option grants during 1997-2002. The committee found no basis for having less than 'complete confidence in [CEO] Steve Jobs and the senior management team,' placing full responsibility for past problems on the company's former CFO and general counsel. But the company's report fails to dispel concerns about Apple's governance. … In reviewing past grant awards, the report discusses separately grants awarded to directors and to Mr. Jobs, but it lumps grants to senior managers other than Jobs together with all other grants. The company is surprisingly silent on whether any of these senior managers received 'improperly dated' grants." Bebchuk continues, "Steve Jobs's great accomplishments have well earned him a place in the pantheon of high-tech leaders and visionaries. And Apple's senior management has undoubtedly done very well for shareholders during the past several years. All of this, however, clearly does not compel the conclusion that Apple's governance has performed adequately with respect to option grants. And the company's report falls far short of providing a basis for accepting such a conclusion." Bebchuk adds, "CEO lucky grants were more common when the board lacked a majority of independent directors. In contrast to claims that gains from backdated grants served as an efficient substitute for other forms of compensation, CEOs getting lucky grants received more, not less, total reported compensation. Lucky grants to outside directors were more common in firms with entrenching arrangements that protect incumbents from removal. And outside directors' luck was correlated with CEO luck. … For corporate America to improve its governance going forward, boards should face up to -- and fully share with shareholders -- past governance problems in their companies."

DOJ_NMG_0113688

CRIMINAL LAW:

Media Seeks Daily Audio Tapes Of Libby Trial. The AP (1/5) reports, "Fifteen news organizations and five other groups are asking a federal judge to release audio recordings each day" in the upcoming trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff. The request states, "Most of the key witnesses are public figures who regularly appear in the media. … Knowledge that their testimony might be released on audiotapes will not make them feel awkward or uncomfortable, and certainly no more so than testifying in front of a courtroom filled with reporters."

Fraudulent Currency Sales On The Rise. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, B1, Slater) reports, "Cashing in on the volatile world of buying and selling currencies just became riskier. … Scam artists are increasingly using currency-trading schemes to ensnare even experienced investors, regulators say. The scams take many forms, soliciting individuals over the telephone or wooing them at hotel presentations." The Journal continues, "One widespread scheme promises investors fat profits if they jump in on a time-sensitive opportunity to trade currencies. The money then disappears or gets eaten up in unprofitable trades. … Such frauds exploit a growing awareness among the investing public that the global foreign-exchange market -- worth roughly $2 trillion a day -- is an important financial arena. They also benefit from a legal loophole: Not all of the people who solicit investors to trade currencies are regulated, making them difficult to monitor." The Journal adds, "Over the past five years, more than 25,000 investors have been burned by these frauds, which employ a variety of tactics to lure individuals. Some firms set up booths at investor fairs or rely on printed brochures or pitches over the telephone. Other schemes target particular ethnic groups or spread by word of mouth. … The scams tap into an increasing curiosity among individuals about the world of currencies, long the domain of banks, companies, and other institutions."

Convicted Man Challenges CA Law On Police Killings. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/6, B-1, Egelko) reports, "The lawyer for the man convicted of second-degree murder for killing San Francisco police Officer Isaac Espinoza said Friday he will ask the sentencing judge to declare unconstitutional a state law requiring his 23-year-old client to spend the rest of his life in prison." The Chronicle continues, "The law may violate the right to equal protection because it punishes second-degree murder of a police officer more severely than first-degree murder of someone who isn't an officer, said Martin Sabelli, attorney for defendant David Hill. … District Attorney Kamala Harris disagreed, saying it was both legal and just that 'this defendant should die in prison.'" The Chronicle adds, "A San Francisco jury convicted Hill on Thursday of shooting Espinoza to death in April 2004. The 29-year-old officer, an eight-year police veteran, and his partner, Barry Parker, both in plainclothes, stepped out of their unmarked car on Newhall Street in the Bayview district and ordered Hill to stop because they thought he might be concealing a weapon, according to Parker's testimony. … The defense argued that Hill thought he was being threatened by rival gang members when he opened fire, killing Espinoza and wounding Parker. But jurors found that Hill had known both men were officers, though they acquitted him of premeditated first-degree murder. … Second-degree murder, a killing that is deliberate but not premeditated or planned in advance, is normally punishable by 15 years to life in prison, or 20 to life if a gun is used. But the sentence is longer if the defendant knew, or should have known, that the victim was an on-duty law enforcement officer."

Documents Provide New Details Of Ney Bribe. The Miami Herald (1/6, Weaver) reports, "One-time powerful lobbyist Jack Abramoff gave a $10,000 campaign bribe to an Ohio congressman for his public words of praise for Abramoff's business partner in the purchase of a South Florida fleet of gambling ships more than six years ago." The Herald continues, "Specific details of the political bribe linked to the SunCruz Casinos sale were disclosed for the first time this week in court papers filed by Justice Department lawyers for the upcoming sentencing of convicted former Republican Congressman Bob Ney." The Herald adds, "Ney, 52, pleaded guilty to corruption charges in October and faces sentencing in Washington on Jan. 19. He's trying to downplay the scope of the corruption conspiracy in hopes of receiving a two-year prison sentence. Prosecutors counter that he should be imprisoned for at least two years and three months. … Abramoff, who is at the center of the ongoing corruption investigation in Washington, turned himself in last November to serve about six years in prison for lying to lenders to obtain a $60 million bank loan to buy the SunCruz fleet, based in Dania Beach. … Abramoff and his SunCruz business partner, Adam Kidan of New York, who is serving the same prison sentence, used that money to buy the gambling fleet for $147 million from Fort Lauderdale tycoon Konstantinos 'Gus' Boulis in fall 2000. … Boulis would be slain months later, but Abramoff and Kidan have not been implicated in any way in that case. .. .The SunCruz case against Abramoff and Kidan gave Justice Department officials the leverage to pressure Abramoff to turn on other colleagues, congressional aides and politicians last year."

DOJ_NMG_0113689

DOJ "Pushing" FBI To Speed Data Sharing Via OneDOJ Database. Computerworld (1/6, Weiss) reported, "The U.S. Department of Justice is pushing the FBI and its other operating units to speed up and expand their efforts to share a wide array of information with outside law enforcement agencies via a centralized database called OneDOJ." Computerworld noted, "The plan to expand the use of OneDOJ…has raised the hackles of some privacy and civil rights advocates, who said last week that the DOJ will need to work hard to ensure that the increased information sharing doesn't infringe on the rights of law-abiding Americans. … OneDOJ is 'far more than just bringing together all the information they have,' said Barry Steinhardt, director of the technology and liberty program at the American Civil Liberties Union. … One problem, Steinhardt added, is that the DOJ, and the FBI in particular, have been 'notoriously inept at managing [their] computing resources.'"

Judge Imposes Light Sentences In Alabama Corruption Case. The Mobile Press-Register (1/6, Kirby) reported real estate investor Ken Wall "escaped a lengthy prison sentence Friday for his role in a wide-ranging corruption case in Orange Beach," and former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo's wife "avoided prison altogether." US District Judge Kristi DuBose "sentenced Wall to a year and a day in prison -- less than the minimum recommended by advisory guidelines -- and fined him $250,000. DuBose sentenced Russo's wife, Crystal Russo, to 180 days of home confinement and two years' probation for obstruction of justice. As part of a plea bargain in September, she admitted that she helped her husband try to hide money that prosecutors had targeted for forfeiture. Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Butler objected to the 'insufficiency' of Wall's sentence and indicated prosecutors might appeal."

Former City Councilman Pleads Guilty To Ethics Law Violations. The AP (1/6) reportedm, "Former Orange Beach City Councilman Joseph F. McCarron Jr. pleaded guilty Friday to 15 misdemeanor ethics law violations related to his votes on construction projects in the Alabama Gulf Coast resort. McCarron has agreed to testify in the state prosecution of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo and former city attorney Larry Sutley, Attorney General Troy King said in a statement announcing the guilty plea. As part of McCarron's plea agreement, he has committed to pay fines of $2,000 for each of the 15 counts, King said." The AP noted, "Russo is charged in two state indictments with accepting bribes while in office in exchange for supporting construction projects."

Judge Reluctantly Grants Pellicano Request To Represent Himself. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Spano) reports, "Tossing a legal hand grenade into an already-contentious case, celebrity sleuth Anthony Pellicano on Friday demanded and won the right to act as his own lawyer in his upcoming trial on wiretapping and racketeering charges. U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer tried to talk Pellicano out of his plan, but he would not relent. … The specter of an untrained self-advocate in a complex, high-profile case raised sharp concerns among some court observers." The Times noted, "Half a dozen defendants have pleaded guilty in the broad Pellicano investigation, including a Hollywood filmmaker and a former record executive, both of whom admitted lying to the FBI about hiring Pellicano to wire-tap rivals."

New DC Mayor, Police Chief To Focus On Community Input, Foot Patrols. The Washington Post (1/6, B1, Klein) reports, "D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty and Acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier yesterday outlined a new crime-fighting strategy that calls for customized actions to address safety needs in each region of the city." The Post continues, "Officers in each of the city's 46 police service areas will meet with residents and elected officials in coming weeks and create initiatives that will be launched in March, Lanier said. At her urging, patrol commanders have started programs, including one that has officers adopting specific neighborhood blocks or parks where they will personally keep track of any emerging concerns. … 'Our overriding goal is to reduce crime and the fear of crime in every neighborhood,' said Lanier, who last week succeeded Charles H. Ramsey as chief. She has the job on an acting basis pending confirmation from the D.C. Council." The Post adds, "Fenty and Lanier have emphasized increased officer visibility and foot patrols. The city plans to add 100 officers to the 3,800-member department, and Lanier has said patrols will be her priority. She envisions a force that goes beyond reacting to crimes by building and sustaining safe neighborhoods. … The new mayor and chief outlined their plans at a news conference yesterday -- the second day in a row that Fenty has promoted his early agenda."

DOJ_NMG_0113690

Denver Archdiocese Settles Sex Abuse Suits. The Denver Post (1/6, Gorski) reports, "The Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Denver has settled clergy abuse lawsuits with 15 plaintiffs for a total of $1.58 million, the law firm representing the litigants said today. … 'We are pleased with the settlements,' said Adam Horowitz, an attorney in the Miami law firm Herman and Mermelstein. 'Any time can give a client an opportunity to resolve something at an early stage, that's a good thing for the client.'" The Post continues, "In a statement, Archbishop Charles Chaput said he was grateful to those who had worked to achieve the settlement. 'I sincerely hope that each of the..individuals who participated begin to truly heal,' he said." The Post adds, "Last year, Chaput announced the 24-county northern Colorado diocese had hired mediator Richard Dana, a former federal judge, in an effort to reach settlements with plaintiffs who had sued the archdiocese for clergy sex abuse. … The settlements announced today do not mean the clergy abuse scandal that hit the Denver archdiocese starting in 2004 is resolved, however. At least 20 lawsuits are still pending in Denver District Court. … Today Chaput appealed to those who have yet to settle, asking that they continue to work with the mediation outreach panel, and making himself available to talk with them personally."

New Orleans Terrorized By Wave Of Homicides. NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 8, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The front page headline this morning in the New Orleans paper may tell the whole sad story best: 'Killings Bring The City To Its Bloody Knees.' It is about a new wave of killings that the newspaper describes as unusual even by New Orleans standards." The New York Times (1/6, A11, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports, "A surge in murders since the new year has residents on edge and has raised new fears that officials here remain helpless to contain a lethal combination of guns, drugs and jobless young men. … Eight people have been found dead since Jan. 1, seven of them shooting victims." The Washington Post/AP (1/6, A2, McConnaughey) reports police spokeswoman Bambi Hall "said that, after 19 killings in October and another 19 in November, December's total was 15. There were 161 homicides in the city in 2006. New Orleans's murder rate was seven to 10 times the national average for cities of its size in 2005, the latest period for which complete data are available."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court To Rule On Whistleblower's Suit. The AP (1/6, Press) reports, "After 17 years, James Stone has perhaps a few more months to wait before he learns whether he will collect up to $1 million for exposing fraud by a government contractor at a now-closed nuclear weapons plant." The AP continues, "A court ordered Rockwell International, now part of aerospace giant Boeing Co., to pay the government nearly $4.2 million for fraud connected with environmental cleanup at the Rocky Flats plant northwest of Denver. Stone, a former employee at the facility, could be entitled to as much as one-quarter of the payment under the federal False Claims Act." The AP adds, "The 81-year-old retired engineer filed his whistle-blower lawsuit in 1989, the year Rocky Flats shut its operations after nearly 40 years of production. He has survived legal challenges by Rockwell to dismiss the claim or deprive him of his share. The government joined the suit as Stone's partner 10 years ago. … The Supreme Court now has the case. The ruling could affect an anticipated crush of fraud suits if the high court makes it harder for whistle-blowers to share in the proceeds." The AP notes, "The Bush administration is on Stone's side even though the government collects more money if Rockwell wins. … 'It might be natural for the court to wonder why would it be in the government's interest to advocate that a share of the money damages in this case should be given to a private party,' Justice Department lawyer Malcolm Stewart told the justices during the oral argument in early December. 'In our view, Stone is precisely the type of relator that Congress intended to encourage.' A relator is an individual who sues under the False Claims Act."

Former Texas Acute-Care Service Settles Medicare Fraud Suit For $7.5 Million. The Houston Chronicle (1/6, Villafranca) reports, "A former long-term acute-care service based in Dallas has paid the federal government $7.5 million to settle allegations of fraudulent Medicare claims, the U.S. Department of Justice announced on Friday." The Chronicle continues, "The settlement resolves a civil lawsuit filed in 1999 by four former employees and an independent contractor who worked for SCCI Houston, a 40-bed long-term acute-care hospital. … SCCI Houston was part of SCCI Health Services Corp., which operated six acute-care facilities in Texas and others outside the state." The Chronicle adds, "The lawsuit was filed under whistleblower provisions of the False Claims Act, which authorizes private individuals to file lawsuits on behalf of the United States. … The government filed its own complaint in March 2003. … The allegations claim that from 1996 to 1999, SCCI entered into illegal financial relationships with three physicians and paid the doctors in violation of self-referral statutes, and submitted or caused false claims to be submitted to the Medicare program. … SCCI Corp. was acquired by Triumph HealthCare in 2005. None of the whistleblowers nor any SCCI employees involved in the fraud were part of the acquisition, said Tanya Snodgrass, vice president of professional relations for Triumph HealthCare. … Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said the whistleblowers, Daryl Kaczymarczyk, Patricia Rocha, Michelle Pate, Michael Brigle and Theresa Taylor, shared $1.7 million of the settlement."

DOJ_NMG_0113691

Bankruptcy Judge Approves Delphi Debt Refinancing Plan. The AP (1/6, Tong) reports, "A federal bankruptcy judge on Friday approved a plan by auto parts maker Delphi Corp. to borrow $4.5 billion to refinance debt and lower its monthly interest expenses." The AP continues, "Lawyers for Troy, Mich.-based Delphi said the refinancing, expected to close next week, would save the company $8 million a month. … The debt refinancing proposal was announced on Dec. 18, along with a plan by private equity investors to buy shares worth up to $3.4 billion in a reorganized Delphi." The AP adds, "Delphi lawyers say that the debt and share purchase plans represent 'significant milestones in the debtor's reorganization and another major step forward towards emergence.' … Judge Robert Drain, who approved the debt refinancing proposal on Friday, will consider the equity purchase plan next Thursday. … The company said it will also seek an extension of the deadline for filing its reorganization plan at a hearing next Friday. If approved, the company would have until July 31 to file its plan and Sept. 30 to solicit acceptances."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

EEOC Says DOJ Wrongly Fired Alabama Prosecutor. The Birmingham News (AL) (1/6, Walton) reports, "The federal government has ruled that U.S. Attorney Alice Martin wrongly fired a former assistant prosecutor in 2002." The News continues, "Martin fired Assistant U.S. Attorney Deirdra Brown-Fleming on grounds that she was 'not a team player.' The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission found the reason was 'simply unworthy of credence.' Instead, the EEOC found that Brown-Fleming's firing was retaliatory." The News adds, "The EEOC said it is unclear whether Martin harbored a racist or sexist attitude toward Brown-Fleming, but found that Martin's assessment of Brown-Fleming's relationship with co-workers was tainted with the racist and sexist prejudices of Brown-Fleming's co-workers. … Brown-Fleming was described as rude and condescending, documents show." The News notes, "The EEOC is requiring that the Department of Justice reinstate Brown-Fleming to her former job, with full back pay and other benefits. The amount of back pay was not announced. The commission also ordered the reinstatement of Brown-Fleming's former supervisor, Victor Conrad, who took steps to correct acts of racial hostility against Brown-Fleming and filed his own discrimination claim against the agency. He also is to be reinstated with back pay. … Brown-Fleming worked in the U.S. attorney's Huntsville office from 1998 until her May 2002 firing. Martin serves as U.S. attorney for the 31 northern counties and has offices in Birmingham and Huntsville."

Indiana Jailers Suspended As FBI Launches Probe Of Inmate Beating. The Chicago Tribune (1/6, Fitzsimmons) reported, "Six guards at the Lake County Jail in Indiana were suspended Friday while local and federal officials investigate allegations that an inmate was beaten, officials said. Lake County Sheriff Roy Dominguez said he believes a cover-up took place over the incident, which occurred Dec. 26. … The inmate, Tommy Ford, 40, lashed out verbally and physically at guards who were escorting him to see a visitor, according to an incident report filed later that day. In their report, the guards said Ford 'was taken to the ground' and restrained after he struck one officer in the forehead and spit on another." The Tribune noted, "The FBI is conducting a civil rights investigation of the alleged beating, said FBI spokesman Drew Northern. It is being handled as a 'color of law' case, which looks into abuses of authority, he said."

The Northwest Times (1/6, Guinane) reported Dominguez "said the officers will remain suspended pending investigations by the sheriff's department and possibly the FBI. 'The allegations are very serious, and I intend to pursue them in an objective, timely and professional manner,' Dominguez said. 'The victim was assaulted and was taken to the hospital, treated and days later released.'" Ford "is contemplating a civil lawsuit against the county, the sheriff's department and the individual officers, said Joann Price, an attorney with the Gary firm of Freeman-Wilson & Lewis-Shannon LLC." The AP (1/6) noted Dominguez "said he personally requested that the FBI investigate the attack. 'They will conduct an independent investigation,' he said. 'I want to assure members of the public that no stone will go unturned.'"

DOJ_NMG_0113692

Federal Suit Alleges Racial Bias In Falls Church Police Department. The Washington Post (1/6, B5, Jackman) reports, "Three black officers and one black civilian employee of the Falls Church Police Department have filed a federal civil rights suit against the city, claiming racial discrimination in the department's pay and promotion practices and a hostile work environment for black employees." The Post continues, "One officer alleged that a captain told her last year, 'Do you know why the boundaries of Falls Church are 2.2 square miles? To keep the black people out.' And the civilian employee, who heads the police dispatch center, said that white commanders 'purposefully ignore calls from minority officers for help when on patrol' but do respond when requested by white officers." The Post adds, "The suit, filed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, adds another layer to the turmoil that has roiled the department since its officers union began complaining about internal problems in 2004. The union said that officers were evaluated on how many traffic tickets they wrote and that their weapons were faulty. … Over the summer, then-Chief Robert T. Murray fired the union president, Scott Rhodes. Last month, after the city was forced to rehire Rhodes, pay him a settlement and allow him to retire with full benefits, Murray retired. The city is searching for a new chief."

Man Accused Of Fatal Mississippi Jail Assault Given Videotape. The Biloxi Sun Herald (1/6, Fitzgerald) reports from Gulfport, MS, "Attorneys for Ryan Teel have received a copy of videotaped images of the Feb. 4, 2006, assault on Harrison County jail inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr." The Herald continues, "The tape, however, may not be enough for defense attorneys to persuade a federal review panel against seeking the death penalty when the former deputy stands trial on May 28, attorney Jim Davis said Friday." The Herald adds, "Davis wanted prosecutors to hand over copies of witness statements, expert reports and other types of evidence so he can prepare to defend Teel in a 'mini-trial' before a Justice Department panel in Washington. The government has a deadline of Feb. 16 to decide whether Teel's alleged involvement in Williams' fatal beating merits a possible death penalty. … On Friday, U.S. Chief Magistrate Judge John M. Roper ruled against Davis' request, citing a federal rule known as the Jencks Act. The rule, considered by some to be unconstitutional, restricts a defendant's access to witness statements until the witness has testified in court against him. … 'They're going to eat my lunch,' said Davis, referring to the review panel and federal trial attorney John Richmond. 'This is going to hinder my ability to give (Teel) the best defense possible.'" The Herald notes, "Roper said he does not agree with the Jencks Act, but said he will not circumvent it. … Federal death-penalty cases are rare in Mississippi. They're even rarer nationwide when the defendant is a former law enforcement officer."

North Carolina Man Dies After Police Use Taser To Restrain Him. The Charlotte Observer/AP (1/6) reports, "A 42-year-old man died early Friday after police officers used a Taser when he wouldn't cooperate during his arrest." The AP continues, "Calvin Thompson, of Gastonia, was found nude running on a city street, according to Gaston County Police Department. He disobeyed officers' commands and resisted arrest, police said. … Officers used a Taser to arrest Thompson, but he became unconscious when being placed in custody, police said." The AP adds, "Tasers are stun guns used by law enforcement officials as a non-lethal alternative to bullet-firing weapons. The U.S. Justice Department last year announced it would study a number of cases in which people died after being stunned by the weapons. … Officers said they provided Thompson with medical attention and found what appeared to be crack cocaine in his mouth. He was taken to Gaston Memorial Hospital, where he was pronounced dead. … The North Carolina Highway Patrol believes the vehicle Thompson was driving was involved in at least four separate collisions in a Gastonia subdivision before his arrest. A substance that appeared to be crack cocaine was found in the vehicle, police said."

SCOTUS To Hear Coca-Cola's Appeal Of Racial Discrimination Case. The AP (1/6) reports, "The U.S. Supreme Court on Friday agreed to consider a discrimination case in which a Coca-Cola bottling company fired a black employee." The AP continues, "Coca-Cola asked the Supreme Court to hear the lawsuit, which involves allegations that a supervisor of employee Stephen Peters was motivated by racial bias and influenced a manager to fire the worker. … Such circumstances are sometimes referred to as 'cat's paw' or 'rubber stamp' liability. Coca-Cola fired Peters for insubordination after he refused a request to work on a weekend during his scheduled days off. … The case was one of seven appeals the court accepted Friday." The AP adds, "A federal appeals court reinstated a lawsuit brought on Peters' behalf by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The appeals court said a federal judge placed too much emphasis on the fact that Peters' immediate supervisor made no express recommendation to fire him. … In asking the court to hear the case, the company asked the justices to consider when an employer may be held liable for intentional discrimination when the person who fired an employee harbored no discriminatory bias."

WPost Troubled By Christian Embassy Pentagon Video. The Washington Post (1/6, 690K)

DOJ_NMG_0113693

editorializes, "'There are over 25,000 Department of Defense leaders working in the rings and corridors of the Pentagon. Through Bible study, discipleship, prayer breakfasts, and outreach events, Christian Embassy is mustering these men and women into an intentional relationship with Jesus Christ,' a narrator explains toward the start of a promotional video for Christian Embassy, an offshoot of Campus Crusade for Christ that focuses on diplomats, government leaders and military officers. … Free exercise of religion doesn't stop at the entrance to the Pentagon or other government buildings." But it is "important that both uniformed and civilian military leaders, whatever their religious views, take care that others who don't share their beliefs don't feel coerced or excluded as a result. The Christian Embassy video suggests that such sensitivity has not always been present."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Asks For More Information On Brooks Automation's Sale Of Software Division. The Boston Globe/AP (1/6) reports, "Brooks Automation Inc., which supplies hardware and software to the semiconductor industry, said Friday federal antitrust regulators asked for additional information about the pending sale of its software division to chip equipment maker Applied Materials Inc. … This is the DOJ's second request for both companies." The AP continues, "Brooks Automation and Applied Materials both plan to respond quickly to the request from the Department of Justice's antitrust division, which extends the waiting period until 30 days after the companies have complied. Brooks said it still hopes the $125 million deal can close in the first quarter."

Buyout Pair Sees Bargain In McClatchy Purchase. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, B1, Zuckerman) reports, "Leveraged-buyout firms such as Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and Blackstone Group have been making news for their ambitious takeover deals. … But few of the headline-grabbing buyouts have been as gutsy as the $530 million planned purchase by Avista Capital Partners of McClatchy Co.'s Star Tribune newspaper, announced in late December1." The Journal continues, "The deal for the nation's 15th-largest newspaper by circulation comes amid a slump in the business. The Star Tribune is especially challenged. It has been the worst-performing paper in terms of revenue for McClatchy, which paid $1.2 billion for the Minneapolis paper in 1998. The Star Tribune's ad revenue dropped about 6% last year on a circulation decline of about 4%." The Journal adds, "Despite the ugly writing on the wall for the industry, the prospective purchase is the third-largest for New York-based Avista, a previously little-known private-equity firm that still is raising its first buyout fund and whose executives have never bought any newspaper properties. … Avista mightn't be a household name, but its founders, Thompson Dean and Steven Webster, have been well known in the buyout community for more than a decade. They ran a group that generated returns of about 50% from buyout investments for Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette, which was acquired by Credit Suisse in 2000. The pair left Credit Suisse 18 months ago to start Avista, which they hope will manage $1.5 billion. … The 48-year-old Mr. Dean, who is the son of a career foreign-service officer, was born in Taiwan and grew up in Asia, says they already have spent $850 million to make 11 buyout purchases, focusing on energy, media and health care. Mr. Webster, 55, is an energy specialist who had founded Falcon Drilling. .. .So what do they see with the Star Tribune deal that others in the buyout world missed? A very cheap price -- 6.5 times the paper's cash flow -- a respected brand and an industry that may be bottoming out and poised for a rebound. Avista passed on bidding for the Philadelphia Inquirer, which Mr. Dean says doesn't have comparable cash flow as the Star Tribune."

Iowa Hospital Declines Merger Offer. The Des Moines Register (1/6, Leys) reports, "One of Des Moines' two dominant hospital companies offered Friday to work with its rival to jointly build a single suburban hospital, but the rival declined." The Register continues, "The offer from Iowa Health-Des Moines comes as both that company and Mercy Medical Center move forward with plans to build hospitals next door to each other in West Des Moines. … The companies explored the possibility of a jointly owned suburban facility in 2002. Hospital leaders said they dropped the idea after federal regulators told them informally that it could run afoul of antitrust laws." The Register adds, "Wellmark Blue Cross/Blue Shield, Iowa's largest health insurer, suggested recently that the two companies attempt again to cooperate on a suburban hospital. Iowa Health agreed to try, but Mercy said no. … Wellmark Vice President Cliff Gold said his company believes a joint venture might be acceptable to federal regulators. 'We're saying it's four or five years later, and a lot has changed,' he said. … Gold said the Justice Department has been friendlier to such ideas lately. He also said his company, which is the largest private payer to both hospital companies, would help the hospitals make their case." The Register notes, "Wellmark fears that if two similar hospitals are built side-by-side in West Des Moines, health-care costs would be needlessly inflated. A joint venture would be a more economical option, Gold said. … Iowa Health Chief Executive Officer Eric Crowell wrote a letter to Wellmark Friday saying that his company would agree to a renewed attempt at a joint project, with several conditions."

DOJ_NMG_0113694

ENVIRONMENT:

DOJ Drops Probe Of Florida Waste-Water Dumping. The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida) (1/6, Quinlan) reports from Venice, FL, "The Department of Justice will not file charges against any individuals involved in the city utilities department's 2001 waste-water dumping into Curry Creek, officials said Friday." The Tribune continues, "The announcement answers the question that lingered after the city pleaded guilty in December 2005 to a three-count felony violation of the Clean Water Act: Would those responsible for the dumping or the falsification of records during the subsequent cover-up go to jail?" The Tribune adds, "Speculation centered on what court papers called the 'Executive Group,' a reference to the 'high-level executives, managers, supervisors' who oversaw 'the day-to-day operations' of the Eastside Wastewater Treatment Facility at the time of the dumping. … But the Department of Justice has closed its inquiry, leading the Environmental Protection Agency to drop its investigation. … A Department of Justice spokeswoman would not comment on why the department closed the case." The Tribune notes, "The Justice Department pulled the EPA off the case in a letter to EPA special agent Dan Green, who had handled the investigation. … 'Their recommendation was not to pursue any individual defendants in this case, and the local U.S. Attorney's office went along with this,' Green said. … When the city pleaded guilty in 2005, a judge imposed the minimum fine allowable, $110,000, or $5,000 for each of the 22 days that plant employees discharged waste water into the creek and sprayed it onto a field at Knights Trail. … As part of a deal with prosecutors, the city pledged its full cooperation in any further investigation of any current or past city employees."

Ohio Cities Sue Lead Paint Manufacturers. The New York Times (1/6, Driehaus) reports, "Racing against a proposed state law that would limit paint manufacturers' liability for lead poisoning in aging neighborhoods, Cincinnati has joined five other Ohio cities in filing suits that seek millions of dollars from the companies to clean up lead paint." The Times continues, "Ohio is the latest front in a battle that pits paint companies against cities and states struggling to overcome problems associated with lead poisoning. … The problems include learning impairment in children, high blood pressure in adults and, at high levels of exposure, seizures, comas and deaths." The Times adds, "Municipal and county governments in California, Mississippi, Missouri, New Jersey and Texas have also sued major manufacturers seeking what would amount to billions of dollars in damages. … Whether responsibility rests primarily with paint companies, landlords who let paint deteriorate or cities that fail to enforce housing codes remains an open question." The Times notes, "Rhode Island broke new ground in February by winning a jury trial that found that three paint companies had created a public nuisance and had to clean up lead-paint contamination throughout the state at an estimated cost of $1.37 billion to $3.74 billion. … The companies are seeking a new trial there and trying to fend off litigation throughout the country. They are Sherwin-Williams, based in Cleveland; NL Industries, part of Valhi of Dallas and whose predecessor National Lead made Dutch Boy paint; and Millennium Holdings of Hunt Valley, Md., a successor to a company that owned Glidden Paint, originally based in Cleveland."

ANWR Drilling Ban Introduced In House. The AP (1/5) reports, "Opponents of oil drilling in an Alaskan wildlife refuge are going on the offense after playing defense for a quarter of a century. They want the new Democratic Congress to make an oft-challenged drilling ban permanent. Legislation introduced in the House on Friday would make ANWR "a permanently protected wilderness and end repeated efforts to open the area east of the Prudhoe oil field to energy companies. 'The consensus is that there should not be drilling in the refuge, so the logical next step is to pass legislation which turns it into a wilderness,' Rep. Edward Markey, chief sponsor of the legislation, said in an interview. … A co-sponsor of the bill is Rep. Jim Ramstad, a Minnesota Republican." BBC.com (1/6, Willis) reports ANWR "has been compared to the Serengeti nature reserve in Africa because of its abundance of wildlife."

DuPont Drops Plan To Dump Nerve Gas Wastewaster. The New York Times (1/6, B3, Jones, 1.16M) reports, "Bringing an abrupt end to a three-year fight between environmentalists and federal officials, the DuPont Company announced on Friday that it would not participate in an Army plan to dispose of wastewater from neutralized VX nerve gas by dumping it into the Delaware River. The decision was a victory for environmentalists who questioned how placing wastewater from the neutralized form of the deadly nerve agent would affect the river. ... The decision was hailed by elected officials and environmentalists on both sides of the Delaware, including Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey." VX "is considered one of the world's most toxic chemicals. Exposure to its active form can kill within minutes."

Reports Identify Five New Mercury Contamination Sites In North America. The Washington Post (1/6, A7, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "Two newly published scientific reports suggest that mercury contamination has created at least five 'hot spots' in New England and Canada, places where the neurotoxin has accumulated in fish and wildlife to such an extent that it could harm human health and local ecosystems. The 11 scientists, who work at institutions including Syracuse University and Vermont's Department of Environmental Conservation, analyzed how mercury has accumulated in two indicator species in the northern United States and southern Canada. … Taken together, the two papers, published in this month's edition of the peer-reviewed journal BioScience, represent the most comprehensive ecological analysis of mercury accumulation ever conducted in the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0113695

NYTimes Encouraged By Boxer's Pledge To Curb Carbon Dioxide Emissions. The New York Times (1/6, A14, 1.16M), in an editorial, notes Sen. Barbara Boxer is the new chairwoman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, replacing Sen. James Inhofe, "who regards global warming as an elaborate hoax drummed up by environmentalists and scientists in search of money. Ms. Boxer has already scheduled hearings, and there will be no shortage of legislative remedies to consider. All share one objective, which is to attach a cost to carbon dioxide through a cap on emissions. The underlying logic is that if people and industries are made to pay for the privilege of pumping these gases into the atmosphere, they will inevitably be driven to developer cleaner fuels, cleaner cars and cleaner factories."

Navy Urged Not To Harm Whales. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (1/6, 850K), environmentalists Jean-Michel Cousteau and Michael Jasny write that last July, "the Navy was allowed to proceed with its exercises only when it agreed to take significant, common-sense measures to protect whales and other marine species, such as staying away from the newly designated Northwestern Hawaiian Islands Marine National Monument. ... Yet now, in training exercises planned for California's coastal waters, the Navy is proposing to abandon its commitment to safeguard whales and their habitat from high-intensity sonar. ... The Navy should not be permitted to conduct, and the [California Coastal] Commission must not approve, dangerous sonar training without assurances that the Navy will take meaningful steps to protect whales and other marine life."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Appoints Brink Mississippi SAC. The AP (1/6) reported, "Frederick T. Brink has been appointed the special agent in charge of the FBI in Mississippi, the federal law enforcement agency announced Friday. FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said Brink replaces John G. Raucci, who left Friday for a position at the agency's headquarters in Washington." The AP added, "Brink has also served at the FBI's Operational Technology Division, located at Quantico, Va., and overseas at the U.S Embassy in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. In June 2005, Brink was promoted by Mueller to special agent in charge of the FBI's Special Operations Division in New York." The Jackson Clarion-Ledger (1/6, Kanengiser) noted that Raucci has been named "assistant director of the agency's human resources division. There are 34,500 FBI employees and 'we still turn away thousands every year,' Raucci said. In his first assignment in the South, Raucci said there was excellent cooperation between the FBI and state and local law enforcement agencies throughout Mississippi."

Former El Paso SAC Sentenced To Six Months In Prison. The El Paso Times (1/6, Gilot) reported, "Former FBI special agent in charge Hardrick Crawford was sentenced Friday to six months in prison, making him probably the first person of his rank to do hard time. At the sentencing hearing, U.S. District Judge Philip Martinez said that he liked Crawford, and that seeing the government man in court had been 'painful.' … Crawford was convicted in August of making false statements regarding gifts he received in an Office of Government Ethics Public Financial Disclosure Report submitted to the FBI. Crawford was also found guilty of concealing material facts from the FBI about his friendship with Jose Maria Guardia, a Juárez racetrack owner." The Times noted, "The El Paso FBI office reacted to the sentencing of a popular boss with sadness and resignation Friday. 'We respect the federal justice system, which we in the FBI have sworn to uphold,' spokeswoman Andrea Simmons said. 'While we are saddened by this entire situation, we believe that justice was served.'" The AP (1/6) also briefly reported on Crawford's sentencing.

IG Report Finds DEA Agents Mishandled Seized Cash. The DC Examiner (1/6, Myers) reports, "Drug Enforcement Administration agents routinely disregarded agency rules on the handling of seized cash, jeopardizing hundreds of millions of dollars taken in drug raids, a Justice Department review found." The Examiner continues, "In an audit published Friday, Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine examined thousands of seizures between October 2003 and November 2005. … Fine's report states that drug agents rarely counted the cash they took, often didn't provide receipts for seized money, rarely recorded the seizures in agency ledgers and often didn't ask their colleagues to witness their counting and handling of the money." The Examiner adds, "DEA agents recorded more than 16,000 seizures for nearly $616 million in the period surveyed, the report states. … 'Cash seized by the DEA is at risk because of the DEA's failure to consistently implement and document controls over the seized cash,' Fine's spokeswoman, Cynthia Schnedar, said in an e-mail to The Examiner. … The lack of internal controls over the seized cash leads to accusations of theft by the agents, the report states."

DOJ_NMG_0113696

Federal Agencies Team To Fight Florida Gang Violence. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (1/6, Burdi) reports, "The upsurge in gang violence in Palm Beach County is like a nightmare from 15 years ago when drive-by shootings were commonplace, officials said. … So the county Violent Crimes Task Force has turned to the same remedy it did in the 1990s: Federal prosecution, Sheriff Ric Bradshaw said Friday." The Sun-Sentinel continues, "Local law enforcement and federal agencies -- including the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the Drug Enforcement Administration -- have joined forces because criminals are more likely to do time and more of it under federal guidelines, Bradshaw said. … 'You always try to bring state and federal law enforcement together and use whatever advantages are available,' said Dale Armstrong, ATF resident agent in charge in West Palm Beach." The Sun-Sentinel adds, "Working with federal agencies is nothing new for local departments, but since the county task force was re-formed in April, its focus has been on gangs, Bradshaw said. … 'We're confident we're going to make an impact,' he said."

FBI Investigating Bomb Left At Louisiana Church, Offers $5000 Reward. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/6) reported, "The FBI is offering a reward of up to $5,000 for information leading to the arrest and indictment of those responsible for placing an explosive device at Erwinville Baptist Church" on New Year's Eve. "Debris from the detonated device, described as a pipe bomb, was sent to the FBI Crime Lab at Quantico, Va. Jim Bernazzani, special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans Division, asked that anyone with information about the incident call the Baton Rouge office of the FBI at (225) 291-5159."

IMMIGRATION:

Gunmen Force National Guard Troops Along Mexican Border To Retreat. The Washington Times (1/6, A1, Seper, 88K) reports, "Armed men overran a National Guard observation post along the U.S.-Mexico border in Arizona this week, forcing the soldiers to retreat and prompting an investigation by the U.S. Border Patrol that has focused on the intruders' identity. No shots were exchanged and no one was injured in the incident, which occurred shortly after 11 p.m. on Wednesday." National Guard Sgt. Edward Balaban "said the troops did not know how many men were involved in the attack 'because obviously it took place in the dark.' … Several Border Patrol agents in the area told The Washington Times yesterday the armed men might have been trying to find out what the Guard troops would do if they were confronted by drug or alien smugglers. They said the increased presence of troops and additional Border Patrol agents in recent months had frustrated many of the area's drug and alien smugglers."

WSJournal Argues H-1B Visas Create Additional Jobs. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A6, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "Nearly one-third of science and engineering Ph.D.s working in places like Silicon Valley are the top minds from foreign nations, according to a study from the National Bureau of Economic Research. Many are also here on H1-B visas. Companies are required to spend tens of thousands of dollars in legal fees, advertising expenses and long delays to secure visas for the talented people they need. And the demand for these specialty visas is two to three times higher than the 65,000 per year allotted by Congress. This is all supposed to protect jobs for Americans, but these immigrants are job creators."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Passes Earmark Reform, "Pay-Go" Rules By Wide Margin. The New York Times (1/6, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports on its front page that the new Democratic House voted 280-152 Friday "to pull the shadowy tradition of Congressional earmarking into the daylight, requiring lawmakers to attach their names to the pet items they slip into spending or tax bills and certify that they have no financial interest in the provisions." Forty-eight Republicans joined all 232 Democrats in supporting the measure. The Times says that "more than any of several ethics rules adopted by the House this week, the earmark measure could prevent the kind of corruption that led to several big scandals in recent years." The vote "was linked to a rule known as 'pay as you go' that would prohibit the House from increasing the deficit by passing any new tax cuts or entitlement spending programs without offsetting them with spending cuts or tax increases."

The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Hamburger, Simon, 850K) headlines its report "Everybody Will Know If It's Pork," saying the measure was "championed by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, herself a prodigious author of earmarks." The Chicago Tribune (1/6, Zuckman, 617K) leads its story, "Bye-bye, bridge to nowhere," saying the vote will "curb the middle-of-the-night, backroom deal-making that resulted in approval of embarrassing -- and sometimes illegal -- pork barrel projects."

The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A3, Lueck, 2.04M) focuses on the so-called "pay-go" aspect, saying that the new rule makes efforts to "protect more middle-class Americans from the individual Alternative Minimum Tax" a "whole lot tougher." Pay-go prohibits the House "from considering any tax-cut or entitlement legislation if the cost isn't offset by increased revenue or spending trims. For now, at least, House Democrats say they intend to abide by the rule -- even when it comes to 'fixing' the AMT." The Washington Post (1/6, A4, Montgomery, 690K) also focuses on pay-go, saying the new rules are "aimed at reining in deficit spending and shedding more light on the murky world of special-interest projects known as earmarks." Key Democrats "acknowledged that it will be difficult to abide by" pay-go rules "while keeping their promises to fund health-care, education and homeland-security initiatives." The Post also notes the impact on an AMT fix.

DOJ_NMG_0113697

The Washington Times (1/6, Hurt, 88K) says in its front-page report that Republicans "warned that the new majority is paving the way to increase federal taxes." Rep. Mike Pence said, " 'It doesn't reduce current spending levels or require a reduction in current spending levels. It is a means to justifying tax increases on working families, small businesses and family farms. In a very real sense, the American people ought to know that this proposal translates to: You pay as Congress goes on spending.'"

The CBS Evening News (1/5, story 6, 1:45, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The new Democrat-controlled House is not procrastinating. Today, it completed work on ethics reform rules by requiring full disclosure of pet spending earmarks that are often hidden in legislation. And it voted to end perks that members get from lobbyists, such as gifts of any kind, the use of corporate jets, and free meals. The Senate takes up its own ethics package on Monday, but expect some habits to die hard." NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 7, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) ran an "In Depth" report on "congressional ethics, a top priority of the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill in Washington."

The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Levey, 850K) reports that when Democrats "brought their new ethics rules up for a vote, more than a few eyebrows arched over the congressman who cried loudest about the indignities the Democrats were already inflicting on their GOP colleagues. As much as any Republican," then-Rules Chairman David Dreier "had stirred the rage of Democrats while they suffered in the minority. … But there was Dreier this week, lecturing Democrats on the virtue of openness and professing disappointment about being left out of the legislative process." Rep. Jim McGovern said, "I have whiplash. I thought it would take a couple of weeks before the hypocrisy bubbled up."

Sen. Jon Kyl said on CNBC (1/5, Griffeth), "There's an incentive for both sides to work with each other now. When Republicans controlled both branches of government and the White House, Democrats had every incentive to be negative, to stop success in other words, and prevent the president and the Republicans from being able to tout achievements. … Democrats now control both houses of Congress, and they're not going to be able to go to the next election saying 're-elect us' if they're not able to reach achievements. That will require cooperation from Republicans."

House Democrats Rename International Relations Committee. The Washington Times (1/6, Sands, 88K) reports House Democrats, "seeking a new name to go with a new attitude," said the House International Relations Committee "would be reverting to its old, pre-Republican majority moniker: the 'House Committee on Foreign Affairs.'" Chairman Tom Lantos said, "A new sheriff has come to town, taking the reins with a purpose. Americans have demanded change in the way our country conducts itself in the world." The GOP renamed the panel in 1995 "in part to distinguish it from its counterpart in the other wing of the Capitol, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee."

Pelosi Viewed Favorably By 43%, Unfavorably By 39%, In Rasmussen Poll. A Rasmussen Reports survey of 800 likely voters (+/- 3%) taken January 3-4 finds Speaker Nancy Pelosi is viewed very favorably by 18%, somewhat favorably by 25%, somewhat unfavorably by 14%, and very unfavorably by 25%.

Pelosi Returns To Childhood Neighborhood In Baltimore. The Washington Post (1/6, B3, Morse, 690K) reports Pelosi, "capping off a three-day celebration of her ascension," returned to her hometown of Baltimore Friday, "where a street was renamed for her in front of a stage of dignitaries and a bank of TV cameras." Addressing a crowd near her Little Italy childhood home, she "mentioned her Italian immigrant ancestors, who came to the United States poor, hardworking and religious. Her own upbringing, in the Baltimore rowhouse to her left, she said, was shaped by Italian American pride, devout Catholicism, deep patriotism and staunch Democratic ideals." A street nearby was renamed "Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi." The AP (1/5, Wyatt) also reports on Speaker Pelosi's trip home. The Washington Post (1/6, C1, DuLac, 690K) has a Style section feature on other Democratic celebrations.

New Congress Brings 66 Fresh Faces To Capitol Hill. The New York Times (1/6, A10, Kornblut, 1.16M) takes a look at the "66 new members of the 110th Congress, part of a historic Democratic tide that swept Republicans from power after a dozen years and left President Bush on the defensive." Ohio's Zack Space is said to be typical of the new class. He "campaigned hard on the issue of ethics reform in a race to succeed Representative Bob Ney, who pleaded guilty in a corruption case. Despite his political inexperience -- and the fact that Democratic officials considered him one of their weakest candidates -- Mr. Space beat his Republican rival, in an increasingly Republican district," by 24 points. And "hours after casting his first votes," Space "still beamed with excitement on Thursday, showing off the identification card that doubles as an electronic balloting device. 'I had to ask someone how to use it,' he said."

DOJ_NMG_0113698

New Congress Is Most Religiously Diverse. The Washington Post (1/6, B9, Tilove, 690K) says the new Congress, "for the first time, includes a Muslim, two Buddhists, more Jews than Episcopalians and the highest-ranking Mormon in congressional history. Roman Catholics remain the largest single faith group in Congress, accounting for 29 percent of all members of the House and Senate, followed by Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Jews and Episcopalians." While Catholics in Congress "are almost 2-to-1 Democrats, the most lopsidedly Democratic groups are Jews and those not affiliated with a religion. Of the 43 Jewish members of Congress, there is only one Jewish Republican in the House and two in the Senate. The six religiously unaffiliated members of the House are all Democrats."

WSJournal Says "Pay-Go" Creates AMT Dilemma For Democrats. The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A6, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "In his op-ed column on these pages this week, President Bush made some news by underscoring his opposition to raising taxes. We were certainly glad to hear it, and to publish it, because by our lights the tax cuts and economic growth that has followed are his most notable domestic achievements (give or take a Supreme Court Justice). … However, those lower tax rates are set to expire at the end of 2010, and the Democrats who now control Congress want them repealed. The 'pay-as-you-go' rules that the House just passed would make their extension all but impossible. What this means is that if Congress merely fails to act, the tax cuts expire and the economy will be hit with one of the largest tax increases in history in 2010." According to the Journal, "this…certainly poses a dilemma for Democrats -- all the more so because they must also cope with the rising burden of the Alternative Minimum Tax. … This week, the new Democratic Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Montana's Max Baucus, called the AMT a 'monster in the tax code' and introduced a bill to repeal it."

Dowd Says Democrats "Should Have Shown Some Class." In her New York Times (1/6, A15, 1.16M), column, Maureen Dowd writes, "There was a touch of parody to the giddy Democrat takeover this week. … The first act of House Democrats who promised to govern with bipartisan comity was imperiously banishing Republicans from participating in the initial round of lawmaking. Even if Republicans were brutes during their reign, Democrats should have shown more class, letting the whiny minority party offer some stupid amendments that would lose. Perhaps the Democrats' power-shift into overdrive is a neurological disorder, or neuropolitical disorder."

Democrats Expected To Oppose Making Bush Tax Cuts Permanent. The Wall Street Journal's "Hot Topic" feature (1/6, A5, Timiraos) spotlights tax cuts this week, asking, "Can Congress balance the budget if it keeps the tax cuts in place? In the short term, maybe. But it won't be easy. White House forecasts show a $127 billion shortfall in 2011. Making the tax cuts permanent while balancing the budget will require sharp spending cuts, which likely will cause even many congressional Republicans to balk. President Bush's efforts to constrain spending in the past have had little effect. … Now that Democrats are in control, the resistance from Congress is likely to be greater." The Journal notes, "Both parties have expressed support for permanent changes" to the Alternative Minimum Tax, but "passage of 'pay-go' legislation by the House Friday could add an extra hurdle."

WPost Cites Mankiw In Rejecting Bush's Tax Cut Defense. The Washington Post (1/6, A16, 690K) editorializes, "President Bush wrote in a Wall Street Journal op-ed Wednesday that 'it is also a fact that our tax cuts have fueled robust economic growth and record revenues.' The claim about fueling record revenue is flat wrong, and it is shocking that the president should persist in making such errors. … This is not just our opinion. Harvard's N. Gregory Mankiw, an economic conservative who served as chairman of Mr. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, has tested the hypothesis on which Mr. Bush's claim is based: He looked at the extent to which tax cuts stimulate extra growth and the extent to which that growth generates extra tax revenue that offsets the initial loss of revenue from the tax cut. Mr. Mankiw's conclusion: Even over the long term, once you've allowed all of the extra growth to feed through into extra revenue, cuts in capital taxes juice the economy enough to recoup half of the lost revenue, and cuts in income taxes deliver a boost that recoups 17 percent of the lost revenue."

Democratic Medicare Bill Lacks Formulary To Pressure Drug Firms. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Alonso-Zaldivar, 850K) reports, "The bill that House Democrats unveiled Friday to lower drug prices for the elderly contains a provision that could make it difficult — or maybe even impossible — to achieve its goal, some critics said. The legislation would direct the federal government to use its huge market power to bargain for lower prices with drug manufacturers on behalf of some 23 million seniors enrolled in the Medicare prescription program. But a provision in the bill would explicitly prohibit the government from creating a list of approved drugs, known as a formulary — thus taking away a powerful lever commonly used in such pricing negotiations. Fear of not being included on such a list of approved drugs is one of the principal reasons manufacturers agree to lower prices."

"Health Courts" Proposed As Alternative To Malpractice Jury Trials. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/6, A6, 2.04M) Phillip K. Howard, chair of Common Good, writes, "Skyrocketing health-care costs are a looming national tragedy, but cannot be contained without restoring reliability to the justice system. … Fear of erratic jury decisions in medical malpractice cases has spawned a culture of fear, causing inefficiencies that infect every level of medicine." Howard adds, "A functioning system of justice must aspire to deliberate choices, binding from one case to the next. Reliability is critical. Providers must know what's expected of them and must trust the system to distinguish good care from bad care. What's needed is something entirely new: specialized health-care courts. … A proposal for expert health courts has been developed in a joint venture of Common Good (a nonprofit organization) and the Harvard School of Public Health. It promises to restore reliability and foster confidence."

DOJ_NMG_0113699

Boxer Will Lead Senate Ethics Panel In Johnson's Absence. RollCall.com (1/5) reports that with Sen. Tim Johnson recovering from brain surgery, Majority Leader Harry Reid has selected Environment and Public Works Chairwoman Barbara Boxer "to temporarily take the reins of the chamber's Ethics Committee." The move "will allow the committee to convene before Johnson returns to work. Democratic aides said Friday that Reid's decision also is being driven in part by the fact that the Senate will take up its ethics reform package next week."

Records Of White House Visitors Not Open To Public. The AP (1/6, Yost) reports, "The White House and the Secret Service quietly signed an agreement last spring in the midst of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal declaring that records identifying visitors to the White House are not open to the public." The AP continues, "The Bush administration didn't reveal the existence of the memorandum of understanding until last fall. The White House is using it to deal with a legal problem on a separate front, a ruling by a federal judge ordering the production of Secret Service logs identifying visitors to the office of Vice President Dick Cheney." The AP adds, "In a federal appeals court filing three weeks ago, the administration's lawyers used the memo in a legal argument aimed at overturning the judge's ruling. The Washington Post is suing for access to the Secret Service logs. … The five-page document dated May 17 declares that all entry and exit data on White House visitors belongs to the White House as presidential records rather than to the Secret Service as agency records. Therefore, the agreement states, the material is not subject to public disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act. … In the past, Secret Service logs have revealed the comings and goings of various White House visitors, including Monica Lewinsky and Clinton campaign donor Denise Rich, the wife of fugitive financier Marc Rich, who received a pardon in the closing hours of the Clinton administration."

Roberts Credited With Making SCOTUS More Accessible To Media. The Washington Post (1/6, A3, Barnes, 690K) reports, "Just in the past few months, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg has invited television interrogator Mike Wallace into her chambers for a well-mannered chat. Justice Antonin Scalia has turned up at a sold-out breakfast meeting of the Northern Virginia Technology Council and mixed it up with the American Civil Liberties Union, and he has publicly debated the Constitution with fellow justice…Stephen G. Breyer. Breyer has promoted his book 'Active Liberty' on 'Fox News Sunday'. … And this week…Justice John Paul Stevens said in what was grandly billed as his first network television interview that he considered himself the same 'moderate conservative' that President Gerald R. Ford appointed 31 years ago." According to the Post, "there has…been a change in the way justices, now led by Chief Justice John G. Roberts…see their role both in explaining what they do and in fostering a public conversation about the judiciary, according to those who most carefully monitor the court." Roberts "seems comfortable with reporters."

SCOTUS Adds Cases On Race Discrimination, Environmental Law. The Washington Post/AP (1/6, A3) reports the Supreme Court "added seven cases to its docket, including a discrimination case in which a Coca-Cola bottling company fired a black employee. The lawsuit involves allegations that a supervisor of employee Stephen Peters was motivated by racial bias and influenced a human resources manager to fire the worker. … The court also agreed to consider the interaction of two federal laws, the Endangered Species Act and the Clean Water Act, which set out different standards for federal agencies to protect endangered species." The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Savage, 850K) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed Friday to referee a high school sports dispute over whether coaches have a free-speech right to recruit athletes from other schools. … In Long Island Care at Home vs. Osborne, the court will decide whether certain home-care workers are protected by the federal law that requires a minimum wage and overtime pay. Since the 1970s, the Labor Department has said home-care workers who provide companionship services to the elderly and infirm are generally not covered by the law. … The justices also said they would consider making it harder to sue companies for stock fraud. Tellabs, a maker of telecommunications equipment, was sued by investors who said its executives had knowingly inflated its value."

Death Penalty Appeal Will Also Be Heard. The New York Times (1/6, A12, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports the Supreme Court "agreed…to use the case of a schizophrenic death row inmate in Texas to set the standard for determining when a mental illness is so severe that execution would be constitutionally impermissible. … The American Psychiatric Association has expressed specific concern about the competency standard used by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, which upheld the death sentence for the Texas inmate, Scott L. Panetti, in rejecting his petition for a writ of habeas corpus last May. Mr. Panetti, convicted in 1992 of fatally shooting his in-laws in the presence of his estranged wife and their 3-year-old child, is a 48-year-old Navy veteran who was hospitalized 14 times for schizophrenia and other serious mental disorders in the decade before the crime."

DOJ_NMG_0113700

White House Seeks "Proven Combatant" For Counsel. The New York Times (1/6, A10, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports President Bush "is seeking a new chief lawyer with credentials as a proven combatant as he and his staff prepare for a potential raft of investigations from Democrats in Congress who have promised to challenge the White House's conduct of policy and its assertions of executive power. … Republicans said Friday in interviews that the White House was now, in essence, seeking a politically savvy outsider." The Times add, "Several Republicans, including some former administration officials, said the new White House counsel would also need the stature to counterbalance David S. Addington, the powerful chief of staff of Vice President Dick Cheney. Mr. Addington has tended to argue against cooperating with Congressional requests for classified information, a position that may require some softening, or at least more diplomacy, in the 110th Congress." The Times lists as potential contenders: Fred F. Fielding, Charles J. Cooper, Laurence H. Silberman, David Aufhauser and J. Thomas Schieffer.

NYTimes Blasts FDA Over Decision On Cloned Animals. The New York Times (1/6, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "The Food and Drug Administration's assessment that food from cloned animals is safe to eat is a victory for biotech companies and a loss for everyone else. Like many decisions on the cutting edge of agricultural technology, it was hurried along in a way that is more sensitive to political and economic pressure than to the long-term welfare of animals, humans and the world they inhabit. Asking whether cloned meat and milk are safe is not even the right question. The right question is, why clone at all? … Cloning isn't just a matter for the F.D.A. to decide. It is up to us as a society to decide as well."

LATimes Supports FDA Move. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, 850K), in an editorial, writes, "Even if it's creepy, cloned meat is safe and tasty, says the Food and Drug Administration. … It isn't the FDA's job to rule on the morality of animal husbandry, nor to placate nervous trading partners overseas. Its mandate is to ensure the safety of the nation's food supply, and the verdict is in: Cloned meat is safe. Those who aren't convinced will have other options. Just as 'organic' farms and dairies across the country put special labels on their hormone-free milk or pesticide-free produce, ranches will doubtless spring up to market 'non-cloned' meats. Those who want to pay more for lower-quality food will no doubt be able to do so."

OTHER NEWS:

Jobs Were Created At 2006's Highest Rate In December. ABC World News (1/5, story 6, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There is some surprising news tonight about the strength of the job market. The government says employers added 167,000 jobs last month. That's far more than expected." NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 6, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "160,000 new jobs were added in December, what one economist called a 'rock-solid' reading. And the unemployment rate held steady at 4.5%."

The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A3, Gerena-Morales, lp, 2.04M) reports the Labor Department said Friday that job creation "accelerated at the end of last year and wage gains hovered at their highest level in nearly six years, suggesting that the economy might be performing better than economists anticipated and dashing hopes that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates anytime soon." Payrolls expanded by "a seasonally adjusted 167,000 jobs in December," and unemployment remained unchanged at 4.5%. The Financial Times (1/6, Callan, Guha, Crooks) says the December job gains were "the biggest increase in 2006, defying economists' predictions that the pace of hiring would slow. Wages also picked up, with a 4.2 per cent annual increase in average hourly earnings." The Washington Post (1/6, D1, Henderson, Schneider, 690K) says the report "followed others this week showing that retailers rang up decent holiday sales last month, while factories churned out more goods and businesses spent more on offices, shopping centers and other types of commercial construction." The Washington Times (1/6, A1, Hill, 88K) puts the positive jobs news on its front page, and the New York Times (1/6, C1, Peters, 1.16M) has a business section report.

Jobs Data To Play Key Role In Next Fed Deliberations. The Financial Times (1/6, Guha) says the data will play a "central role" in the Fed's "next deliberations on interest rates." The latest published Fed minutes "show the Fed putting considerable weight on the continued strength of the labour market as an offset to other signs of weakness in the economy, for instance, in manufacturing output."

Bernanke Defends Fed's Banking Role. The Financial Times (1/6) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "stoutly defended" the Fed's role in banking supervision, "pushing back against suggestions that this role should be hived off and given to a single regulator."

DOJ_NMG_0113701

Addressing the American Economic Association, Bernanke said, "The Fed's ability to deal with diverse and hard-to-predict threats to financial stability depends critically on the information, expertise and powers that it holds by virtue of being both a bank supervisor and a central bank."

Markets Down On Jobs Report. The New York Times/AP (1/6, C6) reports the "surprising surge in new jobs and wages diminished the hopes of investors for an interest rate cut." The Dow "fell 82.68 points, or 0.66 percent, to 12,398.01 -- the biggest one-day drop since Nov. 27. The Dow was down more than 115 points at one time yesterday." The S&P 500 was down "8.63 points, or 0.61 percent, to 1,409.71." and the Nasdaq "dropped 19.18 points, or 0.78 percent, to 2,434.25." The Financial Times (1/6, Scholtes, Davies) reports US bond prices were also down on the jobs news, while the Wall Street Journal (1/6, B2, Molinski, 2.04M) reports the dollar hit a "six-week high against the euro Friday and recovered much of its overnight losses against the yen" on the report. In a related piece, the Wall Street Journal (1/6, B1, McKay, 2.04M) examines whether, "after the Dow's 16% gain last year," a correction is due.

The New York Times (1/6, C6, DeAenlle, 1.16M) also reports that "Dogs of the Dow" -- the DJIA's 10 stocks "with the highest dividend yields at the end of each year -- have handily outperformed the index itself and other benchmarks of blue-chip stocks" over the past seven years, making them "the sort of stocks that value investors covet. … The Dogs for 2007, in descending order of yield, are Verizon, Altria, AT&T, Pfizer, Citigroup, Merck, General Motors, Dupont, J. P. Morgan and General Electric."

Lower Oil Prices Yet To Reach Consumers. The Washington Post (1/6, D1, Mufson, 690K) reports that while "warm weather was bad news this week" for OPEC, oil and gas companies, and "any traders who had bet on rising energy prices," the "unseasonably warm weather may make it cheaper to fill their gas tanks -- though it hasn't yet." While crude oil is down 7.8% in New York since the start of 2007, "so far, the benefits of falling crude oil prices haven't trickled down to consumers. … According to AAA, the average nationwide price for unleaded regular gasoline was $2.33 a gallon yesterday, essentially unchanged from the day before and up nearly 3 cents from a month ago." On the same page, the Washington Post (1/6, D1, Freeman, 690K) has a feature on how automakers are gauging demand for alternative-fuel vehicles.

Ex-SEC Chairs Back NYSE/NASD Regulatory Merger. In a Wall Street Journal (1/6, A7, 2.04M) op-ed, former SEC chairmen William Donaldson and Harvey Pitt write, "Despite government's increasing role, there remains an important need for securities industry self-regulation. Given some of the lapses we've seen over the last several years, the need for high ethical standards and business practices is more important than ever. And yet, under the current, outmoded system, there are conflicting standards, inefficiencies and waste. … The proposed merger of the NASD and NYSE regulatory regimes put forward last month is in the best traditions of the government-private sector partnership Congress envisioned when it enacted the federal securities laws."

Biden Expects To Create Exploratory Committee This Month. Asked on CNN's The Situation Room (1/5, Blitzer) about whether he has "formally gone through the process of declaring your intention to run" for president, Sen. Joseph Biden said, "I haven't formally done that, but will formally set up that committee, I expect, by the end of this month. It is my intention to run. I've been straightforward about that for the last six or eight months."

Brownback To Enter Presidential Race On January 20. The AP (1/5, Sidoti) reports Sen. Sam Brownback, a "favorite son of the religious right, will officially enter the presidential race later this month in his home state." A spokesman said Brownback will officially enter the race on January 20 in Topeka, and then "will fly to Washington to participate in the anti-abortion march" marking the anniversary of the Roe v. Wade ruling.

Owens Joins Romney's Senior Advisory Team. The Denver Post (1/6, Marshall, 256K) reports exiting Colorado Gov. Bill Owens has joined Mitt Romney's senior advisory team as the ex-Massachusetts governor moves toward a presidential run. During a radio interview, Owens said of Romney, "I think he's one of the brightest people I've ever seen in public office. He's a businessman, he's a manager. He is a conservative, he wants to cut taxes."

Giuliani Playbook Offers Self-Assessment Of Potential Liabilities. The New York Times (1/6, B3, Purnick, 1.16M) writes, "The country sure has been enjoying itself reading about the Rudy Caper, feasting on the inside dish gleaned from Rudolph W. Giuliani's presidential playbook. The purloined or lost document gives outsiders a glimpse behind the curtain." The Rudy "portrayed on JoinRudy2008.com is a dragon slayer with a record of unmitigated success. He is a man with an open smile, replacing the fearsome City Hall scowl that he used so often to great effect." But the playbook, "meant for insider eyes," concedes Giuliani "as a presidential candidate may have to contend with such trouble as questions about his former wife, Donna Hanover, and his former associate, the controversial Bernard B. Kerik. It cites concerns about Mr. Giuliani's relatively liberal positions on social issues -- stances not likely to find favor with the Republican Party's conservative wing."

DOJ_NMG_0113702

Obama To Address Virginia Democrats Next Month. The Washington Post (1/6, B3, Craig, 690K) reports Sen. Barack Obama "will be the featured guest at a major fundraiser for the Virginia Democratic Party next month," addressing about 2,000 donors and activists at the party's annual Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner in Richmond. While Obama could announce his presidential plans "as soon as this month, his speech at the fundraiser at the Richmond Convention Center could prompt a lot of discussion about Virginia's role in the presidential race. Virginia's Democratic presidential primary has been held relatively early in past elections, before any candidate had the nomination locked up."

McAuliffe Blasts Kerry In Memoir. The AP (1/5) reports Terry McAuliffe, the "former Democratic Party boss and Clinton friend," is "lambasting John Kerry's unsuccessful presidential campaign, calling his effort to unseat President Bush 'one of the biggest acts of political malpractice in the history of American politics.'" The AP says McAuliffe "is close to Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton and will support her presidential bid if the New York senator runs in 2008," and his memoir "could serve as the opening salvo against a potential Clinton rival as Kerry weighs another bid. However, McAuliffe has kind words for other possible candidates, such as Sens. Barack Obama and Chris Dodd and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack." The book, "What a Party! My Life Among Democrats: Presidents, Candidates, Donors, Activists, Alligators and Other Wild Animals," goes on sale January 23. The New York Times (1/6, A13, Broder, 1.16M) says there are "any number of humorous anecdotes sprinkled among the chest-deep pile of dropped names in the 406-page volume."

Candidate For New Hampshire Democratic Chair Withdraws. The New Hampshire Union Leader (1/6) reports New Hampshire Democratic Vice Chairman withdrew from the race to lead the state party. Manchester police "began an investigation of Buckley at the request of the Attorney General's office after Gov. John Lynch received a complaint linking him to pornography. Buckley tonight denied any wrongdoing."

Schwarzenegger Begins Second Term By Claiming Centrist Mantle. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/6, Martin, 384K) reports on its front page that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "cast himself Friday as the leader of a 'post-partisan' movement that would give birth to innovative ideas through collaboration, not party warfare, urging leaders in his second inaugural address to govern from a 'dynamic center that is not held captive by either the left or the right or the past.'" In his 15-minute speech, Schwarzenegger "made no policy proposals and instead focused entirely on tone, rejecting the liberal versus conservative battleground in favor of the pragmatic middle. Aides said the message, from a governor who bucked a national anti-GOP trend last fall by cruising to re-election, was aimed beyond the state toward a national audience." Schwarzenegger said, "The American people are instinctively centrist. So should be our government. America's political parties should return to the center. They should return to the center where the people are."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/5, Blitzer) reported, "Schwarzenegger limped to his inaugural on crutches today. But the California governor may be politically stronger than ever, after mining the middle ground." ABC World News (1/5, story 7, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger used crutches to get on stage to his swearing in. It's the first time he's been seen in public since the bad leg break he suffered skiing before Christmas. Schwarzenegger called every day as governor an adventure. And his political escapes are more hair-raising than anything he did in the movies." The Washington Times/AP (1/6) further quotes Schwarzenegger: "Like Paul on the road to Damascus, I had an experience that opened my eyes. And what was it that I saw? I saw that people, not just in California, but across the nation, were hungry for a new kind of politics, a politics that looks beyond the old labels, the old ways, the old arguments."

The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Martelle, Salladay, 850K) says in a front page feature that "the celebrities and the crowds were notably absent, spotlighting the difference between a movie star doing the unusual -- winning a gubernatorial recall election -- and a now-seasoned politician signing in for four more years." The New York Times (1/6, A9, McKinley, 1.16M) says Schwarzenegger was "nursing a broken leg" but came "armed with an electoral mandate." The event "was a chance for Mr. Schwarzenegger to take hold of the political center, something he did effectively during the election year…and in the election itself." The Washington Post (1/6, C1, Booth, Geis, 690K) writes, "It was Arnold's second inauguration -- and unlike the first one (boring), his wife, former TV news star Maria Shriver, was clearly in charge of the sequel. The theme? Make nice. It is apparently the dawn of 'post-partisanship' in California, as Schwarzenegger renounced the 'fringes of left and right' (technically, he's still a Republican) and declared the 'new creative center.'"

O'Malley To Tour Maryland In Week Before Inaugural. The Washington Post (1/6, B2, Wagner, 690K) reports Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley "announced plans yesterday for a 'One Maryland Inaugural Tour and Celebration' in the week leading up to" his January 17 inauguration, with events across the state.

DOJ_NMG_0113703

NYTimes Says Spitzer Has Big Ambitions For New York. The New York Times (1/6, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "Gov. Eliot Spitzer is fond of saying that you can't change the world by whispering. What New Yorkers saw in his first week in office was a governor in full trumpet about how to overhaul their state government. While some veterans of state politics saw Mr. Spitzer's State of the State speech on Wednesday as too ambitious, former Gov. Hugh Carey got it just right. 'It's a very big agenda,' he said, 'but it's not too big for New York.' … Spitzer certainly acts like a man ready to go forward quickly. The goals he has set may be daunting to the old guard in Albany, but anything less from this governor would have been a grave disappointment."

"Embryo Brokerage" Stirs Bioethics Debate. The Washington Post (1/6, A1, Stein, 690K) reports, "A Texas company has started producing batches of ready-made embryos that single women and infertile couples can order after reviewing detailed information about the race, education, appearance, personality and other characteristics of the egg and sperm donors. The Abraham Center of Life LLC of San Antonio, the first commercial dealer making embryos in advance for unspecified recipients, was created to help make it easier and more affordable for clients to have babies that match their preferences, according to its founder. … The embryo brokerage, which calls itself 'the world's first human embryo bank,' raises alarm among some fertility experts and bioethicists, who say the service marks another disturbing step toward commercialization of human reproduction and 'designer babies.'" The Houston Chronicle (1/6, 530K) and the Dallas Morning News (1/6, 500K) both run this Post story today.

Former President Bush Recovering Well From Surgery. NBC Nightly News (1/5, story 9, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We have an update tonight on the condition of President George H.W. Bush. Eleven doctors say he has recovered well ahead of schedule from hip replacement surgery. He is said to be up and around and walking and expects to be sent home tomorrow. The former president, now 82 years old, underwent the surgery at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota on Wednesday, where he had his left hip replaced back in the year 2000."

California Legislators Approve Reagan Bust For Capitol Rotunda. The Washington Times (1/6, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports, "Nearly twenty years after leaving office, Ronald Reagan is coming back to Washington. California lawmakers have voted to place a bronze bust of the former president in the Capitol Rotunda. … The bust of Mr. Reagan…will replace that of Thomas Starr King, 'the orator who saved the nation.' King is credited with keeping California in the Union during the Civil War."

Ex-Commerce Secretary Verity Dies At 89. The New York Times/AP (1/6, A16, Press) reports Reagan-era Commerce secretary C. William Verity Jr. "died Wednesday in Beaufort, S.C. He was 89. Mr. Verity, who suffered from asthma, died of complications of pneumonia in a Beaufort hospital." He joined the Cabinet "in August 1987 after his predecessor, Malcolm Baldrige, was killed in a rodeo accident."

WSJournal Says Sheehan Is Democrats' "Problem Now." The Wall Street Journal (1/6, A6, 2.04M) editorializes, "When Cindy Sheehan became a celebrity for her 'peace' vigil outside President Bush's Texas ranch in 2005, the antiwar left hailed her as a heroine. ... Well, she's their problem now. On Wednesday members of the new House majority tried to hold a press conference to discuss their legislative priorities, but a group of hecklers, led by Mrs. Sheehan…forced Representative Rahm Emanuel to shut it down. ... We found few comments about her latest antics on the left-wing blogs. It's heartening to realize that her erstwhile backers were motivated by partisanship, not hatred of country."

Ford Remembered On NYTimes Op-Ed Page. New York Times (1/6, 1.16M) guest columnist Orlando Patterson writes that President Gerald Ford "was a man at peace with himself. Uncomplicated but without a trace of shallowness; calm, dignified and quietly engaging, a person you would like to be your friend." In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/6, A15, 1.16M), comic actor Chevy Chase writes about his "relationship" with Ford.

Rice, South Korea's Song Laud Resumption Of Nuclear Talks, Discount Likelihood Of Test. AFP (1/6, Millikin) reports, "The United States has intensified efforts to resume nuclear disarmament talks with North Korea, while confirming it was working with Japan on an emergency plan for a possible crisis in the Korean peninsula." Secretary of State Rice "told a joint news conference with visiting South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min-Soon that the six-party talks could resume 'fairly soon' if Pyongyang signals it is ready for constructive denuclearization steps." The first round "ended without apparent progress," however, "Rice said Friday that those five days of discussions had laid the groundwork for further negotiations." Song "said it was 'North Korea's turn to come back to us with a positive and realistic response' to proposals made" during that first round of talks. In addition, Rice "played down press reports this week that North Korea was making preparations for a second nuclear test explosion as a way of pressuring its partners for concessions in the next round of talks."

DOJ_NMG_0113704

The AP (1/5, Schweid) says Rice "cautioned North Korea on Friday that a second nuclear test 'no doubt would deepen its isolation.'" She and Song "agreed at a State Department news conference that their governments want negotiations on North Korea's nuclear program resumed." Song "said he had no indication that a fresh nuclear test by the North Koreans is imminent." The Washington Post (1/6, A13, Kessler, 690K) keys on the "expected" resumption of the Six-Party Talks, reporting Rice and Song said meetings "are likely to reconvene this month or next, when the United States and its allies hope to get a clearer sense of whether Pyongyang has any interest in giving up its weapons.

Death Of North's Foreign Minister Unlikely To Change Policy. The Washington Times (1/6, Salmon, 88K) reports on the impact of North Korean Foreign Minister Paek Nam-sun's death on Pyongyang's foreign policy, noting most experts believe significant change is "unlikely." Noting Paek's eight-year leadership of the foreign ministry, the Times adds, "In a society as opaque as North Korea's, it is impossible to predict a successor to Mr. Paek, but one analyst expected Mr. Paek's deputy at the foreign ministry," Kang Sok-ju, to take over. "The chances of Mr. Paek's successor having any leeway in moderating the country's nuclear policy are small."

Beijing Asks Tehran To Consider Sanctions, Talks. The Washington Post (1/6, A9, Cody, 690K) reports Beijing "told" Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani "that Tehran should abandon its defiance of U.N. sanctions and work for a swift return to talks to resolve the standoff over its nuclear program." Chinese media indicate that President Hu Jintao "urged" Larijani to offer "a 'serious response' to the U.N. sanctions." The Post calls the "public advice to Iran" one more "instance in which Beijing seemed to be following a course parallel to that of the United States on nuclear nonproliferation. Diplomats from the two countries have worked with increasing closeness over the past three years in Chinese-sponsored negotiations to dismantle North Korea's nuclear weapons program."

The AP (1/5, Ang) adds Beijing "urged Iran to give a 'serious response' to" UNSCR 1737. Larijani "warned that Tehran's commitment to the peaceful use of nuclear technology will change if the country is threatened." Hu reportedly told Larijani that that the "sanctions reflect 'the shared concerns of the international community over the Iranian nuclear issue.'"

US Diplomat To Be First To Visit Mogadishu In Over A Decade. The New York Times (1/6, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi Frazer "plans to visit Mogadishu, the violence-scarred Somali capital," tomorrow. "It would be the first time in more than a decade that a high-ranking United States official has set foot there." While Frazer's schedule "was still tentative," the Times says she plans "to be in Mogadishu for four hours to meet with officials of the transitional government and leading Somali intellectuals." The Times calls the two announcements "part of Somalia's transformation after Ethiopian-led forces ousted the once powerful Islamist movement from the capital last week and helped install a potentially viable government there for the first time in over 16 years." The Financial Times (1/6, England) keys on Zawahiri's call for an "Iraq-style insurgency" across Somalia. The Washington Times/AP (1/6, Kennedy) adds fighters loyal to the Islamic Courts "say they will heed al Qaeda's call for guerrilla attacks and suicide bombings against Ethiopian troops whose intervention was key to the Islamists' defeat."

The Washington Post (1/6, A13, DeYoung, 690K) focuses its coverage on yesterday's meeting of the Somali Contact Group in Nairobi, saying the diplomats and aid providers "urged the quick deployment of an African peacekeeping force in Somalia, as the United States pledged $40 million to assist the mission and provide humanitarian aid." The Somali Contact Group "called for 'immediate support for the stabilization of Somalia,' noted an imperative to launch a political reconciliation process 'without delay' and cited the need for 'immediate concrete assistance.'" Frazer, the meeting's chair, is quoted saying, "The group clearly felt it was important that there not be a security vacuum." Under the front-page headline, "In Somalia, Confusion Remains In Command," the Washington Post (1/6, A1, McCrummen, 690K) adds, "Ordinary Somalis are not sure who is in charge: the Ethiopians, the government, the warlords or the exiled Islamic Courts leaders and their underground fighters," and "security continues to be the main concern in Mogadishu."

Hamas-Fatah Violence Continues Ahead Of Rice Visit. The New York Times (1/6, A6, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya "called Friday for an end to the internal violence in the Gaza Strip, a day after members of his own Hamas militia surrounded the house" of Fatah Col. Muhammed Gharib, "killed him and his bodyguards and seriously wounded his wife and brother." Fatah responded to Gharib's murder by "suggesting another round of retaliation," and "also said negotiations with Hamas on a unity government were impossible in the present atmosphere." In addition, "a local cleric and frequent critic of Hamas, Adel Nasar, was murdered as he left his mosque" yesterday. The Times adds, "The new tensions have set off a series of battles between Hamas and Fatah forces that show no sign of ending, despite various efforts to restore calm."

DOJ_NMG_0113705

The Financial Times (1/6, Morris, Dinmore) keys on Nasar's murder, reporting, "Unidentified gunmen shot dead a Muslim cleric after he delivered a sermon in the Gaza Strip on Friday calling for an end to fierce factional fighting." The "factional violence is worsening just as the US is gearing up for another diplomatic effort in the region," sending Secretary of State Rice to Israel "and the Palestinian territories late next week." Experts on US policy "give no sign of any significant shift away from the current strategy of supporting Mr. Abbas, with money and equipment, while isolating and shunning Hamas."

Tanzanian Foreign Minister Will Be Number Two At UN. The New York Times (1/6, Preston, 1.16M) notes UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon "appointed Asha-Rose Mtengeti-Migiro, the foreign minister of Tanzania, to be deputy secretary general and said he intended to give her responsibility for day-to-day management of the world organization." The Times says Ban "fulfilled a pledge to place a woman from a developing country in the second most powerful post at the United Nations." USUN's Richard Grenell is quoted saying of Migiro, "Her experience indicates she will do a fantastic job." US "officials said [Secretary Rice] was personally acquainted with Ms. Migiro and was pleased when she heard of the appointment on Friday." Migiro was a professor before joining the Cabinet in 2000, and took over the foreign ministry one year ago. BBC.com (1/5) adds Ban "described Ms. Migiro as a highly respected leader who had championed the cause of developing countries over the years."

The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Farley, 850K) notes Ban "said he planned to delegate much of the U.N.'s management and administrative work to" Migiro. "She will also oversee socioeconomic affairs and development issues." A UN statement "said Migiro proved her ability to manage as the chairwoman of the Great Lakes regional conference in Central Africa in December." Ban also appointed former Indian ambassador and undersecretary-general Vijay Nambiar as his chief of staff.

Ban To Publicize His Personal Finances. The Washington Post (1/6, A13, Lynch, 690K) reports Ban "announced Friday that he will release his personal financial records, making him the first U.N. leader to subject his financial dealings to public scrutiny." His "action on his financial records was partly symbolic, because Ban had already been required to file disclosure statements when he served in the South Korean government. It was calculated to prod other senior U.N. officials to voluntarily make their own financial statements public."

NYTimes Calls Ban "A Status Quo Secretary General." The New York Times (1/6, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "The big powers in the United Nations Security Council…wanted a low-key bureaucrat who wouldn't rock the boat. Judging by Mr. Ban's early moves, the world has gotten exactly that. Expect no Kofi Annan-style exhortations to live up to the values of the U.N. charter. ... And expect no serious drive for much-needed administrative reform."

Chinese Fed Raises Reserve Requirements. The New York Times (1/6, C3, Barboza, 1.16M) notes the Chinese central bank "raised the reserve requirement ratio for banks, the fourth increase in six months, to further tighten the nation's money supply." That "modest move" pushes the reserve ratio to 9.5 percent, and experts believe "it was the government's latest warning that too much money in the financial system could ignite inflation and perhaps fuel a stock market bubble." The Times adds that the hike "comes as China's stock market is booming after several years in the doldrums." Beijing "is determined to keep the economy expanding but is concerned about growing so quickly that the economy might crash before 2008, when Beijing is host to the Olympic Games, viewed as the ultimate coming-out party for China."

Chinese Yuan Reaches Parity With Hong Kong Dollar. The New York Times (1/6, C3, Bradsher, 1.16M) notes the Chinese yuan "is poised to become more valuable than the Hong Kong dollar by the end of the month, and could pass the traditional benchmark for the Hong Kong dollar's value as early as next week. The shift has been the latest in a series of shocks for [Hong Kong] residents' confidence that they or their ancestors had made the right decision to live in Hong Kong instead of anywhere else in China." The Times explains, "People in Hong Kong are used to comparing themselves with the educated middle class on the mainland. And they are finding that a growing class of Chinese businessmen and businesswomen have become more affluent than the average resident of Hong Kong." Some Chinese merchants "have stopped taking Hong Kong dollars or have begun asking a slightly greater number of dollars than the number of yuan on price tags would suggest. Prices are rising here in markets for everything from luxury apartments to dried bugs, and the culprit is the same: the rising value of the Chinese yuan and the falling value of the Hong Kong dollar."

Chinese Newspapers' Intellectual Property Suit Could Prove Pivotal. The New York Times (1/6, A3, French, 1.16M) reports the Beijing News, "one of China's largest newspapers," is suing Tom.com, "one of the country's leading Internet portals, claiming that it violated copyright laws, setting off a media war and highlighting the first signs of a possible shift in policies toward intellectual property rights" in China. The newspaper seeks $400,000 in damages for the republication of "more than 25,000 articles and photos without authorization since 2003." Despite China having a "reputation as a sort of no man's land for intellectual property rights," the Times says the News' suit "is headed to court at a time of accelerating legal change and signs of increased efforts by law enforcement to protect copyrights and intellectual property."

DOJ_NMG_0113706

Zimbabwe Offers Long-Term Land Leases To Some White Farmers. The Washington Post (1/6, A9, Timberg, 690K) notes the Zimbabwean government of President Robert Mugabe "has granted long-term leases to 19 white farmers in a step toward allowing as many as 1,000 white-owned commercial farms to resume operating legally after years of land seizures." The Post calls the leases "the latest indication that Zimbabwe is pulling back from the harshest elements of a seven-year-old land reform program that has devastated its once-thriving agricultural sector and helped push the annual inflation rate over 1,000 percent, the highest in the world." However, the Post notes, "many white farmers have rejected the move as a desperate bid to revive the country's economy without restoring their property rights." Calling land "an emotional, politically explosive issue in Zimbabwe," the Post adds, "Among the contentious issues remaining is whether white farmers must surrender the deeds to their land to qualify for new leases."

Warsaw Archbishop Collaborated With Soviet Secret Police. The New York Times (1/6, A3, Smith, 1.16M) notes Warsaw Catholic Archbishop Stanislaw Wielgus, "caught in Eastern Europe's widening witch hunt for former Communist secret police informers, admitted Friday that he had collaborated with the Sluzba Bezpieczenstwa, or Security Service, known as the S.B." While admitted he'd "damaged" the Church, Wielgus said "he had neither spied on anyone nor harmed anyone. He said the only thing he ever did was to inform the secret police of his agenda during foreign academic meetings and to promise not to take part in anti-Communist activities." The Times says "many voices in Poland have called for him to step down," noting the "Warsaw archbishopric is a particularly symbolic institution in the former Soviet bloc." Poland's Catholic Church Historical Commission "said that there was no evidence that Bishop Wielgus's actions harmed anyone, and that [their] documents would be sent to the Vatican for further study."

The Washington Post/AP (1/6, A9, Gera) adds Wielgus "admitted Friday that he had signed an agreement to cooperate with the secret police during the Communist era and said he was leaving his fate in the hands of Pope Benedict XVI." The AP continues, "The mounting allegations against Wielgus have gripped the heavily Roman Catholic country, where the church is esteemed for its opposition to the former Communist government."

Chavez Will Not Renew License Of Venezuela's Largest Television Network. The Los Angeles Times (1/6, Kraul, 850K) notes Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's "decision not to renew the license of his nation's largest and oldest television network, a frequent critic of his policies, drew a rebuke Friday from the Organization of American States." Secretary-General Jose Miguel Insulza "said in a statement that Chavez acted in an arbitrary manner in yanking the license of RCTV." The OAS "objection follows similar condemnations by news media freedom groups, including Reporters Without Borders and the Inter-American Press Association." Chavez has "accused" RCTV "of promoting the coup in April 2002 that briefly knocked him from power, and of committing unspecified ethical lapses." He "said [his] decision was 'irrevocable' and was made because RCTV 'didn't pass the test to receive a renewal of a concession from a state that is serious, responsible, committed and respectful of the people.'"

Candidates Target Incumbent In Argentine Presidential Race. The Financial Times runs profiles today on two candidates for the Argentine presidency. Under the headline, "Menem Preaches His Free Market Gospel," the Financial Times (1/6, Webber) says Carlos Menem "polarises Argentines like few other politicians. His economic policies during a corruption-tainted government in the 1990s are blamed by many for sowing the seeds of the calamitous debt crisis that erupted five years ago, but a quarter of voters were still prepared to have him back in the past elections – and he is betting more will give him another chance now." Labeling him a "Kirchner critic," the Financial Times (1/6, Mander) reports Roberto Lavagna, "the former economy minister who is widely credited with engineering Argentina's rapid economic recovery since its collapse in 2001, has announced that he will run for president in elections due in October." Lavagna "has criticised the government's 'shift to the left' in the past year."

Nuclear Power Said To Enjoy Renaissance Worldwide. A 1,750-word piece on the front page of today's Washington Post (1/6, Struck, 690K) reports, "Faced with evidence that coal- and oil-fired electric plants are overheating the planet, and alarmed by soaring demand for electricity, governments from South America to Asia are turning once again to a power source mostly shunned for two decades as too dangerous and too costly." Noting that 29 plants are under construction worldwide and over 100 more are planned, the Post says officials "are dusting off plans for nuclear plants even though most of the problems that shelved those projects remain." Notably, some experts "contend that the nuclear resurgence is still just talk. In the United States, they note, not a single reactor has been ordered. The high costs and long delays that vexed nuclear construction … soon will diminish the atomic ardor in other countries, they say."

DOJ_NMG_0113707

EU Enlargement Said To Force Retooling Of Attitudes Towards Roma. In an op-ed in today's Los Angeles Times (1/6, 850K), author Colum McCann says many Europeans view the EU's three million new Gypsies as "potential problems." He continues, "If a society recognizes itself, and ultimately critiques itself, on how it treats its most downtrodden, then surely the acid test for the EU is its ongoing treatment of the Roma." McCann admits that it is essential "not to turn any culture into a list of sorrows and benedictions," and says the "European call for inclusion is decent and right. The politicians and bureaucrats behind the sound bites mean well. Why not be in the habit of hoping for a better world?" He concludes that "much about Romani history is still wrapped up in a willful forgetfulness," and urges the end of lingering Roma stereotypes.

Writer Pans Anti-Islamic European Sentiment. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/6, A7, 2.04M), Israeli academic Fania Oz-Salzberger says Israelis in Europe "seem to have gained new European friends, and not quite for the right reasons. These new pro-Israel voices base a love of Jews upon the hatred of Muslims." She adds, "Many of these new friends are Muslim-bashers first and Israel-backers second. Their blanket condemnation of Muslim communities on their continent rings eerily familiar. Their sweeping verdict against a whole civilization has that strange déjà-vu feel." Noting that Israel needs "sober, reliable, critical friends" in Europe, Oz-Salzberger concludes, "Israelis probably deserve a better European opinion, warranted by our history, culture, science and freedom. Not for being the targeted foes of Islam. Beware of Islamophobes bearing gifts."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"President Urged To Avoid Compromises In Iraq."
"Celebrities Shun Gov.'s Inauguration."
"Tijuana's Police Are Back – Unarmed."
"Sen. Barbara Boxer Rescinds Award."

New York Times:
"House Tightens Disclosure Rules For Pet Projects."
"Images Of Hanging Make Hussein A Martyr To Many."
"A New Commander, In Step With The White House On Iraq."
"Katrina Victims Find A Solution: Modular House."
"Companies Pay Dearly For Technology Trade Show."
"San Franciscans Hurl Their Rage At Parking Patrol."

Washington Post:
"Death In Haditha."
"Pelosi, Reid Urge Bush To Begin Iraq Pullout."
"'Embryo Bank' Stirs Ethics Fears."
"In Somalia, Confusion Remains In Command."
"Something For The Dog That Eats Everything: A Diet Pill."
"In The Global Energy Rush, Nuclear Gets A Resurgence."

Washington Times:
"House OKs Budget Rule Changes."
"Reid, Pelosi Rip Iraq Buildup."
"Democrats Backpedal On 9/11 Commission."
"Jobs, Income Gains Bright Spots In 2006."
"Troops Flee From Border Outpost."
"Fenty, Chief To Put More Cops On Streets."

Detroit Free Press:
"Show-Me Time!"
"Detroit May Shut Up To 52 Schools."
"Behind The Scenes At The Rose Bowl: Part 3."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Arrests Of Call-Girl Clients Expected."
"New Hogzilla Tops 1,000 Pounds."
"Bush Shakes Up War Team."
"More Aquarium Stars."

Dallas Morning News:
"Santeria Leader Fights Euless Ban."
"Plucky 13: Gritty Mavs Top Spurs."
"Family, Friends Gather To Remember Darrent Williams."
"Culbreath Called In To Lead Housing Board."
"Revamp To Take Casa Linda Back To Its Roots."
"'Nice, Little Old Man' Shot, Killed."
"FDA Approves Drug For Obese Dogs."

Houston Chronicle:
"Houston's Terror Risk Draws More Federal Funds."
"Pelosi, Reid Tell Bush 'Bring The War To A Close.'"
"Secret Vote Could Cost Craddick Speaker's Post."
"House Votes To Reveal Pet Projects' Sponsors."
"Harris Seeks Laws To Curb Treasurer, Bad Dogs."
"Houston Panel Targets Convenience Store Crime."
"New U.S. War Chief In Iraq Signals Tactics Change."
"MLK Parade Group Sues Houston Over Event Rules."
"Cool Cats Show Off Their Agility At Houston Show."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: President's Strategy In Iraq; Iraq War Policy Analysis; Congressional View On Iraq/ Spending; Unseasonable Weather; Warm Weather Expected To Continue; Close Call At Denver Airport; Jobs Increase In December; Schwarzeneggar Sworn In; Infant Car Seat Report; Solo Sailor Returning Home; Florida Coastal Trailer Park Windfall.

DOJ_NMG_0113708

CBS: Gates Recommends Troop Buildup In Iraq; Military Awaits Troop Buildup Decision; Litvinenko Poisoning Update; Mysterious Weather; Contractor Contract Abuse In Iraq; New Democratic Congress/ Lobbying Reform.

NBC: Warm Winter Weather; Colds Persist In Warm Weather Also; Weather Analysis/ Southern Storms; New Democratic Congress; Homeland Security Spending; US Economy And Jobs; In Depth- Congressional Ethics; Bloody Violence Plagues New Orleans; Update On Former President Bush's Health; Mayfield Retires From National Hurricane Center.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session

US House: Not in session.

Other: LAW SCHOOLS-CONFERENCE _ Immigration debate, surveillance and security issues are among topics at the Association of American Law Schools Annual Meeting. Over 3,500 law faculty expected to attend. Location: Marriott Wardman Park. Contacts: Elizabeth Patterson, 202-296-5184.

IRAQ DIALOGUE _ 9 a.m. Two days before President Bush will deliver a speech announcing a new course in Iraq, women Nobel Peace Prize Winners Dr. Shirin Ebadi and Professor Jody Williams hold a news conference to call for a constructive US-Iran dialogue and engagement. Location: Old Ebbitt Grill, 675 15th St. NW. Contacts: Carah Ong, 202-378-3334.

BIRTH DEFECTS _ 11 a.m. - 2 p.m. The National Museum of Health and Medicine presents a health fair which will include information on steps women can take to ensure a healthy pregnancy and baby. Information about the most common birth defects will also be available, as well as an exhibition at the museum, "From A Single Cell," which will provide insight into some of the rarest complications that can occur in a pregnancy. Location: National Museum of Health and Medicine, Walter Reed Army Medical Center, 6900 Georgia Ave. and Elder Street NW. Contacts: Jennifer Heilman, 202-782-2671.

AYALON HONORED _ 6 p.m. - 9:30 p.m. A number of Christian groups will honor Israeli Ambassador Daniel Ayalon for the advances made in building bridges of support and understanding for Israel with the American Jewish and Christian communities.The event is sponsored by Love of Israel in cooperation with the Embassy of Israel, with co-sponsors including The International Christian Embassy Jerusalem, Salem Communications, High Adventure Broadcasting, Capital City Church, and the Healing Rooms of DC. Location: Capital Hilton, 1001 16th St. NW. Contacts: Kevin McVicker, 703-739-5920.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, January 08, 2007 8:44 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, January 06, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070106.pdf; dojclips070106.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNews' express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Judge Grants Delay In Mental Exam For Padilla (AP)..... 4

Homeland Response:

Spy Pick: Low-key But "Rock Solid" (LAT)..... 4
Bush Names New Spy Chief With Iraq Speech Looming (AFP) .. 5
Profile: Michael McConnell (BBC) 6
DHS To Boost 6 Cities' Share Of Anti-Terror Funds (WP) 7
New York, New Jersey To Split Security Funds (NSDY)..... 8
Federal Funds May Now Pay Police Salaries In Terror Fight (NYT) 8
Area In Highest Tier Of Terror Funding (HC) 9
Democrats Backpedal On 9/11 Commission (WT) 10
FBI Probing Death Threat To Muslim (CCT)..... 11
Sen. Boxer Rescinds Award To Islamic Activist (LAT) 11
Editor's E-Mail May Be Used In Suit Against The Times (NYT) . 13
N.Y. Times Urges Judge To Dismiss Hatfill Suit (WP)..... 14
Hatfill Lawyer: Times Editor Warned Columnist On Anthrax Piece (AP)..... 15
Katrina Victims Find A Solution: Modular House (NYT)..... 16

War News:

Pelosi, Reid Urge Bush To Begin Iraq Pullout (WP) 17
Bush Facing A Deep Divide With Democrats Over Talk Of Increasing Troops In Iraq (NYT)..... 19
Critics Slam Possible Iraq Troop Boost (AP) 20
Reid, Pelosi Rip Iraq Buildup (WT)..... 22
Reid And Pelosi Warn Bush Against "Surge" (RC)..... 23
Democrats Blast Bush's Iraq "Surge" Policy (HILL) 23
Democrats Step Up Iraq Pressure (BBC)..... 24
Top Democrats Balk At Troop Surge (BOS) 24
Senators Back Call For More Troops In Iraq (FT)..... 26
Troop Surge Can't Be Brief, Backers Insist (LAT)..... 26
Iraqi Politicians Divided Over U.S. Envoy (WP)..... 28
Zalmay Khalilzad, On To A New Trouble Spot (NYT)..... 29
Ryan Clark Crocker, A Diplomat Used To Danger (NYT)..... 30
A New Commander, In Step With The White House On Iraq (NYT) 31
Pace Future In Doubt After Shake-up (WT) 33
Images Of Hanging Make Hussein A Martyr To Many (NYT)..... 33
Baghdad Initiative To Go Door To Door (AP)..... 35
American, 2 Iraqi Interpreters Kidnapped (LAT) 36
Insurgents Elude Forces In Eastern Iraqi Province (LAT) 37
Death In Haditha (WP)..... 38
Lawmaker: U.S. Catching, Releasing Top Terror Targets (CNN)42
Army Asks Dead To Sign Up For Another Hitch (AP)..... 43
How Do You Repay A Hero's Sacrifice? (WSJ) 43
With Each Fallen Soldier, A Field Of Flags Grows (NYT)..... 46
White Small-town America Pays Highest price For Going To War (FT)..... 47
Chirac Says Time Proves France Was Right To Resist War (NYT) 48

Corporate Scandals:

Appeals Court Reverses Convictions Of 2 Westar Energy Executives (AP) 49
Ex-Merrill Lynch Analyst Sentenced In Insider Trading Scheme (AP)..... 49
BANKER SLAMMED (NYPOST)..... 50
Jail For Merrill Analyst In Insider Trading Scam (NYDN)..... 51
Ex-Merrill Analyst Gets 37 Months In Insider Case (Update4) (BLOOM) 51
A Misdated Option Aided ACS's Deason (WSJ) 52
Inside Jobs (WSJ)..... 53

Criminal Law:

News Media Seek Audio Of Libby Trial (AP) 54
The Villains Of Currency (WSJ)..... 54
SAN FRANCISCO Challenge To Law On Officer Killings Convicted Man's Attorney Calls It Unconstitutional (SFC). 56
Documents Give New Details Of SunCruz-linked Bribe To Ex-Ohio Lawmaker (MH) 57
DOJ Pushes FBI To Broaden Data Sharing With Outside Agencies (COMPWRLD)..... 58
Ken Wall, Crystal Russo Sentenced In Orange Beach Case (MR) 58
Ex-councilman Pleads Guilty In Orange Beach Corruption Case (AP)..... 60
Pellicano Allowed To Defend Himself (LAT) 60
D.C. Police To Target Each Area's Safety Needs Individually (WP)..... 61
Archdiocese Settles Sex Suits (DENP) 62
Just Days Into The Year, Killings Toll Hits 8 In New Orleans (NYT) 63

A Spate Of Killings Opens New Year In New Orleans (WP/AP) 64

Civil Law:

Supreme Court To Rule On Whistle - Blowing (AP) 65
Former Acute-care Service Settles Suit For $7.5 Million (HC) ... 66
Judge Clears Delphi Debt Refinance Plan (AP)..... 67

Civil Rights:

EEOC Says Prosecutor Wrongly Fired (BN)..... 68
Alleged Jail Beating Spurs Suspensions (CHIT)..... 68
6 Guards Suspended After Alleged Jail Beating (NWTIMES).... 69
Lake County Jail Guards Suspended After Beating (AP) 69
Federal Lawsuit Claims Racial Discrimination In Police Department (WP)..... 70
Teel Given Copy Of Tape (BSH)..... 71
Gastonia Man Dies After Police Use Taser To Restrain Him (CO) 72
US Supreme Court Agrees To Hear Coca-Cola's Appeal In A Race Discrimination Case (AP)..... 72
Questionable Mission (WP)..... 72

Antitrust:

Brooks Unit Sale Gets Antitrust Scrutiny (BOS)..... 73
A Buyout Duo Reads Potential In Newspaper (WSJ) 73
Mercy 'no' To Proposal For Joint Hospital (DMR)..... 74

Environment:

Feds Drop Waste-water Inquiry (HTRIB) 75
6 Ohio Cities Rush To File Suits Against Makers Of Lead Paint (NYT) 76
Bill Would Permanently Bar Drilling In Alaskan Refuge (AP) 76
Drill Ban Sought For Alaskan Park (BBC)..... 77
DuPont Drops Plan For Nerve Gas Wastewater (NYT)..... 78
Mercury "Hot Spots" Identified In U.S. And Canada (WP)..... 79
The Senate's Task On Warming (NYT) 79
The Navy's War On Whales (LAT) 80

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Agent Named To Lead FBI's Miss. Operations (BSH) 81
Brink To Become New FBI Chief In Miss. (JCL) 81
Former FBI Top Agent Gets Prison Sentence (ELPT)..... 81
Former El Paso FBI Chief Sentenced To 6 Months In Prison (DMN/AP)..... 82
Drug Agents Mishandled Seized Cash, Audit Finds (DCEX) 83
Federal Agencies To Help Fight Violence (FLSUNSEN)..... 83
FBI Seeks Information On Device At Church Advocate Westside Bureau (BRADV) 84

Immigration:

Troops Flee From Border Outpost (WT) 84
Hockey-Coach Quota (WSJ) 85

Congress-Administration:

House Tightens Disclosure Rules For Pet Projects (NYT) 86
Everybody Will Know If It's Pork (LAT)..... 87
House Changes Rules On Pork-barrel Projects (CHIT) 89
House's "Pay-Go" Rule Makes AMT Relief Harder (WSJ) 90
House Adopts Pay-as-You-Go Rules (WP) 91
House OKs Budget Rule Changes (WT)..... 92
Dreier Shifts Gears In A Hurry (LAT)..... 92
Democrats Rename Key House Panel (WT) 93
Home Town Paves The Way For Pelosi (WP)..... 94
Pelosi Visits Hometown On Victory Tour (AP) 95
Partying Dead Wake Up The Democrats (WP)..... 96
Giddy Sea Of Fresh Faces In The Capitol, United By A Serious Mission (NYT)..... 97
New Congress Brings Along Religious Firsts (WP) 98
Bush's Tax Legacy (WSJ) 99
Monkey On A Tiger (NYT) 100
Can Bush's Tax Cuts Survive? (WSJ)..... 101
A Heckuva Claim (WP) 101
Bill On Medicare Drug Cost Is Called Weak Medicine (LAT) ... 102
Strong Medicine (WSJ)..... 103
Boxer To Chair Ethics In Johnson's Absence (RC) 104
Memo Says White House Visitors Can't Be Named (AP)..... 104
Court Was Once Cloistered; Now Its Chief Does "Nightline" (WP)..... 105
Race Discrimination Case Added To Docket (WP/AP)..... 106
Justices To Consider School Sports Rules (LAT)..... 106
Justices To Consider Impact Of Mental Illness On Death Penalty (NYT) 107
White House Seeks Lawyer Wise To Ways Of Congress (NYT)108
Safe As Milk? (NYT) 109
Let Them Eat Clones (LAT)..... 110

Other News:

Jobs Data Brighten Economic Picture (WSJ)..... 110
Strong US Job Gains Dash Rate Cut Hopes (FT) 111
Workers, Wages Add To Growth (WP) 112
Jobs, Income Gains Bright Spots In 2006 (WT)..... 113
Job Growth Is Strong, Surprising Economists (NYT)..... 114
Minutes Show Fed Focus On Jobs Data (FT)..... 115
Bernanke Defends Fed Banking Supervision (FT) 116
Surge In Jobs Sends Markets Lower (NYT/AP)..... 116
Treasury Prices Hit By US Labour Report (FT)..... 117
Dollar Jumps To 6-Week High Against Euro On Jobs Data (WSJ)..... 118
After The Dow's 2006 Rise, Investors Ponder A Correction (WSJ)..... 118
Dow's Dogs Still Having Their Day (NYT)..... 119
Lower Oil Prices Slow In Reaching Pump (WP) 120
Gauging The Demand (WP)..... 121
Outdated And Inefficient (WSJ)..... 122
Republican Sen. Sam Brownback Set To Move Forward With Presidential Run (AP)..... 123
Owens To Join Romney Presidential Team (DENP)..... 124
Leaked Notes On '08 Show Giuliani Without The Spin (NYT).. 124
Obama To Headline Big Fundraiser (WP) 125
Former Democratic Party Boss Lambasts Kerry Campaign (AP)126
Goal Is To Look Good, Writer Of Democratic Memoir Admits (NYT) 127

DOJ_NMG_0113712

Buckley Quits Race For State Dem Chair (NHUL) 128
At Inauguration, Governor Praises The Central Path (SFC)..... 129
Schwarzenegger Adopts "Centrist" Line (WT/AP) 130
Glitterati, Gawkers Shrug Off Second Inauguration (LAT)..... 131
Schwarzenegger Opens In A Sequel (NYT) 132
Patching Up What's Broken? (WP) 133
O'Malley To Travel State To Thank His Supporters (WP) 134
Making No Small Plans (NYT)..... 135
"Embryo Bank" Stirs Ethics Fears (WP)..... 135
Texas Firm First To Offer Ready-made Embryos (HC) 137
Texas Company Sells Ready-made Embryos (DMN) 138
Reagan Bust OK'd For Hill (WT)..... 139
C. William Verity Jr. Former Commerce Secretary, 89, Dies (NYT/AP)..... 140
Remember Cindy Sheehan? (WSJ)..... 140
A Meeting With Gerald Ford (NYT) 140
Mr. Ford Gets The Last Laugh (NYT)..... 141
Rice Calls For Denuclearization Moves From North Korea (AFP)..... 142
Rice Cautions N. Korea (AP)..... 143
Nuclear Talks With N. Korea Expected To Resume (WP)..... 143
Policy Pat With Diplomat's Death (WT)..... 144
China Advises "Serious Response" By Iran To U.N. Sanctions (WP)..... 145
Report: China Prods Iran To Answer U.N. (AP)..... 145
American Diplomat To Visit Strife-Torn Somali Capital (NYT).. 146
Iraq-style Insurgency Urged On Somalis (FT)..... 147
Islamist Stragglers Vow Guerrilla Tactics, Suicides (WT/AP)... 148
Quick Deployment Of Peacekeepers Urged For Somalia; Aid Pledged (WP) 148
In Somalia, Confusion Remains In Command (WP)..... 149
Day After Killings, A Hamas Leader Calls For A Truce (NYT).. 151
Cleric Shot In Gaza After Plea For Calm (FT)..... 152
Tanzanian Woman Is Chosen For U.N.'s 2nd Highest Post (NYT) 152
UN Chief Picks Tanzanian Deputy (BBC) 153
Tanzanian Woman Chosen For No. 2 Post At United Nations (LAT) 153
U.N. Chief To Open Financial Records (WP)..... 154
A Status Quo Secretary General (NYT) 155
China Moves To Tighten The Money Supply (NYT)..... 155
China Currency Near Parity With Hong Kong's Dollar (NYT) ... 156
China Media Battle Hints At Shift On Intellectual Property (NYT)157
White Farmers Given Leases In Zimbabwe (WP) 158
Ties To Communist Secret Police Snare Polish Bishop (NYT) 159
Polish Archbishop Admits Signing Communist Pact (WP/AP) . 161
Chavez Denounced For Canceling TV License (LAT)..... 162
Menem Preaches His Free Market Gospel (FT)..... 163
Kirchner Critic Seeks Argentine Presidency (FT)..... 163
In The Global Energy Rush, Nuclear Gets A Resurgence (WP)164
The EU's Ugly Little Challenge (LAT)..... 166
With Friends Like These... (WSJ)..... 167

DOJ_NMG_0113713

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Grants Delay In Mental Exam For Padilla (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, January 6, 2007

MIAMI — A federal judge on Friday gave prison officials another week to complete mental examinations to determine if alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla is competent to stand trial.

Bureau of Prisons officials sought an even longer delay until Jan. 30. They said in court papers that Padilla is not "compliant with psychological testing" and must be observed by staff members to complete the evaluation. The documents provided no further details.

The tests were originally supposed to be completed by Friday.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke insisted that the examinations be finished before the scheduled Jan. 22 trial date so she can rule on a number of other outstanding issues, including Padilla's claim that the case should be dismissed because he was tortured during 3½ years in military custody as an "enemy combatant."

"This court cannot proceed to trial until these motions are adequately resolved," Cooke said in a two-page order Friday.

Justice Department and Pentagon officials have repeatedly denied the torture allegations.

Cooke gave prisons officials until next Friday to finish the evaluation of Padilla and until Jan. 16 to deliver a competency report to her. Two mental experts hired by defense lawyers have concluded that Padilla suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder and is unable to adequately assist his attorneys.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen, is charged along with two others in the U.S. with being part of a support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to violent Islamic extremists around the world. All three have pleaded not guilty. Two others charged in the case are in custody overseas.

Padilla was arrested in 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport for what U.S. officials originally called a plot to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in the United States. President Bush designated him an "enemy combatant" and he was held without criminal charge at a Navy brig in South Carolina until he was added to the Miami terror support case in late 2005.

The "dirty bomb" allegations are not mentioned in the Miami indictment.

Aside from the competency issue, the Jan. 22 trial date is in jeopardy because federal prosecutors have appealed Cooke's dismissal of a key terrorism count in the case. The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals is scheduled to hear oral arguments on that issue Wednesday in Atlanta, and Cooke has said the trial will not go forward until that question is settled.

The dismissed count carries a potential life prison sentence, while the two remaining terror support counts carry possible 15-year sentences each. Cooke ruled that the dismissed count improperly duplicated other parts of the same indictment.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Spy Pick: Low-key But "Rock Solid" (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

President Bush's nominee to be the next director of national intelligence is a spy agency veteran who is a master of the intricacies of the trade, from the technology of intercepting electronic signals to the financial sleight-of-hand of hidden, or "black," budgets.

The main question surrounding J. Michael McConnell's nomination to be the next intelligence chief is whether he is forceful enough to keep an already ill-defined job from sliding into irrelevancy.

When the position of national intelligence director was created two years ago, even lawmakers who drafted legislation that created the job acknowledged that its actual authority is not clear.

A key national commission said the position had more responsibility than institutional power. And high-profile intelligence veterans, including new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, turned down a chance to fill the job in part because of concerns about how it was structured.

DOJ_NMG_0113714

John D. Negroponte, a longtime government official who became the first occupant of the position, spent much of his tenure trying to consolidate his control over the intelligence community, said Gregory Treverton, an analyst at Rand Corp. and former vice chairman of the National Intelligence Council, which represents all U.S. intelligence agencies.

"Negroponte had the reputation for being a savvy operator with no shortage of razor blades on his elbows," Treverton said. The fact that Negroponte is vacating the position 18 months into his tenure, Treverton said, "may be a commentary on just how hard it is."

Others in Washington were more blunt. In turning to McConnell, the White House "went from Negroponte, who was a pretty significant figure, to a less significant one," said a senior government official involved in creating the director's post.

If McConnell is not able to impose his will on the 16 intelligence agencies that fall under his responsibility, "it could be the beginning of the end of the DNI's office," the official said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

McConnell, 63, is known for his courtly manner and soft South Carolina drawl. A retired Navy vice admiral, he is part of an influx of national security officials who first came to prominence during the administration of President George H.W. Bush.

During the 1991 Persian Gulf War, McConnell was a senior intelligence advisor to then-Defense Secretary Dick Cheney and former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Colin L. Powell. In that position, he also established relationships with Gates and Condoleezza Rice, who then worked at the National Security Council in the White House.

McConnell later served as director of the National Security Agency, which is the nation's largest intelligence agency and is responsible for eavesdropping on electronic communications around the world.

During McConnell's tenure, from 1992 to 1996, the NSA is widely viewed as having struggled to keep up with emerging technologies, including the Internet. Even so, McConnell was seen as an effective leader who pushed to improve the agency's ability to confirm the authenticity of intercepted e-mails and other communications.

McConnell "is rock solid," Treverton said. "He knows intelligence, and he's a steady pair of hands."

After retiring, McConnell, a graduate of Furman University in South Carolina, joined the consulting firm Booz Allen Hamilton, where he has spent the last 10 years serving as an advisor to companies as well as government agencies on intelligence and technology issues.

If confirmed by the Senate, McConnell is widely expected to follow the course set by Negroponte and continue pushing for better information sharing among intelligence agencies, rather than launch a major shake-up.

McConnell is invariably described as low-key, causing some to question whether he is the right pick for a job that would seem to require an appetite and aptitude for bureaucratic infighting.

But supporters note that McConnell will not have to contend with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who opposed the creation of the position and was widely seen as pushing the military to encroach on spy agency turf. Rumsfeld stepped down as Defense secretary last month.

Because of his long-standing ties to Cheney, Gates and others, McConnell also has built-in allies.

"McConnell is very quiet," said Mark M. Lowenthal, a former senior CIA official. "But he has a lovely touch, and he's well-known to a lot of people in the community who are still in senior positions in a way that Negroponte was not."

Bush Names New Spy Chief With Iraq Speech Looming (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, January 5, 2007

US President George W. Bush named a new spy chief and filled a critical diplomatic vacancy as he put the last touches on a retooled Iraq strategy that critics charge may escalate the war.

Bush, expected to unveil his new plan as early as Wednesday, nominated director of national intelligence John Negroponte to be US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy -- a key post vacant since July 2006.

"I have asked John Negroponte to serve in this vital position at this crucial moment," Bush said, stressing the former ambassador's responsibility to help ensure "that America speaks to the world with one voice."

And Bush announced that he had chosen vice admiral Michael McConnell, a former head of the National Security Agency, to replace Negroponte at the head of all 16 US spy agencies, officials said.

"Mike will report directly to me. And I am confident he will give me the best information and analysis that America's intelligence community can provide," the US president said.

The reshuffle -- begun when he dumped defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld after opposition Democrats captured the US Congress in November elections -- came days before Bush was to reveal his plans for the unpopular war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0113715

"It is vital they take up their new responsibilities promptly," Bush said in a message aimed at shaping their Senate confirmation. "I would hope that they would be confirmed as quickly as possible."

The embattled US president, his job approval numbers in the cellar, was to unveil his new Iraq approach as early as Wednesday, after consultations with key world leaders and US lawmakers, the White House said.

The president has left untouched his other core national security aides -- Vice President Dick Cheney, Rice and national security adviser Stephen Hadley -- leaving doubts about how far-reaching his Iraq overhaul would be.

In addition to shifting Negroponte -- the first US ambassador to post-Saddam Hussein Iraq -- Bush was to nominate the current US ambassador there, Zalmay Khalilzad, to be US ambassador to the United Nations, a top aide said.

That announcement, filling another key vacancy left by controversial diplomat John Bolton's recent departure, was expected to be announced on Friday.

Replacing Khalilzad in Baghdad would be Ryan Crocker, 57, the US ambassador in Pakistan since November 2004. Crocker is one of the State Department's most experienced Middle East experts and a fluent Arabic speaker.

On the military side, Bush was to change the head of the US Central Command and the top US military commander in Iraq, both of whom have expressed skepticism about escalating the war, US media reported.

Admiral William Fallon, currently head of US forces in the Pacific, would replace retiring General John Abizaid, 55, at the Central Command, which manages the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

In Iraq, Lieutenant General David Petraeus would replace General George Casey as the man in charge of all US and coalition forces, according to the reports, which went unchallenged by the White House.

On Thursday, Bush did not directly address a wave of media reports that he plans to boost the US troop level in Iraq, but stressed, "One thing is for certain: I will want to make sure that the mission is clear and specific and can be accomplished."

Bush, who held a nearly two-hour videoconference with Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki on Thursday, said that the Iraqi leader "has the will necessary to make the tough decisions. That's one of the things I learned today."

But The Washington Post reported Friday that the US president's top aides are still deeply divided over Maliki's reliability and over whether to escalate the war by sending more US troops to Iraq.

The advisers fear Maliki's government may not provide the military support and implement the political reforms necessary for US forces to eventually withdraw, the Post reported, citing officials familiar with the debate.

Profile: Michael McConnell (BBC)

BBC.com, January 5, 2007

Michael McConnell's nomination as head of Washington's 16 spy agencies tops a long career serving the many instruments of US intelligence gathering.

President Bush is looking Mr McConnell to steer the spy agencies

He is seen as a committed, capable official - broadly respected by the spy community and well known to senior figures in the Bush administration.

Naming him as the new Director of National Intelligence, President George W Bush said he had "decades of experience, ensuring our military has the intelligence it needs to fight and win wars".

A courteous man with a soft South Carolina accent, Mr McConnell became a naval intelligence officer after serving in Vietnam.

He came to prominence during the 1991 Gulf War, delivering intelligence about Iraqi forces to the military and political leadership of the time, including Defence Secretary Dick Cheney and Gen Colin Powell.

A tribute offered to him in the US Congress in 1996 said he had been "instrumental in saving US and coalition lives and directly contributed to bringing about a quick and decisive victory" in the first Gulf conflict.

'Candour and openness'

After the war, Mr McConnell was promoted to the rank of Vice Admiral and appointed head of the National Security Agency (NSA).

He led the agency from 1992 to 1996 - an era of rapid technological advances and drastic budget cuts.

Encryption technology developed during his tenure has been used to protect sensitive US electronic communications from enemy hackers.

Mr McConnell's deputy at the NSA, William P Crowell, told the New York Times newspaper he was a "consummate professional".

Another former colleague, Ronald D Lee, told the paper he was "an exceptionally gifted leader who was completely devoted to the rule of law and the constitution".

DOJ_NMG_0113716

The Congressional tribute from 1996 praises his "candour and openness" in keeping Congress informed of the NSA's work.

'Hands-on'

Mr McConnell left the NSA to join the board of Booz Allen Hamilton, a management consulting firm, and stayed out of government for the next 10 years.

The firm has been a major recipient of intelligence outsourcing contracts offered by the Pentagon, according to federal records cited by the USA Today newspaper.

Ralph Shrader, Booz Allen Hamilton's chairman and CEO, told the paper Mr McConnell was a "hands-on" official, who can "solicit lots of opinions" and produce something that takes the needs of the entire country into consideration".

However, some officials have questioned whether his gentle touch will be suited to co-ordinating the diverse arms of US intelligence.

W Patrick Lang, a former intelligence official interviewed by the New York Times, said Mr McConnell's "competent but compliant" reputation meant he may not want to challenge his bosses on critical issues.

DHS To Boost 6 Cities' Share Of Anti-Terror Funds (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

D.C., New York Among Those to Share $411 Million

Chastened by complaints about poor federal cooperation and by controversy over its slashing of aid to New York and Washington last year, the Department of Homeland Security will reserve about $100 million of the $747 million it will dole out to U.S. cities this year to pay for police counterterrorism operations in six metropolitan areas, officials said yesterday.

In announcing changes in style and substance to the Urban Area Security Initiative (UASI) program, Secretary Michael Chertoff cited a "secretary's prerogative to sometimes inject common sense" to grant calculations based on the risk of terrorism and a subjective rating of the effectiveness of local anti-terrorism programs. The process was ridiculed by Congress and private analysts last year for slighting the two areas struck in the 2001 terrorist attacks.

"This is going to be an amazing admission for a public official in Washington: We actually listen to people," Chertoff said, adding that DHS will collaborate more closely with applicants in the distribution of $1.7 billion in state and local grants in 2007.

For the first time, DHS designated six high-risk urban areas -- New York and northern New Jersey; the Washington region; Los Angeles-Long Beach; Chicago; the San Francisco Bay area; and Houston -- which will be allowed to spend as much as 25 percent of their grants for personnel and operations, not just for overtime during heightened national terrorism alerts. Chertoff cited the threat of "homegrown terrorism" in encouraging the funding of law-enforcement-led domestic intelligence "fusion centers."

The six will compete for $411 million, or 55 percent of the UASI funds. An additional 39 cities will compete for the remaining $336 million.

Repeating past assertions, Chertoff said the change reflects risk, not politics. The high-risk areas will receive nearly $30 million more than last year, but their percentage of the UASI budget will remain about the same.

Chertoff declined to say if specific cities would get a boost when grants are announced by summer, saying only that he is confident that New York will "do well" because it has worked closely with DHS.

Senate leaders were critical, noting that DHS will still use subjective peer grading of recipients.

"Amazingly enough, DHS insists on using the same process again," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), the chamber's third-ranking Democrat. He added that New Yorkers "have every reason to be skeptical" of the results because the city is now joined with suburban New Jersey for grant award purposes.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), the chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, said DHS also made "ill-advised" changes to a $509 million state grant program, down $19 million from last year, by eliminating population density as a factor and changing the minimum amount each state can receive.

"I am committed to passing a permanent funding formula so that the guidelines are not arbitrarily rewritten each year," Lieberman said.

Defending the program changes, Chertoff said DHS officials no longer engage in excessive "bean counting" -- using mathematical programs to analyze huge databases listing non-vital facilities such as apartment buildings, small-town popcorn stands and petting zoos.

Urban areas were chosen, Chertoff said, based on population size and density, economic significance, and proximity to critical infrastructure, such as borders and key military assets. They were vetted by Pentagon, Commerce Department and intelligence officials.

DOJ_NMG_0113717

DHS winnowed a database of 80,000 assets into a classified list of about 2,100 targets of national or regional importance, he said, such as nuclear, chemical and energy facilities, dams and transportation systems.

New York, New Jersey To Split Security Funds (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Newsday Washington Bureau

Newsday, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As part of a new regional approach to combatting terror, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced Friday that New York and northern New Jersey would be considered a single area for homeland security planning.

The homeland security chief, who came under withering criticism last year for slashing antiterror funds to New York City, denied that linking two states and 15 counties (including Nassau and Suffolk) would mean less money for New York.

"There is nothing about this to suggest New York is going to get a grant cut," he said.

"I can tell you from the first World Trade Center investigation, a lot of the planning for that bombing took place in Jersey City. So who bore the security responsibility there? Was it New York? Well, New York didn't have the ability to get into Jersey City. Was it New Jersey? Well, the attack took place in New York. ... If you look at the risk, the risk is combined."

In addition, Chertoff said the department is guaranteeing for the first time that the six highest-risk areas -- including New York-northern New Jersey -- will split 55 percent of the $747 million earmarked for the 45 highest-risk urban areas. A total of $1.7 billion will be awarded for all counterterrorism programs next year.

Specific grants won't be announced until the spring, after municipalities have submitted proposals that will once again be judged by secret peer-review panels.

Chertoff vowed that the grant process would be more user-friendly and publicly transparent. He said grants would still be channeled through each state, which will disperse them to localities, "because that's what the law requires."

But not everyone was convinced the process had been sufficiently improved.

"Based on last year's ridiculous allocations, and DHS's indication that once again it will use the peer review process, New Yorkers have every reason to be skeptical," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.).

"If DHS gives out money based on a combined New York and New Jersey area, it better be two full loaves, not a half for each. ... DHS simply cannot direct fewer dollars to the highest-risk area in the country."

New York City officials said they were cautiously optimistic -- in large part because of another significant change in how the program will work. For the first time, high-risk cities may use up to a quarter of their antiterror money to defray the cost of "boots on the ground" -- that is, personnel devoted exclusively to counterterror work.

Until now, the federal government has resisted the city's requests for help defraying the cost of its 1,000-strong counterterror force, insisting instead that the money go to purchase technology.

"We have been advocating for this policy change for several years," said New York City Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler. "Overall, the devil will be in the details, but we are optimistic that our concerns are being heard by Secretary Chertoff and that we will receive more funding than last year."

Rep. Peter King (R-Seaford), ranking member of the House Homeland Security Committee and a leading critic of last year's cuts, was also cautiously optimistic.

"I was assured that the New York-northern New Jersey designation certainly won't hurt New York, and the inference was it should help," he said.

King also called the department's agreement to allow cities to use federal money for dedicated counterterrorism forces "incredibly significant."

"Last year, that was the real philosophical divide," he said. "DHS was consumed by a desire for high-tech gadgetry and New York said it had as much of that as they needed. Their main need is boots on the ground. This will definitely favor communities like them."

Federal Funds May Now Pay Police Salaries In Terror Fight (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — New York City will be able for the first time to use federal grant dollars to pay basic salaries of police officers assigned to counterterrorism tasks, like guarding city bridges and subway tunnels, the secretary of homeland security, Michael Chertoff, said on Friday.

The rules change will apply to six metropolitan areas considered at highest risk for attack: New York, Chicago, Houston, Los Angeles, Washington and San Francisco.

DOJ_NMG_0113718

These six urban areas will share $411 million in antiterrorism grants this year, while 39 other areas from Atlanta to Tucson will compete for the remaining $336 million in available grants, or 45 percent of the total, Mr. Chertoff said.

New York City officials welcomed the rule change, for which they had lobbied over several years. Previously, while some use of grant dollars was allowed for overtime, federal officials pushed cities to use the money to buy antiterrorism equipment like gas masks or surveillance systems rather than for salaries.

In New York, nearly 1,000 officers, at a cost of about $200 million a year, are assigned to antiterrorism tasks, and city officials have argued that the federal government should foot a bigger chunk of the bill. Under the new rules, the city will be able to use up to 25 percent of its federal grant to cover these salaries.

"Our Police Department is essentially a first line of defense again terrorist attacks; that is serving the nation as well as the city," Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler said. "These are the boots on the ground."

But there is still a good chance that when the actual urban-area grant awards come out later this year, city officials will be disappointed.

That is because with an overall pool of just $441 million for these six urban areas, it remains unlikely that the New York City area will get anywhere close to the nearly $230 million it received two years ago — before a cut in the grant last year outraged New York City politicians.

The problem, Mr. Skyler and Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York said, is that too much of the overall $1.7 billion in antiterrorism grants — only a piece of which is set aside for cities, with much of the rest going directly to states — is still being distributed based on politically driven formulas that ensure that every state gets a cut.

Legislation that Democrats have introduced in the House would change the way these grants are awarded — to comply with a 9/11 commission recommendation that they be based on risk.

"You should make it all threat-based," Senator Schumer said. Mr. Chertoff said that regardless of any action by Congress, he hoped to steer as much of the money as he could to those cities with the greatest needs.

Homeland Security is also trying to simplify the evaluation process, to avoid the same criticism as last year that its complicated formula — which includes considering potential targets as obscure as a popcorn factory, a flea market and a petting zoo — was irrational if not comical.

"Speaking for myself, I don't believe that I'm infallible or that I have nothing to learn from anybody," Mr. Chertoff said, admitting that last year's grant process was flawed.

Area In Highest Tier Of Terror Funding (HC)

By Michael Hedges, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Houston will be eligible for a larger chunk of federal grant money for local security as one of six U.S. metropolitan areas most likely to face a terrorist attack, the Department of Homeland Security announced Friday.

Houston's energy industry and port system are considered prime potential targets for terrorists, officials said, and the area's population size as well as its location relatively close to an international border were also considered by federal officials.

It was the first time the federal government identified so-called Tier One potential terrorism targets. The other metro areas are New York, Los Angeles, Washington, Chicago and San Francisco.

The six will split $411 million in urban-area security grants in 2007, or 55 percent of the total allocated directly to all metro regions.

Department of Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff said the economic consequences to the country of a successful strike on an area such as Houston were also weighed.

"The more sophisticated we become at weighing these variables ... the better we've become at targeting resources to address and mitigate those risks," he said.

The Houston area consists of Harris, Montgomery and Fort Bend counties.

"We've done a good job of getting the folks in D.C. to recognize there is a real threat here," said Doug Adkinson, deputy chief of staff to Harris County Judge Robert Eckels. "We've convinced them that the Ship Channel is a real target and — God forbid — a successful attack there would impact the whole country economically."

Equipment and trainingHigh on Houston's wish list for federal funding is an upgrade of the city's aging radio system for police and firefighters, which is not compatible with the high-tech system used in the rest of the region, Adkinson said.

This week, Chertoff cited the 16-year-old UHF radio system in Houston as a potential vulnerability if a terrorist attack required local agencies to coordinate their responses.

DOJ_NMG_0113719

The region also is expected to seek funding for training police in counterterrorism techniques, video cameras for surveillance of potential targets, a marine fire-fighting task force for the Ship Channel, bomb disposal equipment, a building collapse response team, generators, and salaries for intelligence experts working in the city, Adkinson said.

Tier Two targetsThree other Texas locales — Dallas/Fort Worth, San Antonio and El Paso — were among 39 urban areas designated as Tier Two targets. The areas will divide up the remaining $336 million in federal grants.

It was the first time that El Paso became eligible for anti-terrorism funding, a consequence of it being on the Mexican border, Chertoff said.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-El Paso, said he had pushed for the city's inclusion since 2003.

"El Paso is a major metropolitan area along an international border with a major military presence," Reyes said. "I have long argued that it is imperative that our community be included in this grant program, and we should have received these funds years ago."

A separate grant program makes another $2.5 billion in homeland security money available to the states. Texas allocated $17 million to Houston last year.

No precise dollar figure has been set for Houston under the urban grant program.

Its funding application will be weighed against proposals from the other Tier One areas, Chertoff said.

In recent years, New York and Washington officials lobbied for a disproportionately larger share of the money, citing the 9/11 attacks as evidence that they were especially vulnerable targets. The cities ended up complaining that their funding levels were too low.

The feedback was part of the reason DHS divided metropolitan areas into two threat tiers, Chertoff said.

Democrats Backpedal On 9/11 Commission (WT)

By Brian Debose, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

House Democrats campaigned on a promise to implement the recommendations of the September 11 commission, but now say they will not enact all of them.

The recommendation to place all intelligence agencies under the Defense Department "is not on the table," said Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat.

Another obstacle to enacting all the commission reforms as promised is the formula by which federal anti-terrorism money is distributed across the country.

House Democrats are confident they can pass a bill in which funds would be distributed based on risk. Under that plan, the area around New York City and San Francisco would get much more funding than, for example, the area around Topeka, Kan., or Searchlight, Nev.

But such a plan almost certainly will be killed in the Democratic-controlled Senate. Lawmakers there almost always find it difficult to part with money for their police and fire departments or the Coast Guard, regardless of terrorism-risk assessments.

"I suspect the Senate will pass a different version than ours, and we will have to work it out in a conference," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat and chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. "We should have a baseline funding of 25 percent for first responders in all 50 states and the rest should go to the areas with the greatest need and that have the most risk of a terrorist attack."

Another recommendation unlikely to be fully implemented is tasking one House committee with the responsibility of overseeing both intelligence operations and funding. However, Mr. Hoyer said, the plan to create a new subcommittee comprising members from the appropriations and intelligence committees will help.

"The 9/11 commission wanted a single authorizing body for intelligence, and I think the substance or the spirit of the recommendations will be achieved," he said.

Details are still to be finalized.

"It hasn't been worked out how the members would be chosen," said Rep. Silvestre Reyes, Texas Democrat and chairman of the intelligence panel. Whether the chairmen of the two committees or House Speaker Nancy Pelosi would pick the members has yet to be decided, he said, but there will be a new panel in some form.

"As I understand it, it's a final deal. The rest is still being determined," said Rep. Chaka Fattah, Pennsylvania Democrat and a member of the Appropriations Committee.

Some Democrats oppose the hybrid idea from the outset.

"The question is what impact will it have on the intelligence committee, and it seems it will gut the committee's authority," said one Democrat, who did not wish to be named.

DOJ_NMG_0113720

Mr. Hoyer said the intelligence panel would still have oversight and responsibility to ensure that intelligence operations are "effective and accountable."

The Senate will have few problems deciding who will oversee intelligence because "only the Senate intelligence committee can authorize spending for intelligence agencies," said its chairman, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat.

"Our biggest problem is getting the spending authorization done," he said. "It's been two years since we have and we want to do the 2007 as soon as possible and then work on 2008."

The indecision in the House could become a problem for Democrats' hopes of convincing the public that they are just as capable of protecting the country from terrorist attacks as Republicans.

And Republicans are eagerly waiting to see whether Democrats will finally concede that many of the remaining September 11 commission recommendations shouldn't be enacted.

"I think what Democrats are finding in some of the 9/11 recommendations we didn't implement, looking closely at them ... these are not good ideas," said Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican and his party's ranking member on the intelligence panel.

He said the hybrid committee is unnecessary if both the Appropriations Committee and the intelligence panel chairmen pledge to have the same budget priorities.

"That is what I did with Representative Jerry Lewis [California Republican] when I was intelligence chair and he was appropriations chair in the last Congress, and it worked fine," Mr. Hoekstra said.

FBI Probing Death Threat To Muslim (CCT)

By Steve Lawrence

The Contra Costa Times, January 6, 2007

SACRAMENTO - The FBI said Friday it is investigating a death threat sent to the leader of a local Muslim group after U.S. Sen. Barbara Boxer rescinded a certificate her office had awarded to him.

Special Agent Karen Ernst said the bureau launched an investigation after Basim Elkarra reported receiving a threatening e-mail.

Elkarra, executive director of the Sacramento chapter of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, received a certificate of accomplishment from Boxer's office in November recognizing his "outstanding service."

Elkarra said the award reflected his group's efforts to establish good relations with Christians, Jews, minority groups and the FBI.

After the certificate was awarded, Boxer read a Web log linking her to the council and accusing it of pro-terrorist activities, including refusing to condemn Osama bin Laden by name.

Boxer asked her staff to investigate, and her office sent a letter withdrawing the certificate Dec. 21, her communications director, Natalie Ravitz, said Thursday.

Ravitz said two of the council's former members were sentenced to prison for crimes related to terrorist groups. She also said CAIR had refused to label Hamas and Hezbollah as terrorist organizations.

CAIR's national leaders denied that the group had terrorist ties or sympathies and accused Boxer of caving in to anti-Muslim extremists.

"By acting on smears, distortions and guilt by association, Senator Boxer has failed her Muslim constituents and has betrayed the progressive values of her party and state," Parvez Ahmed, CAIR's chairman, said in a statement.

Nihad Awad, CAIR's national executive director, thanked the FBI for investigating and urged Boxer to "examine the agendas of those who seek to marginalize and disenfranchise American Muslims."

Elkarra said the death threat was sent Dec. 30, the day after an article about Boxer rescinding the certificate appeared on Newsweek magazine's Web site. He said he also received another e-mail he described as hate mail when CAIR announced the award.

He said he still has the certificate but doesn't display it. He said he hopes Boxer will reconsider her decision.

"If she went to our Web site, it probably would have taken her two minutes to see all the (positive) campaigns we've launched in the past," he said, adding that his group was "willing to work with Senator Boxer and other officials who seek to build a more tolerant America."

Ravitz said Boxer asked her staff to contact the FBI and urge it to investigate the death threat.

Sen. Boxer Rescinds Award To Islamic Activist (LAT)

By Ashraf Khalil, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0113721

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The man represents a group some contend is extremist. Supporters say right-wingers are just trying to silence American Muslims.

Sen. Barbara Boxer has rescinded an award her office gave to a Sacramento Islamic activist after criticism that the group he represents — the Council on American-Islamic Relations — holds extremist views and has ties to international terrorist organizations.

"I'm saying the four words that every elected official hates to say: 'I made a mistake,' " the California Democrat said in a telephone interview Friday. "I hope they won't believe that I did this to hurt the Muslim community…. We just have to be more careful when we reach out."

The U.S. senator's office rescinded a "certificate of achievement" awarded in November to Basim Elkarra, head of the council's Sacramento office. The rare public reversal follows charges from right-wing activists that Boxer was courting Muslim extremists by associating with the group.

The controversy highlights the complexities facing leading American Muslim groups in their dealings with elected officials — and vice versa.

It recalls a similar dispute surrounding a decision by the Los Angeles County Human Relations Commission to give an award to Dr. Maher Hathout last fall. A senior advisor to the Muslim Public Affairs Council, Hathout also faced charges of extremism. After a bitter two-week public battle, Hathout narrowly avoided having the award rescinded. In a rare revote, only four of the commission's 14 members voted to reaffirm Hathout, with the majority either absent or abstaining.

Council on American-Islamic Relations officials say they and other Muslim organizations have been targets of an ongoing, and sometimes effective, campaign to silence and marginalize American Muslim voices.

"There is a market for Islamophobia right now," said Hussam Ayloush, head of the council's Southern California office. "It's the same group of right-wing extremists who are interconnected and feed off each other and keep recycling the same allegations."

The controversy started when Joe Kaufman, a Florida-based activist and longtime critic of the group, posted an online article attacking the award to Elkarra. Kaufman, who runs a website called CAIRwatch.com, has long contended that the council actively encourages and supports groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah — both of which are on the U.S. government's terrorism watch lists.

"We believe this organization should be shut down and that no elected leaders should have anything to do with them," Kaufman said.

One of the largest American Muslim political groups, the council has seen its profile and membership soar in the last five years. The group had only eight offices as of Sept. 11, 2001. It now has 32, along with an active lobbying arm based in Washington, D.C.

Founded in 1994, the council describes itself as the country's leading Muslim civil rights and advocacy organization. Its local chapters have tax-exempt nonprofit status, and its leaders deny any ties to Hezbollah or Hamas.

Boxer, who said she was unaware of the initial decision by her office to honor Elkarra, said independent research by her office later revealed troubling information about the organization.

"It's the volume of things, not any one thing," she said. "There's a long list."

That list includes several individual council members who have been indicted on terrorism-related charges, as well as harsh criticism of the organization by some of Boxer's congressional colleagues. In 2003, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) said the council was "unusual in its extreme rhetoric and its associations with groups that are suspect."

In recent years the council has drawn a carefully calibrated line on terrorism — strongly criticizing individual attacks and suicide bombings but refusing to label Hamas or Hezbollah as terrorist organizations.

It's also quick to condemn Israeli attacks in Lebanon and the occupied territories and label them as terrorism against civilians.

That criticism of Israel, council officials say, is what's really fueling the campaign against their group. Nothing short of endorsing Israeli policy, they say, will spare them from allegations of extremism.

"The minute we criticize Israel, then we become a nonmoderate group," Ayloush said. "You become public enemy No. 1."

The group also has a complicated relationship with federal law enforcement agencies. Former FBI counterterrorism chief Steven Pomerantz once said the council's activities "effectively give aid to international terrorist groups."

But council representatives say they frequently meet with senior FBI officials, and the group has helped train FBI agents in how to interact with the American Muslim community.

DOJ_NMG_0113722

Kaufman, who regularly contributes to the influential website frontpagemag.com, denies assertions that he's seeking to defame all Muslim groups. But he also said that none of the major American Muslim organizations qualify as moderates in his view. The website touts a variety of publications, such as "Big Lies: Demolishing the Myths of the Propaganda War Against Israel" and "The Truth About Muhammad, Founder of the World's Most Intolerant Religion."

The council has responded to Boxer's snub by demanding a meeting with the senator — an option Boxer said she would welcome — and rallying supporters of various faiths. Among those supporters is Elizabeth Sholes, director of public policy for the California Council of Churches, who has worked personally with Elkarra in Sacramento.

"They've issued multiple declarations against extremism and violence both in the Middle East and in the America Muslim community," Sholes said of the Muslim council. "I have found them in every instance to be absolutely dedicated to the issues of peace and justice."

The Muslim council is also encouraging supporters to contact Boxer's offices to protest the decision. A spokeswoman for Boxer said that as of Friday afternoon, the senator's offices in Washington and California have received 19 calls on the issue — 15 of them against the decision to rescind the award.

But Ayloush acknowledged that the situation represents a setback for the group's attempts to make inroads into American government and society.

"For us, the award has little value," Ayloush said. "It's the symbolism of a progressive Democrat giving in to pressure from right-wing Islamophobes."

ashraf.khalil@latimes.com

Editor's E-Mail May Be Used In Suit Against The Times (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

ALEXANDRIA, Va., Jan. 5 — A lawyer for a former government scientist who is suing The New York Times for defamation over a series of columns about the deadly anthrax mailings of 2001 said Friday in court that he was prepared to introduce an internal e-mail message from a senior Times editor that raised questions about one of the columns.

The lawyer, Mark A. Grannis, said the columns written by Nicholas D. Kristof about the federal investigation of the mailings unfairly damaged the reputation of his client, Dr. Stephen A. Hatfill, a former germ warfare scientist.

Dr. Hatfill's lawyers have said the columns wrongfully suggested that he was responsible for the attacks.

Mr. Grannis told Judge Claude M. Hilton of Federal District Court here that if the trial proceeded he would introduce evidence including a May 23, 2002, message from Philip Taubman, then deputy editor of the editorial page, raising questions about a draft of a column by Mr. Kristof.

Beginning that spring, Mr. Kristof wrote a series of columns about a government scientist whom he initially referred to as Mr. Z., saying the scientist had become the overwhelming focus of the investigation. That August, Mr. Kristof wrote that Dr. Hatfill had acknowledged that he was Mr. Z. at a news conference in which he said the news media had mistreated him.

Mr. Grannis said he would introduce evidence of questions about the column posed by Mr. Taubman and others. The evidence from Mr. Taubman, the lawyer said, was a message saying the as-yet-unpublished column "pointed pretty much at the guy" and encouraging Mr. Kristof to take out some of the material that did that.

Mr. Grannis made his disclosure of the information that he has obtained in the discovery phase of the suit in a hearing on a Times motion to seek dismissal of the complaint.

The trial is scheduled to start Jan. 29. Judge Hilton did not say when he would rule.

The Times has argued that the columns were aimed at prodding the Federal Bureau of Investigation to pursue the anthrax case more vigorously and did not accuse Dr. Hatfill of being the person responsible for the mailings.

In writing about the investigation, Mr. Kristof's ire was directed against federal officials for not moving swiftly to decide whether the scientist was guilty or innocent, the paper's lawyers have said.

"His intent was to focus on the F.B.I.," a lawyer for The Times, Lee Levine, told Judge Hilton.

Mr. Levine, of Levine Sullivan Koch & Schulz, told Judge Hilton that Mr. Hatfill was a public figure, or as someone recognized in libel and defamation law as a limited-purpose public figure, because of his involvement in the public debate about preparedness for a bioterrorist attack.

Mr. Levine said Dr. Hatfill had "voluntarily thrust himself into the vortex of that controversy" through his writings and speeches, confirmed by Dr. Hatfill's complaints that he was easily identified as Mr. Z by many people in the field.

DOJ_NMG_0113723

As a public figure Dr. Hatfill would have a far greater burden in his effort to win a defamation suit. To prevail, a public figure has to prove that the material was published with “actual malice,” that is with the knowledge that the statements were false or with reckless disregard as to whether they were false.

Lawyers for The Times also argued that neither Mr. Taubman’s message nor any other evidence put forward by Mr. Hatfill’s lawyers was proof that Mr. Kristof had acted with reckless disregard for the truth, the standard that Mr. Hatfill must meet if he is found to be a public figure.

The Times said that even if all of Mr. Hatfill’s assertions were true, he would not prevail and that therefore the judge should dismiss the case before trial. The message from Mr. Taubman, now Washington bureau chief for The Times, was released Friday afternoon by the lawyers for The Times. It read: “Nick, you’re still pointing pretty much at the guy. I think you need to lose the material I’ve marked in boldface.”

Mr. Taubman had marked two paragraphs referring to a middle-age American scientist with experience in producing bioweapons. The column, which appeared May 24, included the first of those two paragraphs but dropped the second, the messages showed. Although the essence of that message was pretty much as Mr. Grannis represented it in court, two other e-mail messages he cited were more ambiguous.

He said messages from Nicholas Wade, a former science editor at the paper and then a special projects writer, and Gail Collins, the editorial page editor, were critical of a column prepared for publication in July. Those messages, as disclosed by lawyers for The Times, raised more generalized suggestions.

Mr. Grannis said Mr. Wade’s message had said the column made it plausible to a reader that Mr. Kristof was pointing at Mr. Z as the culprit. But the message said it was plausible that Dr. Hatfill might have been involved in an earlier anthrax scare that was a hoax.

In her message, Ms. Collins said the column “looked fine to me” and asked how an anthrax mailing to The National Enquirer in Florida fit in.

Five people died in the attacks. Although federal authorities identified Dr. Hatfill as a “person of interest” in the case, he was not charged with any crimes. No one has been charged in the attacks.

N.Y. Times Urges Judge To Dismiss Hatfill Suit (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

The New York Times Co. yesterday urged a federal judge to throw out a defamation suit filed by a former Army scientist, saying that columnist Nicholas D. Kristof did not intend to implicate the scientist in the 2001 anthrax attacks.

In a series of columns that explored whether Steven J. Hatfill was responsible for the anthrax-spore mailings that killed five people and sickened 17, Kristof was trying "to focus attention on the FBI, to get it to jump-start the investigation . . . not to point a finger at Mr. Hatfill," said Lee Levine, a Times company lawyer.

But attorneys for Hatfill accused Kristof of deliberately ruining Hatfill's reputation and said Kristof's editor warned him that one of the columns could be read as implicating Hatfill in the attacks. The editor, Philip Taubman, said in an e-mail to Kristof that the column was "pointing pretty directly at the guy" and urged Kristof to take some passages out before publication, said the lawyer, Mark A. Grannis. Kristof declined, Grannis said.

"He was implicating Dr. Hatfill in a notorious act of terrorism," Grannis said. "To pretend otherwise is to just ignore the reality of this case."

Taubman, now the Times's Washington bureau chief, referred questions to a company official yesterday. David McCraw, assistant general counsel for the Times company, said Taubman was not Kristof's editor "for column content. Nick had sent draft columns to Phil and other colleagues seeking their opinion and advice on them." Kristof declined to comment.

U.S. District Judge Claude M. Hilton in Alexandria did not rule yesterday on the Times's request for a dismissal. Hatfill sued the Times company in 2004, contending that the paper defamed him in a series of Kristof columns that identified him as a "likely culprit." A trial is set for Jan. 29.

The legal maneuvering comes in advance of a trial that lawyers say is expected to shine new light on the government's investigation of Hatfill and possibly on the overall anthrax probe itself. No one has been charged in the investigation of anthrax-tainted letters mailed to media and government offices.

Hatfill, a former researcher at the Army's infectious disease research laboratory at Fort Detrick in Frederick, has been trying to clear his name ever since then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft publicly called him a "person of interest" in the investigation in 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0113724

In the 2002 columns, Kristof criticized the FBI, saying it had failed to aggressively pursue a scientist he first identified as "Mr. Z." He wrote that the biodefense community had called Mr. Z a "likely culprit," partly because the scientist was familiar with anthrax.

Kristof later acknowledged that Hatfill was Mr. Z. He also wrote that Hatfill deserved the "presumption of innocence."

Attorneys for the Times said yesterday that Kristof was only trying to focus attention on the failure to solve the case. "The larger issue in the columns was the nation's preparedness to handle biological attacks," Levine said.

Hatfill's attorneys contended that Kristof had deliberately fingered their client as the anthrax killer. "Dr. Hatfill was a purely private citizen, as innocent as anyone in this courtroom and as deserving of the protection of his reputation as anyone in this country," Grannis said.

Hatfill Lawyer: Times Editor Warned Columnist On Anthrax Piece (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 6, 2007

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- Lawyers for a former Army scientist suing The New York Times for libel said Friday that an editor at the paper warned columnist Nicholas Kristof to remove incriminating passages from a column that raised suspicions that Steven Hatfill was involved in the 2001 anthrax attacks.

Kristof left the passages in the May 2002 column despite the warning, said lawyers for Hatfill, who claims that a series of Kristof columns that year falsely implicated him as the culprit in the anthrax mailings that left five people dead. An elderly Connecticut woman was among the victims.

The editor's warning to Kristof was voiced in an e-mail uncovered during the extensive pretrial discovery process, said Mark Grannis, one of Hatfill's lawyers. Grannis did not give specifics on the passages at issue outside court; he said some details of the case have been sealed.

The accusation came as a federal judge again heard arguments on whether to dismiss the lawsuit. The newspaper's lawyers argued that under federal libel law, Hatfill should be considered a public figure. The law makes it more difficult for public figures to prevail in libel cases.

Hatfill's lawyers dispute that their client should be classified as a public figure. But even if he were, they said, they have uncovered flaws in Kristof's reporting that are so flagrant that Hatfill would still win his case.

Grannis said that in addition to the editor's warning, several of Kristof's sources testified in pretrial depositions that they did not provide the information Kristof has said they did.

"Mr. Kristof made things up," Grannis said. "What Mr. Kristof reported was not just false, it was embarrassingly false. It was outrageously false."

Five people were killed and 17 sickened by anthrax that had been mailed to lawmakers on Capitol Hill and members of the news media in New York and Florida just weeks after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The victims include Ottilie Lundgren, 94, of Oxford, Conn., who investigators say died after opening anthrax-contaminated mail that passed through a Connecticut mail distribution center.

The case remains unsolved.

Kristof's columns initially referred to Hatfill only as "Mr. Z"; Hatfill was identified by name only after he held a news conference in August 2002 to denounce rumors that had been swirling around him.

Kristof has said his purpose in writing the columns was to prod a dawdling FBI investigation and that he said in several columns that Mr. Z enjoys a legal presumption of innocence.

Hatfill claims that Kristof's columns revealed enough details for people to figure out who he was despite withholding his name.

Times lawyer Lee Levine said Hatfill is being hypocritical when he argues that he is not a public figure. On the one hand, Hatfill contends he was so well known that people could piece together his identity from the clues in Kristof's "Mr. Z" columns. On the other hand, they argue that he was essentially an unknown when it comes to his status as a public figure under libel law.

"You can't have it both ways," Levine said.

Levine said Hatfill qualifies as a public figure because he had injected himself into the national debate about bioterrorism years before the anthrax attacks. He had occasionally been quoted as an expert in the media, and even once donned a chemical suit for a magazine photo.

U.S. District Judge Claude Hilton said he will rule on the newspaper's motion soon. The trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 29.

Hilton previously ordered Kristof to disclose his confidential FBI sources so Hatfill could pursue his claim. Kristof refused, and in response Hilton barred Kristof from relying on any information provided by those sources in his defense.

DOJ_NMG_0113725

Hatfill's lawsuit was dismissed by Hilton in 2004 but reinstated by a federal appeals court. Hatfill is also suing former Attorney General John Ashcroft, the Justice Department and others in U.S. District Court in Washington claiming they violated Hatfill's civil rights.

Katrina Victims Find A Solution: Modular House (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

PASS CHRISTIAN, Miss. — Of the hundreds of houses swept away by Hurricane Katrina in this small Gulf Coast town, only a fraction have been replaced. The price of building materials has skyrocketed, and the services of even mediocre contractors can be hard to come by.

But on East North Street recently, a swarm of workmen put the final touches on Gwen and Rudy Cardreon's new home, a tan ranch house that sprang up, on 11-foot piling, in a matter of days. Constructed in three pieces in a factory hundreds of miles away, the house came equipped with carpets, curtains, even ceiling fans, but looks as if it were custom built in the Cardreons' yard.

"Isn't it gorgeous?" Mrs. Cardreon exclaimed, standing in her new kitchen as construction workers hammered on the wooden staircase outside.

Before the August 2005 hurricane, so-called modular houses like the Cardreons' were almost unknown in Mississippi, where houses tended to be the traditional "stick built" on site or mobile homes. Modulars have been popular until now mainly in Northern states with short building seasons and high labor costs.

But since the storm, modular houses, which range from simple shotgun-style cottages to fancy minimansions, are starting to appear across the Gulf Coast, as public officials and private citizens search for ways to speed the slow pace of recovery and begin experimenting with new forms of shelter.

Modular houses have a number of advantages over conventionally built houses, their advocates said. For example, once they are delivered, modular homes can sometimes be completed in days, rather than months. They are relatively easy to perch up on stilts to comply with flood zone rules. They require less local labor in a region where there is more than enough construction work to go around. Some are less expensive than conventional houses — they range from $50,000 to $500,000 — and manufacturers say some can withstand 160-mile-an-hour winds.

The number of modular houses on the Gulf Coast is still small; perhaps 400 have been installed in Mississippi in the last year, said Fred C. Hallahan, a consultant in Baltimore who tracks the modular business.

But Mr. Hallahan and other experts expect the trickle of modular housing to grow rapidly this year, and perhaps lead to even bigger changes.

"Really, if we look back 20 years from now, we could see a dramatic shift in the way houses get built," said David W. Hinson, a professor of architecture at Auburn University in Alabama.

In Mississippi, Hurricane Katrina destroyed 70,000 houses and apartments, according to state estimates; more than 30,000 families in the state still live in the small trailers supplied by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Though Mississippi is widely considered to be far ahead of Louisiana in terms of recovery, only 2,480 building permits had been issued by the end of November for new home construction in the hardest-hit counties along the coast, according to the governor's office.

Officials cite many reasons for the slow going, including insurance issues, wetlands regulations, permit backlogs and infrastructure problems. And, of course, money: many people are still fighting with their insurance companies, and over the summer, Mississippi's grant program to help homeowners rebuild ran into some of the same bottlenecks that still plague Louisiana's Road Home program.

But after several adjustments, the Mississippi program has distributed more than $500 million to more than 8,000 homeowners, said Donna Sanford, who supervises the program for the Mississippi Development Authority. Last month, the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development approved a second phase of the program, to help low-income applicants and those who lived in the flood zones.

With the prospect of money finally starting to flow to housing, experiments are going on across the Gulf Coast as people look for ways to build more quickly, more cheaply and with more resistance to hurricanes.

Builders are exploring houses made of steel or concrete, and are considering putting housing above stores, as they do in concentrated urban areas like New York City. Volunteer groups have been ordering house-in-a-box kits from New Hope Construction, a nonprofit supplier in Tennessee that often works closely with churches.

DOJ_NMG_0113726

Lowe's, the big building supply chain, says it will be selling everything necessary to build a Katrina Cottage, designed as a low-cost, high-quality alternative to trailers.

[Directed by Congress, even FEMA has gotten into the act, awarding about $400 million on Dec. 22 to various state-sponsored pilot programs to replace its travel trailers with roomier and sturdier housing.]

But the big push seems to be modular housing, which is being used not just by private developers, but also by Habitat for Humanity and Catholic Charities in New Orleans.

"It's the only answer, it is simply the only answer in Mississippi," said Fred Carl Jr., the founder of the Viking Range Corporation, who served as the Hurricane Katrina housing coordinator for Gov. Haley Barbour.

Mr. Carl said he was trying to lure a major modular manufacturer to the state. "We need nine or ten thousand houses a year," he said.

There is already one home-grown modular builder in Mississippi, Safeway Homes, which Buddy Jenkins and his brother started in 2005. "We're really a stick-built house moved in component parts," Mr. Jenkins said of his tidy houses, which are rated to withstand high winds.

At the company's spotless plant in Lexington, a small town north of the state capital, Jackson, Joel E. Smith walks a visitor through the 16 stations where the houses are framed and insulated by about 100 workers. The ducts and plumbing are installed, fixtures added, doors and windows placed, and each half of a house is tightly screwed and glued.

Once they are delivered, a crane will lower the halves onto a foundation, where they will be joined, and a roof, also built at the plant, will be attached. The basic house costs about $58,000, company officials said, but the final cost will depend on the land, the foundation, the developer and whether the owner has chosen any extras like arched windows.

Safeway Homes has built about 250 houses, Mr. Smith said, and could make as many as three a day. But there are hurdles. Some are regulatory; building inspectors are often unfamiliar with modular housing, and customers must buy through a developer rather than from manufacturers. And some consumers still equate modular houses with mobile homes, in part because they are sold by many of the same manufacturers. That image problem is being tackled by Victor Planetta, a developer based in Louisiana who, with his son, Victor Jr., has started putting modular houses in their Mississippi developments.

Their showplace, on the main highway into Bay St. Louis, near Pass Christian, is a bright yellow, two-story house on pillars with a fountain burbling out front and a big motorboat named Beyond Belief out back in the canal.

The house, which was trucked in several pieces from a Genesis Homes plant in Lake City, Fla., and assembled on the site, has crown moldings, granite, silk flowers and tassels; there is even an elevator. More than 1,000 people have visited the house, which will sell for about $425,000, the Planettas said.

Here in the Pass, as the devastated town is known, about three dozen simple modular houses, including Gwen and Rudy Cardreon's, have been installed though a program called Home Again. Phil Eide, who runs the program for ECD/Hope, a community development organization, said that modular housing had been harder to deal with than he had first hoped. For example, it takes 41 steps to get a permit, he said, and some suppliers make promises they do not keep.

But the program has attracted backing from James L. Barksdale, the former Internet executive and investor who served as chairman of Mississippi's Commission on Recovery, Rebuilding and Renewal, who just bought about 35 modular houses that Home Again will place in communities.

Mr. Barksdale said he had become frustrated with the lack of progress in returning affordable housing to the Gulf Coast.

"My goal," he said, "is to prove to people that we can do this, and then let it become a lot bigger program."

WAR NEWS:

Pelosi, Reid Urge Bush To Begin Iraq Pullout (WP)

By Peter Baker, Robin Wright, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

President Considering Three "Surge" Options

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid declared yesterday that "it is time to bring the war to a close" and warned President Bush that sending more U.S. troops to Iraq would be unacceptable to the Democratic majorities that have just taken over Congress.

Directly challenging Bush's wartime leadership on their second day in charge on Capitol Hill, Democrats Pelosi (Calif.) and Reid (Nev.) sent Bush a letter suggesting that, instead of starting a short-term escalation, he begin a phased withdrawal of U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0113727

forces in the next four to six months. The mission of remaining troops, they said, should be shifted away from combat toward more training, logistics and counterterrorism.

The newly ascendant Democrats are trying to preempt the president before he announces his new strategy. As he prepares for a nationally televised address next week, officials said, Bush is considering three main options to bolster U.S. forces in Iraq: a relatively modest deployment of fewer than 4,000 additional troops, a middle-ground alternative involving about 9,000 and, the most aggressive idea, flowing 20,000 more troops into the country.

In a speech today unveiling his own revised security plan, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is expected to publicly welcome additional U.S. troops, a condition requested by the Bush administration. Maliki's cooperation is pivotal to Bush's own efforts. Bush told Maliki in a videoconference Thursday that the United States is willing to help but that Maliki has to deliver along the way, U.S. officials said.

In preparation for the shift in strategy, Bush reshuffled his national security leadership team yesterday. He replaced the top two generals running the Iraq war, named a new Army chief of staff, moved his intelligence director over to the State Department and put a veteran officer in charge of intelligence. Officials have said he also plans to move his ambassador in Baghdad to the United Nations and replace him with a veteran diplomat.

Over the next few days before his speech, Bush is conducting intensive consultations with lawmakers, foreign allies and advisers. He met with lawmakers from both parties yesterday and plans to talk with leaders of Britain, Australia and possibly Denmark, countries that still have major military contingents in Iraq, according to U.S. officials and diplomats. The White House said he will talk with both Pelosi and Reid before announcing his new strategy.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said the sessions with lawmakers have featured "some vigorous exchanges" and have been useful. "The fact is that these meetings may not be happy-face 'Kumbaya,' but they have been very constructive in the sense that people are talking respectfully about important issues and expressing their ideas," he said. "And some of them are quite interesting. And we're taking them into account."

But some lawmakers have left the meetings unsatisfied. Sen. Ben Nelson (Neb.), a conservative Democrat needed by Bush if he hopes to have any support across the aisle, said he pressed the president yesterday to provide a clear and specific mission before ordering additional forces to Iraq. "The White House has to make the case for sending in more troops before they send the troops," he said. "We need a new direction, not just a new slogan."

Even many Republicans appear unenthusiastic about troop increases. Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said Thursday night on MSNBC's "Hardball" that he might say no to the surge. "I want to know what it all is," Lott said of Bush's overall plan. "But here's my main point: We've got to change the status quo. At some point we've got to say to the Iraqis, 'Congratulations. Saddam is dead. We've given you an opportunity for peace and freedom. It's yours.' "

The letter by Pelosi and Reid sent a signal that the new congressional leadership intends to be aggressive in voicing opposition to Bush's handling of the war. With their new majorities, they have a bigger political megaphone and more ability to bring pressure to bear. At the same time, Pelosi and Reid have eschewed using the main legislative mechanism to change policy, namely cutting off funding for the war.

"Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed," Pelosi and Reid wrote. "Like many current and former military leaders, we believe that trying again would be a serious mistake. . . . Adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point for no strategic gain."

By releasing the sternly worded letter, Democratic leaders hoped to jump ahead of Bush and set the agenda for the weekend talk shows. Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, said the party wants to address even the terminology of the White House plan, defining it not as a "surge" but as an "escalation." "People are going to know [the president] has a very critical audience in the Democratic Congress on this proposal," he said.

The prospect of increasing troop levels has been greeted with so much hostility that some lawmakers are questioning whether Bush is serious. "A surge is not a new strategy. A surge is a new tactic that does nothing to change the underlying strategy that has so clearly failed," said Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), a member of the House Armed Services Committee.

"I don't know if Mr. Bush even believes in this so-called surge," scoffed Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii), another member of the committee. "The neocons are trying to test the new Congress to see how we respond."

While the din of opposition has risen, the administration has not made a public case for why more troops would be the answer. Even senior military officers have expressed deep skepticism in public and outright opposition in private. Aside from some neoconservative scholars, virtually the only prominent voices advocating the troop increase are Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.), an independent who caucuses with the Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0113728

Bush is looking at three broad options involving one to five additional brigades, according to U.S. officials. The smallest increase would basically be limited to the brigade from the Army's 82nd Airborne Division, comprising fewer than 4,000 troops, which has already departed for Kuwait. It would eventually be deployed in Baghdad.

The second option would involve deploying another Army brigade to Baghdad and two battalions of Marines to Anbar, the volatile province that has been a battlefield for the Sunni insurgency and foreign fighters associated with al-Qaeda. The Marines could not be deployed until February, U.S. officials said. The joint Army and Marine deployment would bring the increase to between 9,000 and 10,000 troops.

The third option would supplement the first and second with additional Army brigades, bringing the total to about 20,000, largely deployed in the Iraqi capital. But U.S. officials said this would take considerable time -- possibly three or four months, with a complete deployment as late as May -- because of the difficulty of assembling additional troops through accelerating planned deployments and remobilizing reserves, U.S. officials said.

The Bush administration is also considering a troop increase that would play out in phases and in response to the performance of the Iraqi government in following through on its promises to go after illegal militias and crack down on sectarian violence. Maliki has in turn requested more operational control over Iraqi troops, which Washington is tentatively prepared to give him, U.S. officials said.

Bush installed new U.S. figures yesterday to manage efforts in Iraq. As expected, he replaced Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of U.S. Central Command overseeing Middle East operations, with Navy Adm. William J. Fallon, and replaced Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the Iraq commander, with Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who would be given a fourth star. Bush also confirmed that John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, will become deputy secretary of state and be replaced by Navy Adm. John M. McConnell.

Snow said the generals are not being replaced because of their resistance to increasing troop levels, calling Casey "magnificent" and Abizaid "an extraordinary officer." Casey will become Army chief of staff, and Abizaid is retiring.

Democrats signaled that they will start closely examining administration decisions on Iraq next week. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee announced a schedule for four weeks of hearings on Iraq featuring witnesses such as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; members of the Iraq Study Group, which recommended a new course in Iraq; a slew of former secretaries of state and defense; current and retired generals; and Middle East scholars.

"Our purpose is not to revisit the past," said Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), "but to help build a consensus behind a new course for America in Iraq."

Bush Facing A Deep Divide With Democrats Over Talk Of Increasing Troops In Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — The new Democratic leaders of the Senate and the House warned President Bush on Friday against sending additional troops to Iraq, setting the stage for what could become a major confrontation over a new war strategy.

Mr. Bush is expected to call for more troops in a speech as soon as Wednesday, as part of a renewed effort to secure Baghdad. But Nancy Pelosi, the new speaker of the House, and Harry Reid, the new Senate majority leader, dismissed that approach as a strategy “that has already failed.”

“Adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point for no strategic gain,” Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Reid wrote in a letter to Mr. Bush. “We are well past the point of more troops for Iraq,” they added, urging Mr. Bush to begin a “phased redeployment,” or gradual withdrawal.

Not all Democrats agree with the position their leaders staked out in the letter on Friday, just days before Mr. Bush is expected to announce a broad strategy involving more troops, accelerated training of Iraqi forces and a large increase in economic and reconstruction aid to Iraq. But the release of the letter suggests that a major political battle may be brewing.

Mr. Bush appeared to be trying to head off any confrontation when he invited 13 Democratic and Republican senators to the White House Friday for what administration officials called a “consultation” on Iraq.

At a later meeting, Mr. Bush met with the former chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, who cautioned that Congress would want to take time to consider the strategy before Mr. Bush began implementing it.

“The president has had this opportunity now for some weeks, and I think Congress is entitled to an opportunity to independently look at the situation,” Mr. Warner said.

Mr. Bush has begun to put parts of his plan in place, making official on Friday some changes that will insure new faces are associated with a new approach.

DOJ_NMG_0113729

He announced the nomination of Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus as the new commander in Iraq, to succeed Gen. George W. Casey Jr., whom Mr. Bush said he intended to elevate to Army chief of staff.

Mr. Bush praised General Casey, who spent much of 2006 pressing for a gradual withdrawal of troops, as "strong and effective"; he hailed General Petraeus, who has reportedly backed an increase, as "a soldier of vision and determination."

Mr. Bush is also remaking his diplomatic team, nominating John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, to be deputy secretary of state.

Ryan C. Crocker is expected to be nominated ambassador to Iraq. His nomination would for the first time place an Arabist with experience in sectarian conflicts, mostly in Lebanon, at the head of the embassy in Baghdad.

Administration and Congressional officials said they expected the military and diplomatic nominations to receive Senate approval, though senators might use the hearings to air dissent about any troop increase and draw attention to the perceived failings of Iraq strategy.

The bigger question is whether Congress will seek to stop the troop increase. In theory, it could cut off financing, the only way it could actually interfere with the commander in chief's plans. But Democrats have said they would not take such a step, largely out of fear of being accused of undercutting the troops.

That leaves them with only one option: holding a series of hearings, which start next week, immediately after the president's speech, that are intended to expose the divisions within the military over the wisdom of increasing troops. Many senior officers, including General Casey, have argued that adding American troops will undercut the effort to get the Iraqi government to defend itself.

Some Republican leaders insisted that Congress should not go down that path. "I don't think that we should be dictating military strategy in Iraq from Capitol Hill," said Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican minority leader in the House.

In addition to the 13 senators, Democrats and Republicans, invited to the White House on Friday afternoon, those attending the meeting included Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the Joint Chiefs chairman, Gen. Peter Pace, and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser.

Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, who both are considering a presidential candidacy, arrived at the White House at nearly the same time. After the meeting, Mrs. Clinton did not issue a statement, while Mr. Obama spoke to reporters about his conversation with Mr. Bush.

"I personally indicated that an escalation of troop levels in Iraq was a mistake and that we need a political accommodation, rather than a military approach to the sectarian violence there," he said. "I think he recognizes that the status quo is unacceptable and has to change."

Senator Mary L. Landrieu, a Louisiana Democrat, said she would consider supporting an increase in troops for a short time if the president could articulate "specific opportunities for success," particularly cities that troops would be dispatched to and how long they would stay. Ms. Landrieu also said she would need to be convinced that there was a broader solution to limit American involvement in Iraq.

"The American people's patience is wearing thin with the vagueness," she said, speaking to reporters as she left the White House.

In interviews after the meeting, several senators said they could not tell whether Mr. Bush had made a decision whether to call for a troop increase. The senators described the meeting as frank but not confrontational. But even those who have supported the administration's Iraq policy said it was time for a change of course.

"I don't know that the American people will see the surge as a new direction," said Senator Ben Nelson, a Democrat from Nebraska. "The American people want to see a change in direction, not just a change in slogans."

Senator Blanche Lincoln, an Arkansas Democrat at the meeting, said an increase in troops would face considerable scrutiny in Congress from Democrats and Republicans.

"I asked the president, 'Where would that surge come from?' " Ms. Lincoln said. "He said that was a very good question."

Critics Slam Possible Iraq Troop Boost (AP)

By Jennifer Loven,

AP, January 6, 2007

Days from announcing an overhaul of Iraq strategy, President Bush on Friday encountered a wall of criticism of the U.S. troop escalation that is expected to be the centerpiece of his new war plan.

Bush also reshuffled his war commanders, installing a new team to support the policies he will announce next week. Democrats and Republicans alike took aim at the expected increase in U.S. forces.

DOJ_NMG_0113730

"It has to be significant and sustained. Otherwise do not do it," said Sen. John McCain, a Republican presidential hopeful and Vietnam veteran who has been advocating a troop increase.

Those for going in the opposite direction spoke out, too.

"We are well past the point of more troops for Iraq," new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., wrote in a letter to Bush a day after their party took the reins on Capitol Hill. Instead, Pelosi and Reid urged Bush to begin pulling troops out in four to six months.

The criticism underscored that Bush, preparing his new policy for an increasingly unpopular and costly war, will face a Congress that is not only controlled by Democrats who could challenge him at any turn but also populated with Republicans looking toward the congressional and presidential elections of 2008.

The president spent much of the day in last-minute consultations with members of Congress from both parties, by all accounts soliciting their input while giving few hints of his own plans. But doubts about dispatching more soldiers to Iraq — which Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson called "the elephant in the room" at the White House — were expressed to the president's face and before various audiences around Washington.

Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., an Air Force veteran and member of the House Intelligence Committee who had just returned from Iraq, lambasted Bush's war leadership as lacking "a clarity of mission."

She spoke at a news conference against sending more Americans, saying the U.S. should be focused only on hunting for al-Qaida terrorists and ensuring Iraq does not become a source of regional instability.

"We're talking about goals in lofty terms that are not vital American national interests," she said.

CBS News reported that Defense Secretary Robert Gates has recommended that the president order an immediate 10,000 additional troops to Iraq with an option to double that number by spring under a plan in which five additional brigades of troops could eventually help in Baghdad and two battalions in troubled Anbar Province. Asked for comment, a senior defense official told The Associated Press that parts of the CBS report were incorrect but declined to say which parts or to comment on any recommendations Gates might have made to Bush.

Bush, meanwhile, announced more changes in his team of military and diplomatic advisers.

He said Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander overseeing the theater that includes Iraq, will be succeeded by Adm. William Fallon, now Abizaid's counterpart in the Pacific. Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus is the president's choice to be the new chief commander in Iraq, replacing Gen. George Casey. The nominations must be approved by the Senate.

Petraeus led the 101st Airborne Division during the 2003 Iraq invasion and later headed the effort to train Iraqi security forces.

Both Abizaid and Casey already had been expected to rotate out of their jobs. Both also had publicly expressed skepticism about a troop increase, and when Bush began devising a new Iraq plan their timetable appeared to move up.

Also, Ryan Crocker, a veteran American diplomat who is now U.S. envoy to Pakistan, was expected to replace Zalmay Khalilzad as U.S. ambassador to Iraq. Bush nominated Khalilzad, a subject of criticism in Iraq as favoring his fellow Sunni Muslims, to become the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

In a White House that prides itself on discipline, there was much confusion about the personnel changes. There was a torrent of news leaks, unsuccessful efforts by the White House to control the flow of information and messy shifts in how the announcements would be made.

The president's talks Friday with several groups of lawmakers included moderate Democrats and loyalist Republicans but also some of the president's biggest critics, such as Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama.

"He did say he has not made up his mind yet," said Rep. Chris Carney, a freshman Democrat from Pennsylvania who is in the Navy Reserve and served as a Pentagon intelligence analyst.

Republican Sen. Norm Coleman, part of a later meeting with over a dozen senators of both parties, said the skepticism about whether a burst of troops could achieve anything was nearly universal.

"I don't think there was a sense that case had been made," said Coleman, from Minnesota.

Several senators said Bush promised an increase would be done only in concert with greater efforts by the Iraqi government, which has failed to rein in the Shiite militias and to supply the promised amount of Iraqi forces to work alongside Americans.

Nelson, who said he walked away with no doubt Bush is planning to boost troops, said the president suggested there would be "the expectation of the Iraqis carrying out their part of the deal or else." But, said the Nebraska Democrat, the president did not define the consequences.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, set to unveil his own revamped strategy within days, is himself uneasy about more American troops, preferring that the U.S. presence be pulled back to Baghdad's outskirts.

DOJ_NMG_0113731

During a nearly two-hour discussion Thursday, Bush told al-Maliki he was ready to send additional U.S. forces. But the Iraqi leader replied "he would have to talk that over with his senior military officers to see if they were needed," Sami al-Askari, an al-Maliki political adviser, told The Associated Press.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, meanwhile, agreed with McCain that a small, temporary force boost would not be enough. Neither of the senators, appearing together at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, would put a precise number on how many more troops might be necessary.

However, they said that — at minimum — it should be another three to five brigades for Baghdad, where Shiite militias are terrorizing the minority Sunni population, and one brigade for western Anbar Province, the center of the mostly Sunni anti-American insurgency. With about 3,500 troops in each brigade, that would total 14,000 to 21,000 additional troops.

A letter from 28 House Republicans urged Bush to divert some of the 21 Iraqi battalions operating in peaceful provinces to Baghdad and other dangerous areas, to spare U.S. troops.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush's meetings with lawmakers were more than just window dressing.

He said, "The fact is, these meetings may not be happy-face, kumbaya, but they have been very constructive."

___

Associated Press writers Deb Riechmann, Anne Flaherty, Liz Sidoti, Kimberly Hefling, Jennifer Talhelm and Frederic J. Frommer and Pauline Jelinek contributed to this report.

Reid, Pelosi Rip Iraq Buildup (WT)

By Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

Top House and Senate Democrats yesterday said they oppose boosting the number of troops in Iraq, giving them a jump on President Bush's speech next week detailing a new war strategy and setting a roadblock in front of one of the major options he is considering.

"Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed. Like many current and former military leaders, we believe that trying again would be a serious mistake," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid wrote in a letter designed to frame the debate as Mr. Bush tries to devise what the White House calls a new way forward in Iraq.

Meanwhile, in a shake-up in advance of the speech, Mr. Bush nominated a new deputy secretary of state, director of national intelligence, commander of U.S. forces in Iraq and head of Central Command, the post that oversees the broader war on terrorism in the Middle East.

"It makes sense to go ahead and make sure that you're going to have your command team that is going to be in place as you're working on this new way forward and enacting it," White House press secretary Tony Snow said, adding that some of the outgoing military commanders' jobs would have expired in the middle of implementing the new strategy.

Mr. Snow said the president is "moving in a direction" toward a revamped strategy, but is still listening for ideas.

Now, though, he is facing a challenge from Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, and Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat, at the beginning of the new Congress.

Their letter puts them out in front of Mr. Bush's speech next week, filling the vacuum created as the president works out his new strategy and earning them part of the discussion on the Sunday political talk shows.

But it also comes on the heels of criticism that Democrats are ignoring the concerns of the anti-war faction of their party, and just days after an anti-war demonstration led by activist Cindy Sheehan drowned out a Democratic press conference on Capitol Hill.

Asked about the leaders' letter, Mr. Snow said the administration shares some of the Democrats' goals, such as renewed diplomatic efforts, and chose to focus on the section where the leaders said they "want to do everything we can to help Iraq succeed in the future."

"The ultimate objective here is not to engage in sparring, but to engage in an open dialogue with people on both sides of the aisle," Mr. Snow said.

In their letter, the two leaders pointed to Gen. John Abizaid, the head of Central Command, who said in congressional testimony that bringing in more troops would run counter to trying to get the Iraqis to do more.

Gen. Abizaid lost his job in yesterday's shake-up -- his retirement was announced by the Pentagon -- though Mr. Snow said the administration still values his counsel. Adm. William J. Fallon will replace him at Central Command.

Meanwhile, Gen. George Casey will be moved from commander of U.S forces in Iraq to become Army chief of staff. He will be replaced in Iraq by Lt. Gen. David Petraeus.

DOJ_NMG_0113732

The letter is just one part of the Democrats flexing their newfound muscle on foreign policy and the strategy in Iraq.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, announced a schedule of four weeks of hearings to look at U.S. strategy in Iraq, while Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and chairman of the Judiciary Committee's immigration and refugees subcommittee, will hold a hearing on Iraqi refugees.

If Mr. Bush does choose to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq -- something Mr. Snow said had not been decided yet -- he will have the backing of two prominent senators: Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent.

Speaking together at the American Enterprise Institute, the two lawmakers endorsed a strategy of increasing troops and shifting from training Iraqi security forces to protecting the Iraqi people. Mr. McCain said that the increase must be significant and sustained, and that Americans must be prepared for more casualties, but that the fight is necessary.

"There is somehow the belief, that I don't quite comprehend, that we just come home and then it's over," Mr. McCain said.

Mr. Lieberman warned that leaving Iraq at this juncture would lead to a complete collapse of the country, chaos that would spread across the region and inflame greater Islamic extremism.

Both men also endorsed the change in military leadership.

The military shake-up was coupled yesterday with Mr. Bush nominating John D. Negroponte to become the deputy secretary of state, and nominating retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell to fill Mr. Negroponte's current slot as director of national intelligence.

Reid And Pelosi Warn Bush Against "Surge" (RC)

By John Stanton

RollCall.com, January 5, 2007

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) today rejected an expected Bush administration proposal to sharply increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq and called on the administration to drop the “surge proposal.”

In a letter to President Bush, Pelosi and Reid called the plan little more than a retread of the administration’s previous failed attempts to quell the violence in Iraq. “Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed,” Pelosi and Reid wrote in the letter, adding that, “like many current and former military leaders, we believe that trying again would be a serious mistake. They, like us, believe there is no purely military solution in Iraq. There is only a political solution. Adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point for no strategic gain. And it would undermine our efforts to get the Iraqis to take responsibility for their own future. We are well past the point of more troops for Iraq.”

The sharply worded letter — the first formal communication between the two new leaders of Congress and Bush — comes as the president is preparing for a major address to the nation on the Iraq War and his plans for overhauling his administration’s approach to prosecuting the conflict.

Democrats Blast Bush's Iraq "Surge" Policy (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 5, 2007

Democratic congressional leaders Friday issued a warning to President Bush on his publicly signaled plans to escalate the U.S. troop presence in Iraq, presaging four weeks of Senate hearings that promise to bring sharp scrutiny and criticism for the White House’s war policy.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) sent a letter to Bush requesting he abandon plans for a troop “surge” in an all-out bid to stabilize Iraq, calling the strategy one “you have already tried and that has already failed.” Reid and other Senate Democratic leaders reiterated their strong disapproval of the Bush gambit during an all-day retreat at the Library of Congress.

“The people of this country no longer support the war in Iraq,” Reid told reporters, adding that Democrats are willing to work with the president but “we believe the tactic would be a serious mistake.”

Reid had previously voiced tentative openness to the surge proposal, telling ABC News’ “This Week” on Dec. 17 that he could back temporary military escalation if it were part of a strategy to withdraw from Iraq by next year. The majority leader, who supported last year’s Democratic call for an immediate start to withdrawal, said he heeded the words from U.S. commanders in Iraq who also rejected the surge.

DOJ_NMG_0113733

"The president said he was going to listen to his commanders," Reid said. Referring to the pending arrivals of a new chief of U.S. Central Command and a new senior commander in Iraq, Reid added: "I know he's going to shuffle some of them out, obviously because they're not telling him what he wants to hear."

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee Tuesday will begin four weeks of in-depth hearings on the war, starting with a closed briefing from intelligence officials and featuring testimony from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.). Sen. Richard Lugar (Ind.), the panel's ranking Republican, fully endorsed the ambitious schedule, but Reid and Pelosi's letter earned criticism from one Senate GOP leader.

"In less than 24 hours after opening the new Congress, with calls of working together in the sprit of bipartisanship and putting aside divisive rhetoric, it is disappointing, and more than a touch ironic, that the Democratic leadership has decided to start criticizing this new approach even before it is announced," Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), Republican conference chairman, said in a statement.

Kyl harkened back to Thursday's bipartisan Senate caucus, which emphasized bipartisanship and comity: "In the spirit of national unity, we should at least hear what the president proposes before we criticize it; and once we hear him out, work together in giving his proposals an opportunity to work."

Democrats Step Up Iraq Pressure (BBC)

BBC.com, January 5, 2007

US Democrat leaders have urged President George W Bush not to increase troop levels in Iraq, days before he is expected to announce such a move.

The Democrats, in control of Congress for the first time in 12 years, stepped up pressure ahead of Mr Bush's new policy initiative on Iraq.

The administration has confirmed it is replacing two top US military leaders in Iraq as part of the new strategy.

Mr Bush also announced a new national intelligence director.

'Political battle'

On the first full day of Democratic control of Congress, the new leaders of both Houses called on Mr Bush not to raise troop levels in Iraq.

Correspondents say the president's policy initiative could include a deployment of 10,000 to 20,000 fresh troops in and around Baghdad to disarm militia groups there.

Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid called for a phased withdrawal of forces

But in a letter to the president, Senate Democratic Leader, Harry Reid, and House of Representatives Speaker, Nancy Pelosi, said adding more combat troops would stretch the US military to breaking point with no strategic gain.

They instead urged a phased redeployment of US forces, starting in four to six months, with a re-emphasis on training, logistics and counter-terrorism operations in Iraq.

The BBC's Justin Webb in Washington says this is an aggressive move from the Democrats, setting the stage for a huge political battle.

Mr Bush cannot be prevented from sending more troops, our correspondent says, but he may pay a big political cost if the deployment is carried out amid fierce congressional opposition.

Top Democrats Balk At Troop Surge (BOS)

By Bryan Bender, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 6, 2007

Pelosi, Reid send warning to Bush

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's anticipated decision to increase troop levels in Iraq set off a pitched battle yesterday as newly empowered Democrats warned the White House against an escalation of an unpopular war while two influential senators who want to send more forces drew hundreds of anti war protesters when they appeared at a conservative Washington think tank.

To preempt Bush's scheduled announcement of a new Iraq strategy on Wednesday, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate majority leader Harry Reid told the president that sending thousands more troops into combat is a bad idea, declaring that "no issue is more important than finding an end to the war in Iraq."

The increase, described as a "surge" of forces, "is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed," the Democratic leaders wrote in a letter delivered to the White House yesterday. "Like many current and former military leaders, we believe that trying again would be a serious mistake."

DOJ_NMG_0113734

Several House committee chairmen agreed with the letter and vowed to fight such a decision.

Meanwhile, anti war demonstrators -- chanting and carrying "No Escalation in Iraq" placards -- stood in the rain outside the American Enterprise Institute in downtown Washington, where proponents of the surge plan convened at a forum featuring Senators John McCain of Arizona and Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut. McCain, a Republican, and Lieberman, an independent, agree with the idea of sending more troops to Iraq.

"Escalating the number of troops is only going to escalate the violence," said protester Tim Goodrich , co founder of Iraq Veterans Against the War, standing near the American Enterprise Institute yesterday. The liberal grass-roots organization MoveOn.org had enlisted Goodrich and others to demonstrate.

Democrats believe Bush is about to dispatch up to 40,000 more troops to the war, an attempt to stem the rising violence in Baghdad. Despite taking both houses of Congress on an antiwar platform, party leaders worry they can't do much to stop the president -- short of the politically unpalatable move of ending funding for the war.

"We don't have many options," said Representative Solomon Ortiz , a Texas Democrat set to oversee military readiness issues. "If the president decides he is not going to wait for us to have hearings and the troops are going there, we are going to be criticized by the American public if we don't support them."

"He is going to send them," Ortiz added, "and we're going to have to pay for it."

Some congressional aides raised the prospect that lawmakers could place conditions on war funding, such as refusing to pay for additional military brigades. But they doubted such measures would have any effect: As a wartime commander in chief, Bush can simply ignore them.

Skepticism of the surge plan has come from a variety of quarters, including the top military brass.

General John Abizaid , commander of US forces in the Middle East, has testified in the Senate against more troops. The senior commander in Iraq, General George Casey, has warned that additional troops could further inflame the situation.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have reportedly expressed reservations about the surge plan in recent meetings with the president and his national security team. Senator Richard Lugar, a Republican of Indiana and former chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has also questioned the logic of sending more troops.

"This is a political decision, not military strategy," said Representative Neil Abercrombie , a Democrat of Hawaii who is set to chair a key House subcommittee on the military. "There is simply no reasonable expectation that an additional 15,000 to 20,000 US troops in Baghdad is going to suddenly and miraculously stop Iraqis from killing Iraqis. In fact, there is a great deal of evidence and judgment to the contrary."

Still, there is growing support for one last show of military force to clamp down on the violence in Baghdad. And McCain and Lieberman, the primary supporters of that strategy, were the key participants at the AEI forum yesterday.

The institute has released an updated blueprint for salvaging the Iraq mission, chiefly through a larger US military commitment. The escalation plan is the brainchild of American Enterprise Institute scholar Frederick W. Kagan , and retired Army General Jack Keane , a member of the Pentagon's Defense Policy Board who has recently briefed Bush on the need for additional troops.

Because AEI was the intellectual breeding ground for many of the Bush administration neoconservatives who originally championed the war, some were puzzled by AEI's continued influence on White House policy. Bush "appears to be taking advice from the very same people who advised him in 2002 and 2003," said Chris Preble , director of foreign policy studies at the libertarian Cato Institute.

Yet the AEI plan appears to be at the forefront of administration deliberations.

"Victory is still an option in Iraq," the AEI report declares. "The strategy of relying on a political process to eliminate the insurgency has failed. Rising sectarian violence threatens to break America's will to fight. This violence will destroy the Iraqi government, armed forces, and people if it is not rapidly controlled."

The report called for adding a total of seven Army brigades and Marine regiments as partners with Iraqi forces in Baghdad and "clear high-violence Sunni and mixed Sunni-Shia neighborhoods" of the city. The authors acknowledged the strategy will take "a national commitment to victory in Iraq," including longer tours for ground troops for the foreseeable future.

Achieving such a commitment, however, seemed a longshot.

"It is a profoundly bad idea on so many levels," said Ortiz. "More troops mean more targets for all sides in this expanding civil war."

Representative Marty Meehan , a Lowell Democrat and senior member of the House Armed Services, said yesterday he is drafting a resolution to express congressional disapproval of any major increase in US force levels. "The time for a surge in troops was three and a half years ago," he said. "It's too late."

DOJ_NMG_0113735

In sizing up the surge debate, several observers used the Vietnam War as an analogy, noting that even though support for that war plunged after the Tet Offensive in January 1968, President Lyndon Johnson continued to send troops. They remained in Vietnam for seven more years.

"I don't know what they can do," one congressional aide said of the Democrats' prospects to influence the president's decision, noting that Johnson was known as a stubborn president. Bush "is at least as headstrong as LBJ."

Senators Back Call For More Troops In Iraq (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

John McCain, the leading Republican presidential hopeful, on Friday strongly endorsed a neo-conservative think-tank report that many see as the basis for the "new way forward in Iraq" strategy that George W. Bush will unveil next week.

Mr McCain, who shared a platform with Joe Lieberman, the independent Democratic senator and former vice-presidential candidate, said Mr Bush's expected "surge" of US forces to Iraq should persist until the job of stabilising the security situation has been achieved.

The report, "Choosing Victory: A Plan for Success in Iraq", was sponsored by the American Enterprise Institute and authored by Frederick Kagan. The senators on Friday strongly rejected last month's findings of the Iraq Study Group, which eschewed the word "victory" in its report.

"The troop surge must be substantial and it must be sustained," Mr McCain told an audience at the AEI. "It will mean extra hardships for our men and women in uniform and the violence will get worse before it gets better."

The two senators strongly rejected the Democratic leadership's call for a timeline for the phased withdrawal of US troops from Iraq, which they said would play into the hands of the insurgent groups and militias which would simply await the expiry of the deadline.

Nancy Pelosi, the new Democratic speaker of the House of Representatives, and Harry Reid, the Democratic Senate majority leader, on Friday issued a statement urging Mr Bush to pull back from announcing the expected "surge".

They said it would cut against the verdict of the US electorate in last November's midterm elections.

"Rather than deploy additional forces to Iraq, we believe the way forward is to begin the phased redeployment of our forces in the next four to six months," they said.

However, officials say Mr Bush will base his strategy on conviction rather than opinion polls or the views of the Democratic party.

On Friday Mr Bush appointed David Petraeus, a widely respected general, to replace George Casey in charge of US forces in Iraq.

Gen Petraeus has twice served in Iraq as head of the 101st Airborne division and is considered the person best suited to head a strategy that would focus US forces primarily on "clear, hold and build" operations aimed at winning the confidence of the Iraqi population.

The main target areas would be Baghdad, the capital, and the primarily Sunni al-Anbar province.

Troop Surge Can't Be Brief, Backers Insist (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel, Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

Some GOP senators facing reelection want conditions on Iraq.

The leading advocates of an increase in U.S. forces in Iraq warned President Bush on Friday that any buildup lasting less than 18 months was doomed to fail, and urged the White House to avoid compromises that would scale back the plan.

The hard line taken by such backers as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz) and retired Army Gen. Jack Keane comes as the Bush administration continues to debate the size and the scope of an expected troop increase. White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush has "not entirely" made up his mind, even as he reorganized his top war advisors and began meeting with key members of Congress in advance of a major address next week.

Bush faces growing unease about an extended buildup among some congressional Republicans, who are concerned that it could stretch into the 2008 election season and doom their reelection chances. In the Senate, there are about five to 10 such Republicans, according to GOP aides, who are expected to push for time limits or firm conditions in return for backing the increase.

"For any kind of a surge, they would have to show that the surge itself was limited," said one senior Republican leadership aide. "It would have to be 6 months or a year, tops."

DOJ_NMG_0113736

However, a strategy advocated by McCain and Keane, who has advised Bush on Iraq policy, calls for about 30,000 additional troops who would remain in Iraq from 18 months to two years. About 140,000 U.S. troops are now in Iraq. The plan has heavily influenced administration thinking and has strong advocates within the Pentagon and White House, setting up tension between those advocating a broad troop buildup and supporters of a more limited increase.

"The worst of all worlds would be a short, small surge of U.S. forces," McCain said at a forum on the final version of the plan, developed by Keane and Frederick Kagan, a military analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative Washington think tank. "This troop surge [must be] significant and sustained; otherwise, don't do it."

Advocates of the plan say a large, sustained increase is needed to hold and rebuild pacified Baghdad neighborhoods, which have seen a return of sectarian violence once overstretched U.S. troops move onto other parts of the capital. A short-term or limited troop increase would allow insurgents and sectarian death squads to wait out the U.S. offensive, advocates argue.

"The enemy always expects us to surge and leave," said Kagan, a former faculty member at the U.S. Military Academy. "If we surge for 3 or 6 months and then pull our forces back, the enemy will be right there waiting."

But a more substantial buildup appears to be running into opposition from some within the president's own party. The senior Republican leadership aide said that GOP skeptics in the Senate either oppose or have significant reservations about a troop increase.

"We have people on all sides of this. We're all over the map," the aide said, speaking on condition of anonymity while discussing internal party deliberations.

Only three of those Republican skeptics have gone public so far — Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.). All three are Republicans in states with a large Democratic electorate and are facing reelection in 2008. Some Republicans fear the buildup will be seen as an escalation of the current policy.

"Some are calling this 'staying the course — super-sized,'" said a senior staffer for a skeptical Republican moderate.

McCain said he believed any Republican fence-sitters would rally around the president once the plan is announced, which could come as soon as Wednesday.

"Most of my Republican colleagues are waiting to hear the president," McCain said. "I think you'll see, at the end of the day, most Republicans will support the president's proposal."

The new Democratic leadership in Congress came out forcefully Friday against any increase in troops, calling on Bush in a letter to reject calls for escalation, arguing it would allow the Iraqi government to delay taking over responsibility for their own security.

The letter, signed by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), said their views were shared by senior military leaders and warned that an increase could overstretch U.S. ground forces.

"We're willing to work with the president on a new way forward, but the surge is not the way forward," Reid said at a news conference. "The president said he was going to listen to his commanders, but if he listens to his commanders he can't do this. I know he's shuffling some of them out, I've been told it's because they're not telling them what he wants to hear."

Other leading Democrats, however, appeared to be more open to the proposal.

Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and a backer of plans to gradually withdraw troops from Iraq, said he could support an increase in troops as long as the Iraqi government took concrete steps to achieve political reconciliation within the country before new forces were sent.

"That at least puts pressure on Iraqis," Levin said. "That's what I would call 'hard conditionality.'"

Bush continued his reorganization of his Iraq team ahead of next week's strategy announcement. In the latest shift, Bush named Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the U.S. ground commander in Iraq for the last two years, as the Army's new chief of staff, taking over from Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, whose term expires in August.

The move was widely anticipated while Donald H. Rumsfeld was Defense secretary, but there had been speculation within the Pentagon that Casey would retire, given the administration's shift away from his strategy in Iraq.

Bush also confirmed reports he would replace Casey in Iraq with Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, believed to be an advocate of a more complex counterinsurgency campaign, and would nominate Navy Adm. William J. "Fox" Fallon as the new head of U.S. Central Command, the military's Middle East headquarters being vacated by retiring Army Gen. John P. Abizaid.

Bush also formally nominated retired Navy Vice Adm. J. Michael McConnell as the new director of national intelligence, replacing John D. Negroponte, who is moving to become the No. 2 official at State.

There were hints that even more moves were in the works. John Hillen, the State Department assistant secretary in charge of political and military affairs who played a key role in the agency's efforts in Iraq, has made plans to leave the department this month. His departure comes after only 15 months in the job.

DOJ_NMG_0113737

Bush is also expected to name Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, to become the new envoy to the United Nations, to be replaced by Ryan Crocker, currently the U.S. envoy to Pakistan. Khalilzad will take the place of John R. Bolton, who left the job at the end of a recess appointment when it became clear he did not have Senate backing to remain in the post. As part of his ongoing consultations in advance of his announcement next week, Bush and members of his national security team met Friday with a group of 15 senators to discuss Iraq policy.

According to senators in attendance and White House officials, Bush did not disclose any details of his thinking. Congressional aides said the White House did not intend to brief their leaders on specifics of his plan until Wednesday, just hours before Bush delivers the nationwide speech, a move that has angered Reid.

Despite the lack of details, Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), one of those who attended the meeting in the Cabinet Room, said in an interview that Bush's plan appeared likely to include a substantial buildup.

"I did walk away believing that a surge of some sort will be part of any plan," Nelson said. "But I do believe ... another part would be a set of conditions for the Iraqis to go through, for Prime Minister [Nouri] Maliki to go through."

Other senators in attendance said there was widespread skepticism among both Democrats and Republicans about the troop increase. Many advocated inclusion of strict guidelines and benchmarks to prod the Iraqi government into action.

"I would say that they were all opposed to it unless he come up with some spectacular idea and a way to measure that idea," said Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.), another participant. "They weren't unequivocally against it, but most would say ... the burden of proof was on the president."

Added Nelson: "I don't think there was anything partisan about the skepticism. But the message was, tell us more and when you tell us more we can make up our minds."

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) told the president that "he has the burden of proof" if he wants to send more troops.

"He has to show the American people what we do next," Pryor said.

The assertion by Snow, the presidential spokesman, that Bush has yet to make up his mind on the plan was echoed in other parts of the government, and there are indications the White House is considering options short of a full-scale, long-term buildup.

Although the most likely scenario includes an increase of 20,000 troops, another option is a gradual increase of forces, which could see a portion of new forces sent into Iraq while other brigades are kept in the U.S. or Kuwait as backup forces.

Iraqi Politicians Divided Over U.S. Envoy (WP)

By Joshua Partlow, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Khalilzad's Expected Departure Pleases Shiites, Worries Sunnis

BAGHDAD, Jan. 5 -- The news of the expected departure of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad split Iraqi politicians along sectarian lines, with members of the ruling Shiite alliance voicing eagerness for him to leave and minority Sunnis expressing concern at the loss of an ally.

Members of the U.S.-backed government in Iraq have grown increasingly frustrated with what they see as Khalilzad's efforts to reach out to Sunni groups, and many argue that the U.S. military confronts Shiite militias more aggressively than it does Sunni insurgents.

With both Iraqi and U.S. governments considering new strategies to stem the violence in Baghdad, including increasing the number of U.S. troops, the time seems right for new leadership, Iraqi politicians said Friday.

"Lately there has been a lot of criticism by the Shiites against [Khalilzad], saying he is pro-Sunni. A new face with this new strategy, possibly that would be more effective," said Mahmoud Othman, a senior Kurdish legislator who is regarded as independent.

U.S. officials have said they expect Khalilzad to be replaced by Ryan C. Crocker, the current U.S. envoy to Pakistan, who worked in Iraq earlier in his career. President Bush also picked Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who is credited with reducing sectarian violence in the northern Iraqi city of Mosul, to replace Gen. George W. Casey Jr. as the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

Shiite officials have been critical of some U.S. military operations targeting the Mahdi Army, the vast militia led by Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Khalilzad said in March that the militias posed the greatest threat to Iraq's stability.

In October, the Iraqi government ordered the United States to remove blockades around Sadr City, the Baghdad slum that is home to many Mahdi Army militiamen.

"Obviously, they're not great fans of Khalilzad," said an official in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government who spoke on condition of anonymity. Khalilzad's efforts have "failed in reducing the number of attacks, either on Iraqis or Americans, and at the same time it created a negative attitude toward the Americans amongst the Shia."

DOJ_NMG_0113738

U.S. Embassy officials have said that they do not favor one sect over the other and that reducing the violence requires difficult compromises for all parties.

Sunni lawmakers said Khalilzad's deep knowledge of Iraq's complex political landscape and his openness to Sunni concerns will be missed. Khalilzad is a Sunni Muslim of Afghan descent.

"It is an American decision, and we respect the American decision," said Alaa Makki, a leading Sunni legislator. "But nevertheless, we want those people to be close consultants to the Iraqi field, people who have lived the problem -- they didn't read or hear about the problems."

Mithal Alousi, a secular Sunni lawmaker who considers the ambassador a friend, said Khalilzad's expected appointment as U.S. envoy to the United Nations could help attract more international support for Iraq.

The replacement of top U.S. officials would be a "very good tactical move," Alousi said. "We're talking about a new state and a new strategy, and I think it will be very useful to have a fully new team."

But in the fourth year of violence in Iraq, and with the continuing presence of U.S. troops, some Iraqi leaders express resignation about whether new U.S. leaders on the ground can make a difference.

"I think it all depends on the Iraqis, the political leaders and the religious leaders," Othman said. "I don't think outside countries could solve their problem."

"The American strategy is fixed and obvious and doesn't change by the changing of personnel or leaders," said Nassar al-Rubaie, the leader of a bloc in parliament loyal to Sadr. "While they were counting on the American forces and were not giving wide authority to the prime minister, the security situation was deteriorating, and this will keep happening even if they increase the forces to 10 times the ones that already exist."

A U.S. Embassy spokesman in Baghdad declined to comment on Khalilzad's plans.

The violence in Iraq continued on Friday. A 28-year-old Associated Press photographer, Ahmed Hadi Naji, was found shot in the head several days after he went missing in Baghdad, the news service reported.

Also, a U.S. citizen was reported kidnapped Friday morning in northern Basra, a city in the south of Iraq. U.S. Embassy officials said they were looking into the reports.

Zalmay Khalilzad, On To A New Trouble Spot (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — In successive tours in Afghanistan and Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad earned a reputation as a high-flying, independent, smooth operator — an Afghan-born problem solver who worked with two fragile countries recently invaded by the United States to try to cobble together stability.

Now, as President Bush's choice to become the next ambassador to the United Nations, Mr. Khalilzad is headed to another American trouble spot, though his record would suggest that he is less likely to ruffle bureaucratic feathers than his predecessor, John R. Bolton, who often seemed to regard the organization as a foe.

Mr. Khalilzad joined the Bush administration as a well-known, neoconservative hawk, in the style of Paul D. Wolfowitz, the former deputy defense secretary. Born in Afghanistan and educated in Beirut and the United States, Mr. Khalilzad, as a policy planner in President Reagan's State Department during the 1980s, argued that the United States should arm Afghanistan's mujahedeen.

He was America's first ambassador to Afghanistan, where he became known as the "viceroy," a term evocative of colonialism. He became known for his ability to weave through warring tribal factions and his ability to quickly get senior Afghan officials on the phone or to summon them to his office, including President Hamid Karzai.

In 2005, he was sent to Iraq, where he failed the task of bringing stability, but succeeded in helping Iraqis to agree on a Constitution. Arriving in Baghdad, he quickly recognized that his marching instructions from Washington — that Iraq's Constitution should reflect a strong central government with strong control over the country's oil resources — were not achievable. Mr. Khalilzad advised his bosses that any deal on an Iraqi Constitution would have to provide for greater regional control over the country's oil fields, a key demand of Iraq's Kurdish population.

"He was pragmatic to see that the instructions he had were not achievable, and he had enough clout in Washington to get them changed," said Peter W. Galbraith, the former United States ambassador to Croatia and the author of "The End of Iraq."

Mr. Bolton, the fiery former ambassador, could not have done that, Mr. Galbraith and other current and former diplomats said, because Mr. Bolton seemed to view the world in starker terms of black and white, and shied away from compromise, even though that approach is prized at the United Nations. The blunt-spoken Mr. Bolton's confrontational style often conflicted with the understated ways of the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0113739

Mr. Khalilzad is no shrinking violet but he is less confrontational, people who have worked with both men at the State Department said. "I think he will be welcomed and will get a good response at the U.N., because of his experience, but also simply because he's following John Bolton, who broke a lot of crockery," said Mitchell B. Reiss, a former policy and planning director at the State Department who is now vice provost at the College of William and Mary.

Zalmay Mamozy Khalilzad, known as Zal to his colleagues and friends, was born on March 22, 1951, in Mazar-i-Sharif, Afghanistan, to an urbanized, highly educated and outward-looking Kabul family. During his high school years, Mr. Khalilzad attended the Ghazi Lycée in Kabul, a rigorous, elite school, and went out for the Afghan national basketball team.

He attended the American University of Beirut and then the University of Chicago, where he studied under Albert Wohlstetter, the innovator in strategic nuclear doctrine. Mr. Khalilzad received his Ph.D. in 1979, taught political science at Columbia University and joined the State Department in 1984. He is married to Cheryl Bernard, a political analyst with the RAND Corporation. They have two children, Alexander and Maximilian.

Mr. Khalilzad, a Sunni Muslim, is known at the State Department for his staunch — some say, swaggering — belief that he is a deal broker who can solve any problem. State Department staffers sometimes joked that Mr. Khalilzad, who has advocated talking to Iran, might one day go off script, personally meet with Iran's ruling mullahs and return to inform his bosses that he had worked everything out in American-Iranian relations.

During his time as the United States ambassador to Iraq, Mr. Khalilzad received permission from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to hold talks with Iran about the deteriorating security situation in Iraq. But those talks never happened, although Ms. Rice has consistently referred to "the Zal channel" as an option that the United States could use at any time if Bush officials decided they wanted to talk to Iran.

Mr. Khalilzad speaks Arabic and Persian and often fingered worry beads during long sessions with Sunni and Shiite leaders in Iraq. The fact that he is a Sunni Muslim did not always play well among Iraq's majority Shiite population, and he was sometimes viewed with suspicion and sometimes accused of favoring Sunnis.

In recent months, he has told colleagues that he was ready to leave Iraq. He was considered for the position of Ms. Rice's deputy, the job for which John D. Negroponte has been nominated.

State Department officials said they expected Mr. Khalilzad would get along better with bureaucrats at the United Nations than did Mr. Bolton, but noted that they still expected him to carry on America's agenda for change.

Ryan Clark Crocker, A Diplomat Used To Danger (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — When Ryan C. Crocker was trying to improve his Arabic in the late 1970s, he traveled to Jordan, made contact with a desert tribe and settled in for some hands-on training a little different from the standard State Department regimen.

"He wound up being a shepherd for a week or two, chasing down stray sheep and living with the Bedouin," said Frederic C. Hof, a retired Army officer and author on the Middle East who recalls reading Mr. Crocker's official report on the trip when they were in language training.

Mr. Crocker, President Bush's choice as the new ambassador to Iraq, has brought the same intensity to his three-decade diplomatic career, amassing a record of Middle East and South Asia experience possibly unrivaled in the United States Foreign Service.

He has served as ambassador to Lebanon, Kuwait, Syria and, since 2004, Pakistan. He reopened the American Embassy in Afghanistan after the fall of the Taliban. And he knows Iraq well; he worked there in the 1970s, led the State Department's Iraq-Kuwait task force during the Persian Gulf war in 1991 and returned to Baghdad for four months after the 2003 invasion as director of governance for the Coalition Provisional Authority.

In confronting Iraq's sectarian mayhem and the baffling mix of religious, political and tribal interests, he will be able to draw on many years of immersion in trouble spots with similar problems, including Beirut, where he survived the embassy bombing in 1983.

"He's an absolutely first-rate professional who will manage the job with skill and sensitivity," said Edward S. Walker Jr., president of the Middle East Institute and a former American ambassador to Egypt and Israel. "He has the cultural understanding that's so important to working in that region and that country."

Still, Mr. Walker said, the situation in Iraq is so intractable that it may prove impossible for any envoy to affect events decisively. "We're facing a division in Iraq that may be beyond anyone's capacity to heal," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0113740

Assuming he is formally nominated and confirmed by the Senate, Mr. Crocker, 57, will succeed three men who had very different approaches to the job of top American representative in Baghdad. L. Paul Bremer III, who led the Coalition Provisional Authority, had little experience in the region and exercised control over emerging Iraqi leaders that critics found heavy-handed.

John D. Negroponte, the first ambassador to the new government, took the opposite approach, encouraging Iraqis to take on responsibility and trying to remain in the background. Zalmay M. Khalilzad, who succeeded Mr. Negroponte, has taken a far stronger hand in pressing for reconciliation between the Shiite majority and the Sunni minority.

Former colleagues say Mr. Crocker is likely to be a less public presence in the Iraqi capital than Mr. Khalilzad, though they say he will work assiduously behind the scenes for the political accommodation necessary to reverse the slide to civil war.

They describe Mr. Crocker as a tough boss who drives himself as hard as he drives his staff. An accomplished marathon runner, he runs several miles early every morning, even in such danger spots as Beirut, where he was trailed by burly security guards who sometimes had to hop on bicycles to keep up.

Robin L. Raphel, a senior diplomat who worked with Mr. Crocker in Baghdad in 2003, said he was responsible for helping to put together the Iraqi Governing Council, the provisional government that oversaw the country for a year after the fall of Saddam Hussein.

"He's a very good persuader and negotiator," Ms. Raphel said. "He has the background on a lot of the important figures in Iraq, and he's very good at sussing out who's who."

A former colleague who agreed to speak of Mr. Crocker candidly on condition of anonymity called him "incredibly hard-working, very serious, a little introverted."

"I'd say he's more respected than loved in the State Department," the colleague said, "but he certainly is respected. He's done the dirtiest, hardest assignments you can imagine."

In Pakistan, Mr. Crocker has proved to be an "old school" ambassador who has put only limited pressure on President Pervez Musharraf, the military ruler who has sometimes frustrated the Bush administration by failing to act decisively against Al Qaeda and other militant groups, said Husain Haqqani, professor of international relations at Boston University.

"He's not somebody who will come up with a new grand strategy to change the world," said Mr. Haqqani, a former Pakistani government official. "But attempts to craft grand strategy have caused a lot of upheaval in American diplomacy."

Born June 19, 1949, in Spokane, Wash., Ryan Clark Crocker grew up in an Air Force family and attended school in Morocco, Turkey and Canada, as well as the United States. He graduated from Whitman College in Walla Walla, Wash., in 1971 and took his first Foreign Service assignment to the American Consulate in Khorramshahr, Iran, in 1972. He later worked in the embassies in Qatar, Iraq and Egypt. Because he prefers working overseas, he has rarely worked in Washington, but did hold a few posts there, including deputy assistant secretary of state for near eastern affairs.

He is married to Christine Barnes, a retired Foreign Service secretary, whom he met in Baghdad in 1979. Friends say they own property in the Willamette Valley of Oregon, where a friend said they discussed retiring before Mr. Crocker was named to his current post.

Now Mr. Crocker will face what is likely to be the most demanding assignment of his long career. "He's capable of doing the juggling act required in Iraq," Mr. Haqqani said. "Let's hope he does it well."

A New Commander, In Step With The White House On Iraq (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — The selection of Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus to serve as the senior American commander in Iraq signals an important turn in United States strategy.

As a supporter of increased forces in Iraq, General Petraeus is expected to back a rapid five-brigade expansion, in sharp contrast to his predecessor, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who has been openly skeptical that additional troops would help stabilize the country.

Having overseen the recent drafting of the military's counterinsurgency manual, General Petraeus is also likely to change the American military operation in Baghdad. American forces can be expected to take up positions in neighborhoods throughout the capital instead of limiting themselves to conducting patrols from large, fortified bases in and around the city.

The overarching goal of the American military operation may be altered as well. Under General Casey, the principal focus has been on transferring security responsibilities to the Iraqi security forces, so American troops could gradually withdraw. Now, the emphasis will shift to protecting the Iraqi population from sectarian strife and insurgent attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0113741

Since his appointment was disclosed Thursday, General Petraeus has not spoken publicly about his plans for Iraq. But the doctrine he has advocated suggests that he will want all five of the combat brigades slated to go to Iraq as quickly as possible instead of waiting for them to be phased in.

Before the selection of General Petraeus, there was some doubt about whether the top Iraq commander would be an enthusiastic executor of the new strategy President Bush is preparing to unveil next week — one that could send 20,000 new troops to Iraq. Now, the White House will have an articulate officer to champion and shape that strategy, an important asset for an administration that has decided to buck the tide of public opinion by deepening the American military involvement in Iraq. While some Democratic lawmakers have insisted that any increase be limited to a few months, neither the While House nor General Petraeus would support such a deadline.

To many civilians, the military seems monolithic. But in fact, there has been a lively debate behind the scenes about the best way to achieve the United States' objectives in Iraq — or at least to preserve a measure of stability as sectarian passions threaten to engulf the country.

At one end of the spectrum have been General Casey, Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head of the United States Central Command, and Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, who is in charge of training Iraqi security forces.

They have advocated plans to hand over security responsibilities to the Iraqis while gradually reducing American forces and shrinking the number of American bases in Iraq, as conditions permit. Their argument has been that a lengthy expansion of American forces in Iraq will simply put off the day when Iraqis take more responsibility for their security.

Taking a different view, other officers have argued for sending more troops while stepping up economic efforts, the better to apply the military's new counterinsurgency doctrine. Progress in stabilizing Iraq, they argue, will come only when the Iraqi public does not feel that it needs militias or insurgent groups to ensure its security, and when it concludes that its basic economic needs are being met.

Training and advising the Iraqi forces should continue to be an important priority, these officers have argued, but the Iraqis cannot be expected to shoulder the brunt of the security effort so quickly.

General Petraeus has been squarely in this camp, as was reflected in the military's new counterinsurgency field manual.

The United States has sought to apply the basic lessons of counterinsurgency operations in Baghdad before — most notably during Operation Together Forward II, the second phase of an effort begun over the summer to reduce violence in Baghdad.

But that effort foundered when the United States and Iraqi authorities failed to marshal sufficient forces to hold neighborhoods after they were cleared of insurgents and militias, and when the Iraqis failed to follow through with the job and reconstruction programs that were intended to win over Iraqi citizens.

By all accounts, Mr. Bush plans to announce an expanded military and economic push. But the United States will still have to contend with the political realities in Iraq, including a Shiite-dominated government that has often seemed more sectarian than inclusive, and may not prove enthusiastic about a larger and more visible role for the Americans.

At 54, General Petraeus has a long Army record and a diverse array of contacts and supporters. Having earned a Ph.D. in international relations from Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School, he invited experts from Harvard, nongovernmental organizations and policy groups to review an early draft of the counterinsurgency manual.

During the invasion, he led the 101st Airborne Division, which sought to emphasize economic and political reconstruction efforts in northern Iraq.

When L. Paul Bremer III, the second American civilian administrator of Iraq, formally abolished the Iraqi Army without announcing a plan to pay the former soldiers, General Petraeus approached one of Mr. Bremer's aides and delivered a clear message. The decision to leave Iraqi soldiers without a livelihood was prompting angry protests and putting the lives of American soldiers at risk. Mr. Bremer later decided to pay the Iraqi troops.

In June 2004, General Petraeus was charged with training the new Iraqi Army, a position he held for more than a year. It is a mission that is critical to American efforts in Iraq but which is as yet a mixed success.

As the senior American officer in Iraq, General Petraeus will work with Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, a subordinate who has day-to-day command of the forces and who also supports a troop increase.

Instead of immediately confronting the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia led by the cleric Moktada al-Sadr, the initial strategy is likely to be more subtle: by trying to tamp down sectarian killings, American troops — and the Iraqi forces they are partnered with — will try to reduce the population's reliance on militias for security, making it easier for the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to take the long-promised step of limiting the role of the militias.

Whether a modicum of stability can be achieved amid the violence and sectarian agendas in Iraq is uncertain at best. But General Petraeus seems determined to give the military's new counterinsurgency plan its most ambitious field test.

DOJ_NMG_0113742

Pace Future In Doubt After Shake-up (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

With President Bush replacing his two top field generals for Iraq, speculation has arisen in the Pentagon about the long-term future of his principal military adviser, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace.

From the start, no other four-star general has had more to do with Iraq war policy than Gen. Pace, the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman handpicked by former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Mr. Rumsfeld chose the highly decorated Marine as vice chairman in 2001. He promptly gave the disciplined Vietnam combatant a front-row seat in his Pentagon office as strategy was set for the war on terror and the 2003 invasion that toppled Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Rumsfeld then elevated Gen. Pace as the first Marine to head the Joint Chiefs in September 2005. Unlike the four service chiefs who get four-year terms, the Senate confirms chairmen for two years at a time. The question some are asking inside the Pentagon this week is whether the president will nominate Gen. Pace later this year for a second term, as has been the tradition for chairman.

"Is the president going to root out all his Iraq advisers?" is the way a defense source described speculation in the Pentagon.

A White House spokesman said yesterday he does not know the president's plans regarding Gen. Pace.

The speculation comes as the Pentagon yesterday announced Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates' first major changes for the Iraq war since taking office.

Adm. William J. Fallon, the combatant commander for the Pacific region, will succeed Army Gen. John Abizaid, who is retiring, as head of U.S. Central Command. The command is the center of the war on Islamic extremists, encompassing Afghanistan, Iraq, Iran and the Horn of Africa.

Gen. Fallon's Pacific Command has principal missions of watching Stalinist North Korea and communist China.

Navy admirals have overseen ground operations in the Pacific, but Adm. Fallon will be the first naval officer to run wars in the Persian Gulf region, which is home to a large sea component headquartered in Bahrain.

Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, will be replaced by Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who now heads the U.S. Army Combined Arms Center. Gen. Casey will succeed Gen. Peter Schoomaker as Army chief of staff.

Gen. Petraeus led the 101st Airborne Division in the original invasion. He later took command of training an emerging Iraqi army and police force. He received high praise for making progress in the difficult job of building an Iraqi security force virtually from scratch.

Mr. Bush announced the resignation of Mr. Rumsfeld in November, saying he wanted a "fresh perspective" on an Iraq war that has seen more than 3,000 American troops killed amid extremely violent sectarian fighting.

Pentagon officials say they expect Mr. Bush to order a "surge" of 5,000 to 20,000 soldiers who would focus on quelling violence in Baghdad. There would also be a new economic package in addition to the more than $30 billion approved by Congress for reconstruction and redevelopment.

Gens. Casey and Abizaid had both been expected to leave later this year. Gen. Abizaid, an Arabic speaker seen perfectly suited for the Arab-dominated region, was in his fourth year of command, longer than the normal two-to-three-year shift for combatant commanders. Gen. Casey has been mentioned frequently as Gen. Schoomaker's successor.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said yesterday it made sense to change commanders now and have them in place to implement Mr. Bush's new Iraq strategy.

Images Of Hanging Make Hussein A Martyr To Many (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 5 — In the week since Saddam Hussein was hanged in an execution steeped in sectarian overtones, his public image in the Arab world, formerly that of a convicted dictator, has undergone a resurgence of admiration and awe.

On the streets, in newspapers and over the Internet, Mr. Hussein has emerged as a Sunni Arab hero who stood calm and composed as his Shiite executioners tormented and abused him.

“No one will ever forget the way in which Saddam was executed,” President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt remarked in an interview with the Israeli newspaper Yediot Aharonot published Friday and distributed by the official Egyptian news agency. “They turned him into a martyr.”

DOJ_NMG_0113743

In Libya, which canceled celebrations of the feast of Id al-Adha after the execution, a government statement said a statue depicting Mr. Hussein in the gallows would be erected, along with a monument to Omar al-Mukhtar, who resisted the Italian invasion of Libya and was hanged by the Italians in 1931.

In Morocco and the Palestinian territories, demonstrators held aloft photographs of Mr. Hussein and condemned the United States.

Here in Beirut, hundreds of members of the Lebanese Baath Party and Palestinian activists marched Friday in a predominantly Sunni neighborhood behind a symbolic coffin representing that of Mr. Hussein and later offered a funeral prayer. Photographs of Mr. Hussein standing up in court, against a backdrop of the Dome of the Rock shrine in Jerusalem, were pasted on city walls near Palestinian refugee camps, praising "Saddam the martyr."

"God damn America and its spies," a banner across one major Beirut thoroughfare read. "Our condolences to the nation for the assassination of Saddam, and victory to the Iraqi resistance."

By standing up to the United States and its client government in Baghdad and dying with seeming dignity, Mr. Hussein appears to have been virtually cleansed of his past.

"Suddenly we forgot that he was a dictator and that he killed thousands of people," said Roula Haddad, 33, a Lebanese Christian. "All our hatred for him suddenly turned into sympathy, sympathy with someone who was treated unjustly by an occupation force and its collaborators."

Just a month ago Mr. Hussein was widely dismissed as a criminal who deserved the death penalty, even if his trial was seen as flawed. Much of the Middle East reacted with a collective shrug when he was found guilty of crimes against humanity in November.

But shortly after his execution last Saturday, a video emerged that showed Shiite guards taunting Mr. Hussein, who responded calmly but firmly to them. From then on, many across the region began looking at him as a martyr.

"The Arab world has been devoid of pride for a long time," said Ahmad Mazin al-Shugairi, who hosts a television show at the Middle East Broadcasting Center that promotes a moderate version of Islam in Saudi Arabia. "The way Saddam acted in court and just before he was executed, with dignity and no fear, struck a chord with Arabs who are desperate for their own leaders to have pride too."

Ayman Safadi, editor in chief of the independent Jordanian daily Al Ghad, said, "The last image for many was of Saddam taken out of a hole. That has all changed now."

At the heart of the sudden reversal of opinion was the symbolism of the hasty execution, now framed as an act of sectarian vengeance shrouded in political theater and overseen by the American occupation.

In much of the predominantly Sunni Arab world, the timing of the execution in the early hours of Id al-Adha, which is among the holiest days of the Muslim year, when violence is forbidden and when even Mr. Hussein himself sometimes released prisoners, was seen as a direct insult to the Sunni world.

The contrast between the official video aired without sound on Iraqi television of Mr. Hussein being taken to the gallows and fitted with a noose around his neck and the unauthorized grainy, chaotic recording of the same scene with sound, depicting Shiite militiamen taunting Mr. Hussein with his hands tied, damning him to hell and praising the militant Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, touched a sectarian nerve.

"He stood as strong as a mountain while he was being hanged," said Ahmed el-Ghamrawi, a former Egyptian ambassador to Iraq. "He died a strong president and lived as a strong president. This is the image people are left with."

Daoud Kuttab, a Palestinian media critic and director of the online radio station Ammannet.net, said: "If Saddam had media planners, he could not have planned it better than this. Nobody could ever have imagined that Saddam would have gone down with such dignity."

Writers and commentators have stopped short of eulogizing the dictator but have looked right past his bloody history as they compare Iraq's present circumstances with Iraq under Mr. Hussein.

In Jordan, long a bastion of support forMr. Hussein, many are lionizing him, decrying the timing of the execution and the taunts as part of a Sunni-Shiite conflict.

"Was it a coincidence that Israel, Iran and the United States all welcomed Saddam's execution?" wrote Hamadeh Faraneh, a columnist for the daily Al Rai. "Was it also a coincidence when Saddam said bravely in front of his tormentors, 'Long live the nation,' and that Palestine is Arab, then uttered the declaration of faith? His last words expressed his depth and what he died for."

Another Jordanian journalist, Muhammad Abu Rumman, wrote in Al Ghad on Thursday: "For the vast majority Saddam is a martyr, even if he made mistakes in his first years of rule. He cleansed himself later by confronting the Americans and by rejecting to negotiate with them."

Even the pro-Saudi news media, normally critical of Mr. Hussein, chimed in with a more sentimental tone.

DOJ_NMG_0113744

In the London-based pan-Arab daily Al Hayat, Bilal Khubbaiz, commenting on Iranian and Israeli praise of the execution, wrote, “Saddam, as Iraq’s ruler, was an iron curtain that prevented the Iranian influence from reaching into the Arab world,” as well as “a formidable party in the Arab-Israeli conflict.”

Zuhayr Qusaybati, also writing in Al Hayat, said the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, “gave Saddam what he most wanted: he turned him into a martyr in the eyes of many Iraqis, who can now demand revenge.”

“The height of idiocy,” Mr. Qusaybati said, “is for the man who rules Baghdad under American protection not to realize the purpose of rushing the execution, and that the guillotine carries the signature of a Shiite figure as the flames of sectarian division do not spare Shiites or Sunnis in a country grieving for its butchered citizens.”

In Saudi Arabia, poems eulogizing Mr. Hussein have been passed around on cellphones and in e-mail messages.

“Prepare the gun that will avenge Saddam,” a poem published in a Saudi newspaper warned. “The criminal who signed the execution order without valid reason cheated us on our celebration day. How beautiful it will be when the bullet goes through the heart of him who betrayed Arabism.”

Mr. Safadi, the Jordanian editor, said: “In the public’s perception Saddam was terrible, but those people were worse. That final act has really jeopardized the future of Iraq immensely. And we all know this is a blow to the moderate camp in the Arab world.”

Baghdad Initiative To Go Door To Door (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst And Qassim Abdul-Zahra, Associated Press Writers

AP, January 6, 2007

Iraqi forces backed by U.S. troops will begin a neighborhood-by-neighborhood assault on militants in the capital this weekend as a first step in the new White House strategy to contain Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads, key advisers to the prime minister said Friday.

The first details of the plan — a fresh bid to pacify the capital — emerged a day after President Bush and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki spoke for nearly two hours by video conference. Both leaders were expected to detail their vision of a new strategy in the coming days.

The al-Maliki aides would not address the scope of the planned assaults nor where specifically they were planned.

The Iraqis did, however, signal continuing disagreement on key issues, including al-Maliki's unease over the introduction of more U.S. troops.

Another point of contention has been the Iraqi leader's repeated refusal of U.S. demands to crush the militia of anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, one of the prime minister's most powerful backers.

Any serious drive to curb the extreme chaos and violence in the capital would put not only American forces but al-Maliki's Iraqi army in direct confrontation with al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

The militants are gaining more and more ground as they kill Sunni residents of the city and drive others from their neighborhoods. The explosion of vengeance began after the Feb. 22 bombing by al-Qaida in Iraq militants of an important Shiite shrine, the Golden Dome mosque in Samarra north of the capital.

Sami al-Askari, an al-Maliki political adviser, told The Associated Press on Friday that al-Maliki had not acquiesced to the reported White House plan to send as many as 9,000 more U.S. troops to Baghdad alone.

"President Bush told the prime minister he was ready to send additional troops, but al-Maliki said he would have to talk that over with his senior military officers to see if they were needed," al-Askari said.

Bush reportedly wants to increase troop strength as part of his developing plan to shake-up the U.S. military effort in Iraq, now in its fourth year.

Without a substantial U.S. troop increase there were questions about the success of any new drive to curb violence.

Last summer the U.S. military and Iraqi army flooded the capital with 12,000 additional troops for the same purpose. By October, the U.S. military spokesman said the operation had not met expectations and the situation was disheartening. The last half of 2006 was one of the most violent periods in the center and west of the country since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion to topple Saddam Hussein.

In his discussions with Bush, al-Maliki continued to press for a rapid U.S. withdrawal from the capital to bases "on the outskirts of Baghdad," al-Askari said. The prime minister has claimed his forces will be ready to assume control of security for the whole country by summer. The Americans, perhaps optimistically, hope that can happen by year's end.

Al-Askari and Hassan al-Suneid, another top al-Maliki aide and lawmaker from his Dawa Party, said the fresh security push would be open-ended once initiated this weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0113745

"The Iraqi Interior, Defense and National Security ministries will take part using information we have gathered from a new intelligence network," al-Suneid said. "There will be no time limit, and there will be many stages to the operation."

Al-Suneid said American forces would take part in a supporting role.

As forces apparently began to get ready, the powerful Association of Muslim Scholars voiced Sunni agitation and claimed the coming drive was really a joint operation by Interior Ministry commandos, the Iraqi army and the Mahdi Army to further cleanse mixed neighborhoods. Iraq's security forces are dominated by Shiites.

Sheik Mohammed Bashar al-Fayadh, a spokesman for the organization, claimed residents had seen 150 vehicles massing Friday in the Shula region in northwest Baghdad in advance of the assault.

"We fear a huge attack," al-Fayadh said on Al-Jazeera satellite television.

Throughout Iraq on Friday, at least 31 people died violently or were found dead, including two beheaded victims of the sectarian slaughter found floating in the Tigris river.

The body of an Associated Press employee was found shot in the back of the head Friday, six days after he was last seen by his family leaving for work. Ahmed Hadi Naji, 28, was the fourth AP staffer to die violently in the Iraq war and the second AP employee killed in less than a month. He had been a messenger and occasional cameraman for the AP for 2 1/2 years.

"All of us at AP share the pain and grief being felt by Ahmed's family and friends," said AP President and CEO Tom Curley.

The circumstances of Naji's death were unclear. Dozens of Iraqis are found slain almost every day in Baghdad, many believed to be victims of sectarian death squads.

An American contractor was abducted Friday along with his driver and translator, and the two Iraqis were later found dead near a stadium in the southern city of Basra, police said. The fate of the American was unknown.

"The two victims were the translator and a driver," said a Basra police official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information.

Basra's police chief, Gen. Mohammed Humadi, confirmed that a U.S. citizen had been kidnapped and said he was an American of Iraqi origin. The contractor's name and the company for which he worked were not disclosed.

French President Jacques Chirac, meanwhile, said the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq destabilized the entire Middle East and caused terrorism to spread, adding that the problems in Iraq justified France's strong opposition to the war.

"As France foresaw and feared, the war in Iraq caused upheavals whose effects have not yet finished unraveling," Chirac said in a speech to French ambassadors.

___

AP Military Writer Robert Burns in Washington and AP reporter Christine Ollivier in Paris contributed to this report.

American, 2 Iraqi Interpreters Kidnapped (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

BAGHDAD — A U.S. civilian contractor and two Iraqi interpreters were kidnapped Friday near the southern city of Basra, Iraqi police officials said.

Police Col. Kareem Azaidi in Basra said witnesses saw gunmen in a civilian car, a pickup and two police vehicles cut off the captives' car and take them hostage.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor declined to identify the victims. "We're aware of reports that an American citizen was kidnapped," he said. "And we're looking into them."

The fate of the American contractor was unknown, but the two Iraqis were later found dead, the Associated Press reported.

The abductions came a day after a videotape emerged showing four kidnapped Americans and an Austrian.

The five men in the video said they were contractors for Crescent Security Group, a Kuwait-based firm, abducted near Basra in November. The men identified themselves as John R. Young, 44, of Kansas City, Mo.; Jon Cote of Buffalo, N.Y.; Josh Munns, 23, of Redding, Calif.; Paul Johnson Reuben of Buffalo, Minn.; and Bert Nussbaumer of Austria.

"I'm well; my friends are well. We've been treated well," Young said. Reuben said the video was recorded Dec. 22.

Meanwhile, in the first Friday prayers since Saddam Hussein was hanged, Shiite Muslim clerics called the death of the former Iraqi president — whose regime favored minority Sunnis — a "breakthrough" and condemned those who opposed the recording of the execution.

"The execution of Saddam is a turning point not only in the history of the Iraqi people but in the whole area," Shiite cleric Sadruddin Qubanchi said in the holy city of Najaf. "We foresee a new breakthrough in the region, and this explains the anger of some Arab countries…. Libya, Algeria and Yemen — all these governments are tyrannical too."

DOJ_NMG_0113746

Sunni Arabs throughout the Middle East complained about the way Hussein was executed. A cellphone camera recorded supporters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr taunting and jeering Hussein as he stood on the gallows.

Qubanchi accused the critics of hypocrisy. "When Saudi Arabia shot dead in the streets 400 Iranian Shiite pilgrims after they held a demonstration, no one protested," he said. "But today those who pretend to grieve over Saddam are really grieving only because they fear the wind of change will move people in their countries."

At Baghdad's Bratha Mosque, Sheik Jalaluddin Saghir, a Shiite cleric and parliament member, said that whatever pain Hussein experienced paled in comparison to the atrocities he committed.

"Executing Saddam on the first day of Eid made the Baathists and Sunnis angry," Saghir said, referring to the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha. "That is all pretense. Saddam used to execute leaders and prominent figures anytime he liked — even during Eid."

Sheik Harith Obeidi, a prominent Sunni cleric and parliament member, avoided discussing Hussein's execution and focused instead on religious matters.

Many sermons emphasized the failure of the government to provide security and services.

At least 18 bodies were discovered Friday in Baghdad, some with gunshots to the head and wounds suggesting torture.

Mortar fire killed at least 10 other Iraqis in the capital, and at least five people, including a police officer, were shot to death.

Police officials said 30 gunmen drove 18 Shiite families out of their west Baghdad homes.

Insurgents Elude Forces In Eastern Iraqi Province (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

Villagers deny knowledge of the rebels -- except for a teen who describes their getaways.

FONTIMIYA, IRAQ — U.S. and Iraqi forces trudged through waterlogged fields, crawled down tunnels and went house to house Friday in a painstaking search for Sunni Arab insurgents, combing a remote rural region east of Baghdad that has been a training and logistics base for Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups.

But for the second day of the 1,000-troop operation, in home after home, they found only women, children and men too old to fight.

Time and again, U.S. forces in Iraq have staged major assaults on known insurgent hide-outs only to have key individuals melt away. As with other operations, the military is attempting to dislodge insurgents from their hiding places in Diyala province, then sweep them into known escape routes where they can be intercepted.

But the area's sunken irrigation canals, vast agricultural fields, seldom-traveled back roads and widely scattered hamlets have given guerrillas innumerable ways to avoid capture.

"We are hardly finding any military-aged males," U.S. Army Sgt. 1st Class Pete Johnson said as he directed a truckload of Iraqi fighters into position outside a village in an icy downpour. "They have all pushed away somewhere. Either they have run away or they are waiting for us."

If the insurgents are preparing to make a stand, Johnson said, "we can definitely take the fight to them."

"But if they disappear and hide," he said, "there is no way we can establish positive identification and get them."

U.S. field commanders have struggled to keep pace with guerrillas' movements. Officials say the rebels use spotters, infiltrators in Iraqi security forces and contacts on or near U.S. bases to stay abreast of American troop movements.

The Bush administration is considering sending more troops to Iraq, which in November numbered about 140,000, to quell sectarian fighting in places such as Diyala. Proponents of the idea say 20,000 or more additional troops would enable the military to conduct more operations and train Iraqi forces more quickly. But critics say earlier troop surges have failed to stem the fighting and led to more American casualties.

Since the battle for Fallouja in 2004, when hundreds of insurgents faced off against U.S. soldiers and Marines in close block-to-block combat, the outgunned guerrillas have rarely amassed platoon-sized attacks against the Americans. Rather, they hit and run. Snipers fire at troops from darkened rooms. Triggermen detonate bombs remotely. Rocket-propelled grenades blaze from thick palm groves.

When U.S. troops do learn of large gatherings of insurgents, they often arrive too late — weapons have been stashed and the rebels have scattered among the populace.

After the U.S. eventually withdraws, the insurgents often return.

In Al Anbar province in western Iraq, Col. Brian Beaudreault, commander of the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, said he was attempting to reestablish a police force in Rutbah, a town of 30,000 between Ramadi and Syria. At least three waves of recruits have come and gone in many Al Anbar towns. Iraqi soldiers brought in to provide security in the absence of police have also been plagued by battle losses and attrition.

DOJ_NMG_0113747

Perhaps the most publicized failure of the "clear and hold" tactic has been Operation Together Forward in Baghdad. U.S. commanders announced the plan to clear neighborhoods of insurgents and Shiite death squads with great fanfare, but since the operation began in August, sectarian violence and U.S. casualties in the capital have steadily increased.

In Baqubah, Diyala's capital, guerrillas had virtually destroyed the police force by November. The virulence of the insurgency led Col. David W. Sutherland, the U.S. commander in charge of the province, to take stronger action against the Sunni militants.

But the region, a vast area of farmland dotted with palm groves about 40 miles northeast of Baghdad, is laced with canals and tunnels that insurgents use to evade U.S. aircraft and ground forces.

In addition to intelligence, the offensive has yielded a number of weapons stores, including mortar rounds, antitank mines and two vans rigged with rocket equipment, the military said.

About 600 U.S. and 400 Iraqi troops are participating in the operation, which has drawn in attack helicopters, tanks, fighting vehicles and Humvees.

U.S. Capt. Stephen Dobbins, who commands Bravo Troop, 5th Squadron, 73rd Cavalry, said the current sweep was using what some military officials call a "hammer and anvil" tactic, to push insurgents into waiting troop positions.

Fighter jets dropped a 500-pound bomb on six armed men as they crept through canals toward U.S. and Iraqi troops overnight, the military said. In the morning, troops found a 30-foot tunnel at the site with a store of food, blankets and religious texts. It was destroyed.

At least two suspected insurgents were killed when they were spotted digging in a road, apparently to plant a bomb. The Iraqi army said two of its soldiers were killed in a roadside bombing the previous day.

But fighting so far has been minimal compared with a November offensive in the area, when U.S. soldiers said they faced bands of highly trained and well-disciplined insurgents.

Two roadside bombs wounded two Iraqi soldiers and a U.S. soldier Friday. A disabled vehicle delayed a convoy for several hours, as did wind and rain, which further degraded Diyala's poorly maintained dirt roads and vexed air support operations.

In each village, U.S. and Iraqi troops are moving house to house, separating out military-aged men, swiping their hands for explosives residue and questioning them about insurgent activity in the area.

In Fontimiya, one of the larger wheat-farming communities, 20 men sat cross-legged in a windblown field, eyes downcast and some shivering in the cold, as U.S. soldiers barked out questions.

But the village was otherwise deserted, many of its mud-brick homes reduced to rubble. Residents said the once mostly Shiite Muslim hamlet had been racked by sectarian violence that sent many families fleeing. Just two Shiite families remain in what has become a mostly Sunni Muslim community, they said.

Most denied any knowledge of insurgents. But a detained teenager told troops that the community included a number of fighters who fled on motorcycles through the canal network at the first sound of U.S. helicopters. The boy also said residents received regular visits from masked men on motorcycles who warned them which roads were mined.

U.S. forces said they had positioned troops to block the insurgents' escape.

"The enemy is reacting the way we expected them to, and that will ultimately lead us to triumph and prevail," squadron commander Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas told superiors in a radio call later Friday night, as a sandstorm closed in and wailing winds buffeted their vehicles.

But Poppas has said that long-term success depends on the cooperation of the mostly Shiite Iraqi forces, who until recently had refused to patrol the area, which they consider a death trap. He plans to build them a new patrol base in the area.

Now, U.S. forces say, they must hold the Iraqis back. Iraqi soldiers, used to sprinting through attacks, have expressed frustration at the deliberate approach of the Americans.

"We want to kill Wahhabis," an Iraqi soldier complained to his U.S. counterparts in a joking exchange as they sifted through piles of receipts, letters, identification cards and other documents at a suspect's residence. He referred to followers of the fundamentalist form of Sunni Islam practiced by Al Qaeda, which has spread in the region.

A U.S. soldier assured him he would get his chance.

zavis@latimes.com

Times staff writers Solomon Moore in Baghdad and Molly Hennessy-Fiske in Kirkuk contributed to this report.

Death In Haditha (WP)

By Josh White, Washington Post Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0113748

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

U.S. Marines gunned down five unarmed Iraqis who stumbled onto the scene of a 2005 roadside bombing in Haditha, Iraq, according to eyewitness accounts that are part of a lengthy investigative report obtained by The Washington Post.

Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, the squad's leader, shot the men one by one after Marines ordered them out of a white taxi in the moments following the explosion, which killed one Marine and injured two others, witnesses told investigators. Another Marine fired rounds into their bodies as they lay on the ground.

"The taxi's five occupants exited the vehicle and according to U.S. and Iraqi witnesses, were shot by Wuterich as they stood, unarmed, next to the vehicle approximately ten feet in front of him," said a report by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service on the incident that runs thousands of pages.

One of the witnesses, Sgt. Asad Amer Mashoot, a 26-year-old Iraqi soldier who was in the Marine convoy, told investigators he watched in horror as the four students and the taxi driver fell. "They didn't even try to run away," he said. "We were afraid from Marines and we saw them behaving like crazy. They were yelling and screaming."

The shootings were the first in a series of violent reactions by Marines on the morning of Nov. 19, 2005 that left 24 civilians -- many of them women and children -- dead, in what some human rights groups and Iraqis have called a massacre by U.S. troops.

The report, which relied on hundreds of interviews with Marines, Iraqi soldiers and civilian survivors conducted months after the incident, presents a fragmented and sometimes conflicting chronicle of the violence that day. But taken together, the accounts provide evidence that as the Marines came under attack, they responded in ways that are difficult to reconcile with their rules of engagement.

Four Marines were charged with murder last month in connection with the civilian deaths in Haditha: Wuterich, who faces 13 counts of unpremeditated murder; Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz; Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt; and Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum. Each faces the possibility of life in prison if convicted.

Through their lawyers, three have argued that they behaved appropriately while taking fire on a chaotic battlefield, and that the civilian deaths were a regrettable but unavoidable part of warfare in an especially dangerous area. Dela Cruz's attorney has declined to comment.

The Marine Corps also has charged four officers with failing to investigate and fully report the slayings: Lt. Col. Jeffrey R. Chessani, Capt. Lucas M. McConnell, Capt. Randy W. Stone and Lt. Andrew A. Grayson.

The Marines told investigators that they believed they were authorized to fire freely inside two houses they raided in the minutes following the taxi shootings, after concluding that insurgents were firing on them. After an officer ordered them to "take" one of the homes and Wuterich commanded them to "shoot first, ask questions later," the Marines considered the houses "hostile," according to sworn statements to investigators.

Marine officials have accused the troops of failing to identify their targets before using grenades and guns to kill 14 unarmed people in the houses, including several young children in their pajamas, in a span of about 10 minutes, according to the documents.

Safah Yunis Salem, 13, who said she played dead to avoid being shot, was the only person to survive the Marine attack on the second house. Her sister Aisha, 3, was shot in the leg and died; her brother Zainab, 5, was killed by a shot to the head. She said she lost five other members of her family in the room, including her mother.

"He fired and killed everybody," Safah said. "The American fired and killed everybody."

Numerous Marine officers in the chain of command in Iraq -- including a major general -- knew about the civilian deaths almost immediately but did not launch an investigation for months, according to interview transcripts. Some lower-level officers did not believe that the Marines had done anything inappropriate, while high-ranking officers had limited information about the incident and did not inquire further.

Neal Puckett, one of Wuterich's attorneys, declined to comment on the case yesterday, saying he is "deeply disturbed that any media have access to what sounds like the entire investigation."

Wuterich told investigators in a February interview: "I want to make clear that we did not go in intentionally to spray everyone we saw. We were taking fire."

Marine Corps and NCIS officials declined to comment on details of the case because it is ongoing.A Routine Mission Turns Violent

The report provides a detailed narrative of the events leading to the violence in Haditha. The day began about 6 a.m., when Lance Cpl. Salvador A. Guzman Jr. awoke at Firm Base Sparta and members of his squad learned they would be bringing fresh Iraqi troops to a traffic checkpoint in Haditha. He bumped into Lance Cpl. Miguel "T.J." Terrazas, who joked that "we were going to get hit by an improvised explosive device one day because we travel so much," Guzman told investigators.

The Marines left the base at about 6:45 a.m. and made the personnel changes by about 7 a.m.; then they turned their four-vehicle convoy around and headed back. Sharratt, in the turret of the first Humvee, waved a white sedan over to the side of "Route Chestnut," and as it slid to the south shoulder a blast rocked the neighborhood.

Terrazas, who was driving the fourth Humvee, was killed instantly by the remotely detonated propane tank, which shredded the front of the vehicle and launched it into the middle of the road. Another Marine, severely injured, was trapped in the wreckage.

Marines who rushed to help told investigators they took enemy rifle fire from several locations on the north and south sides of the road. Navy Hospitalman Brian D. Whitt said he could see bullet impacts near his feet and noticed men with rifles disappearing from atop a house to the north. Some of the fire appeared to be coming from behind the white taxi.

The Marines concurred that they were under fire from all sides, indicating that the incident was part of a complex insurgent attack that lasted much of the day.

One Marine and two Iraqi soldiers told investigators that the men who had been in the taxi were standing in a line outside it, some with their hands in the air, when Wuterich began to fire on them.

Wuterich said the men got out of the car, and he shot them because he considered them a threat. But Dela Cruz said the men were standing in a line when they started to fall.

"As I crossed the median I saw one of the Iraqi civilians, who was standing in the center of the line, drop to the ground," Dela Cruz told investigators. "Immediately afterwards another Iraqi standing by him raised his hands to his head. I then heard other small arms fire and looked to my left and saw Sgt. Wuterich kneeling on one knee and shooting his M16 in the direction of the Iraqi civilians."

Dela Cruz told investigators that he pumped bullets into the bodies of the Iraqi men after they were on the ground and later urinated on one of them.

Minutes later, a Quick Reaction Force arrived from the Marine base, bringing Lt. William T. Kallop, the first officer on the scene. Kallop told investigators he began to receive enemy fire almost immediately. About that time, Cpl. Hector A. Salinas spotted a man firing at the squad from the corner of a house on the south side of the road.

"Salinas then stated that he could see the enemy so Kallop told them to 'take the house,' " according to an NCIS summary of an interview with Kallop. The interview provides the first evidence that an officer ordered the attack.

Richard McNeil, a lawyer who represents Kallop, declined to comment about him or his role, but he warned that "typically in an NCIS investigation, the narratives are always slanted to the interpretation of the government."

Wuterich, Salinas, Tatum and Lance Cpl. Humberto M. Mendoza formed a team to attack the house, launching grenades first and then busting through the door.

"I told them to treat it as a hostile environment," Wuterich told investigators. "I told them to shoot first, ask questions later."

Defense attorneys have argued that the men were following their "rules of engagement" when they shot into the homes, using effective techniques in a difficult environment.

The Marine division's rules-of-engagement card in effect at the time in western Iraq instructed Marines to "ALWAYS minimize collateral damage" and said that targets must be positively identified as threats before a Marine can open fire. It also told Marines that "nothing on this card prevents you from using all force necessary to defend yourself."

After entering the first house through a kitchen, Tatum told investigators, he heard what he believed was an AK-47 rifle being "racked," or readied to fire, around a corner. He and Salinas tossed grenades into the room, according to the documents. Waleed Hasan, 37, was killed. Khamisa Ali, 66, was shot dead in the hallway before four others were killed in a bedroom by grenades and rifle fire.

Nine-year-old Eman Hamed told investigators that a grenade landed near her grandfather's bed and exploded, sending shrapnel through the room. Her mother and 4-year-old brother were killed as she huddled, injured, with another brother, Abid, 6, who survived. "All rooms," Abid told investigators. "They were shooting in all rooms."

Several Marines said they quickly cleared the home by fire, shooting through the dust, debris and darkness to eliminate what they believed was a threat.

From there, Wuterich, Mendoza and Tatum said, they moved to a second house after suspecting that insurgents might have escaped. Mendoza told investigators that the Marines approached the second house the same way they did the first, treating it as hostile, according to his sworn statement. Mendoza said he shot a man, 43-year-old Yunis Rasif, through the house's glass kitchen door.

"I fired because I had been told the house was hostile and I was following my training that all individuals in a hostile house are to be shot," Mendoza told investigators. The Marines then entered the house and tossed grenades before firing into a back bedroom, which they later found was filled with women and children.

DOJ_NMG_0113750

"Knowing what I know now, I feel badly about killing Iraqi civilians who may have been innocent, but I stand fast in my decisions that day, as I reacted to the threats that I perceived at the time," Tatum said. "I did not shoot randomly with the intent to harm innocent Iraqi civilians."

Jack Zimmerman, Tatum's attorney, declined to comment yesterday but decried the publication of the documents. "The ethical rules that govern lawyers prohibit me from even discussing the matter," he said.

Mashoot, the Iraqi soldier who was with the Marines, said he thought the attack on the houses was warranted because the entire convoy was taking fire. Investigators noted that he believed the Marines "had justification" because they were "defending themselves."

Another group of Marines, including Dela Cruz, simultaneously went to the north side of the road and found a dwelling that they believed was the "trigger house" for the roadside bomb. They took several Iraqis into custody, according to the documents, but did not shoot anyone in a search of several houses. Another man was shot after Marines observed him running along a ridgeline.

A few hours later, Sharratt, Wuterich and Salinas approached a third and fourth house after noticing men they said were peering at them suspiciously.

The investigative reports show that what happened there is unclear. Iraqi witnesses said the Marines angrily separated men and women into two lines before marching the men into the fourth house and shooting them. The three Marines told investigators they were searching for the men they had seen and separated the women into a safe area before Wuterich and Sharratt entered the house.

Sharratt told investigators that he saw a man raise an AK-47 rifle as if to shoot him. Sharratt said his gun jammed, but he grabbed his 9mm handgun and shot the attacker. He told investigators he saw another man with a rifle and shot him and two others because he "felt threatened." Wuterich also shot at the men, he said.

Sharratt has been charged with unpremeditated murder in three of the slayings.

Gary Myers, a lawyer representing Sharratt, declined to comment yesterday.At First, No Inquiry

The military did not launch an inquiry of the Haditha deaths until a Time magazine reporter began to inquire about the incident two months later. Marine officers told investigators the reason was simple: Nothing in the reports they received from the field caused them to believe that a probe was warranted.

Investigators appear to have found little evidence that Marines on the ground or at headquarters tried to conceal the day's events. But Dela Cruz told investigators that Wuterich asked him to back up claims that the men in the taxi were trying to flee before they were shot.

Puckett, Wuterich's lawyer, challenged Dela Cruz's assertion: "Staff Sergeant Wuterich adamantly denies asking anybody to lie or change their story."

The documents show that Marines in Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, reported the incident to their base as it was happening and made clear that there were a significant number of civilian casualties. Though at first the Marines classified eight of the civilians as insurgents, they quickly reported that at least 15 civilians had been killed in what they called "crossfire" with the enemy.

The events came amid heavy insurgent attacks in Haditha that day that ultimately prompted Marines to call in airstrikes on suspected insurgent homes. The hectic nature of the day caused some early reports to be confused and inaccurate, Marines told investigators.

The Kilo Company commander, McConnell, told his Marines on the day of the attacks that they had done a good job, according to an investigative summary in the NCIS report. Investigators wrote that McConnell did not want to question his Marines on a day they lost a comrade but that he informed his superiors about the civilian deaths.

"There was never a hint whatsoever that these kids did anything improper. Not one," said Kevin McDermott, a lawyer who represents McConnell.

Marine officers said Chessani, the Marines' battalion commander, informed his superior, the regimental commander, of the civilian casualties the day they occurred and was told by that officer, Col. Stephen W. Davis, that no investigation was needed.

"There was nothing out of the ordinary about any of this, including the number of civilian dead, that would have triggered anything in my mind that was out of the norm," Davis told military investigators, according to a transcript. "There is nothing about this incident that jumped out at any point to us."

Maj. Gen. Richard A. Huck, the division commander, told investigators he learned about the civilian casualties on the day they occurred and believed that they were the result of a roadside bomb and the ensuing gunbattle between Marines and insurgents. Huck visited Haditha three days later and was briefed on the incident.

DOJ_NMG_0113751

"Nothing in the brief caused any concern to me," Huck told investigators. "I do not recall if the brief discussed the number of Iraqis killed that day, but I do recall the brief discussing Marines clearing houses following the IED attack."

McConnell and Chessani have been charged in the case; Huck and Davis have not. Attempts to reach Chessani or an attorney for him were not successful.

In December 2005, the Marines authorized $38,000 in condolence payments to the families of the civilians killed in the first two houses, and Chessani, in early February, explained the payments in a memo. "The enemy chose the time and place of his ambush. Without callous disregard for the lives of innocent bystanders, the enemy would not have chosen to fight from the bedrooms and living rooms of civilian-occupied houses," he wrote.

The official inquiry began two weeks later, after the Time reporter sent a list of questions about the incident to Marine officials in Iraq. In his e-mail, the reporter raised the possibility that Marines had massacred civilians and executed the men from the taxi, based in part on a videotape made by an activist a day after the incident.

Huck told investigators he dismissed the allegations, believing they were part of an insurgent campaign to smear the Marines. Other Marine officers, such as Davis, also believed that the allegations were outlandish.

But Maj. Samuel H. Carrasco, then a battalion operations officer, said he and the battalion executive officer suggested an investigation to Chessani. Carrasco told investigators that "Lt. Col. Chessani then shouted, 'My men are not murderers.' "

The first investigation, by Army Col. Gregory Watt, ordered by Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, then the top field commander in Iraq, essentially supported the Marines' accounts of events. Watt determined that the troops had reason to be suspicious of the men in the white car and concluded that while they did not positively identify targets in the houses, it might have been "unrealistic to expect" on the battlefield that day.

He also found no indication that the Marines "intentionally targeted, engaged and killed noncombatants," but he suggested a criminal investigation nonetheless. The NCIS investigation began March 12, leading to last month's charges.

Lawmaker: U.S. Catching, Releasing Top Terror Targets (CNN)

CNN.com, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The U.S. military already knows what half of its most-wanted terrorist targets look like because they have been apprehended and photographed in the past, a Republican congresswoman said Friday.

The United States is operating "a catch and release program for al Qaeda in Iraq," said Rep. Heather Wilson, a member of the House intelligence committee.

In remarks at the National Press Club, the New Mexico lawmaker said a senior official told her that the U.S. military already has photographs of "fully half of the high-value al Qaeda targets in Iraq" presently being hunted.

"They're wearing orange jumpsuits in the mugshots we took of them when we captured them the first time," Wilson recalled the official telling her.

"We are operating a catch and release program for al Qaeda in Iraq. This is inexcusable and frustrating ... for the young men and women in the military who are in the fight," she added.

Wilson also joined a congressional chorus Friday calling for President Bush to reject a reported proposal to send another 20,000 to 40,000 troops to bolster the force of 140,000 already deployed in Iraq.

Top Democrats have called the idea a strategy "that has already failed," and Wilson said quelling sectarian violence in the war-ravaged nation is a task best left to the Iraqis.

"I am not a supporter of a surge to do for the Iraqis what the Iraqis will not do for themselves," Wilson said.

"I also have not seen a clarity of mission, and I think that's the greatest weakness that we have right now."

Wilson's remarks came as the U.S. military announced that Iraqi special forces caught four suspected leaders of a terrorist cell during a raid in Baghdad's Sadr City. Three other suspects were detained for questioning.

The men are suspected of being involved in the kidnapping and murder of civilians, the military said.

"They are also suspected of organizing and directing sectarian-based mortar attacks on neighborhoods surrounding Sadr City," a military statement said.

Sadr City is a stronghold of the Mehdi Army, a Shiite militia led by radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.Execution backlash

A day after Bush said he wished Saddam Hussein's execution had "gone in a more dignified way," violent protests erupted in India and Indian-controlled Kashmir over the Iraqi leader's hanging.

Like Bush, the protesters objected to the release of a cell phone video showing Shiite guards taunting the Sunni dictator before his death.

The protests, which have been going on for four days in India's only majority Muslim state, prompted police in Srinagar to use tear gas and batons to control the crowd. Muslim protesters pelted police and troops with heavy stones after Friday prayers.

The protesters also chanted anti-American slogans and torched effigies of Bush.

In the northern town of Agra, home to the Taj Mahal, two men were arrested for allegedly hurling stones at tourists Friday. It was at least the second such incident since Saddam's execution, police said.

U.S. tourist Karen Maini said she "was in great danger" after a man threw a brick at her car while she was stuck in traffic in Agra.

"It was so loud and noisy and scary," she said of the protest. "My driver saved my life." (Watch how the Iraqi government is reacting to footage of Hussein's execution)Other developments

• Police found 12 bodies, most showing signs of torture, strewn across Baghdad on Friday.

• The driver for Iraqi Minister of Agriculture Yaarub Nadhim al-Aboudi was shot to death Friday in the Dora district of southern Baghdad, an Interior Ministry source said. Al-Aboudi is one of al-Sadr's followers.

• Mortar rounds fell in residential areas of eastern and western Baghdad, killing four people and wounding 16. Four civilians were wounded after mortar rounds landed in the city's al-Amil neighborhood, and four people were killed and another 12 wounded when mortar rounds struck a market and apartment complex in Zafaraniya.

• Unidentified gunmen attacked police officers in western Baghdad's Adel neighborhood, killing one and wounding another.

Army Asks Dead To Sign Up For Another Hitch (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Army said Friday it would apologize to the families of about 275 officers killed or wounded in action who were mistakenly sent letters urging them to return to active duty.

The letters were sent a few days after Christmas to more than 5,100 Army officers who had recently left the service. Included were letters to about 75 officers killed in action and about 200 wounded in action.

"Army personnel officials are contacting those officers' families now to personally apologize for erroneously sending the letters," the Army said in a brief news release issued Friday night.

The Army did not say how or when the mistake was discovered. It said the database normally used for such correspondence with former officers had been "thoroughly reviewed" to remove the names of wounded or dead soldiers.

"But an earlier list was used inadvertently for the December mailings," the Army statement said, adding that the Army is apologizing to those officers and families affected and "regrets any confusion."

How Do You Repay A Hero's Sacrifice? (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

EUREKA, Calif. -- Kelly Miller has the dream once or twice a week.

He's on patrol in Iraq, searching a white Toyota Land Cruiser. The driver lunges out and grabs Cpl. Miller's squad leader, Jason Dunham, around the neck. The Iraqi and Cpl. Dunham tumble to the ground in a ferocious hand-to-hand struggle. Cpl. Miller beats the insurgent with a police baton. Another Marine races over to help. The Iraqi drops a hand grenade.

The force of the explosion lifts Cpl. Dunham into the air, his back arching before he falls back toward the brown-dirt road.

Cpl. Miller wakes up.

Almost three years have passed since that grenade exploded for real. But the images are never far from his mind -- the insurgent, the explosion and the friend who intentionally took the brunt of a live grenade and gave his own life to save Cpl. Miller's. The adrenalin of combat, the pain of hot shrapnel, the guilt of making it home alive.

At the White House on Thursday, President Bush will present Cpl. Dunham's parents with the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest award for military valor, the first such award for a Marine since Vietnam. The ceremony will enshrine Jason Dunham for posterity as one who loved his brothers more than himself.

In the audience will sit Cpl. Miller, a 23-year-old still struggling with what it means to receive that much love.

When American forces rolled into Baghdad in April 2003, Kelly Miller was living with his parents in Eureka in their modest shingled home, within sight of the smoky columns rising from the local paper mill. His mom, Linda, was an energetic doctor's-office manager with practical short hair. His dad, Charlie, was a quiet man who delivered mail for 31 years, then retired to care for his grandchildren.

Kelly Miller, sandy-brown-haired and six-foot-one, spent his days with friends, fishing for crabs and racing his car by the beach. On weekends he managed the night crew at the local supermarket.

But the news from Iraq made him wonder about his own courage. How would he perform in combat? One morning after his shift ended, he walked into the Marine recruiter's office at the strip mall and enlisted in the infantry.

DOJ_NMG_0113753

So just after noon on April 14, 2004, he found himself a grunt in the Fourth Platoon of Kilo Co., Third Battalion, Seventh Marines -- and Cpl. Dunham's point man on a patrol through a trash-strewn Iraqi neighborhood near Karabilah, on the Syrian border.

HE WAS STILL what the Marines called a boot, a private first class fresh out of boot camp. Many senior enlisted men made life miserable for the boots. But Cpl. Dunham was different. When the boots had to fill sand bags in the hot sun, Cpl. Dunham filled sand bags beside them. Cpl. Miller and other boots loved him for it.

The insurgents had already gotten the jump on the patrol that day, firing a rocket-propelled grenade at the squad's Humvees. The grenade had missed its mark, and Cpl. Dunham's men climbed out of the vehicles to hunt down the shooter.

As point man, it was Cpl. Miller's job to spot roadside bombs and ambushes before it was too late. The responsibility weighed on him as he moved carefully past stone walls and silent, half-built homes. He worried that any mistake would get his friends killed.

The patrol stopped to search a line of vehicles that seemed to be fleeing. Cpl. Miller and Cpl. Dunham approached the white Land Cruiser, where Cpl. Miller saw a rifle poking out from under the rear floor mat. He looked up just in time to see the driver attack Cpl. Dunham.

The insurgent's hand grenade sprayed Cpl. Miller and Cpl. Bill Hampton, the other Marine who rushed to Cpl. Dunham's aid, with jagged pieces of metal. Cpl. Miller heard a ringing in his head, the echoes of a burst ear drum. His face flushed hot, and his mouth tasted of blood. A red stream dripped off his left hand, and he was confused to find that he couldn't pick up his rifle. Pieces of shrapnel burned in his face and arms.

"My mom is going to be … pissed," he told another Marine as he wandered away from the scene, according to both men.

Despite the shrapnel that peppered Cpl. Hampton, he, too, was able to stagger away. But Cpl. Dunham lay still, a fragment embedded deep in his brain. He would die eight days later at a Naval hospital in Bethesda, Md., with his parents at his bedside.

Cpl. Dunham's commanders soon figured out that he had placed his helmet over the grenade to protect his friends, an act of bravery described in a front-page story in The Wall Street Journal on May 25, 2004.

The Marines sent Cpl. Miller to recuperate in Eureka, where he became withdrawn and quick to anger. He couldn't get it out of his head that, as point man, he was supposed to protect the Marines behind him. He was the first one to get to Cpl. Dunham's side, but instead of saving Jason, Jason saved him.

He had a tattoo artist ink a helmet-and-rifle memorial honoring Cpl. Dunham on his right arm with the words: Remember the Fallen 4-14-04. When he was well enough to play softball, Cpl. Miller taped his wrist to give him strength to swing the bat and wrote "Cpl. J.D. USMC" on the wrap.

"Mom, goddammit," he told Mrs. Miller after a couple of beers one night, "I should have done more to save Jason."

MORE ABOUT CPL. DUNHAM

• Page One: In Combat, Marine Put Theory to Test, Comrades Believe4

5/25/04

Mrs. Miller, now 59, became long-distance friends with Cpl. Dunham's mom, Deb, a 46-year-old with shoulder-length red hair. Mrs. Dunham taught home economics at the only school in tiny Scio, N.Y., patiently coaching students in such survival skills as child-care and bachelors' cooking. At home she baked pies, made fudge and did battle with three dogs.

When she first dated Dan Dunham, a farmhand, the locals thought them an unlikely pair. She was a self-described good girl; he took pride in being a hard-drinking bad boy who gave the local police headaches. He had already been married once and was raising two young boys, Jason and Justin, on his own on $600 a month. She fell in love as much with the boys as she did with Dan, and ever after raised them as her own. The Dunhams had two more children together. For years, Mrs. Dunham couldn't rest until she knew all four children were safe in their beds.

Mrs. Dunham wasn't surprised that Jason had given his own life for his friends; she would have been surprised if he had done anything else under the circumstances. In a letter to Cpl. Hampton's mother, Mrs. Dunham wrote: "When you next get a chance to hug your son please give him one from me. He does not need to know it is from me, but I would appreciate if you would do that for me."

Far from begrudging Cpls. Miller and Hampton their survival, Mrs. Dunham felt that their lives added meaning to her own son's death. Soon Deb Dunham and Linda Miller began referring to Cpl. Miller as "our son."

"We believe that Kelly and William are both very special," Mrs. Dunham wrote to Mrs. Miller. "I do not know what is in their futures but I (we) firmly believe that Jason did what he had to do and they have some important purpose here and he has his to do in Heaven."

But for months Cpl. Miller couldn't get himself to talk to Jason's parents. When they finally met at the Marines' desert base in Twentynine Palms, Calif., Cpl. Miller spoke with them for 15 awkward minutes, unsure whether to thank them or apologize.

DOJ_NMG_0113754

AS HE REGAINED STRENGTH and sensation in his arms, Cpl. Miller returned to Twentynine Palms obsessed with trying to rejoin his old platoon mates before they shipped out for their next tour of Iraq in the second half of 2005. It troubled him that his friends had finished their full seven months in the combat zone, while he had not.

Cpl. Miller's commander allowed him to resume light duty as Kilo Co.'s clerk, but even in Iraq that would be a rear-echelon job without the camaraderie of the front lines. So several times a day Cpl. Miller pestered the captain to allow him to rejoin Fourth Platoon as a rifleman, doing five quick pull-ups outside the office for emphasis.

The captain would allow Cpl. Miller back into a rifle platoon only with permission from his surgeon, his physical therapist, the battalion medical officer and his mother. Cpl. Miller collected the letters, including one from a very reluctant Mrs. Miller.

In March 2005, the captain cleared him to rejoin Fourth Platoon, and Cpl. Miller traveled home to Eureka to break the news. Mrs. Miller was in her room, folding clothes on the bed, when he told her that he would soon return to Iraq.

"Why do you feel you need to go back?" she asked him. "You don't have to."

"I have to finish something I started the first time," Cpl. Miller told her. He left the room, returning a few minutes later. "I have to go and finish what Dunham started, and bring my guys home," he said.

SOON ENOUGH, Cpl. Miller found himself in Ramadi, the most hostile city in the Sunni Triangle, for what proved to be months of grueling cat-and-mouse games with the insurgents. The Marines of Kilo Co. hid in abandoned buildings to ambush bomb makers. They manned an isolated, bomb-gutted outpost that was a frequent target for mortar and rocket attacks. They watched as Iraqis in civilian clothes casually dropped explosives on the main road through the city.

On three occasions Cpl. Miller called home from Iraq to report that he had been hurt. Once he injured his ankle playing basketball on base. Another time he stepped into a hole while on patrol. And another, his Humvee was destroyed by a roadside bomb. Each time he called, Mrs. Miller would report back to Mrs. Dunham, and they would fret together.

After he returned from Ramadi, Cpl. Miller decided he had had enough of the Marine Corps, and on his Web page he put a clock that counted down to the end of his enlistment in June, 2007. When the clock hit zero, he hoped to join his older brother as a sheriff's deputy back home in Eureka. He liked the idea of uniformed service, but without the long overseas deployments that made it hard to raise a family as a Marine.

Over the years, Cpl. Miller grew more comfortable around the Dunhams, and made a habit of calling Mrs. Dunham on holidays, such as Christmas and Mother's Day, when he knew that Jason would have called. They'd chat about his dating life and the doings of the Dunham family. He had long talks with Jason's younger brother and sister. Mrs. Dunham noticed the brotherly, teasing tone of their conversations, as if Kelly were trying to fill the gap left by Jason. He talked to Kyle, then 15, about the pros and cons of enlisting in the Marines, reminding him that going to college first would give him more options in life. Enlisting meant a four-year contract.

One night last summer, Mrs. Dunham hit a low spot, home alone and desperate to talk to Jason. In tears she phoned Cpl. Miller. He had friends over, but kept her talking until she was laughing again.

On his Web page, Cpl. Miller wrote, "Who I'd like to meet: The most Honorable Man I have ever had the privilege of meeting: Cpl. Jason Dunham. To have a chance to talk to him one more time would be priceless."

At the same time, Mrs. Miller felt that her son's personality had darkened. Her Kelly had been such a happy-go-lucky kid; now he seemed at ease only with other Marines or with two Eureka friends who served in the Army. His voice-mail message was a droning monotone: "You've reached Kelly. Whatever."

On his Web page, he posted a photo of himself in Ramadi, aiming a rifle at the photographer. He described his Nissan sports car and wrote: "I love to pitch it sideways or scream through a windy mountain pass."

One weekend last September, Cpl. Miller left base and drove to Eureka to see his girlfriend, Kellyn Griffin, a 21-year-old junior at Humboldt State University. On Saturday night, they went to the apartment of one of his Army buddies to play a movie-trivia game. Ms. Griffin drank rum and Cokes. Cpl. Miller drank Maker's Mark bourbon. They left just after midnight.

Cpl. Miller made it about a mile before he lost control of the Nissan and flipped it over at a "high rate of speed," according to the police report. The car took to the air, sheared off a wooden utility pole 20 feet above the street and came to a rest on the driver's side, crunched up like a paper napkin after a dinner party.

Ms. Griffin was found in a pool of blood fifty feet away from the Nissan, with a broken arm, a lacerated liver and a concussion that dulled her thinking for days.

Police found Cpl. Miller walking in circles in a nearby parking lot. When a state trooper interviewed him, the corporal volunteered that he "(messed) up and am screwed for drunk driving" and said he had to take responsibility for his mistake, according to the police report. The officer arrested him at 2 a.m. after a test that police say revealed a blood-alcohol level above the legal limit.

DOJ_NMG_0113755

The crash broke Cpl. Miller's nose, a front tooth and his left shoulder blade and socket. At the hospital, Cpl. Miller was frantic for news of Ms. Griffin. Blood still covering his face, he found her hospital bed, felt his head spin and stumbled out of the room.

Cpl. Miller was released a few hours later. That night Mrs. Miller called Cpl. Dunham's mom. "Well, our boy did it," Mrs. Miller said.

A few days later, Mrs. Dunham called back and laid into Cpl. Miller. "You need to stop, Kelly," she recalls saying. "You need to learn to like yourself because Jason gave you a gift. Your mom and I can't lose anybody else."

"I know," he said. "I'm sorry."

"Whether you do something spectacular or not, you still haven't completed your purpose in this life," she continued. "Whether it's you or your child or your great-great-grandchild who does something phenomenal, you have a purpose here, and your destiny isn't done yet."

Cpl. Miller was on heavy painkillers at the time and soon forgot the details of the conversation. But later he remembered how angry Jason's mother had been, and how ashamed he had felt.

The police charged Cpl. Miller with two drunk-driving felonies that carry a maximum combined penalty of six years in prison. A felony conviction would kill any chance of joining the sheriff's department.

Shortly after doctors removed the staples closing the wound on her back, Ms. Griffin and Cpl. Miller lay in bed in his childhood room. "I feel really bad, because in essence someone gave his life for me, and then I turned around and instead of making use of it, I quite possibly put it to waste," he told her.

Near the bed was a photo of Cpl. Miller in his dress blues and Purple Heart medal, a reminder of Cpl. Dunham's sacrifice. "I have to do good by more people and live up to the potential of both of us," Cpl. Miller told her.

THE CORPORAL'S FELLOW GRUNTS have rallied to his side. When Maj. Trent Gibson, commander of Kilo Co. when Cpl. Dunham was killed, heard about the car accident, he felt he had let Cpl. Miller down. Even though the major had changed jobs in the Marine Corps, he knew that Kelly had been having nightmares about the grenade attack. He knew Kelly had been getting reckless.

He wished he had said something earlier. Now, he emailed his men:

Kilo Brothers,

For those of you who haven't heard, Cpl Miller had another near-death experience this last Sunday. He's goddamned lucky. Let's all give him a phone call...or shoot him an email...and let him know that we care about him and that he's got to keep his head on straight if he's going to make good on the gift that Cpl Dunham gave him....

Semper Kilo.

Marines who had served under Cpl. Miller in Ramadi sent letters and emails to the judge who would hear his case. "This Marine has only to begin his life," wrote LCpl.Robert B. Bullard. "To rob him of what he has done for me, my platoon, and country would not only be morally incorrect but a criminal act against a mistake."

Mrs. Dunham wrote a lengthy letter telling the judge how Cpl. Miller had rushed to her son's side that day in Iraq. She described how he had since stepped in as a surrogate brother to her youngest children.

She also described how Kelly "has been chasing his personal demons" since Jason sacrificed himself. "I wish you would consider that Kelly is an honorable young man who volunteered to serve and protect those weaker than himself," she wrote.

On Nov. 10, at the opening of the Marine Corps museum in Quantico, Va., President Bush announced his decision to award Cpl. Dunham the Medal of Honor. Leaving the ceremony, Mrs. Dunham talked about the legacy of her son's death. "I'm worried about Kelly," she said. "It's a gift. Strings aren't attached to it. Guilt shouldn't be attached to it. They should just do the best they can with their lives."

The Dunhams have invited dozens of Kilo Co. Marines to Thursday's Medal of Honor presentation in the East Room of the White House. The award, they say, isn't just for their son; it's for all of the young men who served beside him.

Two weeks later, Cpl. Miller is due back in court . His lawyer is trying to persuade the judge and prosecutor to reduce the felony charges to misdemeanors, which would probably allow the corporal to avoid prison. If they agree, and he keeps his record clean for a few years, he could still apply to be a sheriff's deputy.

On his Web page Cpl. Miller writes: "I can't wait for the time to come for a new chapter in my life."

With Each Fallen Soldier, A Field Of Flags Grows (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113756

MIDDLE GROVE, N.Y., Jan. 4 — The flags are cut from rolls of yellow plastic tablecloth, then woven onto thin wire rods. Each is about as long as a man's size 7 shoe, as wide as an outstretched hand.

They stand on a sloped corner field framed by a row of conifer trees in this upstate hamlet, spreading in concentric circles like ripples on still water.

From afar, the flags look like clumsily painted dots, an amateur installation of elusive meaning. A closer look yields a clue: a laminated sign with bold black numbers that match the number of flags on the field, numbers that climb almost by the day.

On Sunday, there were 3,000 yellow flags on the ground. By Thursday, five more.

"Just imagine if instead of flags, there were soldiers standing here," Caren Crootof said as she walked across the field, replacing flags torn or toppled by rain and wind.

Mrs. Crootof, 54, makes the flags, cutting the plastic with scissors at her kitchen table. She plants them most mornings before going to work as a midwife, on the one-acre plot next to the 19th-century farmhouse where she and her husband raised three children. First, she checks a Web site that provides a daily tally of the number of American soldiers killed in the war in Iraq. Then she takes to the field, updates the sign and plants the flags.

It started in July 2004, with 877 flags.

"We all grieved the losses of 9/11, we all shared the pain of those families that lost loved ones in the attacks," Mrs. Crootof said. "But here we were, losing all this potential, losing heroes who threw their bodies on grenades to save other troops, and I felt that we, as a nation, were doing so little to acknowledge them.

"I just felt compelled to do something," she added, "and this is what I could do."

The field of flags is at once poignant and terrifying, plain yet powerful for those who have taken notice in this out-of-the-way town of 2,300 in northeastern New York State. The Crootofs' field sits at the end of Middle Line Road, which slices through a landscape of rolling hills, silos and grazing cattle. It is just off Route 29, next door to Saratoga Springs.

One recent morning, a truck driver passing by flashed a thumbs-up sign to Mrs. Crootof, who stood in the field like a dark speck on a yellow-gold sea. A few minutes later, a van rolled past the field and its driver honked twice as he steered around the bend.

Just as the van disappeared, Bruce Houser pulled up in a sport utility vehicle and snapped a picture. He first spotted the flags some months ago, while traveling the road on business, but drove back this week, 30 miles from his home in Speigletown, to mark the milestone of 3,000 dead soldiers.

"These flags here, they're a stark reminder of what the war really means," Mr. Houser said.

Ankie Meuwissen, 30, who lives opposite Mrs. Crootof, said people often stopped and stared for a moment — mothers with children in tow, working men, couples young and old.

"I don't know if wonderful is the most appropriate word to describe it," Ms. Meuwissen said, "but it's nice that somebody is doing something to remind us what we're giving up in this war."

Last Memorial Day, Mrs. Crootof's daughter, Rebecca, 25, heard taps being played as she was eating breakfast on the sun porch. She stepped outside to find a man playing the piece on a trumpet while standing atop a knoll overlooking the field.

What started as a simple exercise in remembrance has become a vast daily vigil for Mrs. Crootof, a self-professed leftist who has taken part in boisterous antiwar protests in New York City and more subdued ones among her neighbors here.

She abhors the war, but sees the flags as nothing more than a heartfelt way of honoring the troops and sharing the grief of their families.

It is a laborious, tedious task of bending, of burying the rods in the ground. Mrs. Crootof often has help — from her children, who come home during college breaks; from her aging parents, who live nearby; from friends and strangers.

Her husband, Mark, a veterinarian, and their son, Aaron, 18, mow the field in the warm months to keep the wild grass from obscuring the flags; a local 4-H club has offered to take on that task come spring. In the summer of 2005, nine girls from Girl Scout Troop 299 in Ballston Lake, about 15 miles to the south, made 100 flags to replace tattered ones.

"The thing is, we all tend to just go along with our everyday life and forget what's going on in Iraq," said Suzanne DeVito, the troop leader at the time. "But when you look at this field and when you step on it and you walk around it, the war becomes very real because you remember that it's not about bombs and tanks. It's about people like you and I."

White Small-town America Pays Highest price For Going To War (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113757

Every night at the end of Jim Lehrer's NewsHour on America's PBS channel, there is a roll call of American soldiers who died in Iraq that day. Apart from their tragic fates, most of the dead have something else in common: they come from places of which few people have heard.

Obscure towns such as Hollidaysburg, Pennsylvania, Wolfeboro Falls, New Hampshire and Thermopolis, Wyoming, dominate the listings rather than the big cities.

"It is like watching a different reality," says Larry Wilkerson, a former colonel who was chief of staff to Colin Powell. "Nothing could better illustrate the alienation of America's armed forces from the college-going Americans for whom the Iraq war has meant tax cuts, SUVs and nice holidays."

During the week since the 3,000th American soldier was killed in Iraq - by a roadside bomb in Baghdad - Washington's attention has turned to speculation over President George W. Bush's reported plans to order a "surge" of US troops to Iraq.

What is often missing from America's increasingly recriminatory debate on Iraq is how isolated the communities are that bear most of the human cost. The Pentagon does not disclose the socio-economic background of the 25,000 US soldiers who have been killed or wounded in Iraq. But a breakdown of their ethnicity and states of origins shows they are overwhelmingly white and from small towns in the interior states of mid-America and the south.

For example, the ratio of dead in relation to the state's share of the national population is 221 per cent for South Dakota, 178 per cent for Nebraska and 163 per cent for Louisiana.

In contrast, the District of Columbia, which is home to Washington, the US capital, has a ratio of just 52 per cent, while Connecticut is 66 per cent and New Jersey is 60 per cent.

Charles Moskos, a military sociologist at Northwestern University, says the divorce between the social origins of most US army personnel and the character of the population as a whole is greater than ever. When he attended Princeton as a student in the late 1950s, 400 out of his class of 750 had served in uniform. Last year only nine of Princeton's class of 1,100 had been in the armed services, he says.

Even during the Vietnam war, when the well-connected, such as Mr Bush and Dick Cheney, his vice-president, were able to avoid combat in spite of a national enlistment lottery or,like Bill Clinton, dodge the draft altogether, America's middle classes were better represented.

"There is a myth that Americans respect people who have served in combat," says Mr Moskos. "But if you look at the last four presidential elections, it is the draft dodger who has been elected to the White House. They might hate to admit it, but middle-class Americans identify with the draft dodger."

As the war continues, the US military is finding it ever harder to meet enlistment targets. Spending on recruitment has risen several times to more than $1bn (€769m, £518m) in the past 12 months. Standards have been lowered too. The army is now enlisting recruits aged 40, paying recruitment bonuses of up to $40,000 and has lowered the mental threshold to "category three", which, according to Mr Wilkerson, is "one level above imbecility".

Some, including Charlie Rangel, a Democratic representative from Harlem, have even argued for a reinstatement of the draft to make recruitment fairer. Others argue for much larger incentives for graduates to enlist.

Cindy Sheehan, the celebrity anti-war activist whose son Casey was killed in Baghdad in 2004, says she is receiving a huge volume of e-mails from mothers worried their sons should not sign up. "People are joining the military for economic reasons," says Mrs Sheehan, who is from Vacaville, California. "I call it the poverty draft."

However, according to a poll by the Military Times this week, serving US soldiers are not yet fully disenchanted: 72 per cent said they would support their son or daughter if they wished to enlist.

But their opinions on Iraq offer little comfort to Mr Bush as he contemplates whether to increase the number of soldiers in harm's way.

Almost half the soldiers polled said the Iraq war bore no relation to the "war on terrorism" - a key justification for continued fighting. And only 13 per cent said the US was "very likely to succeed" in Iraq.

Chirac Says Time Proves France Was Right To Resist War (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 5 — In a scathing attack of the American-led war in Iraq, President Jacques Chirac said Friday that his predictions that the war would spread chaos and more terrorism had come true.

“As France had foreseen and feared, the war in Iraq has sparked upheavals that have yet to show their full effects,” Mr. Chirac said in his New Year’s address at Élysée Palace to the foreign diplomatic corps.

DOJ_NMG_0113758

"This adventure has worsened the divisions among communities and threatened the very integrity of Iraq," he said. "It has undermined the stability of the entire region, where every country now fears for its security and its independence. It has offered terrorism a new field for expansion."

As President Bush prepares to unveil next week a new military strategy in Iraq, Mr. Chirac added that "the priority, more than ever, is to restore full sovereignty to the Iraqi people."

The single paragraph on Iraq in a speech that addressed many crises and problems around the world was one of Mr. Chirac's most pointed justifications for France's decision to oppose the invasion of Iraq in 2003.

In a sense, the attack was surprising. France's opposition to the war set off a crisis in French-American relations that has since eased, thanks to close cooperation between the United States and France to resolve the summer's Israeli-Hezbollah war and to curb Iran's nuclear program.

As the violence and chaos in Iraq steadily worsened, despite the presence of American troops, the 74-year-old French president tended to avoid reminding the United States of its failures there.

After Mr. Bush's re-election, for example, Mr. Chirac sent him a handwritten "Cher George" letter of congratulations. He also gave a speech expressing hope that 2005 would be a year of "trust" with Mr. Bush, and congratulated him again after elections took place in Iraq.

In Mr. Chirac's last speech to the foreign diplomatic corps, a year ago, he expressed hope that Iraqi elections would help unify Iraqis.

But as Mr. Chirac seems unlikely to run for a third term in presidential elections this spring, he may feel he has little to lose in being blunt in defending what some French political analysts call the high point of his foreign policy in his 12-year presidency.

In Friday's speech, Mr. Chirac also attacked "the pitfalls of unilateralism," a veiled criticism of the Bush administration for going to war in Iraq without the backing of the United Nations Security Council.

He repeated his approval of the emergence of a "multipolar world" as countries like China, India and Brazil assume "the status of global powers." The term enrages the Bush administration because it seems to envision a power that competes with American interests and influence.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Appeals Court Reverses Convictions Of 2 Westar Energy Executives (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 6, 2007

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Jan. 4 (AP) — An appeals court on Friday overturned convictions against two former executives of Westar Energy who were accused of "looting" the Kansas utility and said the most serious charges cannot be retried.

The United States Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit said the case against the former chief executive, David Wittig, and the former chief strategy officer, Douglas Lake, "hung by a thin legal thread," based on claims that the men tried to hide their personal use of corporate aircraft from securities officials.

Those claims led jurors in September 2005 to convict Mr. Wittig on 39 counts of conspiracy, wire fraud, money laundering and circumventing of internal controls, and to convict Mr. Lake on 30 counts. Mr. Wittig was sentenced in April 2006 to 18 years; Mr. Lake received 15 years.

But the three-judge panel said prosecutors did not provide evidence that the two men failed to comply with federal regulations.

Without that evidence, the court said, Mr. Wittig and Mr. Lake are not guilty of wire fraud and cannot be retried on those counts. In addition, the panel threw out the money laundering counts, which were based on the wire fraud, and said those cannot be retried. The court sent back the remaining conspiracy and circumvention counts for trial.

The decision was a blow to federal prosecutors, who have now failed twice to convict the two men. Their first trial ended in a mistrial.

Ex-Merrill Lynch Analyst Sentenced In Insider Trading Scheme (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113759

(AP) - NEW YORK-A former analyst at Merrill Lynch & Co. Inc. who pleaded guilty to insider trading was sentenced Friday to 37 months in prison for his part in a sprawling scheme that used chatty investment bankers and leaked copies of a market-moving magazine.

Stanislav Shpigelman, 24, had admitted tipping other participants who made more than $6.7 million (â‚¬5.1 million) from October 2004 to August 2005. At the time, he worked in Merrill Lynch's mergers and acquisitions division.

In a plea deal he signed with prosecutors, Shpigelman admitted to a single count of conspiracy to commit insider trading in return for a recommendation that he serve between three and four years in prison.

His lawyer, Mary Mulligan, and family members asked U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Karas to sentence Shpigelman to less than three years in prison.

Karas, though, called Shpigelman the "critical component" in a scheme that could make others millions of dollars, though Shpigelman conceded receiving only $10,000 (â‚¬7,643) for providing tips to several mergers and acquisitions.

The judge noted that Shpigelman sometimes sought out secret information about deals from others at his company and did so repeatedly.

"It is unfortunately a classic insider trading scheme," Karas said.

The case originated after regulators noticed unusually high trading volume before a merger announcement and discovered that a 63-year-old retired seamstress in Croatia - the aunt of one of the defendants - had made more than $2 million (â‚¬1.5 million).

Investigators soon realized they had found a beehive of inside trading activity that seemed to rely on any method its participants could dream up. At one point, they even discussed getting exotic dancers to coax stock secrets from investment bankers, the government said.

The case also resulted in the arrests of a Milwaukee forklift operator who allegedly obtained early copies of a market-moving column in BusinessWeek magazine and a New Jersey grand juror who supposedly fed the conspiracy secrets about an accounting fraud probe.

But at the heart of the scandal was David Pajcin, a former Goldman Sachs Group Inc. analyst who is cooperating with the government, prosecutors said.

Prosecutors say Pajcin and Eugene Plotkin, 26, a Harvard-trained former Goldman Sachs analyst who has pleaded not guilty to charges in the case, made more than $6.7 million (â‚¬5.1 million) through inside trades. Plotkin is awaiting trial.

Investigators said Plotkin introduced Pajcin to Shpigelman in November 2004 at a Russian day spa and sauna in Manhattan.

The forklift operator, Nickolaus Shuster, 25, has pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit insider trading and awaits sentencing.

BANKER SLAMMED (NYPOST)

By Janet Whitman

The New York Post, January 6, 2007

January 6, 2007 -- A former junior banker at Merrill Lynch was sentenced yesterday to three years and a month behind bars for leaking secret details on pending mergers to the ringleaders of an audacious scheme that also ensnared a stripper, a retired Croatian seamstress, spies in a Business Week print shop and a New Jersey mailman.

Stanislav Shpigelman, 24, pleaded guilty to the insider-trading charges in July, admitting that he passed on confidential information on deals, such as Reebok's acquisition by Adidas, to the scam's two masterminds, who racked up $6.4 million in ill-gotten gains by trading on the tips.

"I realize my actions are inexcusable," Shpigelman told a Manhattan courtroom yesterday, as his parents, sister, other family members and friends sat behind him. "I should have walked away from the situation, but I didn't have the strength."

The promising young investment banker, who lives with his parents in Sheepshead Bay, Brooklyn, has been working for a moving company.

His family begged the judge for leniency.

"I know my son," his mother, Jane, told U.S. District Judge Kenneth Karas. "I am afraid the stress of prison may break him."

Judge Karas said he imposed the jail term with a "heavy heart" because Shpigelman had one of the most supportive families he had ever come across.

But the judge added that the stiff sentence was necessary to send a strong signal to other young bankers on Wall Street.

Shpigelman has asked to do his time at the Otisville Federal Correctional Institution in Otisville, N.Y., or the Schuylkill Federal Correctional Institution in Minersville, Pa.

The plot's architects, former Goldman Sachs bankers Eugene Plotkin and David Pajcin, recruited Shpigelman in November 2004 at a Russian bathhouse in lower Manhattan called Spa 88.

Shpigelman, who had earlier got help from Plotkin in securing an internship at Merrill, said he felt pressured to cooperate. He netted less than $12,000 for providing inside info on six pending mergers.

Investigators were tipped off to the trading ring in late 2005, when the FBI got word of a suspicious trade ahead of news that Reebok was being acquired.

A retired underwear seamstress in Croatia bought $130,000 worth of Reebok options, a trade that turned into a $2 million profit in only two days.

The seamstress turned out to be the aunt of Pajcin, who controlled her account from New Jersey.

Investigators later learned of other plots hatched by Plotkin, 27, and Pajcin, 29, including the planting of forklift operator moles inside a BusinessWeek print shop to steal prepublication copies.

Pajcin also persuaded his friend, former New Jersey mailman Jason Smith, to divulge secret information while he served on a grand jury. Smith got a sentence of two years and nine months in prison.

Plotkin, who has pleaded not guilty, is out on bail awaiting trial. Pajcin is in a Brooklyn jail and is cooperating with investigators.

Shpigelman must report to prison on March 9.

janet.whitman@nypost.com

Jail For Merrill Analyst In Insider Trading Scam (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, January 6, 2007

The inside man in a $6.7 million Wall Street trading scam that envisioned using strippers to pry stock tips from drunken bankers was sentenced yesterday to three years and a month in prison.

"My actions were foolish and I regret considerably what I have done," Stanislav Shpigelman told Manhattan Federal Judge Kenneth Karas.

Karas called the Brooklyn-reared Merrill Lynch investment analyst a "classic overachiever," but said prison time was necessary to deter others from trying the same thing.

Shpigelman, 24, leaked details of several pending deals, including the 2005 merger of Adidas and Reebok, to accomplices who traded on the information.

Shpigelman met co-conspirator Eugene Plotkin, a Harvard grad, at a Russian day spa in the financial district where they traded stock tips between steams, prosecutors said. In November 2004, Plotkin introduced him to David Pajcin, and Shpigelman promptly filled him in on the pending merger between Procter & Gamble and Gillette, the feds said.

Shpigelman, a SUNY-Binghamton alum whose family lives in Sheepshead Bay, got just $10,000 for his role in the scheme.

The defendants hoped to employ strippers to glean stock tips from bankers over drinks, but that plan never materialized. They did, however, get advance copies of a popular Business Week stock tips column by getting an associate a job as a forklift operator at the Wisconsin plant where the magazine is printed.

Plotkin goes on trial in April. Pajcin is cooperating with the feds.

"Shpigelman did this for the oldest reason in the book," prosecutor Benjamin Lawsky said. "Greed and the desire to make bundles and bundles of money."

But Shpigelman's lawyer, Mary Mulligan, said greed was not a factor for a client who still lives with his parents in the same bedroom he had in high school.

"He sits before you a humble, repentant man," she said, noting that he now works for a moving company and does charity work.

Ex-Merrill Analyst Gets 37 Months In Insider Case (Update4) (BLOOM)

By David Glovin

Bloomberg, January 6, 2007

Jan. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Former Merrill Lynch & Co. analyst Stanislav Shpigelman was sentenced to 37 months in prison for leaking secret information on a pending deal, the first analyst jailed in the million-dollar insider-trading scheme.

Shpigelman, 24, a former analyst in Merrill's mergers-and- acquisitions division, told U.S. District Judge Kenneth Karas today he was ``sorry'' for giving secret information about pending mergers to two junior employees at Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Eugene Plotkin and David Pajcin, who allegedly bought shares in companies targeted for takeover.

``I realize what I've done is inexcusable," Shpigelman said in Manhattan federal court. ``I do beg for leniency."

Today's sentencing is the second in a case that has led to criminal charges against Plotkin, Pajcin and others. Last month Jason Smith, a former mailman in New Jersey, was sentenced to 33 months in prison for leaking secret information from a grand jury he served on to Plotkin and Pajcin to use in insider trading.

Shpigelman was a ``mole inside Merrill Lynch," Assistant U.S. Attorney Benjamin Lawsky told Karas. ``On any one of these deals, a savvy trader could make millions of dollars." New York-based Merrill fired Shpigelman after the scheme came to light.

Shpigelman, who lives in Brooklyn, New York, faced from 37 to 46 months in prison under federal sentencing guidelines.

Secret Information

Prosecutors said Shpigelman leaked secret information on six pending transactions in 2004 and 2005, including Procter & Gamble Co.'s $61 billion purchase of Gillette Co. Shpigelman admitted in his guilty plea in July that he tipped the others about a single deal, Adidas-Salomon AG's $3.67 billion purchase of Reebok International.

Shpigelman was a student at the State University of New York at Binghamton when he befriended Plotkin, who helped him prepare for Wall Street job interviews, prosecutors said. Plotkin and Pajcin, a 2000 University of Notre Dame economics graduate, met at Goldman.

Shpigelman worked as a summer intern at Merrill from 2000 to 2002 before graduating with a degree in business management in 2004, the Securities and Exchange Commission said in April in a related civil suit.

Plotkin and Pajcin, who is now cooperating with prosecutors, recruited Shpigelman for the insider-trading scheme in a meeting at Club 88, a Manhattan day spa and Russian sauna, the SEC said. Prosecutors said Plotkin and others tried to recruit sources at other investment banks to leak them information.

`Bundles of Money'

Lawsky disputed Shpigelman's claim that he was ``pressured" to leak information that helped others earn at least $2.5 million in illegal profits. ``Mr. Shpigelman did this for the oldest reason in the book -- greed -- and his desire to make bundles and bundles of money," Lawsky said.

Karas called Shpigelman an ``overachiever" who became a ``critical component" in a ``classic insider-trading case." Karas said he wanted the sentence to send a stern message to Wall Street.

``This is the kind of case that comes along that people talk about," Karas said.

Defense attorney Mary Mulligan said the safe-deposit box Shpigelman opened soon after the scheme began was for his poker winnings, a claim Karas rejected.

``Greed was not his motivation," Mulligan said of Shpigelman, who now works for a moving company and must report to prison on March 9. Mulligan asked unsuccessfully that her client be allowed to serve part of his sentence at home. Shpigelman's mother and sister also requested leniency.

Business Week

Separately, Plotkin and Pajcin are accused of illegally obtaining the names of stocks mentioned in Business Week magazine before issues were mailed to subscribers.

Nickolaus Shuster, who worked at a Wisconsin printing plant, pleaded guilty in October to charges that he leaked the names of companies set to appear in the magazine. Prosecutors said Shuster stole copies for Plotkin and Pajcin. Charges were filed against another plant worker, Juan Renteria, who has pleaded not guilty.

If convicted, Plotkin may face up to 15 years in jail because he allegedly helped organize the scheme.

Merrill shares fell 9 cents to $91.95 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading at 1:44 p.m. Merrill is a passive minority investor in Bloomberg LP, the parent of Bloomberg News.

The case is U.S. v. Shpigelman, 06-CR-586, U.S. District Court, Southern District of New York (Manhattan).

A Misdated Option Aided ACS's Deason (WSJ)

By James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Affiliated Computer Services Inc. for the first time said its chairman, Darwin Deason, benefited from a wrongly dated stock option, adding that a portion of the 2002 award would be repriced to cut its potential value by $655,000.

But the company said the repricing is being done for tax reasons, and repeated its earlier insistence that an internal probe didn't find evidence that Mr. Deason's 2002 option grant had been improperly backdated.

The Dallas-based technology outsourcing concern forced its chief executive and top finance official to resign their posts in November, after the internal investigation uncovered rampant backdating.

DOJ_NMG_0113762

In a filing late Friday, the company detailed a series of past option grants to Mr. Deason and other top officials that it is repricing to avoid having individual executives suffer tax penalties associated with mispriced option grants. Except for the 2002 grant received by Mr. Deason and several others, the company didn't say whether the particular grants being repriced were backdated, or merely carried incorrect dates because final approval hadn't yet occurred.

Fortunate Timing

In Mr. Deason's case, the fortunately timed 2002 grant came at the bottom of a steep trough, on a late July date when the stock hit a quarterly low. The company said yesterday its internal probe found "evidence, though inconclusive" that there had been an "informal" selection of that date for Mr. Deason's grant. But formal approval, it said, didn't occur until five days later, when the stock had risen 5%.

Repricing the entire grant of 600,000 shares would have wiped $1.1 million from its potential value. ACS repriced only a portion of the award to the higher exercise price, because there is no tax penalty associated with already vested options. The company has already repriced all options for individuals found to have engaged in misconduct.

The company offered no more details Friday about a 1998 grant to Mr. Deason and other executives that was dated at a yearly low.

Nearly a Month Off

The repricing of other grants to ACS top executives show that the company misdated grants by close to a month on occasion. One grant, originally dated July 11, 2000, to current CEO Lynn Blodgett among others, was priced at $16.44, just ahead of a steep run-up in the company's stock. The company said the actual price should have been $23.47, or 43% higher. The stock next reached that level on August 10, 2000.

The ACS spokesman, Michael Buckley, said the company is reimbursing Mr. Deason and other executives for any financial loss or tax penalties associated with the misdated, repriced options. He said Mr. Deason is being treated like all the other employees whose grants have been repriced.

Write to James Bandler at james.bandler@wsj.com4

Inside Jobs (WSJ)

By Lucian Bebchuk

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Apple Computer announced a week ago the conclusions of a special board committee that examined the "improper dating" of over 6,000 option grants during 1997-2002. The committee found no basis for having less than "complete confidence in [CEO] Steve Jobs and the senior management team," placing full responsibility for past problems on the company's former CFO and general counsel. But the company's report fails to dispel concerns about Apple's governance.

In reviewing past grant awards, the report discusses separately grants awarded to directors and to Mr. Jobs, but it lumps grants to senior managers other than Jobs together with all other grants. The company is surprisingly silent on whether any of these senior managers received "improperly dated" grants.

The report indicates that Mr. Jobs "was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates," but states that "he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants." But even though Mr. Jobs did not personally benefit from these grants, it turns out that he did benefit from other improperly timed grants.

In particular, Mr. Jobs received in 2002 an award of at-the-money options to buy 7.5 million Apple shares, roughly 2% of the total shares then outstanding. The grant was backdated by two months, which significantly increased the award's value. Surprisingly, Apple did not disclose the backdating of this large CEO grant in October when it announced the committee's "key findings."

When reporting about this grant in 2003, Apple noted that the grant comprised 32% of the total options awarded to Apple employees during 2002, and explicitly stated that the grant's exercise price was equal to the stock price on the grant date. Apple's report does not provide any insight into why the special committee found as fully acceptable the failure by Mr. Jobs and all other directors to notice the erroneous recording and reporting of this significant grant.

The special committee concluded that Mr. Jobs did not appreciate the "accounting implications" that the improper dating of grants had for Apple's financial statements. But improper dating may be viewed as wrong for reasons other than the accounting consequences. Thus, it is unfortunate that the report says little about what Mr. Jobs and others current senior managers knew and believed about the improper dating beyond noting Mr. Jobs's failure to appreciate the accounting implications.

Finally, the account suggested by Apple's report leaves readers wondering what incentive the former CFO and general counsel had to engage in improper dating. CFOs and general counsels commonly do not have primary responsibility for attracting and compensating employees. Why would these two former executives engage in massive backdating of thousands of grants without at least tacit support from other members of senior management? Why would they act to increase the compensation of a CEO who was unaware of their having done so? These mysteries add to the questions posed by the company's report.

DOJ_NMG_0113763

Steve Jobs's great accomplishments have well earned him a place in the pantheon of high-tech leaders and visionaries. And Apple's senior management has undoubtedly done very well for shareholders during the past several years. All of this, however, clearly does not compel the conclusion that Apple's governance has performed adequately with respect to option grants. And the company's report falls far short of providing a basis for accepting such a conclusion.

Beyond Apple Computer, there are many other apples in the barrel of companies whose past option grant practices raise serious questions. In a recent study, "Lucky CEOs," Yaniv Grinstein, Urs Peyer and I estimate that 12% of public firms were involved in lucky grants awarded at monthly lows that cannot be explained by sheer luck. In a subsequent study, "Lucky Directors," we further show that outside directors received lucky grants not produced by sheer luck in an estimated 7% of public firms.

We also find evidence linking lucky grants with governance problems. CEO lucky grants were more common when the board lacked a majority of independent directors. In contrast to claims that gains from backdated grants served as an efficient substitute for other forms of compensation, CEOs getting lucky grants received more, not less, total reported compensation. Lucky grants to outside directors were more common in firms with entrenching arrangements that protect incumbents from removal. And outside directors' luck was correlated with CEO luck.

For corporate America to improve its governance going forward, boards should face up to -- and fully share with shareholders -- past governance problems in their companies.

Mr. Bebchuk, director of Harvard Law School's program on corporate governance, is co-author of "Pay without Performance: The Unfulfilled Promise of Executive Compensation" (Harvard University Press, 2004).

CRIMINAL LAW:

News Media Seek Audio Of Libby Trial (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - Fifteen news organizations and five other groups are asking a federal judge to release audio recordings each day in the upcoming criminal trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff.

The Supreme Court releases audio recordings of arguments in major cases, and lower federal courts have "started to follow the Supreme Court's lead," lawyers for the news organizations said in filings this week in U.S. District Court.

Cheney is expected to testify for his former aide, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, and other witnesses will include NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert.

"Most of the key witnesses are public figures who regularly appear in the media," the organizations said in documents filed late Thursday with Judge Reggie Walton. "Knowledge that their testimony might be released on audiotapes will not make them feel awkward or uncomfortable, and certainly no more so than testifying in front of a courtroom filled with reporters."

The Libby trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 16. He is accused of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about his conversations with journalists regarding outed CIA officer Valerie Plame.

"If there were ever a case where release of audio recordings is unlikely to have any impact on the proceedings - other than the beneficial one of more fully informing the public - it is this one," lawyers for the news organizations stated.

The organizations are ABC, The Associated Press, Bloomberg News, CNN, CBS, Dow Jones, E.W. Scripps, the Hearst Corp., the Los Angeles Times, the McClatchey Co., NBC, National Public Radio, USA Today, the Washington Post, the American Society of Newspaper Editors, the Newspaper Association of America, the Radio-Television News Directors Association, the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press and the Society of Professional Journalists.

The Villains Of Currency (WSJ)

By Joanna Slater

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Investors' Excitement Allows Fraudsters To Get Even the Savvy

Cashing in on the volatile world of buying and selling currencies just became riskier.

Scam artists are increasingly using currency-trading schemes to ensnare even experienced investors, regulators say. The scams take many forms, soliciting individuals over the telephone or wooing them at hotel presentations.

DOJ_NMG_0113764

One widespread scheme promises investors fat profits if they jump in on a time-sensitive opportunity to trade currencies. The money then disappears or gets eaten up in unprofitable trades.

Such frauds exploit a growing awareness among the investing public that the global foreign-exchange market -- worth roughly $2 trillion a day -- is an important financial arena. They also benefit from a legal loophole: Not all of the people who solicit investors to trade currencies are regulated, making them difficult to monitor.

Schemes like these are "the fraud du jour," says Michael Dunn, a commissioner at the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the government body responsible for regulating a portion of currency trading. In recent years, foreign-exchange fraud cases have expanded to take up 28% of the body's current litigation. "This is a real problem out there," says Mr. Dunn.

Over the past five years, more than 25,000 investors have been burned by these frauds, which employ a variety of tactics to lure individuals. Some firms set up booths at investor fairs or rely on printed brochures or pitches over the telephone. Other schemes target particular ethnic groups or spread by word of mouth.

That's how Vicki Myers learned about White Pine Trust Corp., a San Diego foreign-currency fund. Before deciding whether to invest, Ms. Myers visited the company's office. The firm had trading screens, glossy brochures, and, it claimed, an outstanding track record. Impressed, Ms. Myers and her husband invested $58,000 in retirement funds and other savings.

After the fund's Web site stopped working and no one returned her calls, she drove back to the office in 2004, only to find it abandoned. The money was likely gone, she realized. The fund's founder is now in prison after pleading guilty to wire fraud.

"It made me sick," recalls the 57-year-old, who is a marketing director at a residence for the elderly. She estimates that about half of her husband's retirement savings disappeared in the fraud.

The scams tap into an increasing curiosity among individuals about the world of currencies, long the domain of banks, companies, and other institutions.

"The strength and weakness in the dollar is being talked about in the headlines on a daily basis," says Muhammad Rasoul, chief operating officer of Global Forex Trading, a registered foreign-exchange firm based in Michigan that caters to individual customers. "You're going to have people trying to take advantage of those who aren't as familiar" with currencies.

To combat such practices, Mr. Rasoul advocates closing the loopholes that allow some currency-market players to escape regulation and help unscrupulous operators to thrive.

Knowing how to identify legitimate foreign-exchange players is particularly important since the number of firms catering to individual investors has exploded in recent years. Increasing numbers of small investors are trying their hand at buying and selling actual money, thanks to electronic-trading platforms that require low minimum investments.

It's a risky proposition that features unpredictable swings in prices that can wipe out gains. The scams rarely mention such hazards. They target not only financial novices and the elderly, but also investors with an advanced grasp of how markets work.

A good example is the con that ensnared Ms. Myers, which managed to solicit more than $30 million from investors.

The fund's founder, Richard Matthews Jr., pleaded guilty to wire fraud in 2005 in federal court in San Diego, and is in prison while a receiver liquidates the ill-gotten gains from the scam, which included a 12-acre island in Belize, property in California, and a yacht.

Investors in the scheme may recover approximately 20% of their original investment, according to the receiver.

The frauds themselves differ in type and scope. A garden-variety scam might work like this: Fraudsters rent a telemarketing "boiler room" complete with phones and cubicles, and start cold-calling numbers from a list of leads available for purchase. They promise large guaranteed returns, hail their track record, and ask that a minimum investment be wired to a particular bank. If an investor bites, the calls continue, saying more money is needed to take advantage of an urgent trading opportunity.

When the investor asks for the money back, the response is that the market has shifted; then a month or two later the company closes. "The next day they're up and running under a new name," says Mr. Dunn of the CFTC. Florida is a particular hotspot for such schemes, he says.

Another tactic is to target members of a particular community. In San Francisco, for example, a firm placed a classified ad in a local Chinese-language newspaper -- promising well-paid work with health insurance. People who responded to the ad were given a minimal amount of training in how to trade currencies. Then they were asked to invest $20,000 of their own money and to encourage friends and relatives to open accounts. Nearly all of the $1.78 million invested by at least 45 people was lost.

One fact that helps to explain the prevalence of such currency scams is that they sometimes slip through the regulatory cracks. The CFTC has the authority to crack down on fraud in futures contracts, which are agreements to buy or sell a given commodity (or in this case, a particular currency) on specific dates. Futures contracts are a basic way to speculate on currencies. In a recent foreign-exchange case, CFTC v. Zelener, in the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago, the judges ruled that although customers were defrauded, the contracts involved weren't explicitly futures. As a result, the judges said the carefully worded contracts in the case put the wrongdoers beyond the mandate of the CFTC. "In effect, it gave a blueprint for fraudsters on how to escape our jurisdiction," says Mr. Dunn of the CFTC.

DOJ_NMG_0113765

Last year, Congress examined ways to close the Zelener loophole and is expected to reconsider the issue soon.

Another issue exploited by fraudsters relates to how currency contracts get sold to the average investor. The current law provides a fair degree of latitude for companies selling over-the-counter currency futures: for example, they don't have to register with a regulatory body, as long as they're affiliated with a company that has done so. Their employees can also escape regulatory scrutiny.

The result, at times, is high-pressure sales tactics by people who were previously involved in other forms of commodity fraud, says Daniel Roth, president of the National Futures Association, a self-regulating body for the industry.

"Essentially you have a completely unregulated sales force that is in some cases preying on retail customers," says Mr. Roth. "I can't believe that's what Congress intended."

Some registered firms take steps to protect themselves. Mr. Rasoul of Global Forex Trading says his firm won't take customer referrals from unregulated agents who may be using questionable practices to bring in business. "We're not interested in dealing with people who don't have some kind of responsibility over them," he says.

Write to Joanna Slater at joanna.slater@wsj.com1 Unmasking Fraud ...

If you're considering investing in currencies, some resources to protect yourself:

• Visit the CFTC's currency fraud site: www.cftc.gov/enf/enfforex.htm2

• Contact the National Futures Association at (800) 676-4NFA and ask if a company is a member of the NFA or registered with the CFTC, and to check the disciplinary record of a particular company or salesperson. The NFA has a site to check a firm's record (www.nfa.futures.org/basicnet3).

• Check if the company has attracted the attention of other authorities, like your state's securities commissioner (www.nasaa.org4) or Attorney General's consumer protection bureau (www.naag.org5).

... And Getting Into Forex

There are several ways to invest in foreign-currency movements:

• Mutual Funds. Several "hard currency" funds invest in a variety of currencies. Foreign-bond funds also derive a portion of returns from currency movements. Morningstar's Web site is a resource to research such funds.

• Online Accounts. A large number of companies offer online trading accounts to retail investors where they can speculate directly on currency movements.

• ETFs. Certain exchange-traded funds track the performance of individual foreign currencies against the dollar. Sites such as www.etfconnect.com6 offer information.

Sources: CFTC; WSJ data

SAN FRANCISCO Challenge To Law On Officer Killings Convicted Man's Attorney Calls It Unconstitutional (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 6, 2007

(01-05) 20:57 PST -- The lawyer for the man convicted of second-degree murder for killing San Francisco police Officer Isaac Espinoza said Friday he will ask the sentencing judge to declare unconstitutional a state law requiring his 23-year-old client to spend the rest of his life in prison.

The law may violate the right to equal protection because it punishes second-degree murder of a police officer more severely than first-degree murder of someone who isn't an officer, said Martin Sabelli, attorney for defendant David Hill.

District Attorney Kamala Harris disagreed, saying it was both legal and just that "this defendant should die in prison."

A San Francisco jury convicted Hill on Thursday of shooting Espinoza to death in April 2004. The 29-year-old officer, an eight-year police veteran, and his partner, Barry Parker, both in plainclothes, stepped out of their unmarked car on Newhall Street in the Bayview district and ordered Hill to stop because they thought he might be concealing a weapon, according to Parker's testimony.

The defense argued that Hill thought he was being threatened by rival gang members when he opened fire, killing Espinoza and wounding Parker. But jurors found that Hill had known both men were officers, though they acquitted him of premeditated first-degree murder.

Second-degree murder, a killing that is deliberate but not premeditated or planned in advance, is normally punishable by 15 years to life in prison, or 20 to life if a gun is used. But the sentence is longer if the defendant knew, or should have known, that the victim was an on-duty law enforcement officer.

DOJ_NMG_0113766

Under a law that the Legislature passed in 1997, and voters reaffirmed in a 1998 ballot initiative, second-degree murder of a peace officer carries a mandatory sentence of life in prison without possibility of parole, if the killer used a gun or other dangerous weapon, or intended to kill or seriously injure the officer. If none of those circumstances is proved but the defendant knew the victim was an officer, the punishment is 25 years to life.

First-degree murder of a law enforcement officer is punishable by death or life without parole. Harris, fulfilling a campaign promise of opposition to the death penalty, said within days of Hill's arrest that she would not seek a death sentence.

Hill is scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 8 by Superior Court Judge Carol Yaggy.

Sabelli, Hill's lawyer, said he would base his constitutional challenge on the fact that the law requires a harsher sentence for second-degree murder of a police officer, life without parole, than the sentence for first-degree murder of a non-officer, 25 years to life.

"It's a more serious punishment for what appears to be a lesser crime, based on the status of the victim," Sabelli said. "There may be a constitutional issue, an equal-protection issue."

He also said there appeared to be "a tension, if not a contradiction," in the jury's findings that Hill had known the victims were police officers but had not acted with premeditation when he shot them.

But Harris said the nature of a police officer's job justifies a more severe punishment for their murder.

"It's absolutely necessary to have a law that gives more of a penalty when someone harms a person who is fulfilling a duty to keep us safe," Harris said.

E-mail Bob Egelko at begelko@sfchronicle.com.

Page B - 1

Documents Give New Details Of SunCruz-linked Bribe To Ex-Ohio Lawmaker (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, January 6, 2007

One-time powerful lobbyist Jack Abramoff gave a $10,000 campaign bribe to an Ohio congressman for his public words of praise for Abramoff's business partner in the purchase of a South Florida fleet of gambling ships more than six years ago.

Specific details of the political bribe linked to the SunCruz Casinos sale were disclosed for the first time this week in court papers filed by Justice Department lawyers for the upcoming sentencing of convicted former Republican Congressman Bob Ney.

Ney, 52, pleaded guilty to corruption charges in October and faces sentencing in Washington on Jan. 19. He's trying to downplay the scope of the corruption conspiracy in hopes of receiving a two-year prison sentence. Prosecutors counter that he should be imprisoned for at least two years and three months.

Abramoff, who is at the center of the ongoing corruption investigation in Washington, turned himself in last November to serve about six years in prison for lying to lenders to obtain a $60 million bank loan to buy the SunCruz fleet, based in Dania Beach.

Abramoff and his SunCruz business partner, Adam Kidan of New York, who is serving the same prison sentence, used that money to buy the gambling fleet for $147 million from Fort Lauderdale tycoon Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis in fall 2000.

Boulis would be slain months later, but Abramoff and Kidan have not been implicated in any way in that case.

The SunCruz case against Abramoff and Kidan gave Justice Department officials the leverage to pressure Abramoff to turn on other colleagues, congressional aides and politicians last year.

The charges against Ney are based primarily on his behind-the-scenes work for Abramoff's Indian tribal clients in exchange for a golf trip to Scotland, campaign money and professional sports tickets. Ney also took tens of thousands of dollars in casino chips and cash from a foreign businessman seeking political favors. But the charges also include the former lawmaker's unusual tactics to help Abramoff buy the SunCruz gambling fleet.

During negotiations in the SunCruz deal, Abramoff asked his lobbying partner, Michael Scanlon, who had once worked for ex-GOP leader Tom DeLay, to do him a favor. That's when Ney entered the picture.

Scanlon contacted Ney's chief of staff, Neil Volz, to arrange to have Ney disparage Boulis and his company in the Congressional Record. Scanlon drafted a statement that Ney put into the Record in March 2000, saying: ``There are a few bad apples out there who don't play by the rules and that is just plain wrong. One such example is the case of SunCruz Casinos, based out of Florida."

The motive: "To soften the negotiating position" of Boulis and "secure a better deal" for Abramoff and his business partner Kidan, according to the court documents filed Wednesday.

Scanlon, who also pleaded guilty to corruption charges, told investigators that Abramoff and Kidan asked for another favor from Ney after the SunCruz sale that September. "Abramoff and Kidan wanted a second statement, this time praising Kidan as the new manager of the business," according to the court documents.

That October, Scanlon discussed the plan in e-mails with Abramoff -- including a payoff to the congressman.

And in a phone call with Ney and Volz, "Scanlon offered them a $10,000 contribution to the National Republican Campaign Committee in return for [Ney's] agreement to insert the second statement into the Congressional Record," the documents say.

In late October 2000, Ney inserted these remarks: ``I have come to learn that SunCruz Casinos now finds itself under new ownership and, more importantly, that its new owner has a renowned reputation for honesty and integrity."

Ney predicted that Kidan ``will easily transform SunCruz from a questionable enterprise to an upstanding establishment that the gaming community can be proud of."

On Nov. 1, 2000, Abramoff and Kidan tapped SunCruz's coffers to donate $10,000 on Ney's behalf to the GOP campaign committee.

The following year, the partners ran the business into the ground.

DOJ Pushes FBI To Broaden Data Sharing With Outside Agencies (COMPWRLD)

By Todd R. Weiss

Computerworld, January 6, 2007

It plans to use a central database to make crime info widely available

January 06, 2007 (Computerworld) -- The U.S. Department of Justice is pushing the FBI and its other operating units to speed up and expand their efforts to share a wide array of information with outside law enforcement agencies via a centralized database called OneDOJ.

In a Dec. 21 memo, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty also directed CIO Vance Hitch to work with the DOJ's component agencies to develop "an aggressive but practical plan" for increasing their information-sharing capabilities. The plans, which must be submitted to McNulty's office by Feb. 9, will include steps that can be taken within the next 180 days to enable the units to participate more fully in seven ongoing data-sharing initiatives.

In addition, McNulty assigned Hitch to a new committee that will coordinate the DOJ's information-sharing program. And he said in the memo that the coordinating committee and his staff will work with Hitch's office to develop plans for implementing the Unix-based OneDOJ technology internally in 15 high-priority metropolitan areas and other regions.

The plan to expand the use of OneDOJ by other law enforcement authorities at the federal, state and local levels has raised the hackles of some privacy and civil rights advocates, who said last week that the DOJ will need to work hard to ensure that the increased information sharing doesn't infringe on the rights of law-abiding Americans.

"The problem is the ease with which the information held by multiple agencies can be accessed in one place," said Allison Knight, staff counsel at the Electronic Privacy Information Center in Washington. Any inaccurate data stored in OneDOJ could be quickly disseminated to a large number of law enforcement officials, she said, adding that the DOJ should enable people to correct erroneous information.

Knight also said that the centralized database could become a big target of hackers and other unauthorized users. DOJ officials need to ensure that deep security and safety mechanisms are in place to prevent breaches, she said.

OneDOJ is "far more than just bringing together all the information they have," said Barry Steinhardt, director of the technology and liberty program at the American Civil Liberties Union. "Once you put all the information in one place, it enables the kind of data mining that's not possible by traditional law enforcement."

One problem, Steinhardt added, is that the DOJ, and the FBI in particular, have been "notoriously inept at managing [their] computing resources."

For example, the FBI in 2005 scrapped a three-year, $170 million effort to develop an automated case management system and now is pursuing a project called Sentinel that isn't due for completion until late 2009. And the DOJ received a "D" grade for computer security on an annual report card issued by a congressional committee last March.

Ken Wall, Crystal Russo Sentenced In Orange Beach Case (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 6, 2007

A real estate investor escaped a lengthy prison sentence Friday for his role in a wide-ranging corruption case in Orange Beach, while the wife of that city's former mayor avoided prison altogether.

Federal prosecutors in Mobile urged U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose to send Ken Wall to prison for more than two years for mail and wire fraud in a case centering on Steve Russo, who had served as mayor of the resort city before resigning last year following his indictment on corruption charges.

Instead, DuBose sentenced Wall to a year and a day in prison -- less than the minimum recommended by advisory guidelines -- and fined him $250,000.

DuBose sentenced Russo's wife, Crystal Russo, to 180 days of home confinement and two years' probation for obstruction of justice. As part of a plea bargain in September, she admitted that she helped her husband try to hide money that prosecutors had targeted for forfeiture.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven

Butler objected to the "insufficiency" of Wall's sentence and indicated prosecutors might appeal.

"This case, like any public corruption case, strikes at the core of our democratic process -- which is the right to honest government by our elected officials," U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes said in a statement.

A jury in September found Wall, 55, guilty of conspiracy, two counts of mail fraud and three counts of wire fraud in connection with a real estate deal that netted Steve Russo $400,000.

The charges arose from one of a number of corrupt schemes that prosecutors contended the mayor ran to enrich himself. Russo and former City Attorney Larry Sutley, who also were convicted in September, will be sentenced next month.

DuBose earlier this week overturned Wall's conspiracy conviction, ruling that there was insufficient evidence to support it. But she let the other counts stand.

At the trial, developer Jim Brown -- who cut a deal with prosecutors for his testimony -- told jurors that he financed Russo's $1.2 million purchase of property on Gulf Bay Road along Wolf Bay in August 2005 in order to ensure support for his development projects. The mayor sold the property the same day for $1.6 million to Deck Investments -- a partnership that included Wall, who had teamed with Brown on a controversial proposal to build a $300 million condominium-hotel and retail project called The Water Club.

Brown is scheduled to be sentenced in June for conspiracy.

Testimony during the trial indicated that Wall had never disclosed to his Deck Investments partners that Russo was the owner of the property, and Brown told jurors that Wall wanted Russo to know that Wall had made the deal work.

The initial calculation of advisory sentencing guidelines by the U.S. Probation Office for Wall called for a minimum prison term of 6½ years in prison. That was based partly on the $400,000 profit Russo made on the "land flip."

But defense attorneys Bill Baxley and David McKnight argued Friday that no one lost any money. Although Russo undoubtedly profited, McKnight said, he pointed to testimony from Brown that the Gulf Bay property was worth at least $2 million. And he also noted that Deck Investments was searching for property in the area anyway.

DuBose agreed.

"There was no bribe given. There was no gratuity given," she said. "There was an obvious conflict of interest."

DuBose said the adjusted guideline range of 21 to 27 months was not appropriate and cited several factors that supported the defense request for probation, including Wall's spotless criminal record, his lack of danger to the community and the likelihood that he will not commit more crimes. But she said some prison time was necessary to reflect the seriousness of the offense.

"The public deserves complete and infallible honesty from its public officials," she said.

Given a chance to address the court, Wall continued to maintain his innocence, reasserting that he would have bought the Gulf Bay Road property "from the man on the moon" because it was in the best interest of Deck Investments.

Wall also told the judge that the criminal charges have wrecked him financially. He said he earned no regular income in 2006 and had to sell assets to pay loans that lenders called as a result of the indictment. He said his bank has given him a 90-day extension to pay the mortgage on his own home.

Turning to face 40 or so friends and relatives who packed the small courtroom, a visibly emotional Wall said, "The only joy I felt in the last 10 months is the love and support and shoulder that you folks have offered to me."

Crystal Russo's sentencing came after a plea by her lawyer and her father for leniency. A federal grand jury indicted her in June after investigators alleged that she had opened a bank account in her maiden name at the behest of her husband, who then transferred $95,000 from his own account.

Defense attorney Gordon Armstrong asked the judge to sentence his client to straight probation, arguing that she was entitled to leniency under a federal rule available to otherwise law-abiding defendants who commit an aberrant and spontaneous crime.

Armstrong said his client, who was 19 years old and working at Russo's store when she met him, was "very young, very inexperienced and very naive."

DOJ_NMG_0113769

But Butler, the prosecutor, argued that to qualify for a break under the "aberrant behavior" rule the crime must be of limited duration and not include subsequent acts. He pointed out that Russo opened the account over the phone on a Friday afternoon, went to the bank the following Monday to submit the required paperwork and then tried to take money out two days later.

DuBose agreed that restricted probation was appropriate. While on home confinement, Russo will have to wear an electronic monitoring device and pay its $3.26 daily expense. She will not be allowed to leave her home unless she gets advance permission from the U.S. Probation Office.

"Sorry would not even describe the remorse I feel ... that you even have to know who I am," she told the judge.

As she left the courthouse, Russo focused on the positive.

"I'm going home," she said.

Ex-councilman Pleads Guilty In Orange Beach Corruption Case (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

BAY MINETTE, Ala. (AP) — Former Orange Beach City Councilman Joseph F. McCarron Jr. pleaded guilty Friday to 15 misdemeanor ethics law violations related to his votes on construction projects in the Alabama Gulf Coast resort.

McCarron has agreed to testify in the state prosecution of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo and former city attorney Larry Sutley, Attorney General Troy King said in a statement announcing the guilty plea.

As part of McCarron's plea agreement, he has committed to pay fines of $2,000 for each of the 15 counts, King said. Sentencing is set for March 21.

King said McCarron admitted to five instances of "unintentional violation" of three different sections of the state ethics law, through his votes to rezone properties for his business clients, for which he later sold them insurance.

The votes were for rezoning properties including Terry Cove Marina, Phoenix on the Bay II, Turquoise Place, Turquoise Place East, and Caribe Planned Unit Development.

Unintentional violation of the ethics law is a misdemeanor.

Russo is charged in two state indictments with accepting bribes while in office in exchange for supporting construction projects.

Russo, Sutley and developer Ken Wall were convicted by a federal jury on numerous public corruption counts after a two-week trial in September. A federal judge later overturned Wall's conspiracy conviction but upheld his mail and wire fraud convictions. Developer Jim Brown pleaded guilty in June to federal charges of bribing Russo to curry favor at City Hall. Wall was charged for his role in separate schemes to enrich the mayor.

Pellicano Allowed To Defend Himself (LAT)

By John Spano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The private investigator facing racketeering and wiretapping charges dismissed his attorney because the courts wouldn't pay him.

Tossing a legal hand grenade into an already-contentious case, celebrity sleuth Anthony Pellicano on Friday demanded and won the right to act as his own lawyer in his upcoming trial on wiretapping and racketeering charges.

U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer tried to talk Pellicano out of his plan, but he would not relent.

"I urge you to let me appoint counsel for you," Fischer implored in federal court in downtown Los Angeles.

"You're very kind, your honor, but no, thank you," Pellicano said.

The ruling added another unexpected turn to a case that has rocked Los Angeles' legal and entertainment communities. Pellicano was once one of the city's most successful private detectives and for years had worked on behalf of marquee names in Hollywood and legal circles, gathering secrets to help sway court and business affairs in his clients' favor.

The specter of an untrained self-advocate in a complex, high-profile case raised sharp concerns among some court observers. One cited the trial of Lynette Alice "Squeaky" Fromme, who insisted on exercising her constitutional right to defend herself on charges of trying to shoot President Ford in 1975, only to turn the courtroom into a circus.

"It's a very foolish thing to do," said Peter Keane, former dean of Golden Gate University School of Law in San Francisco. "Usually you're consigning yourself to failure. It creates nightmares for judges. Judges and prosecutors hate it."

Most lawyers for Pellicano's six co-defendants declined to comment on the record. But while some saw catastrophe, others cited the defendant's stellar career as a private detective in suggesting he might be effective.

"It affects the whole case," one lawyer said. "You have to address his silly motions. If the government is taking up time answering frivolous motions, it's time they are not spending providing your discovery."

DOJ_NMG_0113770

"I don't know what happens with Anthony when he gets up to do his opening statement," another lawyer said. "Does he waive his 5th Amendment privilege [against self-incrimination]? I don't know which way it cuts, in terms of benefit to the prosecution or the defense."

Pellicano, one of seven defendants in the complicated federal case, had been represented by San Francisco attorney Steven F. Gruel without charge. Pellicano wrote to Fischer that he released Gruel because he believed it was unfair for him to continue working gratis.

Pellicano has already been declared indigent and qualifies for court-paid counsel, which is normally selected from a list of qualified lawyers maintained by each federal trial court in California. Lawyers familiar with the case said Gruel is not on the list, and Fischer was reluctant to appoint him.

The judge cleared the courtroom and held a 15-minute closed-door session with Pellicano and Gruel before publicly allowing the former private detective to represent himself.

Lawyers uniformly praised Gruel as a top attorney and said his loss would be difficult. Several lawyers and observers suggested other defendants may decide to seek separate trials, adding to delays. The trial is scheduled for this summer.

Several suggested Pellicano will find it impossible to review all the evidence before trial. Massive amounts of electronic records were seized from Pellicano's computer system before his arrest. Being incarcerated, his options are limited, lawyers said.

Keane said that while Pellicano has "assured his own conviction," the effect on other defendants "could go in a number of directions."

"If Pellicano is an abrasive, arrogant, obnoxious person, it could be a godsend for the other defendants. He could deflect all the antipathy towards himself," Keane said.

Half a dozen defendants have pleaded guilty in the broad Pellicano investigation, including a Hollywood filmmaker and a former record executive, both of whom admitted lying to the FBI about hiring Pellicano to wire-tap rivals.

Gruel said he would rejoin the defense if and when Pellicano asks. In the meantime, he said his former client "could do a pretty darn good job. He knows the issues and he knows the facts better than anyone."

"After 40 years of experience, he has a practical knowledge of how the legal system works," Gruel said.

On Friday, Fischer ended the hearing by telling Pellicano, "If you change your mind, let me know."

"Yes ma'am," responded Pellicano. "I know exactly what you mean."

If convicted of all 108 counts in the federal indictment — including wire fraud, identity theft, computer theft and possession of wiretapping devices — Pellicano could get up to 625 years in prison and $26.75 million in fines.

john.spano@latimes.com

D.C. Police To Target Each Area's Safety Needs Individually (WP)

By Allison Klein, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Mayor and Chief Emphasize Community Input, Foot Patrols

D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty and Acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier yesterday outlined a new crime-fighting strategy that calls for customized actions to address safety needs in each region of the city.

Officers in each of the city's 46 police service areas will meet with residents and elected officials in coming weeks and create initiatives that will be launched in March, Lanier said. At her urging, patrol commanders have started programs, including one that has officers adopting specific neighborhood blocks or parks where they will personally keep track of any emerging concerns.

"Our overriding goal is to reduce crime and the fear of crime in every neighborhood," said Lanier, who last week succeeded Charles H. Ramsey as chief. She has the job on an acting basis pending confirmation from the D.C. Council.

Fenty and Lanier have emphasized increased officer visibility and foot patrols. The city plans to add 100 officers to the 3,800-member department, and Lanier has said patrols will be her priority. She envisions a force that goes beyond reacting to crimes by building and sustaining safe neighborhoods.

The new mayor and chief outlined their plans at a news conference yesterday -- the second day in a row that Fenty has promoted his early agenda. On Thursday, he proposed a dramatic restructuring of the D.C. public schools that would give him ultimate authority over the troubled system.

Fenty (D), who was sworn in Tuesday, said he moved quickly on schools and police because he believes they are twin vital components to a healthy city.

"We very much view our record of service intertwined with our ability to make our streets safer," said Fenty, who as a council member frequently criticized the police department's direction.

DOJ_NMG_0113771

Fenty's approach drew praise from one of his predecessors, council member and former mayor Marion Barry (D-Ward 8). "I commend the mayor to move public safety parallel with education because there's no way you can educate young people when they don't feel safe going to school or in school," Barry said.

Lanier, a 16-year member of the department, is taking a team approach to policing. She told patrol commanders in the seven police districts to have open dialogues with their officers, who in turn are supposed to cull ideas from the community.

In the 3rd District, which encompasses neighborhoods such as Shaw, Adams Morgan, Columbia Heights and the U Street corridor, Cmdr. Larry McCoy came up with the adopt-a-block program. His district has the biggest volume of crime in the city, driven by robberies, burglaries and assaults.

With 467 officers, he does not have enough officers to assign one to each block, but he will cover the district strategically.

"The idea is that's their baby," McCoy said. "That's their place to make a difference."

In choosing to increase foot patrols, McCoy said, he and other commanders will have to strike a balance to ensure that officers are able to arrive quickly when someone calls for help. "We'll always have the capability to respond; that won't be a problem," McCoy said. "Sometimes it will be a matter of officers going back to their cars and responding."

Since the initiative was announced this week, comments have been popping up on the 3rd District e-mail group from people such as Columbia Heights resident Winnie Huston, who said that it reminds her of growing up in a small town. "It brings a small-town sensibility to the city in a way that makes a lot of sense," Huston said.

Cmdr. Robin Hoey has carved the 6th District, the northern section of the city east of the Anacostia River, into 34 small areas and will cover them with foot, bike and motor patrols. He emphasized foot beats -- "going back to the old days," he said.

His plan focuses on getting guns off the streets in his communities, which have some of the highest homicide rates in the city. And he will initiate anti-bullying programs in schools.

"We're looking at youth gun violence," Hoey said. "There are some crooks out there, but there are other kids who are arming themselves to protect themselves."

In the 1st District, which includes Capitol Hill and the RFK Stadium area, Cmdr. Diane Groomes said she is encouraging citizens to ride along with officers on patrol, and she will have every officer become involved in a community-based program, such as reading in schools, taking the elderly on errands and youth midnight basketball.

She said the benefit is twofold: It assists people, and it often helps solve cases. "You get a lot of information that way," Groomes said.

Lanier also is changing the way homicide detectives are assigned cases. Detectives, who now get cases from throughout the city, instead will be on regional teams to become more familiar with criminals, witnesses and sources in specific areas and neighborhoods.

Over the years, various chiefs have tried decentralizing the homicide unit instead of having detectives report to one command. Lanier did not go that far.

Detectives will work out of the same building and report to a centralized chain of command. But they will be assigned to one of three regional operations commands. The east command, which has the majority of the city's homicides, will have the most detectives, said C.V. Morris, head of the Violent Crimes Branch.

Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said the shift to regional homicide detectives is a sound decision because "a lot of homicide is territorial."

Lanier said she will reevaluate some strategies now in place, such as targeting crime hot spots, to see what's working well and what's not. Overall, she has gotten a positive response from officers.

"We're very optimistic," said Officer Kristopher Baumann, chairman of the D.C. police union, who had a strained relationship with Ramsey. "The officers on the streets know what the problems are, and they have ideas about how to solve them."

Archdiocese Settles Sex Suits (DENP)

By Eric Gorski, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 6, 2007

The Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Denver has settled clergy abuse lawsuits with 15 plaintiffs for a total of $1.58 million, the law firm representing the litigants said today.

"We are pleased with the settlements," said Adam Horowitz, an attorney in the Miami law firm Herman and Mermelstein. "Any time can give a client an opportunity to resolve something at an early stage, that's a good thing for the client."

In a statement, Archbishop Charles Chaput said he was grateful to those who had worked to achieve the settlement. "I sincerely hope that each of the..individuals who participated begin to truly heal," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0113772

Last year, Chaput announced the 24-county northern Colorado diocese had hired mediator Richard Dana, a former federal judge, in an effort to reach settlements with plaintiffs who had sued the archdiocese for clergy sex abuse.

The settlements announced today do not mean the clergy abuse scandal that hit the Denver archdiocese starting in 2004 is resolved, however. At least 20 lawsuits are still pending in Denver District Court.

Today Chaput appealed to those who have yet to settle, asking that they continue to work with the mediation outreach panel, and making himself available to talk with them personally. "We will continue to try to be proactive, both spiritually and otherwise, to help anyone who has ever been hurt during his or her childhood by any member of our clergy," he said.

Four of Herman's clients declined to settle. None of the clients represented by lawyer Jeffrey Anderson of St. Paul, Minn., agreed to settlements. Anderson rejected the mediation process, saying the archdiocese should open its personnel files also.

The archdiocese declined to say how much money was available through mediation except to call it a "substantial sum."

News of some settlements with Herman clients has trickled out in recent months. It was unclear whether the announcement today means Dana's work is done.

The settlements range anywhere from $30,000 to $150,000 per case, the law firm said. All settlements involving allegations of sexual abuse with minor boys exceeded $100,000, it said.

Ten of the settled suits targeted the Rev. Harold Robert White, who was defrocked in 2003. White died late last year of an apparent heart attack while vacationing in Mexico. He was 73.

Among the White accusers who settled lawsuits: his godson, Delbert Nielsen, whose agreement is for $150,000. Four other White accusers are named, and the others are John Does. One is a Jane Doe - the only female to file suit accusing White.

The Denver Post reported a single allegation against White in 2004, and many more followed. At least three times, the Denver archdiocese was told of allegations against White but allowed him to serve, moving him from parish to parish for years before taking steps to remove him, according to interviews with alleged victims, one of his former superiors and church documents obtained by The Denver Post.

Five of the settled cases involve lawsuits naming the Rev. Leonard Abercrombie, who died in 1994.

The Herman law firm blamed the lack of settlements in its remaining cases primarily on the archdiocese's refusal "to voluntarily release the contents of the offending priests' personnel files..." The archdiocese has said such files are private and confidential.

Just Days Into The Year, Killings Toll Hits 8 In New Orleans (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 5 — A surge in murders since the new year has residents on edge and has raised new fears that officials here remain helpless to contain a lethal combination of guns, drugs and jobless young men.

The worries are particularly acute as this city struggles to repopulate 17 months after Hurricane Katrina.

Eight people have been found dead since Jan. 1, seven of them shooting victims, with the most recent being a young woman found lying on her bed in the Uptown section Friday morning, shot in the head.

As the police were scrambling to investigate that killing and the others, mostly of young men gunned down in high-crime areas, grief-stricken neighbors gathered outside the house of Helen Hill, an independent filmmaker, and her husband, Dr. Paul Gailiunas, who were shot by an intruder early Thursday morning in the Faubourg Marigny section, the authorities said.

Ms. Hill, 36, well known in the local film community and the recipient of several awards, was killed; Dr. Gailiunas, who specialized in treating the city's poor, survived his wounds. The police found him kneeling by the front door, bleeding and holding the couple's 2-year-old son in his arms. His wife lay nearby, shot in the neck. The child was not hurt.

That crime, breaking the typical pattern of drug-related shootings, helped prompt a front-page headline in The Times-Picayune on Friday: "Killings bring the city to its bloodied knees."

The spate of murders came after a New Year's Day statement by the city's police superintendent, Warren J. Riley, that New Orleans had been made safer because the 2006 murder total was the lowest in 30 years.

But the assertion was questionable even before these killings started. On a per-capita basis, because of the city's drastically reduced population after Hurricane Katrina, the murder rate of at least 81 per 100,000 people in 2006 easily makes New Orleans one of the most violent cities in the nation.

On Friday, flowers and scribbled remembrances fronted the modest duplex of Ms. Hill and her husband on North Rampart Street, in a picturesque neighborhood of old Creole cottages frequented by tourists and local residents escaping the crowds of the nearby French Quarter.

DOJ_NMG_0113773

Both were remembered as outsiders — Dr. Gailiunas is from Canada, friends said, and his wife from South Carolina — with a fervent commitment to the city's culture and its underclass.

"You know what, it's horrifying: you kill my wife, you shoot me while I'm holding my baby," said Darlene Wright, who said Dr. Gailiunas had treated her two sons at the low-cost clinic he started on Esplanade Avenue. "He was different from the other doctors. It didn't matter what your color or culture. He cared about the people."

Friends said Dr. Gailiunas had been released from the hospital Friday afternoon and that he planned to return to Canada. The police said his wounds were not life-threatening but they could not confirm his release.

Ms. Hill, a Harvard graduate and recipient of a Rockefeller Foundation fellowship, had shown her films at numerous festivals in Canada and the United States.

"Things didn't matter to them, their whole focus was on people and partaking in the culture of what was happening in New Orleans," said Carlton Charles, Dr. Gailiunas's landlord at the Esplanade clinic.

Previously, the doctor had worked in the high-crime, impoverished Central City area.

"He wanted to reach out to the poor and the underprivileged, people he felt had a lot of needs," Dr. Henry Evans, a colleague there, said.

On Friday, David Jones, the owner of a bed-and-breakfast near the couple's home, described how, shortly before the shooting, a lanky gun-wielding intruder — possibly the same one who shot the couple — had forced his way into his establishment, but apparently fled after panicked guests called the police.

The other recent killings followed a depressingly familiar pattern. Earlier Thursday, the police found a young man with gunshot wounds lying face-down in a Central City alleyway; on Wednesday evening, they responded to a report of gunshots in the same neighborhood and found another young man dead; that afternoon, Louisiana National Guardsmen found the body of a man shot in the head in the Desire area, in the Ninth Ward; and on Wednesday morning, they found the body of a woman wrapped in a rug in the Lower Ninth Ward.

The National Guard is patrolling several sections of the city at the request of the Police Department, which is still low on manpower. Superintendent Riley, who has been out of town, and other senior police officials did not respond to requests for comment on the violence.

Compounding residents' fears here is the apparent inability of the criminal justice system to successfully prosecute the murderers. A study by the Metropolitan Crime Commission of New Orleans, a foundation, found that from October 2003 to September 2004, only 12 percent of those arrested for murder were incarcerated.

"You know, there are people in this neighborhood trying to bring it back," said Mr. Jones, the bed-and-breakfast owner. "I'm tired of this. I'm ready to torch the whole neighborhood."

A Spate Of Killings Opens New Year In New Orleans (WP/AP)

By Janet McConnaughey, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Filmmaker Among the Latest Victims

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 5 -- A young woman shot to death in her home Friday morning became at least the seventh New Orleans homicide victim of the new year.

The victim, whose identity was not released, was said to be in her early 20s. Her house in the Uptown section of New Orleans had been ransacked; police did not know whether anything had been taken.

Five of the shootings, all unrelated, occurred within a 14-hour span Wednesday night and Thursday morning. Also, a body with signs of physical trauma was found Wednesday wrapped in a rug. That death has not been classified.

The spate of killings dashed hopes that the city's police chief was right on New Year's Day when he said he believed the violence that has plagued parts of the city for months had been brought under control.

One of Thursday's victims was independent filmmaker Helen Hill; her husband, Paul Gailiunas, a physician who treats the city's poor, was wounded.

Police did not release the names; they were identified by weeping friends and neighbors who gathered in front of the little white house where the killing occurred. They had moved to the Faubourg Marigny neighborhood near the French Quarter about a year after Hurricane Katrina wiped out their home in the Mid-City neighborhood.

Police said both were shot at their front door about 5:30 a.m. Thursday. No other details were available. A friend said family members from Columbia, S.C., were on their way to New Orleans on Thursday after learning of the shooting.

DOJ_NMG_0113774

"They were wonderful people. Two bright spots in New Orleans. They gave us hope that people could live together. And they'd do anything for anybody," said Sheri Branch, who was taking care of the couple's 2-year-old son while Gailiunas was hospitalized.

Hill made short films; her experimental animation shorts had been shown at a number of festivals in the United States and Canada.

Gailiunas, who was in stable condition Thursday, opened a clinic for poor people in the Treme neighborhood in 2004. It was flooded by Katrina a year later.

No witnesses to any of the killings have come forward, police said Thursday, appealing for help to solve the most recent cases.

Assistant Superintendent Steven Nicholas described the recent killings as brazen acts, often committed in broad daylight and, in one case, within a block of police officers.

At a news conference earlier this week, Police Superintendent Warren J. Riley said homicides in the city spiked in April, May and July but had become less frequent -- something he credited to police initiatives.

Police spokeswoman Bambi Hall said that, after 19 killings in October and another 19 in November, December's total was 15. There were 161 homicides in the city in 2006. New Orleans's murder rate was seven to 10 times the national average for cities of its size in 2005, the latest period for which complete data are available.

National Guard troops and state police were brought in to help patrol some neighborhoods after five teenagers were killed in one night in June 2006. The Guard has focused on areas most devastated by Hurricane Katrina so police could focus on higher-crime areas. Their patrols are expected to continue this year.

Nicholas said Riley and New Orleans District Attorney Eddie Jordan have spoken and are working to target violent criminals and to get them off the street. "Those partnerships are well established," he said.

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court To Rule On Whistle - Blowing (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 6, 2007

Filed at 3:24 a.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- After 17 years, James Stone has perhaps a few more months to wait before he learns whether he will collect up to $1 million for exposing fraud by a government contractor at a now-closed nuclear weapons plant.

A court ordered Rockwell International, now part of aerospace giant Boeing Co., to pay the government nearly $4.2 million for fraud connected with environmental cleanup at the Rocky Flats plant northwest of Denver. Stone, a former employee at the facility, could be entitled to as much as one-quarter of the payment under the federal False Claims Act.

The 81-year-old retired engineer filed his whistle-blower lawsuit in 1989, the year Rocky Flats shut its operations after nearly 40 years of production. He has survived legal challenges by Rockwell to dismiss the claim or deprive him of his share. The government joined the suit as Stone's partner 10 years ago.

The Supreme Court now has the case. The ruling could affect an anticipated crush of fraud suits if the high court makes it harder for whistle-blowers to share in the proceeds.

If Rockwell wins, "it's going to be much more difficult for whistle-blowers and there are going to be fewer cases," said James Moorman, president of the Taxpayers Against Fraud Education Fund, an advocacy group.

Rockwell must pay the entire penalty no matter how the Supreme Court rules, although it would not have to pay Stone's attorney fees. The only question before the court is whether Stone will get his cut.

The company, backed by defense, energy and pharmaceutical interests, wants the justices to restrict when an individual can collect for suing on the government's behalf.

The Bush administration is on Stone's side even though the government collects more money if Rockwell wins.

"It might be natural for the court to wonder why would it be in the government's interest to advocate that a share of the money damages in this case should be given to a private party," Justice Department lawyer Malcolm Stewart told the justices during the oral argument in early December. "In our view, Stone is precisely the type of relator that Congress intended to encourage." A relator is an individual who sues under the False Claims Act.

The False Claims Act allows individuals, acting on the government's behalf, to file fraud suits against companies that do business with the government. If they prevail, they receive a portion of what the contractor must pay the government.

DOJ_NMG_0113775

During World War II, Congress amended the Civil War-era law to make whistle-blower suits more difficult. Since Congress changed the law again in 1986, such suits have returned $11 billion to the government. Recent high-profile cases include settlements with leading pharmaceutical manufacturers.

Sen. Charles Grassley, who led the fight to reinvigorate the False Claims Act in 1986, urged the court to rule in Stone's favor.

Grassley, R-Iowa, said provisions in the law that authorize whistle-blower suits are "essential to the government today to confront fraud in government programs from reconstruction in Iraq to aid for victims of Hurricane Katrina."

The issues before the justices are:

--How much independent knowledge of wrongdoing must someone have to file a False Claims Act suit?

--Does that information have to be part of the case that eventually convinces a jury that a government contractor committed fraud?

Once alleged improprieties are disclosed publicly, often by the media, individuals face a higher hurdle in bringing fraud suits on the government's behalf. Otherwise, people could read a newspaper account or an indictment and then rush to the courthouse to file suit.

The major exception to this rule is if an individual is an original source of the information. That is what Stone claims; several courts have agreed.

Stone did not file suit until after problems at Rocky Flats became public. He did, however, approach federal investigators with information about environmental issues before news accounts were published.

At trial, the jury found Rockwell submitted false claims in 1987 and 1988 saying it was meeting goals of treating low-level radioactive wastes at the former atomic weapons plant. Rockwell laid off Stone in 1986.

Maureen Mahoney, representing the company, told the justices it is implausible for Stone to claim he had independent knowledge of any fraud. "His claim by his own admission starts in 1987, after he was gone," Mahoney said.

Yet both the trial and appeals courts, as well as the government, say Stone has shown he provided information on which the allegations of fraud were based.

A ruling by the Supreme Court is expected before July.

Rocky Flats is designated by the Environmental Protection Agency as a Superfund cleanup site. It is an Energy Department-owned cleanup and closure site.

In nearly four decades, some 70,000 plutonium triggers for nuclear bombs were made at Rocky Flats. Production was halted in 1989 because of chronic safety problems, prompting a raid by FBI agents. The Cold War ended before production could resume. In 1993, the Energy Department announced that the facility's mission was over.

State and federal regulators signed an agreement in 1996 on the cleanup, including demolition of what was termed "the most dangerous building in America" because of leaks, spills and a fire that drove radiation levels off the charts.

The case is Rockwell International v. U.S., ex rel Stone, 05-1272.

^------

On the Net:

Supreme Court: http://www.supremecourtus.gov

Taxpayers Against Fraud Education Fund: http://www.taf.org/

Energy Department: http://www.energy.gov/

Boeing: http://www.boeing.com/

Former Acute-care Service Settles Suit For $7.5 Million (HC)

By Armando Villafranca, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, January 6, 2007

Ex-workers and contractor alleged Medicare fraud at SCCI Corp.

A former long-term acute-care service based in Dallas has paid the federal government $7.5 million to settle allegations of fraudulent Medicare claims, the U.S. Department of Justice announced on Friday.

The settlement resolves a civil lawsuit filed in 1999 by four former employees and an independent contractor who worked for SCCI Houston, a 40-bed long-term acute-care hospital.

SCCI Houston was part of SCCI Health Services Corp., which operated six acute-care facilities in Texas and others outside the state.

The lawsuit was filed under whistleblower provisions of the False Claims Act, which authorizes private individuals to file lawsuits on behalf of the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0113776

The government filed its own complaint in March 2003.

The allegations claim that from 1996 to 1999, SCCI entered into illegal financial relationships with three physicians and paid the doctors in violation of self-referral statutes, and submitted or caused false claims to be submitted to the Medicare program.

SCCI Corp. was acquired by Triumph HealthCare in 2005. None of the whistleblowers nor any SCCI employees involved in the fraud were part of the acquisition, said Tanya Snodgrass, vice president of professional relations for Triumph HealthCare.

"We are very happy that it is officially over and we can finally move forward without this distraction," Snodgrass said.

She said Triumph worked with the Justice Department to resolve the lawsuit.

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said the whistleblowers, Daryl Kaczymarczyk, Patricia Rocha, Michelle Pate, Michael Brigle and Theresa Taylor, shared $1.7 million of the settlement.

Under the whistleblower provision, anyone who reports fraud can reap between 15 and 25 percent of a settlement, Miller said.

The case was handled by the Justice Department's Civil Division and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas, with the assistance of the FBI.

Judge Clears Delphi Debt Refinance Plan (AP)

By Vinnee Tong, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 6, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-A federal bankruptcy judge on Friday approved a plan by auto parts maker Delphi Corp. to borrow $4.5 billion to refinance debt and lower its monthly interest expenses.

Lawyers for Troy, Mich.-based Delphi said the refinancing, expected to close next week, would save the company $8 million a month.

The debt refinancing proposal was announced on Dec. 18, along with a plan by private equity investors to buy shares worth up to $3.4 billion in a reorganized Delphi.

Delphi lawyers say that the debt and share purchase plans represent "significant milestones in the debtor's reorganization and another major step forward towards emergence."

Judge Robert Drain, who approved the debt refinancing proposal on Friday, will consider the equity purchase plan next Thursday.

The company said it will also seek an extension of the deadline for filing its reorganization plan at a hearing next Friday. If approved, the company would have until July 31 to file its plan and Sept. 30 to solicit acceptances.

The current deadline to file a plan is Feb. 1 and to seek acceptances is April 2.

JP Morgan Chase Bank, which administers the company's current debtor-in-possession loan, would be joined by another lender group led by two investment banks to do the refinancing.

Lawyers said in court papers that JP Morgan Chase Bank offered the best terms and would save time for the debtor since a new lender would need to examine the borrower's books.

In the separate equity investment plan, affiliates of three private equity investors, Appaloosa Management LP, Cerberus Capital Management LP and Harbinger Capital Partners Master Fund I, as well as Merrill Lynch & Co. and UBS Securities LLC, would buy shares in a restructured Delphi at a cost of between $1.4 billion and $3.4 billion.

The equity investment plan has been approved by the company, the investors and General Motors Corp., and would give the investors a minimum of 30 percent and up to 72 percent of the restructured company. The plan depends on consensual resolution of Delphi's labor agreements by Jan. 31.

GM was Delphi's parent company until the auto parts supplier was spun off in 1999. The automaker remains Delphi's biggest customer and has had a prominent role in negotiations. Delphi and its affiliates filed for bankruptcy protection in October 2005 under financial duress from a declining American auto industry.

Several parties in the case have objected to the equity investment plan, including Highland Capital Management LP, which has submitted a rival bid to buy shares it has said is worth $4.7 billion, and the acting U.S. Trustee in the case. The company's second-largest union, the official committee of equity security holders and the official committee of unsecured creditors also object.

The union representing the largest number of Delphi employees, the United Auto Workers, has not objected.

The investment agreement depends on Delphi and its unions reaching agreement on changes to their collective bargaining agreements. They have been the subject of out-of-court negotiations since early summer and representatives will hold a chamber's conference with the judge next Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0113777

CIVIL RIGHTS:

EEOC Says Prosecutor Wrongly Fired (BN)

By Val Walton, News Staff Writer

The Birmingham News (AL), January 6, 2007

The federal government has ruled that U.S. Attorney Alice Martin wrongly fired a former assistant prosecutor in 2002.

Martin fired Assistant U.S. Attorney Deirdra Brown-Fleming on grounds that she was "not a team player." The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission found the reason was "simply unworthy of credence." Instead, the EEOC found that Brown-Fleming's firing was retaliatory.

The EEOC said it is unclear whether Martin harbored a racist or sexist attitude toward Brown-Fleming, but found that Martin's assessment of Brown-Fleming's relationship with co-workers was tainted with the racist and sexist prejudices of Brown-Fleming's co-workers.

Brown-Fleming was described as rude and condescending, documents show.

The EEOC is requiring that the Department of Justice reinstate Brown-Fleming to her former job, with full back pay and other benefits. The amount of back pay was not announced. The commission also ordered the reinstatement of Brown-Fleming's former supervisor, Victor Conrad, who took steps to correct acts of racial hostility against Brown-Fleming and filed his own discrimination claim against the agency. He also is to be reinstated with back pay.

Brown-Fleming worked in the U.S. attorney's Huntsville office from 1998 until her May 2002 firing. Martin serves as U.S. attorney for the 31 northern counties and has offices in Birmingham and Huntsville.

In a Friday statement, Martin said the decision to remove Brown-Fleming was "not grounded on impermissible considerations."

She said the Department of Justice takes allegations of discrimination very seriously.

"We firmly support equal employment opportunity and combating illegal discrimination in the federal workplace," Martin said.

Martin's statement said the department will file a request for reconsideration. She declined further comment.

Brown-Fleming said that as the first black woman to be hired in the Huntsville office, she became aware of racially hostile activities against her as early as August 1998. She shared her concerns with Conrad, who is white.

Martin became U.S. attorney for Alabama's Northern District in 2001, replacing Doug Jones, who is now in private practice.

The EEOC found that the office took immediate and appropriate corrective action to address Brown-Fleming's hostile environment after learning of her allegations.

Brown-Fleming said Thursday what happened to her was not an isolated event.

Brown-Fleming maintained during her five-year legal battle against the Justice Department that she was fired in retaliation for helping Conrad with a discrimination claim against the office.

Brown-Fleming detailed instances of where she endured racially derogatory comments by an administrative assistant and a paralegal. Brown-Fleming said the paralegal sabotaged her work.

The EEOC agreed with Brown-Fleming, who lives in Huntsville, that reinstating her as a Justice Department employee in the northern district is "tantamount to placing her into a very antagonistic work environment." If Brown-Fleming chooses not to accept the reinstatement, the Justice Department is ordered to provide her the pay she would receive if she worked there.

Brown-Fleming said Thursday she expects to go back into the practice of law full time, but declined to give specifics.

The EEOC also requires the U.S. attorney's office to provide training related to anti-retaliation, discrimination and preventing and remedying harassment to all staff in Huntsville and Birmingham.

E-mail: vwalton@bhamnews.com

Alleged Jail Beating Spurs Suspensions (CHIT)

By Emma Graves Fitzsimmons, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 6, 2007

FBI probes 6 guards in Lake County, Ind.

Six guards at the Lake County Jail in Indiana were suspended Friday while local and federal officials investigate allegations that an inmate was beaten, officials said.

Lake County Sheriff Roy Dominguez said he believes a cover-up took place over the incident, which occurred Dec. 26. The inmate's injuries were severe enough that he was taken to a hospital and placed in intensive care, Dominguez said.

DOJ_NMG_0113778

The inmate, Tommy Ford, 40, lashed out verbally and physically at guards who were escorting him to see a visitor, according to an incident report filed later that day. In their report, the guards said Ford "was taken to the ground" and restrained after he struck one officer in the forehead and spit on another.

"This went above and beyond what is required to restrain an individual," the sheriff said. "This was abuse."

The sheriff said he was angry that he did not learn of the incident until Thursday.

The FBI is conducting a civil rights investigation of the alleged beating, said FBI spokesman Drew Northern. It is being handled as a "color of law" case, which looks into abuses of authority, he said.

The sheriff did not release the names of the correctional officers, who were suspended with pay, but said many were seasoned officers trained to deal with aggressive inmates.

Dominguez would not disclose the extent of Ford's injuries. He said only that Ford was hospitalized for several days and is now in the medical unit of the jail.

Ford's lawyer, Joann Price, said his family is planning to pursue legal action. Ford had "physical marks and signs of injury on his face" when she interviewed him, Price said.

Ford was being held in the Lake County Jail while waiting to be transferred to prison. In October, he was sentenced to 50 years in prison for the murder of a 15-year-old boy.

Dominguez said his office is looking into the possibility of a cover-up because the incident report did not contain information about the alleged beating.

The sheriff's office expects the investigation to last about a week.

---

efitzsimmons@tribune.com

6 Guards Suspended After Alleged Jail Beating (NWTIMES)

By Patrick Guinane

Northwest Times, January 6, 2007

CROWN POINT | Lake County Sheriff Roy Dominguez suspended six jail guards Friday accused of beating an inmate and sending the man to a local hospital's intensive care unit, the sheriff reported.

Tommy Ford, who is awaiting transfer to state prison to serve a 50-year sentence for murder, was hospitalized for "a few days" following the Dec. 26 incident, the sheriff said. He now is housed in the jail's medical unit.

Dominguez said he did not find out about the alleged assault until Thursday and that the investigation would explore whether officers attempted to cover up the incident.

The sheriff declined to discuss the extent of Ford's injuries, citing federal medical privacy law. Dominguez also would not name the jail officers, who were suspended with pay. He said the officers will remain suspended pending investigations by the sheriff's department and possibly the FBI.

"The allegations are very serious, and I intend to pursue them in an objective, timely and professional manner,"

Dominguez said. "The victim was assaulted and was taken to the hospital, treated and days later released."

Ford, who lists Gary addresses in court and jail records, is contemplating a civil lawsuit against the county, the sheriff's department and the individual officers, said Joann Price, an attorney with the Gary firm of Freeman-Wilson & Lewis-Shannon LLC.

"His injuries were quite severe. He still is experiencing a great deal of pain, and there is still some evidence of the extent of his injuries," Price said. "(The beating) was with implements (and) certainly with fists."

Dominguez said he requested an independent investigation Thursday and planned to meet Friday with local FBI officials. Commander Kathy Hrebenyak is leading the sheriff's department investigation, which Dominguez intends to forward to Lake County Prosecutor Bernard Carter.

Dominguez would not describe the actions the guards took against Ford, but said, "If they believe that somehow they can conduct themselves in this type of fashion and nothing's going to occur to them, they're sadly mistaken."

An incident report released by the sheriff's department shows that Ford became combative while being escorted to the visitation area of the jail at 1:40 p.m. Dec. 26. Ford called one officer a homosexual slur and -- when uncuffed for visitation -- punched another officer in the face after threatening to kill his mother, the report states.

Once back at his cell, Ford spat at one guard and tried to attack others, at which point three officers restrained him, the report states. Eleven responding officers are listed on the incident report.

Lake County Jail Guards Suspended After Beating (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

CROWN POINT, Ind. - Lake County's sheriff on Friday asked the FBI to investigate allegations that several jail guards severely beat a convicted murderer and then tried to cover it up.

Six jailers have been suspended with pay during the investigation, said Sheriff Roy Dominguez, who did not release the names of the guards.

The beaten prisoner, Tommy Ford, 40, was hospitalized in intensive care following the Dec. 26 attack in the county jail.

Dominguez would not disclose the extent of Ford's injuries or information about the beating. He would only say Ford that was hospitalized for "several days" and was in the jail's medical unit on Friday.

Dominguez said up to six jail staffers attacked Ford after he cursed guards who were escorting him to see a visitor.

"This went above and beyond what is required to restrain an individual," the sheriff said. "This was abuse."

Ford was convicted of murder in October and sentenced to 50 years in prison. He was being held at the jail awaiting transfer to a state prison.

Dominguez said his office was looking into the possibility of a cover-up because a report on the incident did not contain information about the beating.

He said he personally requested that the FBI investigate the attack.

"They will conduct an independent investigation," he said. "I want to assure members of the public that no stone will go unturned."

Federal Lawsuit Claims Racial Discrimination In Police Department (WP)

By Tom Jackman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Pay Practices, Hostile Work Environment Cited

Three black officers and one black civilian employee of the Falls Church Police Department have filed a federal civil rights suit against the city, claiming racial discrimination in the department's pay and promotion practices and a hostile work environment for black employees.

One officer alleged that a captain told her last year, "Do you know why the boundaries of Falls Church are 2.2 square miles? To keep the black people out." And the civilian employee, who heads the police dispatch center, said that white commanders "purposefully ignore calls from minority officers for help when on patrol" but do respond when requested by white officers.

The suit, filed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, adds another layer to the turmoil that has roiled the department since its officers union began complaining about internal problems in 2004. The union said that officers were evaluated on how many traffic tickets they wrote and that their weapons were faulty.

Over the summer, then-Chief Robert T. Murray fired the union president, Scott Rhodes. Last month, after the city was forced to rehire Rhodes, pay him a settlement and allow him to retire with full benefits, Murray retired. The city is searching for a new chief.

Acting Chief Harry W. Reitze said he had not seen the suit and could not comment specifically. "I'm really trying to lead the department in positive directions . . . and to continue to provide the highest level of services and safety to the community," Reitze said. "I'm doing my best to make sure the department is a positive place to work."

The plaintiffs are the officers union's new president, Markus Bristol, Cpl. Frank D. Hicks, Officer Derrica N. Wilson and civilian employee Carolyn A. Pendleton. The suit states that there are no African Americans above the rank of corporal and that Wilson is the only black female officer in the department's history.

Of the 30 sworn officers in the department, five are black, the suit says.

Bristol, a 10-year member of the department, was suspended with pay for four months last year after he and Rhodes publicly pointed out that officers' guns repeatedly misfired in training and that Murray was taking no action to repair or replace them. The suit states he was reinstated without explanation.

Bristol, 38, alleges in the lawsuit that, in conversations with fellow officers, "he is constantly reminded of his superiors' sentiments toward African-Americans, such as: they are lazy, they don't like to work, and they take too much time off."

Hicks, on the force for eight years, said he went on leave for treatment of a brain tumor in 2001. He later found that while he was away, his approved 7 percent pay raise had been reduced to 5 percent by Murray, the suit alleges.

In 2004, Hicks served as a trainer for new officers, without extra pay. But in 2005, Hicks said, white officers he had trained were sent to school for instruction on how to train and then replaced Hicks and were paid extra for the work.

Hicks also said he sometimes called for backup and other officers "wouldn't answer me."

DOJ_NMG_0113780

Christopher E. Brown, the plaintiffs' attorney, noted that the black officers frequently filed internal complaints about such treatment. "The command staff would do nothing about it," Brown said. "They'd ignore it."

Wilson, 28, joined the department in 2002 and, among other duties, supervises the city's crossing guards and performs background checks on applicants, but she said the department refuses to pay her a supervisor's salary. She said that she endured racist comments such as the one about the size of Falls Church and that she now suffers from migraine headaches caused by the stressful situation.

Pendleton, 49, joined the department in 1982 and has supervised communications for 15 years. But when she was assigned to also oversee the records unit in 2004, she said she was paid less than the white man who had held the records job, despite having more education and more employees to supervise.

Teel Given Copy Of Tape (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 6, 2007

GULFPORT - Attorneys for Ryan Teel have received a copy of videotaped images of the Feb. 4, 2006, assault on Harrison County jail inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr.

The tape, however, may not be enough for defense attorneys to persuade a federal review panel against seeking the death penalty when the former deputy stands trial on May 28, attorney Jim Davis said Friday.

Davis wanted prosecutors to hand over copies of witness statements, expert reports and other types of evidence so he can prepare to defend Teel in a "mini-trial" before a Justice Department panel in Washington. The government has a deadline of Feb. 16 to decide whether Teel's alleged involvement in Williams' fatal beating merits a possible death penalty.

On Friday, U.S. Chief Magistrate Judge John M. Roper ruled against Davis' request, citing a federal rule known as the Jencks Act. The rule, considered by some to be unconstitutional, restricts a defendant's access to witness statements until the witness has testified in court against him.

"They're going to eat my lunch," said Davis, referring to the review panel and federal trial attorney John Richmond. "This is going to hinder my ability to give (Teel) the best defense possible."

Roper said he does not agree with the Jencks Act, but said he will not circumvent it.

"We're in uncharted waters here," Roper said.

Federal death-penalty cases are rare in Mississippi. They're even rarer nationwide when the defendant is a former law enforcement officer.

Davis said the videotape, compiled from surveillance cameras in the jail booking room, is of poor quality. Facing the review panel without more information puts the defense at an unfair advantage, said Davis, who wants to know what government witnesses and experts are prepared to say.

"His client should know who was there," Richmond said. "His client was the officer in charge of the booking room that night."

Roper allowed one advantage: He ordered federal prosecutors to provide the defense with a list of people who appear on the videotape within a few days before the panel review.

Roper said the defense can study plea agreements to get a better idea of how to defend Teel before the review board. Roper said he also has seen the videotape.

Richmond said the government has been generous in providing more documents to the defense than it is required to provide months in advance of trial. Davis and co-counsel Keith Pisarich have also received more than 450 pages in documents, Richmond said.

Teel, who remains in custody, is accused of two counts: using excessive force in an attempt to kill Williams under color of law in deprivation of civil rights, and destruction, alteration or falsification of records in a federal investigation.

The count involving injuries resulting in death is punishable by any number of years to life in prison. It's the count the government could use to seek the death penalty.

The other count is punishable by up to 20 years in prison.

Four former corrections officers have pleaded guilty to conspiring to deprive jail inmates of their civil rights. Two of them were on duty the night Williams, 40, was beaten in the booking room. They have agreed to testify for the government.

The Jencks Act

A federal rule named for labor organizer Clinton Jencks allows the government to withhold witness statements from a defendant until a witness has first testified on direct examination at trial.

DOJ_NMG_0113781

Jencks, who led Mexican-American mineworkers in a 15-month strike for fair treatment in the 1950s, was given a five-year sentence for allegedly falsifying a non-communist document. The Supreme Court overturned the decision because the government refused to give the defense witness statements, including those of a paid informant who later recanted.

Congress later passed a rule in Jencks' name; Jencks portrayed himself in the movie "Salt of the Earth."

Gastonia Man Dies After Police Use Taser To Restrain Him (CO)

The Charlotte Observer, January 6, 2007

GASTONIA, N.C. - A 42-year-old man died early Friday after police officers used a Taser when he wouldn't cooperate during his arrest.

Calvin Thompson, of Gastonia, was found nude running on a city street, according to Gaston County Police Department. He disobeyed officers' commands and resisted arrest, police said.

Officers used a Taser to arrest Thompson, but he became unconscious when being placed in custody, police said.

Tasers are stun guns used by law enforcement officials as a non-lethal alternative to bullet-firing weapons. The U.S. Justice Department last year announced it would study a number of cases in which people died after being stunned by the weapons.

Officers said they provided Thompson with medical attention and found what appeared to be crack cocaine in his mouth. He was taken to Gaston Memorial Hospital, where he was pronounced dead.

The North Carolina Highway Patrol believes the vehicle Thompson was driving was involved in at least four separate collisions in a Gastonia subdivision before his arrest. A substance that appeared to be crack cocaine was found in the vehicle, police said.

The State Bureau of Investigation is looking into the incident and three Gastonia police officers were placed on paid administrative leave while the department conducts an internal investigation.

US Supreme Court Agrees To Hear Coca-Cola's Appeal In A Race Discrimination Case (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The U.S. Supreme Court on Friday agreed to consider a discrimination case in which a Coca-Cola bottling company fired a black employee.

Coca-Cola asked the Supreme Court to hear the lawsuit, which involves allegations that a supervisor of employee Stephen Peters was motivated by racial bias and influenced a manager to fire the worker.

Such circumstances are sometimes referred to as "cat's paw" or "rubber stamp" liability. Coca-Cola fired Peters for insubordination after he refused a request to work on a weekend during his scheduled days off.

The case was one of seven appeals the court accepted Friday.

A federal appeals court reinstated a lawsuit brought on Peters' behalf by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The appeals court said a federal judge placed too much emphasis on the fact that Peters' immediate supervisor made no express recommendation to fire him.

In asking the court to hear the case, the company asked the justices to consider when an employer may be held liable for intentional discrimination when the person who fired an employee harbored no discriminatory bias.

Peters worked at the Coca-Cola facility in Albuquerque, New Mexico.

Questionable Mission (WP)

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

A Christian Embassy campaign at the Pentagon tests constitutional boundaries.

"THERE ARE over 25,000 Department of Defense leaders working in the rings and corridors of the Pentagon. Through Bible study, discipleship, prayer breakfasts, and outreach events, Christian Embassy is mustering these men and women into an intentional relationship with Jesus Christ," a narrator explains toward the start of a promotional video for Christian Embassy, an offshoot of Campus Crusade for Christ that focuses on diplomats, government leaders and military officers. As a uniformed Air Force Maj. Gen. Jack J. Catton Jr. explains, "I found a wonderful opportunity as a director on the joint staff, as I meet the people that come into my directorate, and I tell them right up front who Jack Catton is . . . and my first priority is my faith in God, then my family and then country. I share my faith because it describes who I am."

Free exercise of religion doesn't stop at the entrance to the Pentagon or other government buildings; it's a right of those who occupy the upper rungs of government service as well as those in lower ranks. But when those in senior positions are moved to share their religious views with colleagues and subordinates, the tension between the twin constitutional guarantees -- the mandate of free exercise of and the prohibition against government establishment of religion -- comes into play. That tension is heightened in the military, with its emphasis on rank and command. It's important that both uniformed and civilian military leaders, whatever their religious views, take care that others who don't share their beliefs don't feel coerced or excluded as a result.

DOJ_NMG_0113782

The Christian Embassy video suggests that such sensitivity has not always been present. With its extensive, inside-the-Pentagon footage and interviews with senior officials and high-ranking officers in uniform, the video conveys a sense that the group's mission has been endorsed by the Pentagon; it carries no disclaimer. Robert Varney, the group's executive director, says the Pentagon chaplain's office gave permission for the filming and that it's no surprise that military officers, interviewed at work in the Pentagon, were in uniform. But following a complaint by the Military Religious Freedom Foundation, the video has been removed from Christian Embassy's Web site and the Pentagon is reviewing the matter. As it does so, it would be wise to consider not only whether the video and the Christian Embassy's other activities comply with the letter of Pentagon rules but also with the spirit of the Constitution its personnel are sworn to protect.

ANTITRUST:

Brooks Unit Sale Gets Antitrust Scrutiny (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 6, 2007

CHELMSFORD, Mass. --Brooks Automation Inc., which supplies hardware and software to the semiconductor industry, said Friday federal antitrust regulators asked for additional information about the pending sale of its software division to chip equipment maker Applied Materials Inc.

This is the DOJ's second request for both companies.

Brooks Automation and Applied Materials both plan to respond quickly to the request from the Department of Justice's antitrust division, which extends the waiting period until 30 days after the companies have complied. Brooks said it still hopes the $125 million deal can close in the first quarter.

Brooks Automation shares fell 9 cents to close at $14.57, while Advanced Materials shares fell 13 cents to close at $18.67, both on the Nasdaq.

A Buyout Duo Reads Potential In Newspaper (WSJ)

By Gregory Zuckerman

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Avista Likes Quality Of Star Tribune Brand; Thoughts of Rebound

Leveraged-buyout firms such as Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and Blackstone Group have been making news for their ambitious takeover deals.

But few of the headline-grabbing buyouts have been as gutsy as the $530 million planned purchase by Avista Capital Partners of McClatchy Co.'s Star Tribune newspaper, announced in late December1.

The deal for the nation's 15th-largest newspaper by circulation comes amid a slump in the business. The Star Tribune is especially challenged. It has been the worst-performing paper in terms of revenue for McClatchy, which paid $1.2 billion for the Minneapolis paper in 1998. The Star Tribune's ad revenue dropped about 6% last year on a circulation decline of about 4%.

Despite the ugly writing on the wall for the industry, the prospective purchase is the third-largest for New York-based Avista, a previously little-known private-equity firm that still is raising its first buyout fund and whose executives have never bought any newspaper properties.

Avista mightn't be a household name, but its founders, Thompson Dean and Steven Webster, have been well known in the buyout community for more than a decade. They ran a group that generated returns of about 50% from buyout investments for Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette, which was acquired by Credit Suisse in 2000. The pair left Credit Suisse 18 months ago to start Avista, which they hope will manage $1.5 billion.

The 48-year-old Mr. Dean, who is the son of a career foreign-service officer, was born in Taiwan and grew up in Asia, says they already have spent $850 million to make 11 buyout purchases, focusing on energy, media and health care. Mr. Webster, 55, is an energy specialist who had founded Falcon Drilling.

So what do they see with the Star Tribune deal that others in the buyout world missed? A very cheap price -- 6.5 times the paper's cash flow -- a respected brand and an industry that may be bottoming out and poised for a rebound. Avista passed on bidding for the Philadelphia Inquirer, which Mr. Dean says doesn't have comparable cash flow as the Star Tribune.

"We got a premium paper in a healthy market, and we paid a very attractive price," says Mr. Dean. "There is meaningful franchise value for top-20 papers. The risk is that readership continues its steady decline."

DOJ_NMG_0113783

The Avista team, which left Credit Suisse when the bank became wary of competing with its clients for large buyouts, is comfortable making contrarian bets. "Newspapers are poised to stabilize their revenue base, and advertising rates are stabilizing," Mr. Dean says. "People will continue to read newspapers."

Mr. Dean wouldn't address whether Avista will slash costs or lay off employees. "Newspapers have to recognize that they are operating in a different environment, with different pressures, declining readership and advertising pressures," he says. "We have to get additional revenue growth and do things more efficiently, but that may not be about staff cuts."

While public investors penalize newspaper companies for their lack of growth, private-equity investors generally are more concerned with steady cash flows. And newspapers usually don't have steep capital expenditures that soak up cash.

So if the Star Tribune's circulation stops declining and Avista can generate some growth for the paper's Web site, the firm might avoid significant cost cutting.

"To generate an acceptable return, we only need modest growth because of [the paper's] impressive high free-cash flow," and the low purchase price that Avista paid, Mr. Dean says.

Avista hasn't said how much of its fund's own cash it will use for the purchase price and how much of it will come from debt it will pile on the paper.

Avista's executives don't have any newspaper experience, but they are used to betting on overlooked media sectors. In the early 1990s the Avista team scored by buying the Argyle television group, which turned out to be a profitable investment, at a time "people said no one will watch network TV," Mr. Dean recalls. They also scored on radio purchases.

In May of last year, while the cable-television business was in Wall Street's doghouse, Avista bought WideOpenWest, the 13th-largest cable company in the U.S., the fund's first buyout. WideOpenWest, which focuses on cities like Detroit and Chicago, was grappling with savage competition and was sold by two buyout firms with broad media experience.

But cable stocks have taken off since the Avista purchase, WideOpenWest's cash flow is up almost 70% and people in the private-equity world describe the deal as a home run, at least so far.

Although Avista hasn't made previous newspaper acquisitions, it placed Chris Harte, a former Knight Ridder executive whose family is among the owners of San Antonio-based direct-marketing firm and publisher Harte-Hanks Inc., as the chairman of Star Tribune's holding company.

"If you analyze [the performance of Avista's team over time], you see consistent, strong investments with low volatility," says Daniel Cahill, who manages U.S. private-equity investments for Scotland's Standard Life Investments, one of Avista's first investors.

But Mr. Cahill notes that "spinning off from Credit Suisse will cause some distractions" for the group, as they continue to expand.

Write to Gregory Zuckerman at gregory.zuckerman@wsj.com2

Mercy 'no' To Proposal For Joint Hospital (DMR)

By Tony Leys

Des Moines Register, January 6, 2007

Iowa's largest health insurer, Wellmark, likes the idea, but there are worries about federal antitrust regulations.

One of Des Moines' two dominant hospital companies offered Friday to work with its rival to jointly build a single suburban hospital, but the rival declined.

The offer from Iowa Health-Des Moines comes as both that company and Mercy Medical Center move forward with plans to build hospitals next door to each other in West Des Moines.

The companies explored the possibility of a jointly owned suburban facility in 2002. Hospital leaders said they dropped the idea after federal regulators told them informally that it could run afoul of antitrust laws.

Wellmark Blue Cross/Blue Shield, Iowa's largest health insurer, suggested recently that the two companies attempt again to cooperate on a suburban hospital. Iowa Health agreed to try, but Mercy said no.

Wellmark Vice President Cliff Gold said his company believes a joint venture might be acceptable to federal regulators. "We're saying it's four or five years later, and a lot has changed," he said.

Gold said the Justice Department has been friendlier to such ideas lately. He also said his company, which is the largest private payer to both hospital companies, would help the hospitals make their case.

Wellmark fears that if two similar hospitals are built side-by-side in West Des Moines, health-care costs would be needlessly inflated. A joint venture would be a more economical option, Gold said.

Iowa Health Chief Executive Officer Eric Crowell wrote a letter to Wellmark Friday saying that his company would agree to a renewed attempt at a joint project, with several conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0113784

One condition was that the process include Broadlawns Medical Center, Polk County's public hospital. Iowa Health's current plans include giving Iowa Lutheran Hospital to Broadlawns, which would demolish its current facility.

Iowa Health also said that Mercy would have to put its suburban plans on hold, and that Wellmark would pay the legal costs of the request.

When the original joint proposal was made in 2002, Mercy Chief Executive Officer David Vellinga said the idea "just makes common sense."

But in a letter to Wellmark this week, Vellinga said Mercy was not interested now.

"This approach has been tried and, as you know, has been rejected by the (Department of Justice)," the letter said. "Our attorneys have advised us not to proceed with meetings to plan such a joint venture again as that would be contrary to the direction given by DOJ and, further, that it is extremely unlikely that the DOJ would reach a different conclusion in this matter."

Both systems have talked for years about building hospitals in the western suburbs. The jockeying has intensified in recent months, as Mercy and Iowa Health proposed closing Des Moines hospitals and replacing them with new facilities in West Des Moines. Both sides contend their plans do not need permission from state regulators, though Iowa Health has offered to seek such permission if Mercy would do the same. Mercy said no to that offer.

The Iowa Health Facilities Council, which judges large medical projects, is scheduled to meet Jan. 16 to consider whether the projects must be reviewed.

ENVIRONMENT:

Feds Drop Waste-water Inquiry (HTRIB)

By Paul Quinlan

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), January 6, 2007

No charges will be brought against workers involved in Venice utilities department dumping.

VENICE -- The Department of Justice will not file charges against any individuals involved in the city utilities department's 2001 waste-water dumping into Curry Creek, officials said Friday.

The announcement answers the question that lingered after the city pleaded guilty in December 2005 to a three-count felony violation of the Clean Water Act: Would those responsible for the dumping or the falsification of records during the subsequent cover-up go to jail?

Speculation centered on what court papers called the "Executive Group," a reference to the "high-level executives, managers, supervisors" who oversaw "the day-to-day operations" of the Eastside Wastewater Treatment Facility at the time of the dumping.

But the Department of Justice has closed its inquiry, leading the Environmental Protection Agency to drop its investigation.

A Department of Justice spokeswoman would not comment on why the department closed the case.

The Justice Department pulled the EPA off the case in a letter to EPA special agent Dan Green, who had handled the investigation.

"Their recommendation was not to pursue any individual defendants in this case, and the local U.S. Attorney's office went along with this," Green said.

When the city pleaded guilty in 2005, a judge imposed the minimum fine allowable, $110,000, or $5,000 for each of the 22 days that plant employees discharged waste water into the creek and sprayed it onto a field at Knights Trail.

As part of a deal with prosecutors, the city pledged its full cooperation in any further investigation of any current or past city employees.

City employees testified for months afterward.

City Manager Marty Black fumed over the Justice Department's decision to drop the inquiry Friday.

"We're very disappointed that the federal authorities have elected not to put the resources into this to finish out prosecution of the individuals who committed the crimes," said Black.

Despite the small fine that the charges carried, Black estimates the cost of the episode, including legal, consulting and engineering expenses, exceeds $2 million.

Last June, the city struck a deal with the EPA that would keep Venice off a blacklist of Clean Water Act violators.

The deal preserves the city's eligibility for federal contracts, assistance and loans for its water plant.

According to the plea agreement, city employees knowingly dumped the treated waste water into Curry Creek and sprayed it onto the Knights Trail field even though systems designed to measure and limit the flow were not working.

DOJ_NMG_0113785

City workers then submitted reports that falsified measurements of the discharge.

Members of the Executive Group later certified the accuracy of those reports.

The three utility workers who blew the whistle on the dumping later sued the city, saying they were harassed by supervisors after the incident.

The city settled, giving each $25,000 and a letter of apology.

The City Council purged the department in 2004, eliminating more than a dozen top positions and hiring a private company, Operations Management International, to run the department.

6 Ohio Cities Rush To File Suits Against Makers Of Lead Paint (NYT)

By Bob Driehaus

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

CINCINNATI, Jan. 5 — Racing against a proposed state law that would limit paint manufacturers' liability for lead poisoning in aging neighborhoods, Cincinnati has joined five other Ohio cities in filing suits that seek millions of dollars from the companies to clean up lead paint.

Ohio is the latest front in a battle that pits paint companies against cities and states struggling to overcome problems associated with lead poisoning.

The problems include learning impairment in children, high blood pressure in adults and, at high levels of exposure, seizures, comas and deaths.

Municipal and county governments in California, Mississippi, Missouri, New Jersey and Texas have also sued major manufacturers seeking what would amount to billions of dollars in damages.

Whether responsibility rests primarily with paint companies, landlords who let paint deteriorate or cities that fail to enforce housing codes remains an open question.

Rhode Island broke new ground in February by winning a jury trial that found that three paint companies had created a public nuisance and had to clean up lead-paint contamination throughout the state at an estimated cost of $1.37 billion to $3.74 billion.

The companies are seeking a new trial there and trying to fend off litigation throughout the country. They are Sherwin-Williams, based in Cleveland; NL Industries, part of Valhi of Dallas and whose predecessor National Lead made Dutch Boy paint; and Millennium Holdings of Hunt Valley, Md., a successor to a company that owned Glidden Paint, originally based in Cleveland.

"The movement is gaining steam," Jack McConnell, the lead lawyer in the Ohio lawsuits and a participant in the Rhode Island trial, said. "We've seen it both in the Rhode Island trial and in three or four appellate court decisions, all of which have ruled against the lead-paint industry."

Lawyers for paint companies say such suits unjustifiably shift responsibility from the cities that failed to enforce housing codes that would have kept lead paint from deteriorating and affecting residents.

"Did the companies know that lead was toxic?" asked Bonnie Campbell, who represents several paint manufacturers. "Sure, everybody knew that. What wasn't known was that property owners wouldn't take care of their property."

Ms. Campbell noted that most manufacturers voluntarily began removing lead from their products in 1955, when problems became apparent.

In Ohio, Gov. Bob Taft decided on Friday to allow a bill to become law without his signature that will ban future suits like those filed by the cities that are based on public nuisance grounds. Plaintiffs will instead have to rely on product liability law, which requires proof linking lead paint in a given home to a specific manufacturer. Noneconomic damages, including punitive damages, will be capped at $5,000 a consumer, instead of being unlimited.

Mr. Taft said that provision prevented him from signing the bill because the cap was too low.

Bill Would Permanently Bar Drilling In Alaskan Refuge (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Opponents of oil drilling in an Alaskan wildlife refuge are going on the offense after playing defense for a quarter of a century. They want the new Democratic Congress to make an oft-challenged drilling ban permanent.

Legislation introduced in the House on Friday would make the oil-rich 1.2 million-acre coastal strip of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge a permanently protected wilderness and end repeated efforts to open the area east of the Prudhoe oil field to energy companies.

"The consensus is that there should not be drilling in the refuge, so the logical next step is to pass legislation which turns it into a wilderness," Rep. Edward Markey, chief sponsor of the legislation, said in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0113786

The Massachusetts Democrat has introduced similar legislation in each of the last three congressional sessions. However, the House has approved drilling in the refuge a half dozen times, only to see the effort die in the Senate were supporters couldn't muster the 60 votes to overcome a likely filibuster.

This time, with Democrats in the majority and a number of moderate Republicans on record as opposed to drilling, Markey believe he has a good chance in the House to go one step farther and declare the refuge permanently off-limits to oil development.

A co-sponsor of the bill is Rep. Jim Ramstad, a Minnesota Republican.

Cindy Shogan, executive director of the Alaska Wilderness League, also says this time is different.

"What's changed is we won't have those daily assaults" from pro-drilling forces, she said. "We are definitely on the offense."

Environmentalists said they plan to mobilize the same people that have fought drilling proposals in past years behind the Markey-Ramstad legislation.

Two years ago, when Republicans expanded their majorities in both the House and Senate, the likelihood of opening the refuge to oil development gained new momentum. It already had been a top energy priority of President Bush since 2001.

"Many people had written the obituary for the refuge," said Melinda Pierce, legislative director of the Sierra Club. But a concerted push by pro-drilling forces fell short.

Now Markey believes the momentum is going the other way.

"We now have a majority of House members that have publicly said they oppose any drilling in the refuge. In the previous Congress we were battling the Republicans in the majority who wanted to drill."

Environmentalist know that in the Senate they will need 60 votes to get the wilderness designation, with the filibuster threat coming from Republicans this time. Sen. Ted Stevens, an Alaska Republican who has battled to open the refuge to oil drilling for a quarter century, has not given up.

The coastal strip of ANWR, as the refuge is commonly referred to, is believed to contain 10.5 billion barrels of oil, approaching the size of the Prudhoe Bay field to the west. At peak production the refuge could supply 1 million barrels a day by 2025, according to the Interior Department.

On the other hand, to environmentalists and conservationists the refuge's coastal strip represents the ultimate wild place to be protected. They compare it to the Serengeti in Africa because of the wildlife that abound: polar bears, musk oxen, caribou and millions of migratory birds that fly there as part of their annual migration.

Drilling proponents argue that modern technology can limit the footprint on the coastal tundra and develop the oil without disturbing the wildlife.

Bush, who called for opening the refuge during his 2000 presidential campaign, repeatedly has said its environment can be protected alongside oil rigs. He views the refuge's oil as essential to lessening America's dependence on foreign energy sources.

Markey disagrees.

"Our addiction to oil is real [but] drilling in the refuge would amount to a declaration that we remain in denial about this addiction," he said.

"There are some places in our world that are so rare and so special, that we have a responsibility to protect them."

Drill Ban Sought For Alaskan Park (BBC)

By David Willis

BBC.com, January 6, 2007

Legislation has been tabled in the United States aimed at making a ban on oil drilling at a wildlife refuge in Alaska permanent.

Wildlife campaigners are hoping the new Democrat-led Congress will adopt such a move, which has been rejected on several occasions in the past.

The legislation would make about 500,000 hectares of land along the Alaskan coast a protected wilderness.

It is rich in wildlife but also has more than 10bn barrels of oil.

Political shift

To many environmentalists the area represents probably the ultimate wild place in need of protection.

It has been compared to the Serengeti nature reserve in Africa because of its abundance of wildlife - polar bears, oxen, caribou and millions of migratory birds.

But it is also thought the area could supply up to one million barrels of oil a day at peak production.

US President George W Bush has said repeatedly that he believes it is possible to protect the environment while still allowing drilling to take place.

DOJ_NMG_0113787

He believes the area is essential for lessening US dependence on foreign energy sources.

Outlawing drilling in the area has been tried in the past without success.

But with Democrats now in the majority in the US Congress and a number of moderate Republicans on record as supporting the move, chief sponsor of the legislation, Representative Edward Markey, believes he stands a good chance of success.

DuPont Drops Plan For Nerve Gas Wastewater (NYT)

By Richard G. Jones

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

TRENTON, Jan. 5 — Bringing an abrupt end to a three-year fight between environmentalists and federal officials, the DuPont Company announced on Friday that it would not participate in an Army plan to dispose of wastewater from neutralized VX nerve gas by dumping it into the Delaware River.

The decision was a victory for environmentalists who questioned how placing wastewater from the neutralized form of the deadly nerve agent would affect the river. Created for use by the military, VX is considered one of the world's most toxic chemicals. Exposure to its active form can kill within minutes.

The Army plan involved bringing VX wastewater from a chemical treatment center in Newport, Ind., to a DuPont plant in Deepwater, N.J.

But, citing what was expected to be a long and contentious approval process by state environmental regulators, officials at E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Company said they would not take part in the effort.

"During our three-year evaluation of the Newport proposal, it has become increasingly clear to us that the approval process will be lengthy and arduous," Nicholas C. Fanandakis, a vice president and general manager at DuPont, said in a statement. "Therefore, we believe it is in the best interests of New Jersey and DuPont not to proceed."

The decision was hailed by elected officials and environmentalists on both sides of the Delaware, including Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey, who had questioned the plan in 2004 while he was a member of the United States Senate.

"It's now official," Mr. Corzine said in a statement. "VX will never be dumped in the Delaware River or any other New Jersey waterway. This is a decisive victory for the people of New Jersey. VX nerve agent is one of the world's most deadly chemical compounds, and dumping it in a river never made any sense."

Mr. Corzine credited the state's Congressional delegation, including Representative Robert E. Andrews, with helping to bring about the company's decision.

Mr. Andrews said that he and other members of the delegation had recently commissioned a report by the federal Government Accountability Office, to be released this month, to examine the soundness of the Army's proposal.

"I believe that forthcoming report played a role in DuPont's very commendable decision," Mr. Andrews said in a telephone interview.

Mr. Fanandakis said that DuPont abandoned the project despite endorsements for it by the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the Environmental Protection Agency.

A spokesman for the Army's chemical materials agency said that it would continue to review other options for disposing of the neutralized VX gas.

Mickey Morales, an Army spokesman, said in a statement that although federal officials were disappointed, they appreciated DuPont's work "in this effort to rid our nation of the threat associated with continued storage of these obsolete chemical weapons."

DuPont and the Army had been working together for the last few years on the plan to dispose of the waste. Because DuPont had not formally agreed to take on the project, the two sides had not entered into a contract, and no money related to the disposal of the waste was lost because of DuPont's decision.

The plan under consideration would have shipped waste from the Army's Newport Chemical Depot in Indiana to the DuPont plant, near the Delaware Memorial Bridge in South Jersey.

Workers at the depot neutralize the nerve gas in a process that includes mixing it with hot water and sodium hydroxide to form a nonlethal, but still caustic, material known as hydrolysate. Some compare its potency to that of household cleaning products.

The Army plan called for DuPont to remove any remaining harmful chemicals from the hydrolysate before dumping it into the Delaware. Mr. Morales said that the Army had neutralized little more than a third of its total stockpile of 1,269 tons of VX gas, and that the depot in Indiana was equipped to handle all of the hydrolysate wastewater expected to be produced.

DOJ_NMG_0113788

Environmentalists had received assurances that the water would not be harmful to the Delaware, but continued to question the Army plan. Late last month, a coalition of environmental groups from Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Kentucky filed suit against the Army.

On Friday, environmentalists in New Jersey and Pennsylvania welcomed the DuPont decision.

“This is a great day for the river and the people of New Jersey, Delaware and the states that the nerve agent waste would have been trucked through,” said Maya van Rossum of the Delaware Riverkeeper Network, a plaintiff in the suit. “This is the right decision by DuPont.”

Jeff Tittel, executive director of the New Jersey chapter of the Sierra Club, said: “They had a lot of nerve to dump on New Jersey. I’m glad they realized this was a bad idea.”

Mercury "Hot Spots" Identified In U.S. And Canada (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Two newly published scientific reports suggest that mercury contamination has created at least five "hot spots" in New England and Canada, places where the neurotoxin has accumulated in fish and wildlife to such an extent that it could harm human health and local ecosystems.

The 11 scientists, who work at institutions including Syracuse University and Vermont's Department of Environmental Conservation, analyzed how mercury has accumulated in two indicator species in the northern United States and southern Canada. In both cases, they were able to identify several regions where mercury in yellow perch and common loons was above acceptable levels.

David C. Evans, who heads a Maine-based nonprofit group called the BioDiversity Research Institute and is one of the papers' lead authors, said the study shows that some areas of the country are more susceptible to mercury pollution than others.

"You need to look at the fish and wildlife to understand what areas are problematic," Evans said. "A coal-burning plant in a wetland area would have far greater impact on human health and wildlife than a coal-burning plant in a dry, grassy area."

Taken together, the two papers, published in this month's edition of the peer-reviewed journal BioScience, represent the most comprehensive ecological analysis of mercury accumulation ever conducted in the United States. They are significant because the Environmental Protection Agency has created a system requiring electric utilities to cut their mercury emissions 70 percent by 2025 but allowing power plants to trade pollution credits in reaching that target.

Under the Clean Air Mercury Rule, power plants in some regions may emit more mercury than others, which has prompted some to question whether the new system will result in mercury hot spots across the country.

One EPA official, who spoke on the condition that he not to be identified because of agency rules, said the two papers raise questions about the system, which will begin to take effect in 2010. In the 2005 federal notice announcing the rule, the agency wrote that it would "evaluate and take appropriate action" if more information emerged about mercury hot spots.

"There's a growing body of evidence that there are places where mercury deposition is a serious problem," the official said. "This is something that needs to be looked at very carefully before putting in a cap-and-trade system."

But EPA spokeswoman Jessica Emond said the agency remains committed to the rule.

"U.S. mercury air emissions have dropped by 45 percent since 1990," Emond said. "Under the Bush administration, the U.S. is the first nation in the world to regulate mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants."

Scott Segal, a lobbyist who represents electric utilities, noted that when the nation adopted a cap-and-trade system for sulfur dioxide, the largest polluters cleaned up fastest.

"Nothing in the report establishes a basis for changing course away from trading systems for mercury control like the one found in the Clean Air Mercury Rule," Segal said. "A well-designed cap-and-trade program remains the most appropriate response to dealing with mercury emissions from power plants."

But the researchers said their findings suggest that local and regional emissions can have a serious impact on local wildlife and human health. They identified five regions as "biological mercury hot spots," including New York's Adirondack Mountains, the Merrimack River in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, Maine's Androscoggin and Kennebec rivers, and central Nova Scotia.

The Senate’s Task On Warming (NYT)

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

Here are a few bulletins from planet Earth:

Dec. 12 — Exhaustive computer simulations carried out at the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo., suggest that the Arctic Ocean will be mostly open water in the summer of 2040 — several decades earlier than expected.

DOJ_NMG_0113789

Scientists attribute the loss of summer ice largely to the buildup of carbon dioxide and other man-made greenhouse gases in the atmosphere.

Dec. 14 — Experts at NASA's Goddard Institute predict that 2006 will be the fifth-warmest year since modern record-keeping began, continuing a decades-long global warming trend caused, again, by the buildup of man-made carbon dioxide.

Dec. 27 — The Interior Department proposes adding polar bears to the list of threatened species because of the accelerating loss of the Arctic ice that is the bears' habitat. The department does not take a position on why the ice is melting, but studies supporting the proposed listing identify greenhouse gases as the main culprit, adding that if left unchecked these gases will create ice-free Arctic summers in three decades.

But we knew that.

One can only assume that the Senate's new Democratic leadership is paying attention. California's Barbara Boxer is the new chairwoman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, replacing James Inhofe, the Oklahoma Republican who regards global warming as an elaborate hoax drummed up by environmentalists and scientists in search of money. Ms. Boxer has already scheduled hearings, and there will be no shortage of legislative remedies to consider. All share one objective, which is to attach a cost to carbon dioxide through a cap on emissions.

The underlying logic is that if people and industries are made to pay for the privilege of pumping these gases into the atmosphere, they will inevitably be driven to developer cleaner fuels, cleaner cars and cleaner factories.

This is the path most developed countries have chosen. Europe has imposed caps on industrial emissions, and European companies have begun investing in new technologies and cleaner factories in places like China, partly as a way to meet their own obligations to cut emissions and partly as a way to lead China to a greener future.

These hearings need to be conducted in a thoughtful manner. There has been enough noise, from the Inhofe right and from the doomsayers who see each hurricane as a sign the apocalypse is upon us. But it is also important that Ms. Boxer and her colleagues not lose sight of a fundamental reality: Saturating the atmosphere with greenhouse gases is loading the dice in a dangerous game.

The Navy's War On Whales (LAT)

By Jean-Michel Cousteau, Michael Jasny

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The Navy should be required to minimize whale deaths when testing sonar equipment, which can wreak havoc on marine life.

LAST JULY, with ships off Hawaii poised to begin one of the Navy's largest training exercises, a federal judge in Los Angeles temporarily halted use of a dangerous type of military sonar — called midfrequency active sonar, or MFA sonar, used to detect submarines — that has been linked to mass strandings and deaths of whales around the world. The Navy was allowed to proceed with its exercises only when it agreed to take significant, common-sense measures to protect whales and other marine species, such as staying away from the newly designated Northwestern Hawaiian Islands Marine National Monument. This outcome showed that the Navy can, if ordered to do so, achieve its training objectives while making strides to protect the marine environment.

Yet now, in training exercises planned for California's coastal waters, the Navy is proposing to abandon its commitment to safeguard whales and their habitat from high-intensity sonar. It has submitted an application to the California Coastal Commission to conduct two years of intensive MFA sonar training off Southern California without committing to measures that effectively protect the state's rich marine life. The commission is scheduled to make a final decision next week. The proposed training would take place in some of the most diverse and biologically rich waters off the continental United States — waters that host blue whales, humpbacks, gray whales, dolphins, porpoises and other sensitive and iconic California species.

That MFA sonar can cause serious injury and death to whales is beyond reasonable scientific dispute. Sonar has been associated with mass strandings off Hawaii, Alaska, the Bahamas, the Virgin Islands, Japan and numerous other sites. In 2004, at a symposium by the International Whaling Commission, more than 100 whale biologists reported that the association between sonar and whale deaths "is very convincing and appears overwhelming." The same year, an expert panel commissioned by the Navy reached the same conclusion.

Despite the proven dangers, the Navy persists in thinking that sonar training doesn't pose a significant threat to the environment, and so objects to adequate precautions. The Navy asked the commission in effect to rubber-stamp its application without any real information about steps it will or won't take to protect marine life.

The Navy should not be permitted to conduct, and the commission must not approve, dangerous sonar training without assurances that the Navy will take meaningful steps to protect whales and other marine life.

DOJ_NMG_0113790

Such steps include avoiding key whale habitats, such as the Channel Islands National Marine Sanctuary; turning off sonar if whales get too close; limiting training in low-visibility conditions, in which whales cannot be detected; and taking other common-sense measures to minimize the risk of more whale deaths. The Coastal Commission has the power to make these demands. Indeed, in a 40-page report issued last week, the commission's staff recommended such measures.

The Coastal Commission was created 35 years ago by a vote of the people to act as the state's independent voice for the conservation and management of our greatest economic and environmental resource — our coast and coastal waters. When the Navy requests permission to train in our coastal waters, it cannot reasonably refuse to protect those waters and the marine life that thrives there. The commission must insist that it do so.

JEAN-MICHEL COUSTEAU is founder and president of Ocean Futures Society in Santa Barbara. MICHAEL JASNY is a senior policy analyst with the Natural Resources Defense Council in Los Angeles.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Agent Named To Lead FBI's Miss. Operations (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 6, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - Frederick T. Brink has been appointed the special agent in charge of the FBI in Mississippi, the federal law enforcement agency announced Friday.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said Brink replaces John G. Raucci, who left Friday for a position at the agency's headquarters in Washington.

Raucci had led the FBI's Jackson division since July 18, 2005.

Brink joined the FBI in 1985. Before that he was a military instructor and a shipboard surface warfare officer with the Naval Academy, which he graduated from in 1978.

His field office assignments have been in Tampa, Honolulu and Hawaii.

Brink has also served at the FBI's Operational Technology Division, located at Quantico, Va., and overseas at the U.S Embassy in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia.

In June 2005, Brink was promoted by Mueller to special agent in charge of the FBI's Special Operations Division in New York.

He comes to Mississippi from that post.

There are nine resident offices of the FBI in Mississippi.

Brink To Become New FBI Chief In Miss. (JCL)

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, January 6, 2007

Fred Brink, a graduate of the U.S. Naval Academy and 21-year FBI veteran, today was named the new special agent in charge of the FBI's Jackson Division.

Brink is coming to Mississippi from his post as special agent in charge of the FBI's special operations division in New York.

He succeeds John G. Raucci, who will move to FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C. next week as assistant director of the agency's human resources division. There are 34,500 FBI employees and "we still turn away thousands every year," Raucci said.

In his first assignment in the South, Raucci said there was excellent cooperation between the FBI and state and local law enforcement agencies throughout Mississippi.

Stephen F. Gomez will serve as acting special agent in charge for a few weeks, said FBI spokesman Jason Pack. Gomez has worked in the FBI's Jackson office.

Overseeing FBI operations in Mississippi, Raucci served in the Jackson office since July 18, 2005.

Mississippi's FBI chief oversees nine offices statewide.

Former FBI Top Agent Gets Prison Sentence (ELPT)

By Louie Gilot, El Paso Times

El Paso Times, January 6, 2007

Former FBI special agent in charge Hardrick Crawford was sentenced Friday to six months in prison, making him probably the first person of his rank to do hard time.

At the sentencing hearing, U.S. District Judge Philip Martinez said that he liked Crawford, and that seeing the government man in court had been "painful."

But Martinez opted for a sentence at the high end of the sentencing guideline. He could have decided on probation.

"This is a sad day. It's a sad day for your family. It's a sad day for me," Martinez said.

Crawford was convicted in August of making false statements regarding gifts he received in an Office of Government Ethics Public Financial Disclosure Report submitted to the FBI.

Crawford was also found guilty of concealing material facts from the FBI about his friendship with Jose Maria Guardia, a Juárez racetrack owner.

He was acquitted of three charges, including that he made false statements to investigators looking into the friendship.

Crawford will remain free on bond until 2 p.m. March 5, when he is must surrender and start his prison sentence. Crawford did not want to comment after the sentencing and has not decided whether to appeal, said his lawyer, Mary Stillinger.

Advertisement

FBI officials said they did not recall any other special agent in charge of the FBI who was sent to prison. Retired and active FBI agents from around the country followed the sentencing outcome online. Agents even wrote some of the 70 letters submitted to Judge Martinez in Crawford's behalf.

One letter writer was former city Rep. Dusty Rhodes, who said Friday's sentence was "harsh and unnecessary."

"He's suffered enough. His career is ruined. He's broke. What else can you do to him?" Rhodes said.

Many retired law enforcement officers enjoy a second career as security consultants, a path that is now closed for Crawford, as Martinez pointed out during the hearing.

Crawford, who was the special agent in charge of the El Paso FBI office from July 2001 to November 2003, met Guardia in 2002, when Guardia was a FBI informant for a short time.

The two became as close as brothers, according to trial testimony. At one point during their friendship, Crawford vouched for Guardia's character at a news conference in Juárez after Guardia was accused of having ties to drug trafficking and money laundering.

Crawford's involvement drew the ire of Mexican officials, who saw it as meddling and triggered the U.S. investigation that led to the prosecution.

Prosecutors also accused Crawford of improperly accepting gifts from Guardia, such as a job for Crawford's wife, a membership at the Coronado Country Club and three family trips to Las Vegas.

During his trial, Crawford sought to show that he was manipulated by Guardia but that he did nothing illegal or unethical.

Friday, he addressed the court.

"I stand tall before you this morning, ... proud of my U.S. Army service, proud of my Beachwood, Ohio, (police) service and proud of my FBI service. However, I believe my love for my wife and my friendship clouded my judgment and made me vulnerable," he said.

When Martinez asked him to name something he had done wrong, Crawford said he should have "micromanaged" his wife's employment with Guardia. Crawford's wife, Linda Crawford, burst into tears during her husband's statement.

Martinez said that he had problems with some aspects of the case, including Crawford's statements that he had never heard any negative information about Guardia even though he had been briefed by some of his agents about suspicions surrounding the Mexican businessman.

Martinez also said that Crawford had been selective with information when interviewed by investigators, that he had been confusing about whether the Juárez news conference had been planned and that it wasn't clear how he supposedly repaid Guardia for the Vegas trips.

Martinez also sentenced Crawford to three years of supervised release, a $10,000 fine and 200 hours of community service.

The El Paso FBI office reacted to the sentencing of a popular boss with sadness and resignation Friday.

"We respect the federal justice system, which we in the FBI have sworn to uphold," spokeswoman Andrea Simmons said. "While we are saddened by this entire situation, we believe that justice was served."

Assistant U.S. Attorney James Blankinship said investigators did their job as if Crawford were any low-level employee, such as letter carriers or prison guards who "get in a bad situation and lie about it."

Where Crawford will serve his time had not been decided Friday. For his safety, he would not have to stay in the area where he worked, a standard rule for imprisoning former law enforcement officers.

Louie Gilot may be reached at lgilot@elpasotimes.com, 546-6131.

Former El Paso FBI Chief Sentenced To 6 Months In Prison (DMN/AP)

Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, January 6, 2007

EL PASO – The former head of the FBI's El Paso bureau was sentenced Friday to six months in federal prison for lying to investigators about his relationship with a Mexican race track owner.

Hardrick Crawford Jr. was convicted last year of concealing information about his association with Jose Maria Guardia and of making false statements on federal financial disclosure reports about gifts he received from Guardia.

He was sentenced to six months on each count by U.S. District Judge Philip R. Martinez and will serve the terms concurrently. He also was ordered to serve three years of supervised release and fined $10,000.

Crawford, who left his job in 2003, was acquitted of three charges of lying to investigators. He faced up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Drug Agents Mishandled Seized Cash, Audit Finds (DCEX)

By Bill Myers, The Examiner

DC Examiner, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - Drug Enforcement Administration agents routinely disregarded agency rules on the handling of seized cash, jeopardizing hundreds of millions of dollars taken in drug raids, a Justice Department review found.

In an audit published Friday, Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine examined thousands of seizures between October 2003 and November 2005.

Fine's report states that drug agents rarely counted the cash they took, often didn't provide receipts for seized money, rarely recorded the seizures in agency ledgers and often didn't ask their colleagues to witness their counting and handling of the money.

DEA agents recorded more than 16,000 seizures for nearly $616 million in the period surveyed, the report states.

"Cash seized by the DEA is at risk because of the DEA's failure to consistently implement and document controls over the seized cash," Fine's spokeswoman, Cynthia Schnedar, said in an e-mail to The Examiner.

The lack of internal controls over the seized cash leads to accusations of theft by the agents, the report states.

The DEA opened internal investigations of 33 agents between 2003 and 2005, Fine's report states. In 11 of those cases, the agents didn't follow agency guidelines on handling, processing or disposing of the evidence, the report states.

"DEA takes the OIG recommendations seriously and is taking prompt actions to address them," agency spokesman Steven Robertson said.

Anyone with information on the DEA or the Justice Department's Inspector General can call 202-459-4956.

bmyers@dcexaminer.com

Federal Agencies To Help Fight Violence (FLSUNSEN)

By Jerome Burdi, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 6, 2007

The upsurge in gang violence in Palm Beach County is like a nightmare from 15 years ago when drive-by shootings were commonplace, officials said.

So the county Violent Crimes Task Force has turned to the same remedy it did in the 1990s: Federal prosecution, Sheriff Ric Bradshaw said Friday.

Local law enforcement and federal agencies -- including the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the Drug Enforcement Administration -- have joined forces because criminals are more likely to do time and more of it under federal guidelines, Bradshaw said.

"You always try to bring state and federal law enforcement together and use whatever advantages are available," said Dale Armstrong, ATF resident agent in charge in West Palm Beach.

Working with federal agencies is nothing new for local departments, but since the county task force was re-formed in April, its focus has been on gangs, Bradshaw said.

"We're confident we're going to make an impact," he said.

The New Year started off with bullets and blood, the same way 2006 ended.

On Christmas Eve, a simmering battle between rival gangs left one man shot to death in the Boynton Beach Mall. On New Year's Day gunmen drove down a residential street in Riviera Beach, fired at least 37 shots and killed an 8-month-old baby strapped in a car safety seat.

On Wednesday night, a deaf man was killed in a spray of bullets in Belle Glade. His back turned to the masked gunmen, Ziatavian Griffin, 22, didn't hear everyone on the busy street scatter. Investigators said he might not have been the target.

Bradshaw said that law enforcement will take a more proactive approach to identify gang members and prevent crime, that the federal system can impose stiffer jail sentences and fines and that witnesses are protected from defendants until trial. This prevents witness tampering, one of the most common tactics used by suspected gang members to derail cases against them, he said.

"These people have no regard for life," Bradshaw said.

Anonymity helps, said Riviera Beach Assistant Chief David Harris. Harris led the task force in 1991 for about nine months, making over 300 cases against suspected gang members; about 60 were drive-by shooting cases, he said. All but one shooting case ended in conviction, he said.

"The drive-bys just stopped," Harris said. "It was the federal intervention that prosecuted these guys and kept them in jail."

Once people in the community took notice that criminals were staying in jail, witnesses started coming forward, he said. Three months into the collaborative effort one woman brought him six high-powered guns, Harris said.

"`I was afraid my boyfriend was going to kill me. Now I know he's going to jail so here's the weapons,'" he recalled her saying.

Anyone with information on gang activity should call Crime Stoppers at 800-458-8477.

FBI Seeks Information On Device At Church Advocate Westside Bureau (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 6, 2007

The FBI is offering a reward of up to $5,000 for information leading to the arrest and indictment of those responsible for placing an explosive device at Erwinville Baptist Church.

The device was discovered outside the church at 5:19 p.m. New Year's Eve.

The West Baton Rouge Sheriff's Office was notified, and deputies called the State Police Hazardous Materials Unit.

Deputies closed off La. 413 and the State Police team detonated the device about 9 p.m.

FBI crime scene investigators went to the location Monday to collect possible evidence, West Baton Rouge Parish Sheriff Mike Cazes said.

Debris from the detonated device, described as a pipe bomb, was sent to the FBI Crime Lab at Quantico, Va.

Jim Bernazzani, special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans Division, asked that anyone with information about the incident call the Baton Rouge office of the FBI at (225) 291-5159.

IMMIGRATION:

Troops Flee From Border Outpost (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

Armed men overran a National Guard observation post along the U.S.-Mexico border in Arizona this week, forcing the soldiers to retreat and prompting an investigation by the U.S. Border Patrol that has focused on the intruders' identity.

No shots were exchanged and no one was injured in the incident, which occurred shortly after 11 p.m. on Wednesday. The National Guard troops were members of an entry-identification team, assigned to monitor major illegal-alien and drug-smuggling corridors.

After forcing the soldiers to flee, the unidentified men retreated into Mexico.

National Guard Sgt. Edward Balaban said the troops did not know how many men were involved in the attack "because obviously it took place in the dark." He said National Guard officials are investigating the incident and will determine shortly whether to change any procedures for troops at the border.

The Border Patrol probe has focused on determining who the armed men were, what they were doing and why they approached the observation post, which is located near Sasabe, Ariz., in one of this country's major alien and drug-smuggling corridors. The outpost sits on a hillside overlooking the border and is covered by a tent and camouflage netting.

Several Border Patrol agents in the area told The Washington Times yesterday the armed men might have been trying to find out what the Guard troops would do if they were confronted by drug or alien smugglers. They said the increased presence of troops and additional Border Patrol agents in recent months had frustrated many of the area's drug and alien smugglers.

"I guess they got their answer," said one veteran agent. "When in doubt, the troops will run."

DOJ_NMG_0113794

Earlier this year, several Border Patrol agents said they had been assigned to guard National Guard personnel, given standing orders to be within five minutes of the troops deployed along the border. The agents, who referred to the assignment as "the nanny patrol," said most of the Guard troops are not allowed to carry loaded weapons, despite a significant increase in violence directed at Border Patrol agents during the past year.

Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar disputed the assertions, saying only that "a small percentage" of his agents were working as "force protection" for the Guard members. He said those agents also were performing their traditional border-enforcement functions.

National Guard troops taking part in Operation Jump Start are not empowered to get involved in law-enforcement duties. They cannot detain, arrest or interdict anyone or anything coming across the border -- only report them to the Border Patrol.

The Sasabe area has been the busiest in the Tucson, Ariz., Border Patrol sector for marijuana seizures. Agents have seized 124,000 pounds of the drug there since Oct. 1, said Rob Daniels, spokesman for the Border Patrol's Tucson Sector.

"We don't know if this was a matter of somebody coming up accidentally on the individuals, coming up intentionally on the individuals, or some sort of a diversion," Mr. Daniels said, adding that the increased presence of Guard and Border Patrol personnel had made it more difficult to smuggle drugs and people and "that heightened frustration may have been connected to what took place."

About a third of the 6,000 National Guard troops now deployed along the 1,951-mile U.S.-Mexico border as part of President Bush's $760 million "Operation Jump Start" are assigned to entry-identification teams. They have been deployed from California to Texas to upgrade border security and give the Border Patrol time to recruit, hire and train 6,000 new agents by the end of 2008.

Minuteman Civil Defense Corps President Chris Simcox, whose volunteers have staked out the Sasabe area for the past two years, said MCDC will increase its activity today with dozens of members expected to stand alongside Guard troops.

"I am not at all shocked by this incursion; our president and federal government have sent these lawbreakers a message of immunity if caught and a helping hand to accomplish their criminal goals," he said. "Our nation is being overrun by the influx of illegal aliens as well as drug cartels that show no signs of fear in crossing our border."

Chief Aguilar has called the troops "a vital asset in the effort to protect America from future terrorist attacks and mitigate illegal border incursions." In addition to providing border security, the troops are building roads and fences, adding cameras and sensors, conducting aerial reconnaissance, providing medical aid and communications support, and assisting at highway checkpoints.

Hockey-Coach Quota (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

The University of Alaska Anchorage Seawolves hockey team is on a roll, and interim coach Dave Shyiak is a top candidate for coach of the year in the Western Collegiate Hockey Association.

But the team has a big problem. Mr. Shyiak was born in Canada and is working as a so-called temporary H1-B professional worker. His visa is expiring and U.S. immigration officials fret that this foreigner may be taking a job from an American citizen. So the university must comply with rules that require it to verify that there is no American worker who is "able, willing, qualified, and available to accept the job at the prevailing wage for that occupation." The university is taking out newspaper ads for the hockey team's head-coach position and hoping no one applies.

"He's a very, very good coach," athletic director Steve Cobb tells us. "He's worked hard, paid his taxes, and done everything he's supposed to do. The system doesn't make sense." No kidding. What's next? Deporting superstars Dirk Nowitzki (Germany) and Steve Nash (Canada) from the NBA?

We have here a microcosm of the lunacy of America's immigration laws, and industries a lot more vital to America's economy than sports are harmed. Nearly one-third of science and engineering Ph.D.s working in places like Silicon Valley are the top minds from foreign nations, according to a study from the National Bureau of Economic Research. Many are also here on H1-B visas. Companies are required to spend tens of thousands of dollars in legal fees, advertising expenses and long delays to secure visas for the talented people they need. And the demand for these specialty visas is two to three times higher than the 65,000 per year allotted by Congress.

This is all supposed to protect jobs for Americans, but these immigrants are job creators. A new study from the University of California Berkeley found that in 2005 talented immigrants helped start businesses, mostly in high-tech, with sales of nearly $50 billion a year and tens of thousands of new jobs. The study concludes: "Immigrants have become a driving force in the creation of new businesses and intellectual property in the U.S."

DOJ_NMG_0113795

Scott McNealy, Chairman of Sun Microsystems, recently implored Congress to raise H1-B visa numbers, noting that two of Sun's co-founders were immigrants who have created tens of thousands of jobs. "Why would you have an arbitrary number of smart people?" he asks. A lot of hockey fans in Anchorage are asking the same question.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Tightens Disclosure Rules For Pet Projects (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — The House voted on Friday to pull the shadowy tradition of Congressional earmarking into the daylight, requiring lawmakers to attach their names to the pet items they slip into spending or tax bills and certify that they have no financial interest in the provisions.

More than any of several ethics rules adopted by the House this week, the earmark measure could prevent the kind of corruption that led to several big scandals in recent years, including former Representative Randy Cunningham's sale of earmarks to government contractors for cash, gifts and campaign contributions.

The cost of earmarks has tripled in the last 12 years, to more than $64 billion annually. Some lawmakers treated their share of that money as personal accounts to dole out to constituents or, in many cases, campaign contributors.

In what lawmakers of both parties called a recognition of the backlash against such corruption in the November elections, the earmark rule the Democrats passed extends far beyond the proposal they introduced last spring and campaigned on in the fall. That proposal applied only to earmarks that are typically already well publicized.

It also goes further than a measure the Republicans passed just weeks before the November election. As in other efforts to change the earmarking process, the Republican leaders foundered against the opposition of the powerful Appropriations Committee, which doles out earmarks as it writes spending bills.

The vote on the new earmark measure was linked to a rule known as "pay as you go" that would prohibit the House from increasing the deficit by passing any new tax cuts or entitlement spending programs without offsetting them with spending cuts or tax increases.

Republicans denounced the "pay as you go" rule as an excuse for Democrats to increase taxes. "I call it the Flip Wilson rule," said Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana, referring to the comedian whose signature line was, "The devil made me do it."

Still, the changes were approved by a vote of 280 to 152, with 48 Republicans joining all 232 Democrats.

On the subject of earmarks, Mr. Pence and several other Republicans commended the Democrats as heeding the message the voters sent at the polls. "We went through an election where voters were rightfully outraged" by the practice of earmarking, said Representative Paul D. Ryan, Republican of Wisconsin.

In a signal that they, too, had heard the message, the Republican minority incorporated the same changes into the token alternative they proposed before the Democratic majority passed the new House rules.

"I'm pleased that Democrat leaders agree with Republicans that earmark reform is a critical issue," Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader, said.

Even as the Democrats were passing the strict new disclosure rules, however, at least one influential chairman suggested that he was less than fully committed to the full breadth of their application.

The rules would require lawmakers to disclose their sponsorship of not only spending earmarks but also narrowly focused tax or tariff reductions affecting fewer than 10 companies or people — something the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee had resisted just as the Appropriations Committee had for spending provisions.

After the vote on Friday on the new rule, Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York, the new Ways and Means Committee chairman, suggested that such resistance had not disappeared.

"You have to assume that everything we have done is subject to a revisit," Mr. Rangel said. "We support the speaker and her drive to get things done within 100 hours," he said, referring to Speaker Nancy Pelosi. But, he added, "These things are not locked in cement."

Mr. Rangel and other Democrats also acknowledged that the adoption of the pay-as-you-go rules would force tough choices when it came to delivering on campaign promises like new education subsidies, some of which would fall under the rules.

DOJ_NMG_0113796

In particular, the rules will make it more difficult to repair the alternative minimum tax, which, thanks to inflation, penalizes millions of middle-class households as well as its original targets, the rich. Repairing the tax is estimated to cost as much as $1 trillion in lost revenue over 10 years.

Mr. Rangel said he was determined to find $1 trillion of tax revenue elsewhere to pay for the repair, as much as possible by eliminating outdated tax loopholes. "You have to throw it right in the middle of the tax code and say, 'We are removing this,' and then you have to find the money," he said.

In a meeting with reporters, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the House majority leader, promised that Democrats would cut the number of earmarks in half in the next budget, for the 2008 fiscal year. But several Democrats emphasized that the new rules would not alone reduce the amount of earmarks, but could result in more restraint.

Lawmakers already race to take credit for earmarked projects for their districts. But it has often been impossible for outsiders to learn who sponsored earmarks no one took credit for, and unclaimed earmarks were often the ones that played a role in corruption scandals. The new rules will require disclosure of all earmarks in a bill, as well as their sponsors, their purpose and their costs. The rules will also prohibit party leaders from trading earmarks for members' votes.

In contrast to the past opposition of appropriations chairmen, Representative David R. Obey, the Wisconsin Democrat who now leads the committee, was a driving force behind the earmark rule, several Democrats involved in the matter said.

Mr. Obey said Friday that over the last 12 years of Republican control the number of earmarks in the labor, health and education spending bill had risen to 3,000, from zero.

"I think that is a gross exaggeration of what our staffs have the ability to review," he said. "I don't want a single earmark in any bill that the committee staff cannot review to make certain that the reputation of this House and the reputation of the committee are protected."

In particular, Mr. Obey added the requirement for lawmakers requesting earmarks to clarify that they had no financial interest in the project, to prevent directing taxpayer money toward projects like the beautification of a relative's shopping mall.

Although previous rules already prohibited such self-dealing, "when a member has to certify publicly, it focuses the mind," said Representative Chris Van Hollen, Democrat of Maryland.

The Senate is expected to take up its own earmark rules next week. The initial proposal, based on a bill that passed the Senate last year but not the House, would apply to only a small fraction of earmarks, excluding those directed to military or other federal contracts, as well as those described in legislative reports instead of bill texts. Several lawmakers, however, have said they hope to strengthen the Senate rules, too.

Everybody Will Know If It's Pork (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger, Richard Simon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The House adopts rules requiring lawmakers to disclose their earmarks.

WASHINGTON — Led by its new Democratic majority, the House imposed substantial new restrictions Friday on earmarking, a controversial practice increasingly used by legislators from both parties to slip narrowly tailored spending provisions into bills without public scrutiny.

The new rules will not end earmarks, but will force legislators to disclose their actions publicly and certify they have no financial stake in their earmarks.

The often secret nature of the process contributed to its explosive increase in recent years and led to scandals such as the one that ensnared former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe), who went to jail for accepting bribes from lobbyists seeking earmarks.

The adoption of new rules cracking down on earmarks was remarkable because leaders of both parties climbed to power by making extensive use of the practice, which provided them influence among their peers and leverage in raising funds from lobbyists.

The reform proposal, championed by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, herself a prodigious author of earmarks, drew praise from conservative Republicans and reform advocates who said they saw the strong measure as a sign that the new Congress may be serious about curbing the excesses of recent years.

"They had the guts to do what we didn't," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), a critic of taxpayer money going for such things as the National Wild Turkey Federation, cranberry-production conservation and potato research. Many of the most costly and controversial earmarks were put in bills by lawmakers at the request of defense industry lobbyists who donated to their campaigns.

DOJ_NMG_0113797

The number of earmarks exploded in the last decade from 1,439 in 1995 to 15,268 last year, according to a Senate estimate. They have been blamed for spawning a troubling culture on Capitol Hill that saw a dramatic rise in the number of lobbyists and some notorious corruption scandals.

Earmarks gained wider notoriety after the $223-million "bridge to nowhere" — connecting Ketchikan, Alaska, to an island with an airport and about 50 inhabitants — was slipped into the 2005 highway bill.

The ethics measure, which passed the House Friday on a 280-152 vote, requires that earmarks and their authors be clearly identified.

"I salute the House for attacking this problem," said Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), who has made earmark reform a hallmark of his career. Coburn said he was uncertain whether the Senate would be as rigorous in its earmark rules when it takes up the issue next week.

The Los Angeles Times reported recently that the new Senate Majority Leader, Harry Reid, earmarked funds for a bridge across the Colorado River that could affect the value of undeveloped land Reid owns in the vicinity. The Nevada Democrat has denied any wrongdoing.

The disclosure was one of many in recent months suggesting that lawmakers, including former House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), may have profited from their own earmarks. He denied any connection between his earmark for highway construction and the rise in the value of property he owned nearby.

In some other cases, the spending provisions look like rewards for campaign contributors and other supporters. Earmarks played a role in the scandal around lobbyist Jack Abramoff and Cunningham's bribery conviction. They also led to a federal inquiry involving Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), the former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee. The congressman has denied any wrongdoing.

The greatest power to earmark lies in the hands of appropriations committee members. Reid and Pelosi are both appropriations veterans and rose in power partly because of their ability to use earmarks as carrots or sticks with junior members of Congress. In addition, it helped them and other congressional leaders lure campaign contributions, which they then distributed to colleagues.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) was among those who pushed for the new rule. He said Friday that the provision requiring earmark sponsors to certify that neither they nor their spouses would benefit would "curb some of the worst abuses" and ensure that more earmarks go to "public purposes rather than special interests or anyone's personal benefit."

He and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) had proposed similar legislation a few months ago but their idea was rebuffed — by Republicans and Democrats.

A spokesman for Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.), the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee who is famous for bringing projects to his home state, said the senator had no comment on the House action. But Tom Gavin said, "The image of the Congress is in the mud, and Senator Byrd wants to work to pick that image up, clean it off, and restore the integrity to the Congress."

The Senate next week will consider its own ethics measure — one that also would require earmark sponsors to be identified and could include a process to allow senators to try to strip earmarks out of bills.

Byrd and Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), the House Appropriations Committee chairman, intend to ban earmarks from the unfinished 2007 spending bills.

Obey supports the new House rule and said it would "protect the integrity of the institution." But he was not happy when President Bush singled out Congress for criticism earlier this week for the proliferation of earmarks.

"If we are going to talk about earmarks, then let's talk about the guy who does the most earmarking," Obey said during Friday's debate, asserting that the president has favored Republican districts in his budget proposal.

White House Deputy Press Secretary Tony Fratto welcomed the House action but said it fell short of the president's goal of cutting in half the number and cost of earmarks. "To make them transparent is important and should have a chilling effect on new earmarks," he said, "but reducing the overall number of earmarks should be a goal as well."

All of the "no" votes were cast by Republicans, with many saying they supported earmark reform but opposed another provision of the rules requiring that any new tax cuts or spending increases be offset with tax increases or spending cuts to keep the deficit from growing. Many Republicans objected to the potential for tax increases.

Taxpayer watchdog groups praised the action. Citizens Against Government Waste called the measure a "long-overdue improvement that will shine light on the corrupting practice of earmarking."

But group president Tom Schatz cautioned: "Politicians will bend any rule or find any loophole in order to keep or conceal their pork. Taxpayers must keep the heat on Congress for these reform efforts to fully bear fruit."

DOJ_NMG_0113798

Coburn, while praising the House action, cautioned that "this is a slippery cat and we are not going to catch it on the first pass."

House Changes Rules On Pork-barrel Projects (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Bye-bye, bridge to nowhere.

In one of its first official acts under Democratic control, the House voted 280-152 on Friday to curb the middle-of-the-night, backroom deal-making that resulted in approval of embarrassing—and sometimes illegal—pork barrel projects.

Forty-eight Republicans joined 232 Democrats to require committees to disclose all sponsors of so-called earmarks. The new rules would prohibit lawmakers from trading their votes for special spending projects tacked on to legislation, and it would require members to certify that they have no personal financial stake in their requests.

Democrats said they expect the new rules to end many of the excesses that occurred under the Republican majority. The Senate is expected to consider a similar proposal next week.

During the last session of Congress, former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) wound up in prison after using earmarks to steer Pentagon contracts to a defense contractor who had bought Cunningham's home for $700,000 more than market value. Cunningham pleaded guilty to taking more than $2.5 million in bribes.

Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) and Rep. Don Young (R-Alaska) famously pushed for more than $223 million in federal funds to pay for a bridge to the isolated island of Gravina, population 50—resulting in the derisive moniker "bridge to nowhere." The proposal died after the earmark was exposed.

And Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.) earned himself the "Flushing Our Money Down the Toilet Award" from Citizens Against Government Waste. He had set aside $1 million for the Waterfree Urinal Conservation Initiative, instructing the Navy to learn more about water-free urinals, something that could have benefited a company in Ehlers' district.

"When the Republican Congress took over in 1995, throughout the entire federal budget, [there were] 1,400 earmarks," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.). "At the end of the Republican Congress, there were 13,997 earmarks."

Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Caucus, said a lobbyist once called earmarks "an ATM for lobbyists." That, he said, would now stop.

"It's not going to be an ATM machine for the special interests anymore, because this Congress, that gavel, is going to open up the people's House, not the auction house," Emanuel said.

Republicans acknowledged Friday that the increase in embarrassing earmarks gave them a bad reputation among voters when it came to fiscal discipline. And some said the earmark abuses by Cunningham and others fed into the notion that Republicans were corrupt.

"This is one of the ways we got into a heap of trouble," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), who noted he was never embarrassed or ashamed of any of the special projects for his district that he attached to legislation.

To be sure, Republicans voted for a somewhat similar proposal at the end of last year in a last-ditch attempt to improve their image with voters. It didn't appear to impress them and it didn't impress such opponents of pork-barrel projects as Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.).

"Bully for the Democrats," Flake said. "They did what we didn't have the guts to do when it matters."

Flake placed some of the blame for the runaway earmarks with President Bush. The president, he said, could easily instruct federal agencies not to enforce Congress' instructions unless they are placed inside the legislative text, rather than in an accompanying report. If Congress were forced to do that, the earmarks would be exposed and the president could veto the bill.

"Some of us have been begging him to do this for years," Flake said.

Some advocates for reining in federal spending say it's nice to shine a light on some of the silliness that passes for earmarks, but the move will do little to actually save money. Earmarks make up about 1 percent to 2 percent of all federal discretionary dollars spent each year. Where the federal budget faces its biggest challenge is in the runaway growth of entitlement programs, such as Medicare and Social Security.

"The deficit hawk in me doesn't look at it and say, 'Gosh, this is going to save a lot of money,'" said Robert Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, an organization that promotes fiscal responsibility.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said he hopes the new rules will halve the number of earmarks each year. In part, that may come from the public scrutiny implicit in attaching a name to a project.

But Bixby is skeptical that lawmakers will care.

DOJ_NMG_0113799

"That assumes that somebody can be embarrassed," he said. "You go there to go to bat for your constituents and by golly, whatever you're going to bat for is going to sound like the most important thing that ever was."

Steve Ellis, vice president of programs for Taxpayers for Common Sense, agreed, pointing out that "Don Young wasn't bashful about the bridge to nowhere."

In fact, he said, lawmakers may scale back their requests so they aren't on the order of $200 million, the expected cost of the Alaska bridge.

"There may be a whole lot of little bridges to nowhere," said Ellis, whose organization is a bipartisan watchdog group. "You can never underestimate members of Congress' ability to be shameless."

Indeed, many House members said Friday that the new rules would not stop them from helping their districts with money for a road here or a bicycle path there.

"My constituents pay a lot of tax dollars and they have got to get something back," said Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio).

Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) pointed out that after 12 years of being in the minority, he's not really used to getting much in the way of federal assistance to bring back home. But he said he's so happy when he can get something, he wants everyone to know.

Recently, he said, he squeezed out $5 million for the Concordia Child Care Center, which runs child-enrichment programs in Chicago's Roscoe Village neighborhood. And Rep. Jan Schakowsky (D-Ill.) said she's thrilled when she can bring back money to pay for roads or sidewalks or local law enforcement and usually holds a press conference to announce it.

House leaders have imposed a moratorium on earmarks for all fiscal 2007 spending bills. But after that, Schakowsky said she'll be trying to get her fair share.

"I'm still going to be fighting as hard as I can for my district," she said.

House's "Pay-Go" Rule Makes AMT Relief Harder (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The drive in Congress to protect more middle-class Americans from the individual Alternative Minimum Tax just got a whole lot tougher.

The House Friday passed a new "pay-go" budget rule that aims to rein in the country's surging deficit by prohibiting the chamber from considering any tax-cut or entitlement legislation if the cost isn't offset by increased revenue or spending trims. For now, at least, House Democrats say they intend to abide by the rule -- even when it comes to "fixing" the AMT, a proposition that would require them to replace vast amounts of tax revenue.

The AMT was designed to prevent upper-income people from avoiding paying taxes altogether, but it wasn't indexed for inflation. Without a change to the system, that would, over time, require a growing number of middle-class families to pay higher taxes. Congress has passed temporary patches to prevent this. But without a change in law, more than 30 million taxpayers would be subject to the tax in 2010, according to the Tax Policy Center, a joint venture of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution.

Doing away with the AMT -- as some Democrats are proposing -- would reduce tax revenue by about $1 trillion over the next decade, an amount that would be challenging and politically painful to offset. It is possible that Congress could pass a shorter-term remedy.

In either case, coming up with offsetting revenue would be tough. Passage of the pay-go rule in the House "means it's going to be with great difficulty that we find $1 trillion," said Charles B. Rangel (D., N.Y.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, who has made reducing the AMT's impact on the middle class a top priority. "It's not good for me to have pay-go, but it's good for the country."

In the Senate, too, a bipartisan push to repeal the AMT is on a collision course with a plan to strengthen pay-go requirements. On Thursday, Senate Finance Chairman Max Baucus (D., Mont.), along with the panel's ranking member, Iowa Republican Sen. Charles Grassley, proposed repealing the AMT. Mr. Baucus said he wants to do so in a "fiscally responsible way," but has not provided any specific plans. Meanwhile, a proposal by Senate Budget Chairman Kent Conrad (D., N.D.) for tightening pay-go rules would require revenue losses from repeal of the AMT to be offset. Or, if offsets weren't found, 60 senators would have to approve the AMT changes.

With the emphasis on fiscal restraint, Mr. Rangel said he is taking a broad look at possible changes to the tax code that could be used to offset the loss in revenue from any changes to the AMT. Certain tax breaks, such as deductions for mortgage interest and charitable contributions, wouldn't be touched, Mr. Rangel said. As for others, "I'm having them all added up," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0113800

Mr. Rangel acknowledged that Democrats have to tread carefully or risk political backlash. "At the end of the day, we have to have an equitable package where nobody can say Democrats raised taxes."

Republicans criticized the new House pay-go rules as too weak, in particular because they don't apply to all spending.

House Adopts Pay-as-You-Go Rules (WP)

By Lori Montgomery, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Changes Aim to Curb Deficit Spending, Shed Light on Earmarks

On its second day under Democratic management, the House yesterday overwhelmingly approved new rules aimed at reining in deficit spending and shedding more light on the murky world of special-interest projects known as earmarks.

Under the new provisions, the House will for the first time in years be required to pay for any proposal to cut taxes or increase spending on the most expensive federal programs by raising taxes or cutting spending elsewhere. And lawmakers will be required to disclose the sponsors of earmarks, which are attached in virtual secrecy to legislation to direct money to favored interests or home-district projects.

In recent months, with revelations that lawmakers had earmarked funds for projects with little public benefit, earmarks had became a political embarrassment and a symbol of fiscal profligacy.

The House voted 280 to 152 to approve the rules, which drew the support of 48 Republicans. Democratic leaders, in control of the House for the first time in 12 years, hailed the vote as a sign of their commitment to restore accountability to federal spending and to reduce a budget deficit and national debt that they say have been swollen by Republican tax cuts and military spending.

But even as they celebrated one of their first exercises of legislative power, key Democrats acknowledged that it will be difficult to abide by the new pay-as-you-go spending rules -- known on Capitol Hill as "pay-go" measures -- while keeping their promises to fund health-care, education and homeland-security initiatives. The rule change also jeopardizes President Bush's efforts to extend his tax cuts, most of which will expire in 2010. And it will complicate Democratic efforts to repeal the alternative minimum tax, a set of provisions in the tax code that could force millions of households to pay more this year.

"It's important that they passed a pay-go rule because they're setting a standard for themselves. This is a way of saying 'There's a new sheriff in town' and 'We're going to be fiscally responsible,' " said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, an advocacy group dedicated to deficit reduction. "But, now, they're going to have to figure out how to live up to that standard. And that's going to be pretty tough."

Yesterday's vote completed work on a series of rule changes proposed by Democrats to regulate operations in the House during the 110th Congress. On Thursday, the House adopted stringent new controls on the lobbying of House members, banning gifts from lobbyists and severely restricting privately funded travel. Yesterday, in addition to the rules affecting spending, the House adopted "civility" measures that grant Republican lawmakers more opportunities to offer their views and to participate in legislative debate than Democrats say they received under Republican control.

But the rules on spending drew the most animated debate, as Democrats accused the president and congressional Republicans of frittering away the large budget surpluses they inherited after the 2000 elections and of running up record budget deficits. Last year, the deficit was a relatively modest $248 billion, but the national debt is approaching $9 trillion.

"The one thing we can say about George Bush and his economic policy is: 'We are forever in your debt,' " Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) told his colleagues on the House floor. "On day number two, Democrats have said, 'Enough is enough with running up the debt of this country. We're going to put our fiscal house in order.' "

Republicans fired back, criticizing the new spending rules as a weakened, "paper-tiger" version of an expired pay-as-you-go law, which triggered across-the-board spending cuts whenever legislation increasing the deficit was passed. House leaders have promised to pursue such legislation in the coming weeks, but they note that it could not take effect without the support of the Senate and the White House. In the meantime, House Democrats say, the more limited rule, which makes budget-busting legislation subject to a parliamentary rule of order, is the best they can do.

Budget experts note that House rules are easily waived, and some predict that Democrats will be forced to abandon the new rules, at least for certain expenditures, to meet their campaign promises. For example, House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and other Democratic leaders have vowed to halt the expansion of the alternative minimum tax, which would cost about $50 billion this year alone. Repealing the tax, as Rangel and others advocate, would cost close to $1 trillion over the next decade.

Coming up with that kind of cash is possible, budget experts say, but doing so is probably going to be politically unpalatable. For example, Leonard E. Burman, co-director of the Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution, is working on options for covering the cost of a repeal. Among them: Allowing the president's tax cuts to expire and eliminating the federal deduction for state and local income taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0113801

That combination would raise more than enough money to pay for repeal, Burman said, but "for somebody like Rangel in a high-tax city and high-tax state, it's going to be hard to swallow. There's no free lunch."

Democrats are already having trouble reconciling their pledge to reduce the deficit with policy changes that they promised to pursue during the first 100 hours of the new Congress. This week, for instance, senior House Democratic aides said the promise to cut in half interest rates on student loans will have to be phased in over five years instead of being passed immediately.

So far, fiscal restraint appears to be gaining the upper hand. As he left the House chamber yesterday, Rangel said he is scouring the tax code for tax breaks that benefit special interests. If the beneficiaries "don't put their hands up, it's out," he said, suggesting that the money saved could go toward paying for the repeal of the alternative minimum tax.

"It's not good for me to have pay-go, but it's good for the country," Rangel said. "At this point, nobody . . . has convinced me that there should be exemptions from pay-go."

House OKs Budget Rule Changes (WT)

By Charles Hurt, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

House Democrats yesterday approved powerful measures to thwart new deficit spending, but Republicans warned that the new majority is paving the way to increase federal taxes.

"We simply cannot continue to run record budget deficits and debt. We must not force our children and grandchildren to pay for what we are buying," Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said on his first full day as majority leader. "That is not only an intellectually bankrupt policy, it is an immoral policy."

While Republicans and conservatives said they applauded Democratic efforts to balance the budget, they said the "pay-as-you-go" provisions in the package of new rules will more likely encourage a tax increase than force cuts in federal expenditures.

"It doesn't reduce current spending levels or require a reduction in current spending levels," said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican. "It is a means to justifying tax increases on working families, small businesses and family farms. In a very real sense, the American people ought to know that this proposal translates to: 'You pay as Congress goes on spending.' "

Conservatives off Capitol Hill agreed.

Tim Phillips, president of Americans for Prosperity, said the "pay-as-you-go" rules for the budget "tilt the budgetary playing field in favor of economy-killing tax hikes instead of spending restraint."

"These new rules will almost certainly lead to tax hikes, and we know that the path to prosperity is not paved with higher taxes," he said.

Those provisions, approved on a 280-154 vote, mean that any increases in federal benefit programs such as Medicare or Medicaid will have to be offset by cuts elsewhere in federal spending or be accompanied by tax increases. They also mean that it will be much harder to extend President Bush's tax cuts, most of which expire at the end of 2010.

The package of new rules also contained other reforms to limit -- or at least expose -- the ability of lawmakers to get huge federal projects for their home districts, better known as earmarks or political pork.

Under those provisions, lawmakers will be forced to publicly disclose the earmarks they request.

The earmark provisions are similar to ones Republicans approved last year. But only about a quarter of them supported yesterday's Democratic proposal because it was linked to the "pay-as-you-go" provisions.

"To their credit, Democrats have enacted stronger pork-barrel earmark reforms than their Republican colleagues were able to pass last September," said Mr. Phillips, whose group traveled the country in a bus last year highlighting outrageous federal spending. "This is a testament to the continued power of the grass-roots taxpayers, many of whom joined us on our nationwide Ending Earmarks Express bus tour last year who told their elected officials to close the earmark favor factory."

Republicans yesterday also announced their proposal to allow small-business owners to pool resources to purchase health insurance for employees.

"Republicans are committed to working with our Democrat colleagues to find innovative ways to help provide health insurance to the 46 million Americans who have no health insurance," said Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican. "The Small Business Health Fairness Act, a bill that I've brought to this floor several times myself ... would allow small businesses to join together and buy health insurance in larger pools, just like big companies and unions can do today."

Dreier Shifts Gears In A Hurry (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0113802

By Noam N. Levey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The Republican was a ruthless rules panel chief. Now he cries foul. Democrats are amazed.

WASHINGTON — Democrats never expected to waltz back to power this week without a few protests from the party they ousted.

But when they brought their new ethics rules up for a vote, more than a few eyebrows arched over the congressman who cried loudest about the indignities the Democrats were already inflicting on their GOP colleagues.

As much as any Republican, Rep. David Dreier had stirred the rage of Democrats while they suffered in the minority. Wielding the chairman's gavel of the House Rules Committee, the 14-term congressman from San Dimas seemed to revel in his power as legislative gatekeeper — the man who could stop any bill from getting to the floor.

But there was Dreier this week, lecturing Democrats on the virtue of openness and professing disappointment about being left out of the legislative process.

"I have whiplash," said Rep. Jim McGovern, a Massachusetts Democrat who seethed under Dreier's chairmanship for four years. "I thought it would take a couple of weeks before the hypocrisy bubbled up."

Dreier just smiled when asked about his new role as champion of inclusion. "I'm loving it," said the tall, polished ex-chairman after leaving a news conference in which he complained about the demise of legislative fair play.

"I got a call a few minutes ago from a former staffer who said, 'My gosh, I haven't seen you have so much fun in a long time.' And I said, 'You know what, I'd much prefer being the chairman and in the majority. But I do enjoy the role of being the loyal opposition too,' " Dreier said. "I love holding people accountable. They did it to us constantly, so that's what I'm doing."

The rapid transformation from punitive enforcer to principled rebel reflected the odd political theater that accompanies changes of power on Capitol Hill.

Dreier is actually reprising his role as indignant reformer. Before Republicans took over in 1995, Dreier was among a group of House Republicans who led the charge for more openness under the autocratic Democratic majority. But when Dreier assumed the helm of the Rules Committee in 1999, he became notorious for suppressing minority Democrats.

Meeting in an out-of-the-way room on the Capitol's third floor, the little-understood Rules Committee rarely generates headlines. But because the chairman controls which bills can come to the House floor for votes and whether they can be amended, it is immensely powerful.

"It is the most important tool that the majority in the House has," said UC Berkeley congressional scholar Eric Schickler.

As chairman, Dreier was unfailingly polite and quick with a smile. But he used his power mercilessly, calling the committee to order in the middle of the night, providing committee members little time to review legislation, and sending more and more bills to the floor that could not be amended.

"I could not think of those diabolical things," said Rep. Louise M. Slaughter, the New York Democrat who is taking over the committee after years as the ranking minority member. "We were simply at their mercy."

Slaughter and other Democrats repeatedly promised they would be different. "We have no intention of keeping our foot on your necks the way you did to us," Slaughter told Dreier on the House floor.

But when Democrats brought up their ethics rules without consulting Republicans and then scheduled votes without allowing amendments, Dreier had the target he needed.

"I am disappointed," he said Thursday on the floor of the House.

"I am concerned," he noted later.

"I am very, very troubled and saddened," he concluded.

Then Dreier urged his Republican colleagues to support the new ethics rules, which banned such perks as free sports tickets from lobbyists and trips on corporate jets. The rules, he said, were not unlike the proposals GOP leaders had crafted when they held the majority.

The performance drew raves from Dreier's GOP colleagues.

"He's doing a great job," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida, the No. 3 Republican in the House. "He's going out of his way to teach all members how to properly use House rules."

Rep. Alcee L. Hastings, a Florida Democrat who serves on the Rules Committee with Dreier and jousted with him on the House floor, chuckled at the former chairman's joyous embrace of his new underdog role.

"I'm enjoying the banter with him because of his disingenuousness," Hastings said after the debate. "He is the only person in this chamber who can take a position directly contradictory to the one he took a few minutes earlier with a straight face."

Democrats Rename Key House Panel (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0113803

By David R. Sands, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

Seeking a new name to go with a new attitude, congressional Democrats announced yesterday the House International Relations Committee would be reverting to its old, pre-Republican majority moniker: the "House Committee on Foreign Affairs."

"A new sheriff has come to town, taking the reins with a purpose," incoming committee Chairman Tom Lantos, California Democrat, said. "Americans have demanded change in the way our country conducts itself in the world."

The new Republican House majority in 1994, under Speaker New Gingrich, re-dubbed the panel the International Relations Committee in part to distinguish it from its counterpart in the other wing of the Capitol, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. Lantos noted that the House panel had been known as the Committee on Foreign Affairs almost without interruption since 1822.

By whatever name, the House and Senate foreign affairs committees have both promised aggressive early oversight of the Bush administration's diplomacy, something they say was not done under Republican control.

Mr. Lantos will chair a hearing Thursday on Iraq with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, a day after President Bush is slated to outline his revised strategy on the war. The committee will hold a second hearing the same day on U.S. policy toward Iran.

Mr. Lantos said the committee also planned public sessions on the North Korean nuclear standoff and the "looming potential loss of Afghanistan" to the resurgent fundamentalist Taliban movement.

New Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, also has announced plans for a string of oversight hearings on Iraq over the next month. The Senate committee will hold a closed session with intelligence officials on Iraq on Tuesday and will hear from a group of private Iraq scholars on Wednesday.

Mr. Biden has been an early and vocal critic of an increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, which is expected to be a centerpiece of Mr. Bush's new strategy.

"We've tried the military surge option before and it failed," Mr. Biden said last month.

"If the president proposes escalation in Iraq, I will oppose him and so will many of my colleagues in Congress," he added.

Home Town Paves The Way For Pelosi (WP)

By Dan Morse, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Capping off a three-day celebration of her ascension as speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, Nancy Pelosi returned yesterday to her home town of Baltimore, where a street was renamed for her in front of a stage of dignitaries and a bank of TV cameras.

"She comes here today to recapture her humble beginnings," the Rev. Michael Salerno, pastor of a nearby church, told a crowd gathered at a street corner outside Pelosi's childhood home in a gritty-looking collection of rowhouses in Baltimore's Little Italy neighborhood.

The setting seemed to emphasize Pelosi's working-class roots and counter the "San Francisco liberal" image that Republicans have tried to attach to her.

When Pelosi (D-Calif.) spoke to the crowd, she mentioned her Italian immigrant ancestors, who came to the United States poor, hardworking and religious. Her own upbringing, in the Baltimore rowhouse to her left, she said, was shaped by Italian American pride, devout Catholicism, deep patriotism and staunch Democratic ideals. Her father and a brother were mayors of the city.

"I wanted to come back here and say thank you to all of you," she said. "Every step that I took to the speakership began in this neighborhood."

Tommy D'Alesandro, the brother who was mayor, spoke of growing up in the house, with people coming by needing help with jobs, housing, medical care, getting someone out of jail and, he said -- drawing the biggest laugh of the day -- getting someone into jail.

There were "thousands and thousands of favors done" in the home, he said, evoking an earlier time of machine politics.

Baltimore Mayor and Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D) pulled the decorative cover off a street sign outside the house. The name: Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi.

But on the streets of Little Italy, aside from the facades of the old rowhouses, it's not that gritty anymore. Real estate has appreciated, young professionals have moved in and renovated their houses, and there's a Whole Foods nearby. In some ways, the neighborhood has prospered just as Pelosi has.

DOJ_NMG_0113804

In 2005, she was ranked ninth among House members in net worth, which, between her and her husband, was more than $14 million, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

That year, the average home in Little Italy sold for $361,500, a 165 percent spike over two years before, according to Live Baltimore, a group advocating that people buy in Baltimore. Live Baltimore ranked about 216 Baltimore neighborhoods on property values and found that Little Italy had experienced the third-highest increase.

What's the appeal?

"You don't think it's the architecture, do you?" asked Roberto Marsili, pointing at one of the old buildings. He has lived in his rowhouse, two doors down from where Pelosi lived, since 1939.

He said people like him are dwindling in number. He remembers Pelosi as a youngster -- well-behaved and pleasant. "A very classy girl," Marsili said.

But many of the residents moved in recently, long after Pelosi left.

What Little Italy offers is prime location -- you can walk to the Inner Harbor, office buildings, a Barnes & Noble, a wine shop selling $175 bottles of cabernet sauvignon -- and the feeling that you're not living in a condo tower.

The neighborhood is still home to people like Marsili. There are more than a dozen Italian restaurants. There's still enough of the Italian culture that newcomers, even if they're not Italian, can make it part of their own identity.

At Rocco's Capriccio, a restaurant, the owners frequently see newcomers at dinner. Some of the newcomers like to tell their visiting friends they know the owner of the place, Rocco Gargano Jr. said.

"A lot of the people who come in are caught up in living in an Italian neighborhood," Gargano said. "It's kinda like being in a movie."

"They want to be caught up in the mix," said his sister Rosa Gargano.

Rocco estimates that the neighborhood's population is 70 percent young professionals. He lives in Anne Arundel County and commutes to the family restaurant to work. At midnight, he said, he likes to walk outside and see people walking from Italian restaurant to Italian restaurant. "In a way," he said, "you kinda get caught up in it, too."

Michaelle "Mick" Stachura, who attended the event yesterday, is a newcomer to Little Italy and has embraced its remaining authenticity. She bought a rowhouse in 2002 for $135,000 and spent nearly $200,000 on renovations. She has become active in a local church and recently made cookies with older residents for an Italian street fair.

"It's just so endearing down here," she said. "It's the only place I've lived where I want to be part of the neighborhood."

Pelosi Visits Hometown On Victory Tour (AP)

By Kristen Wyatt

AP, January 5, 2007

BALTIMORE (AP) - Newly elected House Speaker Nancy Pelosi took a victory lap Friday through Baltimore, the blue-collar city where she grew up and learned politics from her father, who was mayor in the 1940s and 50s.

Pelosi, surrounded by family members, laid a bouquet of white roses beside a statue of her father, former Mayor Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., in the downtown business district.

"It is with great emotion that I come to this spot because I used to visit here every time I came to Baltimore," she said.

Pelosi then visited her childhood home in Little Italy, a tiny, close-knit community of row houses and Italian restaurants just east of the trendy Inner Harbor.

(AP) House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of Calif., joins fellow Democrats at a reception on Capitol Hill in...

Full Image"We were devoutly Catholic, deeply patriotic, extremely proud of our Italian heritage, and in our case, staunchly Democratic," Pelosi said at a ceremony to name her childhood block Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi.

The Baltimore events capped off two days of victory festivities for Pelosi, who was elected the nation's first female speaker Thursday. The events also were designed to counter Republican descriptions of Pelosi as a San Francisco liberal.

Pelosi grew up the youngest of six children, and the only girl.

"We were all born and raised in politics, and we all worked the political scene," recalled Pelosi's oldest brother, Thomas D'Alesandro III, who was also mayor of Baltimore.

The family "had our doors open every day, people coming in looking for jobs, for medical assistance, for housing, to get somebody out of jail," he recalled. Pelosi "had an opportunity at an early age to be exposed to the world of politics at the precinct level, at the constituent level."

(AP) House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of Calif., center, accompanied by Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash., left,...

Full ImagePelosi left Little Italy after high school and never returned as a full-time resident, but neighbors here still remember the polite little girl who rode in open-top convertibles in city parades.

DOJ_NMG_0113805

Giovanna Aquia Blatterman, whose husband used to dance with Pelosi at neighborhood church dances, said residents are working to add Pelosi's name to a bocce court named for her father.

"She had a lot of time to watch and absorb, and it's paying off now," she Blatterman said..

Partying Dead Wake Up The Democrats (WP)

By J. Freedom DuLac, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Do Democrats have more fun? At the end of her own triumphal celebration concert Thursday night, newly sworn-in House Speaker Nancy Pelosi asked that very question.

This being a fete for the Democrats, most of the approximately 1,200 attendees at the National Building Museum fundraiser answered affirmatively. Guess they weren't dead, after all!

Just a couple of hours earlier, several surviving members of the Grateful Dead were onstage, performing some of the psychedelic jam band's best-known songs in front of a buttoned-up audience: legislators, donors, activists, advisers, "just friends" who sat lifelessly during the first of two sets. One exception was the Deadhead who finally jumped out of his gilded seat near the back of the room and did the overbite-boogie during the shuffling hit "Touch of Grey." He was met with more than a few incredulous stares. (Turns out that fun is not a partisan concept. It might, however, be a relatively foreign idea in the starchy, scripted realm of modern national politics.)

But it wouldn't take an act of Congress to get the guarded group to loosen up, just an irresistible polyrhythmic groove. When the Dead survivors and a few of their musician friends -- collectively dubbed Your House Band for the occasion -- performed the decades-old New Orleans anthem "Iko Iko," the crowd snapped to and the party finally felt like, well . . . a party. A strange-looking party, to be sure: the bearded counterculture icon and Dead co-founder Bob Weir sporting a coat and tie and looking like a classics professor, a most perplexing image.

Still, even Pelosi was able to let her hair down by standing up and dancing in place during "Iko Iko." No need to worry about any sort of YouTube embarrassment; Madam Speaker, at 66, can dance just fine. Certainly well enough that the producers' script noted that Pelosi and her husband, Paul, were to "remain on stage and perhaps dance" during a closing ensemble performance of the tune "You've Got a Friend." Which they did.

Though the $1,000-per-ticket fundraiser was billed as a concert -- Pelosipalooza if you will -- you do not necessarily attend such gatherings for their artistic merits. The 12-story atrium in which the concert was staged was an echo chamber, and the performances were largely predictable, with the musicians sticking to the hits and to the script. (You didn't really expect a free-form Dead show, did you? With epic drum solos and long stretches of improvisational guitar noodling and obscure songs they haven't performed since that show at Winterland way back when? And "spacecakes" at the dessert buffet?)

There was the elegant Tony Bennett crooning "I Left My Heart in San Francisco" in a nod to California's 8th District, which Pelosi represents. And the great singer-songwriter Carole King, sounding a little parched but peeling off three classics at a Steinway grand piano: "Sweet Seasons," "I Feel the Earth Move" and "(You Make Me Feel Like) A Natural Woman." (Even the hunky actor Richard Gere was spotted singing the latter's refrain.)

Some, but not all, of the songs packed political messages -- not least the two performed by Bruce Hornsby, a former Dead collaborator who sat in with Your House Band. "The End of the Innocence," co-authored by Hornsby and Don Henley in 1987, was a protest song about President Reagan, what with its reference to the "tired old man that we elected king" and allusions to military might and shrinking farm subsidies. And "The Way It Is," performed solo at a Steinway grand piano, addressed racial inequity.

In fact, there was much buzz about inclusion right up until the night ended at 10:30, with speakers -- and the House speaker -- talking about providing representation to the underrepresented, about diversity. And yet the stage was filled with white men, save for King, rapper Wyclef Jean and a few sidemen.

Jean was the lineup's lone nod to youth (most of the performers were nearly twice his age, if not older), and he was also its wild card, prone to onstage unpredictability. In that regard, he didn't disappoint, first demanding that the crowd sit down, post-"Iko Iko," and listen to an a cappella rap he'd written for the occasion. The verse probably marked the first time in hip-hop history that Pelosi, Barack Obama and North Korea were mentioned over the course of 16 bars. Jean also rhymed in Spanish, Japanese and French and Hebrew before performing three covers: the hymnal "Rivers of Babylon," Bob Marley's "Redemption Song" and the old soca smash "Hot Hot Hot."

Jean mentioned Pelosi's name repeatedly during the songs -- several dozen times in all -- and riffed on the price of oil before jumping offstage to dance with Pelosi during "Hot Hot Hot," their impromptu pas de deux captured by a house video camera and flashed onto an oversize screen behind the stage. And at least for that moment, anyway, yes, the resurgent Democrats were having more fun.

DOJ_NMG_0113806

Giddy Sea Of Fresh Faces In The Capitol, United By A Serious Mission (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — Hours after casting his first votes in Congress, Representative Zack Space still beamed with excitement on Thursday, showing off the identification card that doubles as an electronic balloting device.

"I had to ask someone how to use it," he said, proudly whisking the card out of its carrying case as he gave his family a tour of the Capitol.

Back in his office, a new receptionist apologized for hanging up on someone who called. "Sorry, second day on the job," she chirped.

Even before his arrival in Washington this week, Mr. Space, 45, typified the incoming freshman class: A Democrat from Ohio, he campaigned hard on the issue of ethics reform in a race to succeed Representative Bob Ney, who pleaded guilty in a corruption case. Despite his political inexperience — and the fact that Democratic officials considered him one of their weakest candidates — Mr. Space beat his Republican rival, in an increasingly Republican district, 62 percent to 38 percent.

Now, he is one of 66 new members of the 110th Congress, part of a historic Democratic tide that swept Republicans from power after a dozen years and left President Bush on the defensive.

Although Mr. Space at times exudes a certain good-natured goofiness — his campaign Web logo featured a starry rendering of outer space, and one of his mottos is a riff on his father's first name, Socrates ("being the son of Socrates, Zack Space knows a thing or two about ethics") — he has a mission of the utmost seriousness in Congress. On Thursday, his first day, before all his boxes were unpacked and his shared apartment furnished, Mr. Space was given a high-profile role in introducing his party's ethics reform package.

"The winds of change have brought me here," Mr. Space said in his first speech on the House floor, arguing in favor of the package. "The time to act is now. We have an extraordinary burden to prove to those who have given us this honor. We must make clear to them that we are representing their interests, not bartering legislative favors in order to gain gifts and trips."

On the other side of the Capitol dome, the incoming senators will not cast their first votes until next week (and the first one, a resolution honoring the late President Gerald R. Ford, will not exactly cause heartburn). Their transition will take longer in other ways: new senators are housed in temporary offices in the basement, while administrators try to establish which sitting senators intend to move.

That left freshman Senator Jon Tester, a Democrat who previously lived on an 1,800-acre ranch in Montana, squeezed into a small space in the bowels of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. In the office of Senator James Webb, Democrat of Virginia, the phone system was so problem-plagued that his line remained busy for hours on end.

But the wave of newcomers was most palpable in the House, where the dozens of arrivals circulated through welcome parties, herded their families on tours and waited in long lines to have their photographs taken with Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the new House speaker. Representative Carol Shea Porter, a New Hampshire Democrat who won an upset victory, let out an audible gasp when she set foot on the House floor the first time, said her chief of staff, Harry Gural.

"Walking in was a little bit like walking into the lights of Yankee Stadium, going out onto the field as a player rather than a spectator," Mr. Gural said.

The cable network channel C-Span chronicled even the most anonymous new members, setting up a camera position in the Cannon House Office Building to lure members of the freshman class into interviews.

"So far, so good," said Representative Mazie K. Hirono, Democrat of Hawaii (and one of two new Buddhist members of the Congress), as she concluded her 15 minutes of C-Span.

Ms. Hirono had a press schedule, but little else: unable to buy office gear until she was sworn in, the newest Democrat from the farthest state was working without computers.

Unlike earlier eras, when newcomers simply showed up in Washington and had to fend for themselves, freshmen now undergo a series of orientation programs in the weeks between Election Day and the swearing-in.

"It's much different than when I came here. You were on your own," said Representative George Miller, a California Democrat now in his 17th term.

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts and another House lifer, offered the freshmen some advice: Learn time management, and how to resist invitations to social events.

"The default answer when people ask you to do things should be 'no,' " Mr. Frank said.

DOJ_NMG_0113807

Then there is the issue of housing, always tricky for members of Congress who are in Washington on weekdays but at home in their districts most weekends. Mr. Space and his new roommate, Representative Michael Arcuri of New York, moved into their "small, subterranean" apartment earlier in the week, an arrangement prompted in part by Mr. Arcuri's fondness for Mr. Space's Greek cooking. By Friday, they still appeared to be getting along.

And Mr. Space, grinning as he wandered the halls, had not grown disillusioned by Washington, he said, nor strayed from his pledges.

"Not yet," he said, when asked if he had broken any campaign promises. Then he corrected himself. "I mean — no."

New Congress Brings Along Religious Firsts (WP)

By Jonathan Tilove, Religion News Service

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

The new Congress, for the first time, includes a Muslim, two Buddhists, more Jews than Episcopalians and the highest-ranking Mormon in congressional history.

Roman Catholics remain the largest single faith group in Congress, accounting for 29 percent of all members of the House and Senate, followed by Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Jews and Episcopalians.

While Catholics in Congress are almost 2-to-1 Democrats, the most lopsidedly Democratic groups are Jews and those not affiliated with a religion. Of the 43 Jewish members of Congress, there is only one Jewish Republican in the House and two in the Senate. The six religiously unaffiliated members of the House are all Democrats.

The most Republican groups are the small band of Christian Scientists in the House (all five are Republican) and members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (12 Republicans and three Democrats) -- though the top-ranking Mormon is Nevada Sen. Harry M. Reid, the new Democratic majority leader.

Baptists generally divide along partisan lines defined by race. Most black Baptists are Democrats, while most white Baptists are Republicans. Notable exceptions include House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) and Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.), president pro tem in the new Senate, both white Baptists.

Because 2006 was such a good year for Democrats, they have regained their commanding advantage among Catholics, which had slipped during an era of GOP dominance. In Pennsylvania alone, five new Democrats, all Catholics, were elected to Congress in November, including Robert P. Casey Jr., who defeated Sen. Rick Santorum, a far more conservative Catholic.

In the new Congress, two-thirds of all Catholic members will be Democrats. By contrast, after big Republican gains in 1994, 44 percent of Catholic members of Congress were Republican, according to Albert Menendez, a writer and researcher who has been counting the religious affiliation of members of Congress since 1972.

"It's a thankless task, but somebody's got to do it," said Menendez, 64, who lives in North Potomac and has published his counts and analysis first with Americans United for Separation of Church and State and more recently in Voice of Reason, the newsletter of Americans for Religious Liberty. He is also the author of several books, including "Religion at the Polls" (1977), "John F. Kennedy: Catholic and Humanist" (1979) and "Evangelicals at the Ballot Box" (1996).

Menendez bases his count on how lawmakers identify themselves. When he did his first tally after the 1972 election, Congress was still much in the sway of a few mainline Christian faiths. At the time, just three mainline Protestant denominations -- Methodists, Presbyterians and Episcopalians -- accounted for 43 percent of all members of Congress, including 51 senators. Come January, those three will account for just a fifth of Congress, including 32 senators. Still, all three -- especially Episcopalians and Presbyterians -- continue to be better represented on Capitol Hill than among the general population.

Other historically important Christian denominations have suffered steep declines in Congress. Menendez said the Lyndon B. Johnson landslide of 1964 brought 14 Unitarians to Washington. In the new Congress, there are two -- Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.) and Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.). In the late 1960s, there were 29 members of the United Church of Christ in Congress, but in the new Congress, there will be only six, including Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who joined the church as an adult. (Obama's Kenyan father was from a Muslim background and his American mother's parents were non-practicing Baptist and Methodist.)

Through it all, Lutherans have maintained. Menendez said they were underrepresented relative to their population in 1972, with 16 members of Congress, and remain underrepresented today with 17. While their total numbers have held steady, their political allegiance has flipped from 2-to-1 Republican to 2-to-1 Democrat.

Evangelical Christians -- a category that cuts across denominational lines -- are even more underrepresented, according to Furman University political scientist James L. Guth, all the more so after this year's defeat of Republican incumbents such as Reps. John N. Hostettler of Indiana and Jim Ryun of Kansas.

But perhaps the most underrepresented group in Congress is the 14 percent of all American adults who, according to the 2001 American Religious Identification Survey, conducted by scholars at the Graduate Center at the City University of New York, claim no religion at all. Only six members of Congress, all Democrats, identify themselves as religiously unaffiliated: Reps. John F. Tierney and John W. Olver of Massachusetts, Earl Blumenauer of Oregon, Neil Abercrombie of Hawaii, Tammy Baldwin of Wisconsin and Mark Udall of Colorado.

DOJ_NMG_0113808

Jews have continued to gain representation in Congress -- 8 percent in the new Congress -- even as their share of the national population has waned (1.3 percent in 2001). But Jewish numbers in Congress also tend to fluctuate with Democratic fortunes. In a year in which Democrats did well in unexpected places, new Jewish members of Congress were elected this fall from Tennessee, Kentucky, Arizona and New Hampshire, as well as the more familiar terrain of Florida and Wisconsin.

For Buddhists and Muslims, the 110th Congress represents their first congressional representation.

The two Buddhist Democrats -- Reps. Mazie K. Hirono of Hawaii and Hank Johnson of Georgia -- both have avoided talking about their religion, saying it is a private matter.

A spokesman for Hirono, who came to Hawaii with her mother from Japan when she was 8, would only confirm that Hirono was raised in the tradition of her mother's Jodo Shu Buddhism.

A spokesman for Johnson would only confirm that he became a Buddhist about 30 years ago and is affiliated with Soka Gakkai International, an American Buddhist association.

Like Johnson, Keith Ellison of Minnesota, the first Muslim elected to Congress, is a convert and African American. Raised Catholic, he converted to Islam at 19 while attending Wayne State University .

"The election of this first Muslim is quite important symbolically," said John Green, director of the Ray C. Bliss Institute of Applied Politics at the University of Akron. "It may very well be the harbinger of greater acceptance of Muslims in the future."

Bush's Tax Legacy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

In his op-ed column on these pages this week, President Bush made some news by underscoring his opposition to raising taxes. We were certainly glad to hear it, and to publish it, because by our lights the tax cuts and economic growth that has followed are his most notable domestic achievements (give or take a Supreme Court Justice).

That growth was underscored again with yesterday's buoyant jobs and income report for December. Job growth exceeding expectations at 167,000 and the jobless rate held at a very low 4.5%, despite a slowdown in manufacturing and construction. Since the Bush tax cuts on dividends and capital gains passed in mid-2003, the economy has created 7.2 million new jobs according to the survey of business establishments, and an additional 1.2 million in the more variable household survey.

As for the inevitable political complaints that these new jobs are all lousy, average hourly non-supervisory wages have now climbed 4.2% over the past 12 months, or twice the official rate of inflation. With flat or falling energy prices, and a tight labor market, real wages are also starting to show impressive gains.

Meanwhile, tax revenues continue to roll into the Treasury and state coffers. Federal receipts rose by 14.6% in fiscal 2005, another 11.8% in 2006, and kept rising by 9% in this year's first two months despite slower GDP growth. The budget deficit, in turn, has fallen by $165 billion in two years, and including state surpluses is now down to about 1% of GDP, which as an economic matter is negligible. Tax revenues as a share of the economy are also back above 18.5%, which is their modern historical norm.

This record is so impressive that liberal critics have been forced to ignore it and focus on other alleged outrages, such as "inequality," or CEO pay, or some vague prediction of future doom. And, yes, the future is unpredictable. But in the field of economics there are few more definitive tests than the results from the tax cuts of 2003. Critics predicted disaster, supporters the opposite, and the supporters can point to more than three years of prosperity as vindication -- despite $70 oil and $3 gasoline, and lately despite the worst housing slowdown in 15 years.

However, those lower tax rates are set to expire at the end of 2010, and the Democrats who now control Congress want them repealed. The "pay-as-you-go" rules that the House just passed would make their extension all but impossible. What this means is that if Congress merely fails to act, the tax cuts expire and the economy will be hit with one of the largest tax increases in history in 2010.

The dividend rate would snap back to 39.6% from 15%, the capital gains rate to 20% from 15%, and the top marginal income tax rate to 39.6% from 35%. Marginal and average tax rates for the middle class would also increase, returning to the Clinton-era levies that had driven taxes as a share of GDP to a postwar high of 20.9%.

Now in the minority on Capitol Hill, Republicans can't do much about this. But it certainly poses a dilemma for Democrats -- all the more so because they must also cope with the rising burden of the Alternative Minimum Tax. The AMT -- created by Democrats in 1969 to capture a few millionaires -- will engulf some 23 million taxpayers this year without a change in law.

DOJ_NMG_0113809

This week, the new Democratic Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Montana's Max Baucus, called the AMT a "monster in the tax code" and introduced a bill to repeal it. The only catch: Under Congress's wacky "static revenue" analysis of calculating the impact of tax cuts, AMT repeal would "cost" the Treasury as much as $1.2 trillion over 10 years. Maybe they can find that much in Congressman William Jefferson's freezer.

Our guess is that Democrats will try to finesse all this in the near term. With President Bush now saying he'll oppose a tax increase, they'll be wary of voting for one that would be vetoed and provide Republicans with an issue in 2008. So perhaps they'll try a one- or two-year AMT fix to get them past 2008, while waiting for their Presidential nominee to advance a more detailed tax proposal. Most likely, that would involve a pledge to keep the lower Bush rates for the "middle class," while raising rates on "the rich."

Bill Clinton played that tune all the way to the Oval Office, only to raise taxes on everybody once he got there. It'll be fascinating to see if voters give his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the same leave if she's the Democratic nominee. In any event, what we seem headed for is a two-year national donnybrook over taxes and income that will be decided by the voters in November 2008.

Monkey On A Tiger (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

Washington

There was a touch of parody to the giddy Democrat takeover this week: Nancy Pelosi indulging her inner Haight-Ashbury and dipping the Capitol in tie-dye, sashaying around with the Grateful Dead, Wyclef Jean, Carole King, Richard Gere, feminists and a swarm of well-connected urchins.

The first act of House Democrats who promised to govern with bipartisan comity was imperiously banishing Republicans from participating in the initial round of lawmaking. Even if Republicans were brutes during their reign, Democrats should have shown more class, letting the whiny minority party offer some stupid amendments that would lose.

Perhaps the Democrats' power-shift into overdrive is a neurological disorder, or neuropolitical disorder.

If free will is an illusion — if we are, as one philosopher put it, "nothing more than sophisticated meat machines," doomed to repeat the same mistakes over and over — that would explain a lot about the latest trend in which everyone is reverting to type.

William James wrote in 1890 that the whole "sting and excitement" of life comes from "our sense that in it things are really being decided from one moment to another, and that it is not the dull rattling off of a chain that was forged innumerable ages ago."

But in Science Times this week, Dennis Overbye advised Dr. James to "get over it," observing that "a bevy of experiments in recent years suggest that the conscious mind is like a monkey riding a tiger of subconscious decisions and actions in progress, frantically making up stories about being in control."

As Mark Hallett of the National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke told Mr. Overbye, "Free will does exist, but it's a perception, not a power or a driving force. ... The more you scrutinize it, the more you realize you don't have it."

That would explain why, after voters insisted that the president wrap it up in Iraq, he made a big show of pretending to listen, then decided to do a war do-over.

Is this just the baked-in stubbornness of one man, or is W.'s behavior evidence that he has no free will? Is the Decider freely choosing another huge blunder or is he taking instructions from his genetic and political coding, fearing that if he admits what a foul hash he's made of Iraq, he'll be labeled a wimp, as his dad was?

If W. is trapped on a tiger, he's not the only one.

John McCain can't get beyond seeing himself as a maverick now that he's become a nonmaverick, a right-wing Republican urging an escalation of a hopeless war, even though he's already lived through an escalation of a hopeless war.

"There are two keys to any surge in U.S. troops," Senator McCain told an appreciative audience at the American Enterprise Institute yesterday. "It must be substantial, and it must be sustained."

With the letter she and Harry Reid wrote to the president yesterday, warning him that "we are well past the point of more troops for Iraq," Speaker Pelosi tried to exert her free will to stop the Surge. But the Democrats aren't willing to take real action and cut off money for the Surge. They're predetermined to want to have it both ways: not to be blamed for the war and not to be blamed for pulling the plug on the war.

Iraq has become a snake pit of factions failing to escape fate. Shiites and Sunnis have been fighting and killing each other for about 1,400 years over who was the rightful heir to Muhammad, and yet the entire American high command was somehow taken aback that Shiites and Sunnis can't muster the free will to keep their country from disintegrating.

DOJ_NMG_0113810

Could it have been kismet that there were Shiites taunting Saddam at his hanging? Maybe it was preordained back in the days when Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone and the British diplomat Gertrude Bell drew the boundaries of the modern Iraq that a security guy with a cellphone would capture the spectacle.

Despite all the talk back in the 2000 campaign about a robustly experienced foreign-policy dream team, it may have been destined that the Bush administration would be asleep in the run-up to the insurgency, just as it was asleep in the run-up to 9/11, to Katrina, to the occupation and to the refugee crisis in Iraq. Either all that was predetermined, or the administration was preternaturally negligent.

Arthur Schopenhauer, the German philosopher who said a man can do what he wants but cannot will what he wants, would have understood W.'s nonsensical urge to Surge.

We don't know if human beings have free will. We just know that human beings in Washington appear not to.

Can Bush's Tax Cuts Survive? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Can Congress balance the budget if it keeps the tax cuts in place? In the short term, maybe. But it won't be easy. White House forecasts show a $127 billion shortfall in 2011. Making the tax cuts permanent while balancing the budget will require sharp spending cuts, which likely will cause even many congressional Republicans to balk. President Bush's efforts to constrain spending in the past have had little effect, in part because of the costs of homeland security and the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and in part because of resistance from members of Congress. Now that Democrats are in control, the resistance from Congress is likely to be greater.

In the long term, the task gets even more difficult, due to Baby Boomers retiring and the resulting explosion in Social Security and Medicare costs. Social Security and Medicare trustees estimate the Social Security fund will go into deficit in 2017 and its trust fund will run out of money by 2040. Medicare ran a deficit in 2004 (but not in 2005 due to a surge in tax revenue) and estimates show its trust fund will be depleted by 2018.

Are there other tax cuts or tax increases being considered? On the tax-cut front, both parties have expressed support for permanent changes to repair the Alternative Minimum Tax. It was designed to prevent the wealthy from evading taxes but increasingly has snared upper-middle-class taxpayers because it was never indexed for inflation. The AMT is projected to bring in $1 trillion over the next decade. The passage of "pay-go" legislation by the House Friday could add an extra hurdle because it requires any new tax-cut or entitlement legislation to be offset by increased revenue or decreased spending to prevent the deficit from growing larger still.

As for tax increases, Democrats have proposed eliminating tax breaks for oil companies and more aggressive measures to crack down on tax evasion.

-- Nick Timiraos

FACTS

The War of 1812 prompted the first sales taxes on gold, silverware, jewelry and watches. Congress enacted the first income-tax law in 1862 to help fund the Civil War. It was eliminated in 1872, but a new income tax was created on the eve of World War I.

About half of newly elected Democratic members of congress support repealing tax cuts for the wealthiest tax bracket now rather than waiting for the provisions to expire.

When World War II ended, taxpayers with incomes of more than $1 million faced a top tax rate of 94% on each additional dollar earned. In most cases, taxable income for 2006 of more than $336,550 faced a top federal income-tax rate of 35%.

The national debt stands at $8.6 trillion and interest on that debt grew 23% last year, the fastest-growing part of the federal budget.

POINTS OF VIEW

"Now is not the time to raise taxes on the American people."

--President George W. Bush

"We are mortgaging [our children's] futures for a tax break that benefits those who need it least."

-- House Speaker Nancy Pelosi

A Heckuva Claim (WP)

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Mr. Bush is oblivious to the consequences of his tax cuts.

DOJ_NMG_0113811

PRESIDENT BUSH wrote in a Wall Street Journal op-ed Wednesday that "it is also a fact that our tax cuts have fueled robust economic growth and record revenues." The claim about fueling record revenue is flat wrong, and it is shocking that the president should persist in making such errors. After all, tax cuts are the central plank of his domestic policy. How can he fail to understand the basic facts about them?

This is not just our opinion. Harvard's N. Gregory Mankiw, an economic conservative who served as chairman of Mr. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, has tested the hypothesis on which Mr. Bush's claim is based: He looked at the extent to which tax cuts stimulate extra growth and the extent to which that growth generates extra tax revenue that offsets the initial loss of revenue from the tax cut. Mr. Mankiw's conclusion: Even over the long term, once you've allowed all of the extra growth to feed through into extra revenue, cuts in capital taxes juice the economy enough to recoup half of the lost revenue, and cuts in income taxes deliver a boost that recoups 17 percent of the lost revenue. So a $100 billion cut in taxes on capital widens the budget deficit by $50 billion, and a $100 billion cut in income taxes widens the budget deficit by $83 billion.

If Mr. Bush does not believe Mr. Mankiw, perhaps he may believe the Congressional Budget Office. In a period when it was run by Douglas Holtz-Eakin, another economic conservative who worked in Mr. Bush's White House, the CBO estimated the extent to which a 10 percent reduction in personal taxes might pay for itself. On the most optimistic assumptions it could muster, the CBO found that tax cuts would stimulate enough economic growth to replace 22 percent of lost revenue in the first five years and 32 percent in the second five. On pessimistic assumptions, the growth effects of tax cuts did nothing to offset revenue loss.

If Mr. Bush believes neither Mr. Mankiw nor the Congressional Budget Office, he should at least respect his own Treasury. Prodded by the White House, Treasury economists have calculated how much extra growth would result from making the Bush tax cuts permanent. They have concluded that economic output would rise by about 0.5 percent in the first six years and by an additional 0.2 percent in the "long term." Since the federal government collects around 18 percent of gross domestic product in taxes, enlarging GDP by 0.7 percent would result in extra tax revenue equivalent to 0.13 percent of GDP. That would offset less than a tenth of the revenue that would be lost because of the tax cuts.

Mr. Bush's op-ed included nice statements about bipartisan cooperation. But the Democrats would be more likely to cooperate with the president if he stopped making things up.

Bill On Medicare Drug Cost Is Called Weak Medicine (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

A provision undercuts the legislation's effort to get manufacturers to offer deals, critics say.

WASHINGTON — The bill that House Democrats unveiled Friday to lower drug prices for the elderly contains a provision that could make it difficult — or maybe even impossible — to achieve its goal, some critics said.

The legislation would direct the federal government to use its huge market power to bargain for lower prices with drug manufacturers on behalf of some 23 million seniors enrolled in the Medicare prescription program.

But a provision in the bill would explicitly prohibit the government from creating a list of approved drugs, known as a formulary — thus taking away a powerful lever commonly used in such pricing negotiations. Fear of not being included on such a list of approved drugs is one of the principal reasons manufacturers agree to lower prices.

"If you don't have the power to bump a drug off the formulary, you have no negotiating clout," said Robert Laszewski, a health policy consultant to insurers and other healthcare companies. "Any good capitalist will tell you that you can't negotiate with somebody unless there is the expectation that you may not purchase their product."

Under the Medicare prescription system, benefits are provided by private insurance companies, which rely on lists of approved drugs to negotiate price cuts. Premiums that the elderly pay to the private companies are heavily subsidized by the government.

The program was designed by Republicans and passed in 2003 over bitter opposition from most Democrats, in part because it prohibited the government from negotiating price cuts. Freeing the government's hands was high on the list of actions Democrats had vowed to take when they gained control of Congress.

It's unclear how the apparent concession to industry will affect the political fortunes of the bill. It may help to blunt some arguments against it from critics who say that the government would be dictating prices and therefore reducing access to medicines. However, the concession seems unlikely to win over the drug industry.

"This is a trade-off," said a House Democratic leadership aide, who could not be identified because he is not authorized to talk to the press. "We felt we couldn't go as far as Veterans Affairs does, where they actually take drugs off the formulary."

The VA is known for driving tough deals on drug prices, but it covers many fewer medications than the typical Medicare plan.

DOJ_NMG_0113812

AARP, one of the main groups supporting the Democratic bill, acknowledged Friday that the measure would bar the use of a potent bargaining tactic. "It takes one tool away, but that's not the whole story here," said David Certner, federal affairs director for the influential seniors group.

The government could use other approaches — such as higher co-pays for drugs from companies that refuse to offer discounts — to achieve much the same effect, he said. AARP is launching an advertising campaign in support of the bill.

"Arguing that the only tool you have is to say 'We're going to drop you off the list' is not correct," added Certner.

Another bill supporter defended the concession. "If that provision wasn't in there, the drug companies would probably be going nuts," added Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, a liberal group that advocates for healthcare overhaul. "It makes it politically palatable without harming the intent of giving the [administration] the obligation to bargain."

The House is scheduled to vote Friday on the legislation, whose prospects are unclear. The Senate is expected to move more slowly and draft its own legislation. Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who leads the committee that would write the bill, has opposed allowing the government to negotiate drug prices.

If a bill emerges from Congress, President Bush might well veto it. Most Republicans consider government price controls anathema, and their party has also received strong support from the drug industry, which channeled most of its campaign contributions to GOP candidates in November's congressional elections.

Business groups were unimpressed with Democrats' no-formulary provision. "I'm not convinced it leads anywhere," said R. Bruce Josten, a top lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which has set defeat of the bill as one of its main legislative goals.

The bill would still put the government "in a godlike position on pricing," he said.

The House bill would require the Health and Human Services Department to negotiate prices on behalf of the Medicare program, and report to Congress on its progress. Individual Medicare plans would be free to bargain for deeper discounts, and could restrict the number of drugs they offer.

Strong Medicine (WSJ)

By Philip K. Howard

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Skyrocketing health-care costs are a looming national tragedy, but cannot be contained without restoring reliability to the justice system. America spends over $6,300 per person on health care each year, almost twice that of other Western countries; the overall expenditures on health care, $1.9 trillion, are rising annually at 8%. But the care here is on average no better than in countries that spend half as much.

There are a number of forces contributing to this higher cost -- including government mandates and lack of market discipline. One of the largest drivers of excess costs, however, is American justice -- or more accurately distrust of American justice. Fear of erratic jury decisions in medical malpractice cases has spawned a culture of fear, causing inefficiencies that infect every level of medicine.

Any sick person who gets sicker can drag a doctor through years of litigation -- an average of five years to resolve a claim. A jury can render a verdict that bears no relation to accepted medical standards or, indeed, the results of prior cases. It is not that most juries are unwise: Overall, according to a recent Harvard study, the error rate in this system is about 25%. But playing Russian roulette with one bullet in four chambers is not a source of comfort to most doctors. Meanwhile, payment to patients who deserve it may take years, with the attorney taking up to 40% of the award.

The direct costs of the malpractice system, about $28 billion a year, are only the tip of the iceberg. Defensive medicine -- the practice of ordering the procedures and tests that are not clinically indicated -- is ubiquitous, according to a recent study in Pennsylvania, practiced by over 90% of physicians. It's hard to calculate the total cost of defensive medicine, but estimates start at the tens of billions and go up from there.

Extra tests are not the worst inefficiency. Hospitals often operate like slow motion zones: No choice can occur without stacks of forms and disclosures with multiple witnesses -- all designed to "build a record" in case there's a bad outcome. End-of-life care is often as inhumane as it is costly, as nursing homes send the aged to die in intensive care units, poked with needles and strapped to machines sounding alarms instead of holding the hands of loved ones in quiet comfort.

Restoring trust in American justice can't be accomplished by tweaking this system. A functioning system of justice must aspire to deliberate choices, binding from one case to the next. Reliability is critical. Providers must know what's expected of them and must trust the system to distinguish good care from bad care. What's needed is something entirely new: specialized health-care courts.

DOJ_NMG_0113813

This country has a long history of expert courts in areas that require technical knowledge or special expertise. At the time of the Constitution there were admiralty courts; today we have bankruptcy courts, tax courts, patent courts and a wide range of specialized tribunals in areas ranging from workers compensation to vaccine liability.

A proposal for expert health courts has been developed in a joint venture of Common Good (a nonprofit organization) and the Harvard School of Public Health. It promises to restore reliability and foster confidence by incorporating the following features:

There would be no juries. Instead, specially trained administrative judges, advised by neutral experts paid for by the court -- not by lawyers for either side -- would make decisions and write opinions on standards of care.

A liberalized standard of recovery would provide compensation to injured patients based on whether the injury should have been avoidable. Someone who comes into the hospital with pneumonia and comes out with a staph infection, for example, should be able to recover without having to prove how it happened.

An individual injured by malpractice would receive 100% of his or her actual monetary losses, including future lost income -- but damages for pain and suffering would be paid according to a preset schedule depending on the injury. This is how people are compensated in other countries. And expedited procedures, including mandatory disclosure by defendants, would ensure quick resolution or disputes, avoiding the monetary and psychological costs of drawn-out proceedings.

The advantages of a specialized health court are enormous. A court that writes opinions based on accepted medical standards can provide affirmative guidelines for improving care. The incentives for defensive medicine will be sharply reduced, and a culture of trust will restore the candor needed to avoid tragic errors. Patients will receive settlements much sooner, paying only a fraction of what they now pay in legal fees. Most importantly, reliability will provide a foundation to restore order to health care, including defending reasonable choices to contain costs.

A broad coalition of safety experts, health-care providers and consumer groups such as AARP have come together to call for pilot projects of special health courts. Six major hospitals, including New York Presbyterian and Johns Hopkins, have volunteered to participate in the pilot. Several states are considering sponsoring an experiment, and a bipartisan bill to fund them, co-sponsored by Sens. Mike Enzi (R., Wyo.) and Max Baucus (D., Mt.) has been introduced.

The sticking point is the opposition of the trial lawyers, who insist that juries, and only juries, must make the final decision. But the civil jury was never supposed to decide standards of care as a matter of law; it is intended to resolve disputed facts. In any case, as noted, this country has a long history of special courts and tribunals without juries where the purpose, as here, is to improve the reliability and effectiveness of justice.

None of our aspirations for American healthcare -- better safety, affordability, even empathy -- can be realized as long as providers go through the day looking over their shoulders instead of doing what they think is right. The only way to overcome this distrust, and all its debilitating errors and waste, is to create a special health court that is trustworthy.

Mr. Howard, a lawyer and author, is chair of Common Good. More information on health courts can be found at www.cgood.org1.

Boxer To Chair Ethics In Johnson's Absence (RC)

RollCall.com, January 5, 2007

With Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) still recovering from brain surgery last month, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) will tap Environment and Public Works Chairwoman Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) to temporarily take the reins of the chamber's Ethics Committee, Reid said late Friday.

"Sen. Boxer will take the chair ... until [Johnson] comes back," Reid said, a move that will allow the committee to convene before Johnson returns to work. Democratic aides said Friday that Reid's decision also is being driven in part by the fact that the Senate will take up its ethics reform package next week, and while Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) are the primary sponsors, the move will allow Boxer and ranking member John Cornyn (R-Texas) to help manage the debate over the next two weeks.

Under Ethics Committee rules, an even number of Republican and Democratic Members are needed to conduct business. Additionally, unlike authorizing and appropriations committees, the Ethics Committee does not allow its members to vote by proxy if they are unable to attend a vote.

Memo Says White House Visitors Can't Be Named (AP)

By Pete Yost, The Associated Press

AP, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - The White House and the Secret Service quietly signed an agreement last spring in the midst of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal declaring that records identifying visitors to the White House are not open to the public.

DOJ_NMG_0113814

The Bush administration didn't reveal the existence of the memorandum of understanding until last fall. The White House is using it to deal with a legal problem on a separate front, a ruling by a federal judge ordering the production of Secret Service logs identifying visitors to the office of Vice President Dick Cheney.

In a federal appeals court filing three weeks ago, the administration's lawyers used the memo in a legal argument aimed at overturning the judge's ruling. The Washington Post is suing for access to the Secret Service logs.

The five-page document dated May 17 declares that all entry and exit data on White House visitors belongs to the White House as presidential records rather than to the Secret Service as agency records. Therefore, the agreement states, the material is not subject to public disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act.

In the past, Secret Service logs have revealed the comings and goings of various White House visitors, including Monica Lewinsky and Clinton campaign donor Denise Rich, the wife of fugitive financier Marc Rich, who received a pardon in the closing hours of the Clinton administration.

The memo last spring was signed by the White House and Secret Service the day after a Washington-based group asked a federal judge to impose sanctions on the Secret Service in a dispute over White House visitor logs for Abramoff.

The chief counsel to another Washington-based group suing to get Secret Service logs calls the creation of the memo "a political maneuver couched as a legal one."

"It appears the White House is actually manufacturing evidence to further its own agenda," Anne Weismann, a Justice Department lawyer for 19 years and now chief counsel to Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, said Friday.

Federal courts ultimately will decide whether records identifying White House visitors and who they are going to see are public record.

Court Was Once Cloistered; Now Its Chief Does "Nightline" (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

The "rare public address" by a member of the U.S. Supreme Court isn't so rare anymore.

Just in the past few months, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg has invited television interrogator Mike Wallace into her chambers for a well-mannered chat. Justice Antonin Scalia has turned up at a sold-out breakfast meeting of the Northern Virginia Technology Council and mixed it up with the American Civil Liberties Union, and he has publicly debated the Constitution with fellow justice -- but not kindred spirit -- Stephen G. Breyer. Breyer has promoted his book "Active Liberty" on "Fox News Sunday" with the other television interrogator named Wallace, Chris.

And this week, the court's longest-serving justice joined the crowd, as John Paul Stevens said in what was grandly billed as his first network television interview that he considered himself the same "moderate conservative" that President Gerald R. Ford appointed 31 years ago, even though he is now considered one of the court's reliable liberals.

"I don't really think I've changed," he told ABC's Jan Crawford Greenburg. "I think there have been a lot of changes in the court."

Stevens presumably was referring to the growing conservatism of Republican appointees to the court. But there has also been a change in the way justices, now led by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., 51, see their role both in explaining what they do and in fostering a public conversation about the judiciary, according to those who most carefully monitor the court.

"Even five years ago, it would have been astonishing" to see justices interviewed on Sunday-morning news talk shows, said Thomas C. Goldstein, a Supreme Court practitioner who started the popular Scotusblog.com. "The dam has broken on the justices' desire to stay behind the red curtain."

Goldstein says the change has been building since the court's controversial 5 to 4 Bush v. Gore decision, when justices "realized they had to do a better job explaining themselves."

Others say that Roberts, now in the middle of his second term, has become a more visible symbol of the court, especially because his predecessor, William H. Rehnquist, was in poor health for his final years on the court.

"There's a new chief justice and a new court for the first time in a long time," said Orin S. Kerr, a George Washington University law professor and former Supreme Court clerk who frequently comments about the court.

Roberts is "making himself open and present in the legal world," Kerr said. "It may be that he has an effect on the other justices."

Roberts seems comfortable with reporters. In the wide-ranging "Nightline" interview with Greenburg before University of Miami students in November, he covered his childhood in Indiana and his philosophy on the court: The more narrowly tailored the decision, the better. If it can be unanimous, even better.

DOJ_NMG_0113815

He was properly self-deprecating about his selection. He told of racing to his house in Maryland from Dulles Airport because he had been told to expect a call from President Bush at a certain time. "The White House was a very efficient operation, and I'm sure if I wasn't there, they'd just go down the list and take whoever was next."

Just this term, Roberts has undertaken a series of beyond-the-Beltway speeches, in New York, Vermont, South Carolina and Florida. He has two more scheduled this month, in Chicago and Dallas.

It is difficult to prove conclusively that the justices are talking more, just as it is difficult to know how much they talked in the past. Partly out of court tradition, their offices do not routinely issue their schedules or publicize their remarks. (The last speech submitted to the court's Web site is an August address by Ginsburg in Turkey.) Justices have long given speeches to law classes and legal conferences and at overseas symposiums, sometimes noticed and sometimes not.

But those who follow the court closely say they have no doubt there has been a change.

"This court is more open and accessible in terms of interviews and public conversations than the court has ever been in its history," said University of Chicago law professor Dennis J. Hutchinson.

Hutchinson and others think the change they see is born of individuals: Justice Anthony M. Kennedy promotes citizen involvement in democracy; Scalia and Breyer are willing to debate their views of constitutional interpretation; and even the quiet Stevens has a new tendency to make news. Stevens said in December that he respected the court's decision that found flag burning to be protected free speech, even though he was on the losing side of that case more than a decade ago.

And, Hutchinson said, "Justice Roberts, in my view, is trying to put a human face on the court."

Part of the perception that justices are speaking out more can be attributed to the vitality of blogs and other publications by lawyers, professors and others that take note of almost any utterance from a justice and provide instant analysis.

Some things don't change. Justice David H. Souter limits his remarks almost exclusively to the chambers, and Justice Clarence Thomas is averse to media interviews. Scalia has always spoken frequently outside the court, but the change is that he now is open to media coverage of the events.

He and Breyer offered their competing constitutional views in the debate co-sponsored by the American Constitution Society and the Federalist Society. Breyer says that "purpose" and "consequences" must be considered; Scalia looks for the original intent of the framers. Both now are careful not to talk about current issues before the court; in 2004, Scalia recused himself from a decision on the constitutionality of the phrase "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance, after speaking out on the case at a rally in Virginia.

Such considerations are an important part of a judge's impartiality but also underscore a justice's privilege to answer only questions that are welcome.

So Ginsburg in September was abrupt when Wallace attempted to ask her about one of the court's most enduringly controversial subjects. "Stop," she said. "We're not going to talk about abortion."

Race Discrimination Case Added To Docket (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

The Supreme Court yesterday added seven cases to its docket, including a discrimination case in which a Coca-Cola bottling company fired a black employee.

The lawsuit involves allegations that a supervisor of employee Stephen Peters was motivated by racial bias and influenced a human resources manager to fire the worker. Coca-Cola fired Peters for insubordination after he refused a request to work on a weekend during his scheduled days off.

A federal appeals court said that a federal judge who dismissed the case placed too much emphasis on the fact that Peters's immediate supervisor made no express recommendation to fire him.

Coca-Cola asked the Supreme Court to consider whether an employer may be held liable for intentional discrimination if the person who fired an employee harbored no discriminatory bias.

The case is BCI Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of Los Angeles v. EEOC, No. 06-341.

The court also agreed to consider the interaction of two federal laws, the Endangered Species Act and the Clean Water Act, which set out different standards for federal agencies to protect endangered species.

The case is National Association of Home Builders et al. v. Defenders of Wildlife et al., No. 06-340.

Justices To Consider School Sports Rules (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113816

The high court will take up athlete recruiting, home-care worker pay and stock fraud cases.

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Friday to referee a high school sports dispute over whether coaches have a free-speech right to recruit athletes from other schools.

Last year, a federal appeals court threw out a $3,000 fine and a two-year suspension given to a Tennessee high school football powerhouse whose coach was accused of violating the state's anti-recruiting rule, which is similar to regulations around the country.

Coach Carlton Flatt of the private Brentwood Academy had sent letters and made phone calls to a dozen eighth-grade boys inviting them to spring practice at his school near Nashville.

After the state high school athletic association handed down its punishment, the academy sued in federal court alleging a violation of the 1st Amendment.

In a long-running legal battle, a federal judge as well as the appeals court sided with Brentwood Academy and said the coach's letters and calls were protected as free speech.

The Tennessee Secondary School Athletic Assn. appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that such a free-speech rule could wreak havoc in sports. Schools and coaches in sports leagues "agree to abide by the rules," and they cannot, for example, scream in a referee's face and then claim the protections of the 1st Amendment, the association said.

The justices met Friday for the first time since the Christmas holiday and voted to hear six new cases besides Tennessee Secondary School Athletic Assn. vs. Brentwood Academy.

In Long Island Care at Home vs. Osborne, the court will decide whether certain home-care workers are protected by the federal law that requires a minimum wage and overtime pay.

Since the 1970s, the Labor Department has said home-care workers who provide companionship services to the elderly and infirm are generally not covered by the law.

But in August, a U.S. appeals court in New York rejected that exemption for home-care employees of outside companies.

The home-care industry, which appealed, said that the decision could greatly increase the cost of care for millions of people who are old, sick or disabled.

The court also will hear a potentially important discrimination case that tests whether companies can be held liable for racial bias by a low-level supervisor.

Stephen Peters, a black employee for Coca-Cola in New Mexico, sued the company after being fired, alleging he was a victim of racial discrimination.

Last year, the U.S. appeals court in Denver cleared his suit to go to trial, though its judges agreed that the regional manager in Phoenix who ordered the firing "had no idea that Mr. Peters was black." There was, however, evidence that his actual supervisor showed a bias against blacks and treated Peters unfairly.

The court agreed to hear the case, BCI Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of Los Angeles vs. the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, to clarify the law on handling discrimination complaints.

The justices also said they would consider making it harder to sue companies for stock fraud. Tellabs, a maker of telecommunications equipment, was sued by investors who said its executives had knowingly inflated its value.

A federal appeals court in Chicago cleared the suit to go forward, but the company appealed, arguing the plaintiffs lacked evidence that the executives knew their projections were wrong.

The case, Tellabs vs. Makor Issues & Rights, is the latest to test how much proof investors must produce before they can move forward with a stock fraud suit against a corporation.

The justices are to hear arguments in these cases in March or April and to issue rulings by late June.

Justices To Consider Impact Of Mental Illness On Death Penalty (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — The Supreme Court agreed on Friday to use the case of a schizophrenic death row inmate in Texas to set the standard for determining when a mental illness is so severe that execution would be constitutionally impermissible.

The question is not a new one for the court or for the criminal justice system, but it has come to the fore recently as a growing number of legal and mental health organizations have joined a call for a moratorium on executing those whose rational judgment has been significantly impaired, including their ability to appreciate why they have been sentenced to death.

DOJ_NMG_0113817

The American Psychiatric Association has expressed specific concern about the competency standard used by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, which upheld the death sentence for the Texas inmate, Scott L. Panetti, in rejecting his petition for a writ of habeas corpus last May.

Mr. Panetti, convicted in 1992 of fatally shooting his in-laws in the presence of his estranged wife and their 3-year-old child, is a 48-year-old Navy veteran who was hospitalized 14 times for schizophrenia and other serious mental disorders in the decade before the crime. A jury nonetheless found him competent to stand trial, and the judge permitted him to represent himself.

The Supreme Court ruled in 1986 that the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment barred the execution of the mentally ill. But the justices who decided that case, Ford v. Wainwright, did not settle on a definition of mental illness for the purpose of determining competency for execution.

Most lower courts have adopted, as controlling, a separate opinion by Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., who said that the "retributive goal of the criminal law" was satisfied as long as defendants were aware of "the punishment they are about to suffer" and "why they are to suffer it."

The Fifth Circuit, which supervises the courts in Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi, has boiled this down to what it calls an "awareness" test. In Mr. Panetti's case, Panetti v. Quarterman, No. 06-6407, the appeals court found the test was satisfied because Mr. Panetti indicated that he understood the state's intention to execute him for killing his wife's parents. The fact that he also held the delusional belief that his execution was part of a conspiracy by which the state was trying to prevent him from preaching the Gospel was beside the point, the appeals court said.

In Mr. Panetti's appeal to the Supreme Court, his lawyers argue that the appeals court has distorted Justice Powell's meaning by failing to take the delusions into account. "The moral force of retribution is lost if an inmate believes that his execution is being carried out through a conspiracy of demonic forces rather than as a lawful punishment for a horrific crime," their brief argues.

In a brief urging the justices to accept the appeal, the National Alliance on Mental Illness, an advocacy organization, said "this case exemplifies why mere 'awareness,' the test applied by the Fifth Circuit, is not a meaningful requirement for determining whether to execute prisoners who are severely mentally ill."

The brief said the test "makes no sense when applied to a prisoner who is plagued by delusions of grand persecution."

At his trial, Mr. Panetti was often incoherent and tried to issue subpoenas to Jesus, the pope and John F. Kennedy.

The justices' decision to hear his appeal was the latest indication of the Supreme Court's concern about the administration of capital punishment. In recent years, the court has declared unconstitutional the execution of mentally retarded defendants as well as those who committed murder before the age of 18. Some opponents of the death penalty have described mental illness as the next frontier in the debate.

Mr. Panetti's case was one of seven new appeals the court granted on a busy day as the justices returned from a four-week recess. The cases will be heard on dates yet to be determined in March and April.

Among the other new cases were appeals by the Bush administration and the National Association of Home Builders in a case that lies at the intersection between the Clean Water Act and the Endangered Species Act. The question is whether the Endangered Species Act limits the government's discretion to transfer certain authority over pollution permits from federal agencies to the individual states, as the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit found.

The twin appeals, consolidated for a single argument, are National Association of Home Builders v. Defenders of Wildlife, No. 06-340, and United States Environmental Protection Agency v. Defenders of Wildlife, No. 05-549.

With two significant environmental cases already having been argued in the last three months, the term figures to be one of the most consequential in years for environmental law.

White House Seeks Lawyer Wise To Ways Of Congress (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — President Bush is seeking a new chief lawyer with credentials as a proven combatant as he and his staff prepare for a potential raft of investigations from Democrats in Congress who have promised to challenge the White House's conduct of policy and its assertions of executive power.

Republicans who have consulted with administration officials on personnel said the White House chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, was looking for a seasoned Washington hand to succeed Harriet E. Miers, the White House counsel who announced her resignation on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0113818

Republicans said Friday in interviews that the White House was now, in essence, seeking a politically savvy outsider with ties throughout the capital and in Congress who might be called upon to become something of a public figure in potentially high-profile fights.

"They need somebody who can sit down face-to-face with an ornery committee chairman and work out a conflict over an oversight request," said Bradford A. Berenson, a former associate counsel for Mr. Bush during his first term. "The job will require a certain minimum level of stature and a minimum level of political experience."

Several Republicans, including some former administration officials, said the new White House counsel would also need the stature to counterbalance David S. Addington, the powerful chief of staff of Vice President Dick Cheney. Mr. Addington has tended to argue against cooperating with Congressional requests for classified information, a position that may require some softening, or at least more diplomacy, in the 110th Congress.

The White House is, in some respects, seeking a figure who is the mirror opposite of Ms. Miers, who has not shown a high level of comfort being a public figure, especially since withdrawing herself from the Supreme Court nominating process in 2005 under heavy fire from liberals and conservatives.

Ms. Miers spent most of her career in Texas, and did most of her maneuvering within the White House.

Mr. Bush's choice will be in the mold of the former solicitor general, Theodore B. Olson, said Republican allies of Mr. Bush who are familiar with the administration's views. These people, speaking anonymously to preserve their access to White House officials, said they took Mr. Olson at his word that he was not interested in the position.

These Republicans said other contenders in that mold include Fred F. Fielding, the Reagan-era White House counsel who is now a corporate lawyer in Washington; Charles J. Cooper, a former Justice Department official under President Ronald Reagan, also now practicing law in Washington; Laurence H. Silberman, the retired United States Court of Appeals judge close to Mr. Cheney; and David Aufhauser, the former general counsel for the Treasury Department who is now the global general counsel for UBS, the Swiss bank. Mr. Aufhauser, who has worked with Ms. Miers, also played a crucial legal role for Mr. Bush during the recount of the presidential vote in 2000.

Another name bandied about by some Republicans, but considered a long shot because he lacks Washington legal experience, is J. Thomas Schieffer, the ambassador to Japan who is both a friend and former business partner of President Bush. Mr. Schieffer has been overseas since 2001, having been ambassador to Australia, and may be interested in a Washington job.

The people familiar with the White House thinking said Ms. Miers's departure, coming amid a number of changes in top administration jobs, had been among the most painful personally for Mr. Bush, who has grown quite close to her over more than a decade of collaboration.

Her resignation capped months of speculation about her future at the White House. Republicans close to the White House said that, in the spring, Mr. Bolten had considered replacing Ms. Miers but that Mr. Bush had made it clear he would consider no such thing. But after the Democrats' election victories in November and the promises by some to challenge Mr. Bush's claims of executive power, Mr. Bolten had new incentive to push for change in the counsel's office, several Republicans said.

Two administration officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss a delicate personnel issue, said that Ms. Miers was ready to leave all the same, and disputed suggestions that she was forced out of the post, which they said she could have kept had she wanted to.

Safe As Milk? (NYT)

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

The Food and Drug Administration's assessment that food from cloned animals is safe to eat is a victory for biotech companies and a loss for everyone else. Like many decisions on the cutting edge of agricultural technology, it was hurried along in a way that is more sensitive to political and economic pressure than to the long-term welfare of animals, humans and the world they inhabit. Asking whether cloned meat and milk are safe is not even the right question. The right question is, why clone at all?

Approving food from cloned animals will create another food-labeling nightmare and the same aggressive litigation that usually blocks any attempt to tell consumers where their food comes from.

But cloning has much worse consequences. It marks a revolutionary shift — from the relative randomness of sexual reproduction to the apparent uniformity of asexual reproduction. Because cloning creates genetically identical animals, it will shrink the gene pool on which agriculture rests, and any drastic shrinkage in genetic diversity creates enormous health risks for a species.

Cloning isn't just a matter for the F.D.A. to decide. It is up to us as a society to decide as well. We should be asking much broader questions than the F.D.A. is able to. Who will cloning benefit? What will it do to the health of the animals themselves?

DOJ_NMG_0113819

But the most important question of all may be this one: Are we willing to judge the suitability of new technologies in ways that fully address their ethical and biological complexities? Or are we doomed to give in to politics and the bottom line?

Let Them Eat Clones (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

Even if it's creepy, cloned meat is safe and tasty, says the Food and Drug Administration.

CLONED BEEF: It's what's for dinner. Or at least it will be, if the Food and Drug Administration acts on its recommendation last week to allow meat and milk from cloned animals to be sold without special labels — a position that has food-purity activists up in arms.

Cloned meat, genetically modified crops and hormone-injected milk cows do not qualify as progress to the organic food crowd, which says such advances will cause as-yet-unimaginable health and environmental damage. It would be easier to take them seriously if scientists didn't dismiss most of their concerns out of hand, after voluminous studies showing no ill effects.

Animal cloning appears to touch a particular nerve. A recent survey by the Pew Initiative on Food and Biotechnology found that 64% of Americans are uncomfortable with animal cloning. The numbers are probably worse in much of Europe and Asia, where U.S. experiments with modified crops cause widespread dismay and often lead to bans on U.S. farm exports.

There are legitimate ethical or religious objections to human tampering with the natural reproductive process. And cloning can have ill effects on animals, causing more mutations and early deaths. But the food purists do their cause a disservice when they argue that cloned meat is somehow unsafe or unhealthy.

To begin with, the clone genie is already out of the bottle. There is a voluntary moratorium on the sale of cloned meat and dairy products, but it is widely ignored. Some of the meat currently in the freezer of your local supermarket may well be from the offspring of a cloned animal.

The second delusion is that non-cloned products now in stores are more "natural." Cloning, which involves replacing an egg's nucleus with DNA from a genetically desirable animal, is just the latest artificial reproductive technology to come down the pike. Chances are, that T-bone on your table came from a cow produced using artificial insemination, in vitro fertilization, embryo transfer or some other method that didn't involve a cow and a bull making beautiful music together.

Finally, it's delusional to think that special labels would make any difference. It's impossible to distinguish — at the molecular level or by taste — meat from a cloned animal from the meat of an animal born of two parents. So there would be no way to determine whether meatpackers were complying with the labeling law.

It isn't the FDA's job to rule on the morality of animal husbandry, nor to placate nervous trading partners overseas. Its mandate is to ensure the safety of the nation's food supply, and the verdict is in: Cloned meat is safe.

Those who aren't convinced will have other options. Just as "organic" farms and dairies across the country put special labels on their hormone-free milk or pesticide-free produce, ranches will doubtless spring up to market "non-cloned" meats. Those who want to pay more for lower-quality food will no doubt be able to do so.

OTHER NEWS:

Jobs Data Brighten Economic Picture (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-Morales, Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Strong Payroll, Wage Gains Ease Concerns of Recession And Trim Odds of a Rate Cut

Job creation accelerated at the end of last year and wage gains hovered at their highest level in nearly six years, suggesting that the economy might be performing better than economists anticipated and dashing hopes that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates anytime soon.

The Labor Department Friday said U.S. nonfarm payrolls expanded by a seasonally adjusted 167,000 jobs in December as strong gains in the service sector easily offset manufacturing losses and a drop in construction jobs. With employment gains for October and November revised up by a combined 29,000, the nation added a net total of 1.8 million jobs last year, compared with 1.9 million in 2005 and 2.1 million in 2004. Meanwhile, the unemployment rate last month remained unchanged at 4.5%, near a five-year low.

The strong payroll gains "were certainly a surprise," given recent forecasts for waning job growth, said Nigel Gault, an economist at consultancy Global Insight. "It clearly points to a stronger

DOJ_NMG_0113820

Moody's Investor Services Chief Economist John Lonski6 parses the December jobs data in an interview with WSJ reporter Justin Lahart.

The Labor Department report also showed that wages are rising robustly for U.S. workers: Average hourly earnings rose eight cents to $17.04 in December, up 0.5% from a month earlier and 4.2% from December 2005. Last month's annual wage increase matches November's upwardly revised performance, which both mark the biggest percentage gain since February 2001.

Some economists believe that an increasingly tight labor market means that wages will move even higher in the months ahead, a trend that could damp corporate profits.

"At this stage of the business cycle, more of the total [profit] pie is going to workers and less is going to" corporate coffers, said Jan Hatzius, an economist at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. "Stronger wage growth is likely to persist for a substantial part of 2007."

Indeed, analysts noted Friday that the economy is generating jobs at a pace that is reducing the supply of available workers. This pool includes people who are looking for jobs as well as people who aren't actively searching for work but would accept a job if one were offered. In the past year, this pool has fallen by 1.2 million people to 11.4 million workers, according to economists at Bear Stearns Cos.

Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago President Michael Moskow suggested that December's job growth was well above what the economy can sustain in the long run without straining the supply of available workers.

Slowing population growth and the retiring baby boomers' exit from the work force means normal job growth is about 100,000 a month, he told the Labor and Employment Relations Association in Chicago late Friday. He noted that monthly job growth has averaged about 160,000 in the past six months.

"By the old standard, that would be just average, but given the current trends in the labor force, we view such growth as quite solid," Mr. Moskow said.

That further diminishes the odds that the Federal Reserve will ease monetary policy in coming months, a view that spooked financial markets Friday. The Dow Jones Industrial Average declined 82.68 points to close at 12398.01, while in the bond market in late trading, prices on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note were down 7/32, or a loss of $2.188 for each $1,000 face amount. The yield rose to 4.648%.

Federal Reserve officials see the continued strength in employment as a bit puzzling given that overall economic growth appears to have decelerated. "That difference most likely reflected lags between movements in activity and employment, implying that growth in employment would probably slow over the next quarter or so," said minutes to the Fed's December policy meeting, released Wednesday. If officials still expect the labor market to weaken, they will be less concerned that low unemployment will generate inflationary pressure via higher wages.

Federal Reserve Bank of Boston President Cathy Minehan Friday said the economy will likely grow moderately this year, the unemployment rate will remain below 5%, and underlying inflation, though still a "challenge," will decline gradually.

Employment gains in December were driven by the service sector, which added 178,000 jobs last month. Although retailers shed 9,000 jobs, professional and business services, a category that includes consultants and lawyers, added 50,000 jobs; education and health care added 43,000 jobs; and leisure and hospitality added 31,000 jobs.

Meanwhile, hiring outside the service sector fell last month. Manufacturers cut 12,000 jobs, and the construction industry shed a less-than-expected 3,000 workers amid December's mild weather. Besides housing-related activity, the construction industry added jobs last month to meet demand for hotel construction and other projects.

Strong US Job Gains Dash Rate Cut Hopes (FT)

By Eoin Callan, Krishna Guha, Ed Crooks

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

US companies hired workers at a blistering pace last month, according to fresh data, which dashed hopes of early US interest rate cuts and brightened prospects that the world's biggest economy is heading for a soft landing.

The US Department of Labor said non-farm payrolls rose 167,000 in December, a figure far exceeding market expectations that prompted a sharp sell-off in the bond market. While equities fell back as the likelihood of a rate cut receded, the data sent the dollar higher, and halted an earlier slide in oil prices.

The December jobs gain was the biggest increase in 2006, defying economists' predictions that the pace of hiring would slow. Wages also picked up, with a 4.2 per cent annual increase in average hourly earnings.

DOJ_NMG_0113821

The report is a boost for the Fed in its tug-of-war with the bond market over the state of the US economy and the likely future path of interest rates. Strong job creation and healthy wage gains reinforce the Fed view that the US economy is on track for a soft landing, in spite of the drag from housing and some weakness in manufacturing.

Meanwhile, they challenge the bond market's more pessimistic assumption that gathering economic weakness will force the Fed to cut interest rates.

US bond prices fell sharply following the release of the report, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year bond up 8.4 basis points to 4.69 per cent in the first hour. Bonds later recovered slightly. Short-term interest rate futures fell, bringing the implied odds of a 25 basis point cut by the end of the first half of this year to 30 per cent, down from 50 per cent before the data.

Job creation was also stronger than previously thought in November, with an increase of 154,000, compared with earlier estimates of 132,000.

Carlos Gutierrez, commerce secretary, told the FT the strong jobs numbers "can be sustained" and said wage gains showed workers were now sharing in the benefits of growth.

The economic data helped support the price of oil after sharp falls this week. Oil prices steadied above $55 a barrel for Brent crude. The Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries offered no clear signal on Friday. Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, Qatar's oil minister, was reported by Bloomberg, the news agency, as being "very concerned" about the fall in prices.

Workers, Wages Add To Growth (WP)

By Nell Henderson, Howard Schneider, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Momentum Carries Economy Into 2007

Employers hired new workers and boosted wages at a brisk clip last month, creating far more jobs than many economists had expected and causing unemployment to hold steady at a low 4.5 percent, the Labor Department said yesterday.

That report followed others this week showing that retailers rang up decent holiday sales last month, while factories churned out more goods and businesses spent more on offices, shopping centers and other types of commercial construction.

It's a strong series of reports given that oil prices topped $77 a barrel last year, interest rates rose and a serious housing slump fueled fears of a recession.

"There was a tremendous amount of momentum gathering at the end of the year, and it's carrying into 2007," said Richard Yamarone, director of research at Argus Research Corp.

Home builders, automakers and their suppliers cut thousands of jobs last month, reflecting downturns in their industries that slowed the economy in 2006 and are likely to restrain growth this year as well.

But by last month, the new data show, those woes had not dampened the nation's vibrant service sector, which includes education, health care, finance, travel, entertainment and other industries that together employ more than four of every five payroll workers.

Hiring in these industries more than offset layoffs elsewhere, for a strong net increase of 167,000 jobs in December and 1.8 million jobs for the year, the Labor Department said.

Employers also boosted average wages by a healthy 0.5 percent last month, to $17.04 an hour, which added up to a 4.2 percent increase over the 12 months ended in December, the biggest yearly gain since 2000.

And consumers found their wages went farther at year's end because of falling inflation, which has tumbled along with fuel prices since the summer. That helped encourage holiday spending: Sales at the major retail chains rose by a solid 3.1 percent in December from a year earlier, the International Council of Shopping Centers said this week.

"Nothing is more powerful than employment. That is the determinant of whether you spend . . . and that is fueling economic growth," Yamarone said.

With solid spending at home and a weaker dollar boosting demand from abroad, U.S. manufacturers increased their activity in December, rebounding from a decline in November, the Institute for Supply Management reported earlier in the week.

The Commerce Department also said this week that spending on nonresidential construction projects rose in both October and November, helping cushion the continued decline in spending on home building.

Yesterday's report was too much good news for Wall Street's taste. After a raft of mixed economic signals earlier this winter, investors had been betting the Federal Reserve would cut interest rates soon to fuel economic growth. But that looks increasingly unlikely, and stock and bond prices fell yesterday and investors abandoned their earlier assumptions. Analysts predicted the Federal Reserve will hold steady well into this year.

DOJ_NMG_0113822

Fed policymakers raised short-term interest rates steadily through last June in an effort to cool the economy just enough to bring down inflation without causing a recession -- a goal called a "soft landing." While price pressures moderated last year, the central bank wants them to weaken further this year.

Now, the economy appears likely to grow a moderate 2.4 percent this year, after growing faster than 3 percent in each of the last three years, according to the average forecast of the 54 top business and university economists surveyed last month for Blue Chip Economic Indicators, a monthly publication.

The Blue Chip group also predicted inflation will ebb a little this year, while unemployment creeps up to average 4.8 percent, higher than last month's rate, but still low historically. None of the experts surveyed predicted a recession.

"We are successfully in a soft landing," said Diane Swonk, chief economist at Mesirow Financial. She predicted the economy would rebound strongly enough later this year to cause the Fed to raise its benchmark rate.

The Fed, however, isn't expected to raise interest rates in the near future because it is uncertain how much further the housing market will sag.

Home sales rose in November, fostering hopes they will stabilize soon. But home construction is likely to continue declining for many months while home builders work to reduce their inventories of unsold homes, analysts said.

Housing-related industries -- including residential construction, contractors, real estate agents and brokers -- shed 19,000 jobs last year, a sharp reversal after adding 306,000 in 2005, according to the Economic Policy Institute, a research organization focused on labor issues. Analysts forecast more such losses this year.

Manufacturing employment also appears likely to continue to slide, after falling by 72,000 workers last year. Nearly nine of every 10 factory jobs lost in the second half of last year reflected cuts by employers in businesses related to housing or automaking, said David Huether, chief economist at the National Association of Manufacturers.

Construction employment fell in each of the last four months of last year, but rose by 39,000 jobs over 2006, as gains in nonresidential work more than offset cuts by home builders, the Labor data showed.

But because of the continued expansion of the nation's service industries, the nation's overall job market tightened last year, brightening employment prospects for many workers.

Unemployment averaged 4.6 percent, the lowest level in six years, down from an average of 5.1 percent in 2005.

The jobless rate among white workers rose to 4 percent in December from 3.9 percent in November. African American unemployment fell to 8.4 percent last month, the lowest level since July 2001, from 8.6 percent in November. Latino joblessness fell to 4.9 percent from 5 percent.

The average duration of unemployment shrunk last year as well, to 15.9 weeks as of December from 17.4 weeks in December 2005.

The ranks of the so-called "long-term" jobless workers declined as well, to 16 percent of all the unemployed last month, from 18.5 percent a year earlier, Labor said.

Jobs, Income Gains Bright Spots In 2006 (WT)

By Patrice Hill, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

The job market was the brightest spot in the economy at the end of last year, with wage gains hitting a six-year high of 4.2 percent and employers creating another 167,000 jobs, the Labor Department reported yesterday.

In all, 1.8 million new jobs opened up in 2006 while the healthy growth in incomes enabled consumers to overcome high gas prices and keep spending despite deep troubles in the housing market and the auto industry. The unemployment rate, at 4.5 percent in December, was at the lowest levels since 2000.

By the end of the year, robust growth in services, management and professional jobs like health care, education, engineering and telecommunications overwhelmed job losses in construction and manufacturing that resulted from the weak real estate and auto sectors. Many economists expected the opposite, thinking housing-related job losses would cascade into broader weakness in the labor market.

"It's certainly going to go a long way in calming fears that a housing slowdown was taking the economy apart," said Jim Paulsen, chief investment officer for Wells Capital Management. He expects forecasters to increase their estimates of economic growth this year as a result of the surprisingly strong job growth.

Other recent reports, including news of a weak Christmas sales season, have suggested economic growth and consumer spending are softening.

"Clearly, there is support for consumer spending" from the solid job and income gains, and that will underpin growth in the broader economy, said John Silvia, chief economist at Wachovia Securities.

DOJ_NMG_0113823

Stocks and bonds fell on yesterday's news, as it played into worries at the Federal Reserve that an increasingly tight job market, especially for skilled and educated workers, will stoke wage growth and bolster inflation. Wages constitute about two-thirds of the costs covered by consumer prices.

Fed watchers said that rather than cut interest rates this spring, as many in the markets hoped, the jobs report will prompt the central bank to keep rates elevated and maintain vigilance against inflation.

"Wage gains remain a two-edged sword," said Mr. Silvia. They are "good for personal income" and economic growth, but they underpin inflationary pressures.

"The Fed isn't going to do anything this quarter" to change its anti-inflation stance, said Jack Malvey, global fixed-income strategist at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. "The momentum of the U.S. economy is more vigorous than some in the market presume."

Roger M. Kubarych, economist at Unicredit Markets, said the markets need to awaken to this fact: The Fed will not consider cutting rates unless the job market starts to show weakness.

Peter Morici, business professor at the University of Maryland, said employment conditions may not be as good as they seem. The department reported that 6.8 million people remain unemployed, and participation in the labor force remains well below 2000 levels because another 1.3 million would like to work but are discouraged and have stopped looking for jobs. Many would-be workers have dropped out to seek schooling.

Also, the department's survey of households shows that more than a million people became self-employed last year, often because they could not find good payroll jobs, Mr. Morici said.

"Many people who have been displaced from positions with regular employers have sought refuge in home-based consulting and blue-collar pickup jobs," he said. "For many these days, self-employment is three parts resume posting and one part work, but it still counts as employment at the Labor Department."

Lawrence Kudlow, president of Kudlow & Co., said the growth in self-employment and one-man businesses is a hallmark of an entrepreneurial economy.

"Free-market capitalism is a wonderful thing," he said. "The economy is still in a slowdown mode, but it is still quite healthy," thanks to the steady growth in jobs and income.

Job Growth Is Strong, Surprising Economists (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

Job growth was brisk last month as businesses added to their payrolls with surprising confidence, further evidence that the economy is not likely to slip into a recession.

This growth helped both the employed and the unemployed. The prospects for working Americans strengthened as wages for most workers climbed at a steady clip. Those looking for a job last month found a more welcoming job market, and the amount of time they spent out of work dropped considerably.

The national unemployment rate held steady at a low 4.5 percent.

Such strong numbers, reported yesterday in the government's monthly survey of households and businesses, came as a surprise to many economists, who expected the slowing economy to pressure employers to rein in hiring.

The report also came just two days after an employment survey from a private statistics firm suggested that businesses had shed 40,000 jobs last month.

"Such weakness as we have seen in the job market has been quite narrowly confined to those sectors immediately affected, like construction and manufacturing," said Nigel Gault, chief United States economist for Global Insight. "It really does help alleviate fears of a cumulative downturn spreading from housing and pulling everything down."

The report dashed cold water on those who were expecting the Federal Reserve to lower interest rates anytime soon. Investors, who have been counting on a rate cut by the central bank sometime in the first half of the year, bid stocks lower on the news and sent the bond market reeling. On Wall Street, stocks had their worst day since the end of November.

The Labor Department reported that employment outside the farming sector grew by 167,000 jobs in December, seasonally adjusted — more than enough to absorb natural growth in the work force. In another sign of just how strong the job market has been, the figures for October and November were revised to show that businesses hired more employees than the government first thought.

With the housing market in a slump, builders eliminated 3,000 jobs in December, after cutting substantially more in October and November. And economists said that had it not been for unseasonably warm weather, builders probably would have eliminated even more workers.

DOJ_NMG_0113824

Downsizing in the American auto industry helped contribute to an overall decline in manufacturing jobs last month. For the year, manufacturers shed a net 72,000 jobs.

Retailers, too, shrunk their payrolls last month, reflecting a weak holiday shopping season. Home-improvement supply stores, clothing stores and sporting goods stores led the industry in jobs cut.

But the services sector of the economy showed considerable strength. Professional and business services — companies that offer things like administrative support, computer software design and waste management — added a net 50,000 jobs last month. Health care providers added 31,000 new jobs, and so did hospitality businesses like restaurants and bars.

In all, the largest percentage of the population since September 2001 was employed in December. The employment-population ratio edged up a tenth of a percentage point, to 63.4 percent.

"You want to see folks who are sitting on the sidelines able to come in and find work," said Jared Bernstein, an economist with the Economic Policy Institute. "You've had a really important expansion in labor force, in particular by people who were waiting for jobs and wages to heat up a bit."

Not only are more Americans working, but they are being paid more for it. Average wages have been outpacing inflation by enough of a margin in recent months that workers have seen some of the biggest real gains in their paychecks this decade.

In December, that trend appeared to continue as the average hourly earning for a worker in a nonmanagerial position climbed 8 cents, to $17.04. That was a 4.2 percent gain compared with December 2005, and it matched November's rise, which was the highest in more than five years. It has not topped that rate in more than six years.

Some recent evidence had suggested that wage gains were beginning to taper off, but yesterday's Labor Department statistics showed that workers continued to enjoy the benefits of a strong labor market.

"If you want a signal of what the labor market looks like, see if employers are paying more," said Drew Mathus, an economist with Lehman Brothers.

It appears that employers are giving their workers raises because tightness in the labor market demands it. The report is not likely to put any pressure on the Federal Reserve to ease interest rates .

"The Fed has got to be pleased with these numbers," said Edward Yardeni, chief investment strategist with Oak Associates, a money management firm in Akron, Ohio. "Interest rates are where they should be."

Minutes Show Fed Focus On Jobs Data (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

The central role that Friday's US jobs data will play in the Federal Reserve's next deliberations on interest rates is clear from the latest Fed minutes published this week.

The minutes show the Fed putting considerable weight on the continued strength of the labour market as an offset to other signs of weakness in the economy, for instance, in manufacturing output.

Policymakers noted "solid gains in employment over recent quarters stood in contrast to the softer pace of economic expansion suggested by the spending and production data".

While the bond market has focused on the weaker spending and output data, the Fed saw "mixed signals about the strength of near- term activity".

When output and jobs data diverge in this way, the standard explanation is that it is just a matter of time before the jobs market weakens, too.

The Fed acknowledged in this week's minutes that this remained the "most likely" explanation, implying that "growth in employment will probably slow over the next quarter or so".

But Fed policymakers are thinking about other possible explanations, too. Strong job creation could be a clue that the output numbers are underestimating the true level of growth in the economy and "the recent pace of activity may have been stronger than that indicated by the spending and production data". Alternatively, the combination of slow growth and robust job creation could be a signal that productivity is weaker than the Fed thought. That would not imply upward revisions to growth but it would make the Fed more reluctant to cut interest rates for a given level of growth.

The jobs market is a crucial driver of consumer spending, as well as a potential source of inflationary pressure.

As long as there is healthy growth in employment and in real wages, the Fed will feel confident that consumption will continue to grow, in spite of the disappearing wealth effect from housing.

The Fed's base-case scenario – that the economy overcomes its present weakness and returns to roughly trend growth later this year – already assumes that job growth will ease and unemployment will drift up a little.

DOJ_NMG_0113825

And with demographic trends reducing the growth in the labour force, officials see payroll growth of 100,000 to 120,000 as consistent with stable unemployment. So the 167,000 increase for December almost certainly exceeds even the Fed's own relatively bullish expectations by a wide margin.

The Fed will take into account a wide range of data on the real economy and prices before making its decisions.

But while jobs and wage growth continues at anything like the present rate, it is hard to see it thinking seriously about cutting interest rates.

Bernanke Defends Fed Banking Supervision (FT)

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Ben Bernanke stoutly defended the Federal Reserve's role in banking supervision on Friday, pushing back against suggestions that this role should be hived off and given to a single regulator as in the UK and Japan.

The Fed chairman said there was no evidence that Fed monetary policy decisions had ever been distorted by its supervisory responsibilities, and said the knowledge it gained by acting as a supervisor was essential to its ability to deal with financial crises.

"The Fed's ability to deal with diverse and hard-to-predict threats to financial stability depends critically on the information, expertise and powers that it holds by virtue of being both a bank supervisor and a central bank," he told the annual meeting of the American Economic Association.

His robust defence of the Fed's supervisory role comes at a time of increased US interest in the UK model of financial regulation, based on a single regulator, the Financial Services Authority, which took over supervisory functions previously performed by the Bank of England.

Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson recently highlighted the problem of multiple overlapping regulators in a speech on US capital market competitiveness in which he noted "while the business of banking has converged over time, we still have four separate banking regulators."

Mr Paulson questioned whether this system was conducive to "regulatory efficiency."

Mr Bernanke on Friday admitted that the "issue of efficiency" was "less easy to dismiss" than concerns that the supervisory role would influence monetary policy.

He conceded that the US banking regulatory system is "complex and in some respects duplicative" and said he supported efforts "to make supervision more effective and less burdensome."

But he said the supervisory authority of the Fed has "significant collateral benefits" – enabling it to respond more quickly, more effectively and in a more informed way to financial crises.

The Fed chairman said the knowledge and relationships built up through supervision were crucial in helping it to deal with recent crises, including the provision of massive amounts of liquidity to the banking system after the terrorist attacks of September 11 2001.

Mr Bernanke said the supervisory role also helped the Fed tackle the failure of Drexel Burnham Lambert in 1990 and the collapse of Long Term Capital Management in 1998.

The Fed chairman also suggested that the Fed's expertise, for instance, in capital markets, allowed it to make positive contributions to overall bank supervision.

While Mr Bernanke did not refer to Basle II specifically, the Fed tended to be more sympathetic to big banks arguments that they should be allowed to put greater weight on their own risk-management systems, than some of the other US banking regulators.

Surge In Jobs Sends Markets Lower (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

Wall Street and the Treasury market ended the first week of 2007 with sharp losses yesterday after a surprising surge in new jobs and wages diminished the hopes of investors for an interest rate cut.

The markets shuddered at the Labor Department's report that employers increased their payrolls by 167,000 in December and increased the hourly wages of workers by 0.5 percent. The unemployment rate, meanwhile, held steady at 4.5 percent.

The report suggested that the economy will not be slowing as much as investors anticipated — news that should prove positive for stocks in the long term, but which raised concerns yesterday that the Federal Reserve might use it as a reason to raise interest rates.

DOJ_NMG_0113826

A rise in rates could crimp consumer spending, and further weaken the housing market by making mortgages more expensive.

At this point, though, economists see policy makers keeping rates steady.

"Until we get an uptick in the unemployment rate, in this environment the Fed will probably stay in a holding pattern," said Michael Strauss, chief economist at Commonfund, pointing to the slowing, but still expanding, economy.

"Moderate economic growth is historically good for the equity market, not a bad thing," he said.

Concerns about the jobs report added to disappointment over a warning by Motorola that it is lowering its fourth-quarter sales estimates, as well as a series of analyst downgrades of technology companies.

Motorola fell $1.61, or 7.8 percent, to $18.94 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 82.68 points, or 0.66 percent, to 12,398.01 — the biggest one-day drop since Nov. 27. The Dow was down more than 115 points at one time yesterday.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index dipped 8.63 points, or 0.61 percent, to 1,409.71.

The Nasdaq composite index dropped 19.18 points, or 0.78 percent, to 2,434.25.

Yesterday's steep declines capped a week that showed the stock market's indecision over whether it wants the economy to slow or perk up.

On Wednesday, the first trading day of 2007, stocks were mixed after the Fed released minutes disclosing some expressions of concern that the weak housing sector might be a drag on the economy. Yesterday's positive jobs snapshot, however, suggesting a quickening economy, caused stocks to drop.

The clash between worries over economic cooling and inflation reflects the caution felt by investors, given the big run-up of stocks in late 2006.

"It's just a sign of volatility," said Jeff Kleintop, chief investment strategist for PNC Wealth Management. "We just went through a rally that could've been drawn with a ruler."

The Dow was down 0.52 percent on the week and year; the S.& P. is down 0.61 percent; but the Nasdaq is up 0.78 percent.

The Federal Reserve, which has kept rates stable since August after raising rates for two years, is expected to leave rates unchanged again when its rate-setting committee meets at the end of the month. Still, investors were nervous enough yesterday to sell stocks and bonds, after a months-long pattern of cashing in recent gains at the first possible sign of a rate increase.

Crude oil prices rose 72 cents, to settle at $56.31 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, but ended nearly 8 percent lower on the week on expectations of sluggish demand because of mild weather in the Northeast and Midwest.

Many technology stocks declined on a spate of analyst downgrades. Intel fell 7 cents, to $21.10; Silicon Laboratories dropped $1.98, or 5.6 percent, to $33.36; and Broadcom fell $1.07, or 3.2 percent, to $32.50.

Strong December sales figures from the nation's two biggest consumer electronics retailers, Best Buy Company and Circuit City Stores, failed to give Wall Street a big enough boost to offset the jobs report and news from Motorola.

Best Buy rose 16 cents, to $50.

Circuit City fell 71 cents, or 3.6 percent, to $19.29, on worries about competition from Best Buy.

The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note declined 10/32, to 9927/32.

The yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rose to 4.64 percent, from 4.60 percent.

The 10-year yield had touched 4.70 percent during the day.

Treasury Prices Hit By US Labour Report (FT)

By Saskia Scholtes, Paul Davies

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Government bond prices tumbled on Friday after a stronger-than-expected report on US labour market conditions caught traders on the back foot.

The fall in US Treasury prices initially brought yields close to where they had started the new year as investors adjusted their outlook for economic growth. The US Labor Department said the US economy created 167,000 new jobs in December and reported an upward revision to November job creation.

